There are 648 condemned men and women on penitentiary death rows in the United States. These people have the added punishment of waiting and anticipating hanging, electrocution or gassing.

This four-year period is the longest period recorded without an execution. The supreme court has been hearing a series of appeals that support overturning the death penalty.

As long as such cases were pending, governors and lower courts banned all executions.

The supreme court rejected the offer to put an end to capital punishment and ruled only on procedural questions. The high court still left the big issue untouched.

Is the death penalty itself an unconstitutional violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibtion against "cruel and unusual punishment?" That is the question that must be settled before another life is taken at a penitentiary.

The supreme court has declared only three punishments to be "cruel and unusual" in its history: criminal punishment for being a narcotics addict, (rather than pusher) expatriation for being a military deserter, and a 15-year sentence for filing a false statement.

In relation to these offenses the killing of a human being appears to be extremely cruel and unusual.

Legislation recently introduced by Congressman Don Edwards proposes a two-year suspension to the death penalty. The supreme court would then have time to face this issue head on and to give congress and the states time to study the problem.

This bill would not only serve a humanitarian need by barring possible executions before that issue is settled, but, as Edwards explained. "The suspension of executions for two years will save our already crowded courts the massive effort of reviewing every single case until a final decision is made."

Cheers for "Man of La Mancha"

A standing ovation rang down the opening night curtain on the Contra Costa Musical Theatre's production of Man of La Mancha last week.

The musical play-within-a-play, now running in Walnut Creek, recounts Miguel Cervantes' imprisonment during the Spanish inquisition. The author, with his trusty squire, Pancho, is thrown into a dungeon with a motley assortment of cutpurses, cutthroats and other forms of low life.

The prisoners try him in a kangaroo court and plan to fine him his possessions: a trunk and a bundle of papers.

The "Papers", of course, are Cervantes' monumental manuscript, "Don Quixote." As his defense, the poet offers to present a charade of his novel. Utilizing the contents of the trunk (theatrical props and costumes) and his fellow inmates, Cervantes enacts his classic.

Donald A. Schrump plays the dual role of Cervantes/Quixote. The transition from the gentle poet to the doddering "Knight of the Oweful Countenance" is not an easy one and Mr. Schrump has trouble with the latter. His singing voice is magnificent, but his attempts to age his speaking voice as Quixote result in inarticulate and often inaudible dialogue.

As the strumpet Aldonza, whom Quixote idealizes as his lady Dulcinea, Delores Sharp Nelson is earthy, basic and zoftig. She is a delight to see as she strides the stage in her rags, straddle-legged and arms akimbo, an open invitation to the lecherous muleteers who vie for her favors.

The orchids for the evening, though, go to Jim Orin as Sancho Panza. Mr. Orin, who is a drama instructor at CCSF, is the only member of the cast who sings and acts with equal facility. His comedy and timing are neat, precise, sometimes staggering; yet he manages to remain unobtrusive in the role.

Orin's rendition of "I Really Like Him" is one of the two show-stoppers of the evening. The other, of course, is the popular "The Impossible Dream."

David Wheeler's direction is generally very good and, at times, exceptional. I don't know whether he or choreographer Terri Kirschner can be credited for the fight scenes and the abduction of Aldonza, but they are truly spectacular.

The setting, by James Demarche, works well, especially his ominous drawbridge-gangplank that opens and closes the show. John Sorenson's lighting gives a properly murky feel to the dungeon, but after 2 1/2 hours the low intensity grows rather hard on the eyes. Judy Disbrow is responsible for the very apt costuming. The orchestra, under the direction of Frank Jilka, is outstanding.

Man of La Mancha is an impressive show and well worth the trip across the bay. Performances are at 8:30 Fridays and Saturdays through October 23rd.

POPULAR ROCK GROUP — Tower of Power play their new song "Back on the Streets Again" at Contra Costa's College hour.

Contra Costa Students Unwind With Tower of Power Concert

Approximately 2,000 people gathered on the quad last week at Contra Costa Collegein San Pablo, to listen and smile to the funky strains of the Tower of Power, a popular East Bay rock group.

The overflow crowd, chatting amiably were witnessing a weekly College Hour sponsored by the Associated Students of Contra Costa College.

Pattie Glidden, commissioner of activities for the college is responsible for College Hour which each Thursday from 12 to 1 p.m. gives the student body a chance to get together and unwind from the drudgeries of everyday school life. Pattie is alloted $15,000 a semester to launch College Hour. She estimates that it costs approximately $100 a week for a student body endorsed concert each Thursday. The remaining funds are used for one large concert given at her discretion.

Tower of Power arrived promptly and set up. They played for about 70 minutes including their top tunes such as "Funkaphyse", "Skating on Thin Ice, and "Back on the Streets Again". Tower dedicated their set to the college cultural center. With the right amount of backing and support a similar program, at City College, could be just as exciting as the one at Contra Costa College.

Should 18 Year Olds Drink?

Last week, a bill that would lower the age for drinking alcoholic beverages to 18 passed through committee in the state senate. The criticism, particularly from clergymen, noted such potentials as greater rates of accidents on the highways and alcoholism on the campuses.

These arguments presume that the majority of "under-age" persons are non-drinkers. This is not factual. The greater number of 18 to 20 year-olds can make use of many accessibilities to liquor (i.e., benevolent bar-owners, friends and relatives).

As far as the threat of alcoholism is concerned, addiction to alcohol is clearly far less fashionable than that of drugs in the so-called "youth culture." Fewer people today want to be like their parents.

Measures such as lowering the drinking age as well as legalization of sexual acts are part of a recent drive to "decriminalize" some of the merely disagreeable habits of many citizens.

Certainly 18 year-olds (or older) are capable of buying and consuming alcohol in a responsible manner; yet, because of the law, the penal system must be overtaxed with such cases as what are non-victim crimes.

Neither should a member of this "Pepsi Generation" be exempt from the same protective laws his elders are often in need of, if he should overindulge. He simply deserves not to be compelled to accept a compromise on adult rights and responsibilities when he graduates from the non-adult world.

How Do The Abortion Laws Affect Women? Find Out

City College students engage in various on and off campus projects — one being the issue of abortion. A select group of women on compus are trying to get together various discussions concerning this subject.

The Womens Abortion Coalition, is concerned with the recent Abortion Laws what they are, how they affect women of the United States, how they affect California women, and what the women (especially at City College) can do about these laws.

Another aspect of the discussions is evaluation of accomplishments and plans of the National Womens Abortion Campaign.

The idea of Abortion has been, and is continuing to be, a pressing subject among women and men. The concern that many women have expressed is now being heard in the legislature.

Women at City College have the opportunity to express their feelings and hear the feelings of others at the Womens Abortion Coalition meetings.

A Western States Abortion Action Conference will take place on October 15 & 16 at the University of California, Berkeley. All sessions will be held in the Student Union between Bancroft Way and Telegraph Ave. and will begin Friday at 8 pm and Saturday at 10 am. The conference is being sponsored by the Women's National Abortion Action Coalition — Western Regional Office. All sisters are welcome.

This opportunity should be grasped not only for the general knowledge that it can provide, but also for the information that could be passed on to others in need of help.

QUESTION: Do you think violence is a legitimate tool to use for social change?

Kent Wood—Speech
I don't think violence should be used for anything except self-defense. If the social situation becomes so bad that it becomes a case of an individual's self-defense against society, then is violence necessary.

Rosemary Martinez—Nursing
No, because to me, everyone tends to get the wrong idea of what you want.
If you use violence in one case, there's a tendency to use it for all the changes you desire; the violence tends to be used for all the change you want, social or otherwise.

Martha Wash—Business
No, violence never helps make anything better, only worse. When violence is used to try and force social justice, it can only fail, and end up making things more unjust.

Angelo Calarveras—Criminology
To a certain extent violence is necessary. People tend to hear very poorly when spoken to, but one picture is worth a thousand words. However, the violence used must be directed to things, not people.

Karen Caul—Gen. Ed.
Well, I think after a long period of time it's the only thing that works. Unfortunately, most of the time when violence is used, the change is for the worse.

Nick Jockson—Music
No way, it just creates bad feelings between the two parties. The only time violence can be validly used, is in time of self-defense....

QUESTION: Recently while looking through a book on techniques of sexual intercourse, I ran across a part on the importance of contact between the penis and the clitoris during intercourse. There was an accompanying diagram which showed this, and it appeared that in order for this to be achieved, the penis would need to be bent or curved upward at a considerable angle in order to make contact with the clitoris. Mine curves slightly downward, and I wondered if this is abnormal?

ANSWER: The overwhelming majority of penises are hinged at the point where they are attached to the body and have no difficulty in bending upward. There is considerable anatomic variation from person to person. Unfortunately, this variation often causes an individual needless concern. It is very, very rare that an anatomic abnormality prevents adequate sexual functioning. When this occurs, there is almost always a solution sometimes requiring no more than a little imagination and experimentation.

QUESTION: Is there any harm in digesting the shells of salted peanuts or salted sunflower seeds? I've been eating them for quite sometime and so far have had no problem.

ANSWER: There is probably no harm in eating the shells you mentioned. If you look real closely you might discover that you are not actually digesting them. Some animals have bacteria in their gut that produce the proper enzymes to break down cellulose and other fibrous materials such as shells and husks. Man is not endowed in this way.
Nondigestable materials are important in increasing the bulk of the stool and tend to prevent constipation. Some people worry that things such as shells and small pits can get stuck in the large intestine and cause inflamations. People have also thought that shells may act as a mechanical irritant and cause diarrhea. My consultant on intestines and their contents tells me that there is evidence disproving both these concers.

Students Moonlight as "Dates"

During these struggling days of recession, with "straight" jobs being scarce, many students have had to procure strange and unusual sideline occupations to survive.

At City College there are two female students, both engaged in the same occupation, prositution.

Joanie, 22 years old, is originally from the mid-west.

"I ran away from home after I graduated from high school. I got into the Haight-Ashbury scene here and didn't pick up my first trick (customer) until I was 20."

Joanie said that she was often propositioned by men while she was hitchhiking. "At first I was insulted but pretty soon I was used to it," she said. "Then one day when I was really pressed for rent, I was hitchhiking over to Berkeley and this young executive type made a real good offer and I accepted."

Joanie said she still gets her customers in this fashion. "I usually hitch down Oak Street to Van Ness Avenue," she said. "When you hitchhike it's pretty hard to get busted. You can only get busted if you make the first move. I get into the car and wait for the man to approach me. It's safer that way."

Joanie said she has never been in jail. "I guess I look pretty innocent, most people are really surprised when they find out how I make my living."

Joanie claims that when she dates (the girls both called their customers "dates") she charges between ten and fifteen dollars.

Joanie is a general education major and said she would eventually like to get into social work. "I've really seen a lot since I left home, I know how people are suffering, and I'd like to help them."

"I got strung out on heroin for about six months, just before my twenty-first birthday. I was living with a guy, and we had a lot of money and nothing to do with it. I went to the hospital in Mendocino and kicked the habit."

"When I got out of the hospital, I got rid of my boy friend and started to school. I use the name Joanie when I date but I'm registered under my real name."

Brenda also uses an alias when she works. She is 20 years old and grew up in the Hunter's Point projects.

"I got pregnant in high school and had to drop out. After I gave the baby away I started running around with some loose dudes, got into smack (heroin) and had to support my habit."

"When I was 18 I was a streetwalker. I started on Fillmore street but had to leave when I got into a hassle with this dude who wanted to be my pimp. He beat me up so I had to split for awhile."

"I worked downtown, for a few months, around sixth street but now I've got a good corner in the tenderloin."

Brenda has since given up drugs and is saving her dating money. "I dig nice clothes and I want to buy some property. I don't want to be dating ten years from now. In this profession you wash out quickly, I don't want to be like some of the girls I work with."

PROSTITUTE — Joanie talks to Guardsman editor.

Brenda said that many of the other hookers (as prostitutes are often called) on Eddy Street are over 40 years old. "Those girls are out sometimes for two or three days before they get a date."

"I want to get some money, some education, and a good man, that's why I'm here at City College. I don't like hustling, I've been working out of a book lately as well as on the street" Brenda said her book appointments sometimes paid up to $100.

She gets her appointments through a theatrical agent who she once dated.

Brenda said that she had once had a pimp, "Because I liked to wake up in the morning and see something lower than myself. Now I don't need anyone, I'm secure in myself, I can get by."

"If men want some good advice," Brenda said, "they shouldn't take a lot of money with them when they go dating. Some of the girls aren't too scrupulous. They'll roll a dude if they think he's carrying a lot of bread."

Amori is also serving as the statewide vice-president of the California Community College Placement Directors Association and as a director of the Navy League of the United States.

Morrison emphasized that the 11 demands drawn up by the inmates were an attempt to force an investigation of the conditions inside the penal facility.

These demands, stated Morrison, were met by Russell G. Oswald, the state correction commissioner with "false acceptance." According to Morrison, Oswald went as far as to verbally accept nine of the 11 demands. In reality, he was already planning a full-scale attack by 1,000 troopers and state police.

Morrison cited several incidents of torture inflicted on "said leaders" in the aftermath of the conflict.

He pointed out the extreme lack of credibility shown by the state after Oswald finally disclosed that ten of the hostages succumbed to gunshot wounds inflicted by the police rather than "slit-throats" as was reported by the state.

Morrison insisted that word of what really went on within the prison must be told to the people.

He feels that an investigation is essential because the state releases have no credibility. Whin word is released from inmates, the state simply claims that it can't be verified.

After his talk, Morrison held an informal period of questions and answers in the Young Socialist Alliance workroom in the student activities building.

State Scholarships Are Available Now

Undergraduate college students who are in need of financial assistance to continue college should file a State Scholarship application. Approximately 9,600 new State Scholarships will be awarded in April 1972 for use in 1972-73.

Most of the new awards will be available to high school seniors but the number available for currently enrolled college students who are not already in the State Scholarship Program will be approximately 1,500 in number.

State Scholarships are available for use at any accredited four-year college in California, plus the California Maritime Academy. The awards range from $500 to $2,000 at independent colleges, $300 to $600 at the University of California, and are in the amount of fees charged to students at the California State Colleges (approximately $160).

Students planning to attend a community college during the 1972-73 academic year may have their scholarship held in reserve for them until such time as they attend a four-year college. The former 24-year-old age limit for new applicants has been raised to age 30 effective with this year's competition.

Applications are available in the office of Financial Aid of every California college or directly from the State Scholarship and Loan Commission, 714 P Street, Sacramento, California 95814. Applications must be filed with the State scholarship Commission by midnight, November 19, 1971. Scores on the Scholastic Aptitude Test must also be submitted as part of an application.

Exciting Rhythms By Big Black and His Congregation

Big Black and his Congregation performed at City College and promptly added new converts to his flock.

Big Black is a conga drummer with a flawless sense of timing and an even more flawless sense of music. And his quartet of fellow musicians attest to the latter fact.

Black was born in Georgia and learned his instrument at the hands of some of the finest Cuban drummers around. After a stay in Florida, Black made it to New York where he played with such greats as Max Roach and the incomparable Dizzy Gillespie.

He later moved to California where he earned rave notices at the 1965 Monterey Jazz Festival.

Big Black called his music center of the road. "It has a yesterday bottom, a now top, and an African middle."

The group performed for two hours, doing such selections . "The Afro Shuffle", "Cross the Swan. ", and the ritualistic "Timbales Ra/Congo Chops." The latter song based itself on an African ritual called a "molimo" in which women and children are not allowed to participate.

Big Black told the audience that in normal cases, it builds up to such a frenzy that one gets involved (he tried to tone that part down), but he did get the crowd moving and stomping a bit.

Accompanying Black was a quartet of fine musicians.

Guitarists "Silent Sam", and Al Ingram were given ample chances to cut loose, and they used it to full advantage. Sam's playing sounded like a cross between Jeff Beck and Steve Cropper, but was highly original most of the time. Ingram took musical qualities more like Eric Clapton. He "wailed" with his fuzz box, to give an added dimension to the free-form jazz guitar.

Ray Evans, on timbales, was Big Black's perfect percussion mate. The rapport he had with Black was so beautiful, that a traditional drummer (which the group lacked) would have set it off-balance.

Tying in the two guitars and two percussions is a man named Coffee on bass guitar. He did hit some heavy lines, although he did sound a bit pedestrian at times. If he was given a chance to solo, at least once during a tune, he could easily be a very driving and potent force in the band. He showed signs of it that afternoon.

Colegio De la Mision Formed to Bring Classes to Mission Area

Night school college courses are now available within the Mission District for the Latin-American community. Colegio de la Mision began first classes September 13 at Samuel Gompers High School, 110 Bartlett Street, San Francisco.

The idea of taking college-level adult night education out into the Latin community was conceived by Ricardo Larranaga and John Rodelo of the League of United Latin American Countries. Mr. Larranaga worked with Dean Warren R. White of City College Evening Division on the proposal during the summer.

After agreeing on this program, Dean White and LULAC organizers proceeded to work out a tentative schedule of classes. "The classes offered are essentially a compromise based on the needs of the people expressed through LULAC, what City College Evening Division had to offer, and what classes were easily transportable to the local site," admitted Dean White.

Ten courses are currently offered. Art (Pre-Columbian, Mexican, Central and South American Art History), Business Math, Operation of Small Businesses, English (Phonics for Reading and Spelling), Elementary Composition, Urban Government, Psychology (Career Orientation), Sociology (Organization of the Latin-American Community), Concersational Spanish, and Practical Public Speaking.

Students taking classes receive the same unit credit as they would at City College. Instructors are both from City and the Latin community. "The primary criteria for City College teachers wishing to participate was that they speak Spanish," said Dean White.

The offering of City College courses is only the beginning for Colegio de la Mision. LULAC educational co-ordinators, led by Ricardo Larranga, plan to include courses form other Bay Area colleges. Negotiations in this regard are currently underway with Antioch College West.

Initial response from the Mission community has reportedly been enthusiastic. Ruben Hernandez of La Raza Unida commented, "I worked during the summer as a recruiter to test community interest, and we pre-registered over 700 people. Now all the classes are full and the whole thing is really working well."

For schedules and information contact Ricardo Larranaga of LULAC at 826-5336.

THE GUARDSMAN

Morgenthau Lectures on Policy

"In the end, nobody can say, and only those who can deceive themselves and others can predict what the year 2000 will be like."

These words concluded Hans Morgenthau's lecture on "The Future of Great Power Relations". The witty professor of political science at City College of New York, spoke on Tuesday October 12 at the Visual Arts Building before an enthusiastic and receptive audience.

Morgenthau jumped into his topic and highlighted the past two decades after World War II as a struggle between two super powers: United States and Russia. Huddled around these powers were their allies. The post World War II struggles were also cleverly based on morality.

It was a struggle between good and evil and the U.S., under Eisenhower, maintained the position that neutrality was itself evil. "It was a simple policy, he stated, "but an unusual interpretation of world politics."

The aspect of morality gave the world situation a cutting and double edged blade, for man always felt that good must triumph over evil. Morgenthau pointed out that this was not always the case.

Today in 1971, the same essential super power relationship exists, but it is more complex and more unstable.

Morgenthau stated that the allies of the superpowers are now pursuing their own nationalistic interests.

In the American camp, France, West Germany, and Japan often pursue conflicting goals and hence strenuous relationships often exit goals with the U.S.

In the Communist alliance of Russia, unity is maintained by the Red Army. He cited the 1956 invasion of Hungary and the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia as proof.

Today's situation lends itself to slightly favoring the U.S. "The Poles and Czechs would just as soon shoot at Russians as anybody else," he stated.

But the world scene will change dramatically within the next few short years. In the future there will be three super powers: Russia, America and China.

It was in his discussion of China that Morgenthau was at his best.

The professor began by simply stating, "U.S. non-recognition of China was an absurd policy. Non-recognition makes sense only if the policy may change a regime. It has taken the U.S. 21 years to realize that the communist government is here to stay."

United States recognition of China would have come as early as 1950 if America had not misinterpreted China's actions. General MacArthur and President Truman felt that Chinese support of the North Korean Army was in effect Chinese action against the U.S. This is a false concept of reality.

Morgenthau points out that China felt that she was being attacked and Morgenthau made it clear that China would oppose any army on the march towards the Yellow River Valley. The action of China was more nationalist than communist in nature.

Atzinger Quits Student Council

Student Council member, Dan Atzinger has resigned from the council, effective last Monday.

Atzinger, head of the powerful financial committee, was unavailable for comment at the time of his resignation.

Informed sources, both at the student council and at the experimental college, claim that Atzinger was fed up with the job, and that he has quit campus activities.

Atzinger has been active on campus since his first day of admission. He was involved, before his election, in investigating the finances of the student council. Later he served as chairman of the campus seal committee. The choice of a new campus seal was hotly contested because of confusion about the contest rules. Atzinger resigned as chairman following a protest brought by a delegation of Chinese students.

Cleveland Wrecking Company

There's going to be a happening tomorrow night, October 22, from 9:12 p.m. in the Student Union Building, as The Cleveland Wrecking Company returns to City College.

There will be dancing as well as listening to the new strains of the "Wreckers" which now includes piano, organ, and congo drums.

Refreshments are being donated by Coca-Cola and the volunteer efforts of the mothers who help to operate the Child Care Center.

A fantastic light show has been promised by Paul Hewitt of the Physics department. Other faculty guests will include Dudley Yasuda and Brown Miller.

Wrecking Company concert will make for a fine evening and also support the Draft Counseling office and Child Care Center which works for the students at CCSF.

City College Visited by Anti-Busing Candidates

Two major critics of the busing law are also candidates for the Board of Supervisors.

Mrs. Marjorie Lemlow and business executive Robert G. Nelson spoke at a special anti-busing meet on October 15 at City College.

Robert Nelson

Robert Nelson has been endorsed by five different political organizations.

Nelson emphasized the fact that he is not anti-busing, but a very serious candidate for the office.

So serious is his candidacy that he has called as the gut issue of his campaign the question: Who is being represented by our supervisors?

Nelson said that Mrs. Dianne Feinstein is "incredibly wrong" to state she is pro-busing for public schools when her own daughter attends a private school. "We have more segregated schools today than at the end of last year."

Nelson also accused the major press of San Francisco of refusing to publish the actual attendance statistics of the busing program. He said that Hugh Wire, Dr. Shaheen's administrative assistant, was giving out false information.

"The Board of Education," said Nelson, "has compiled the actual race breakdown, but won't release it to the public."

He pointed out that there were many points that Judge Stanley Weigel made in his busing ruling that can be refuted by evidence. One example was that there were many schools in San Francisco that were naturally integrated before the ruling.

Nelson supports Proposition "S" to have an elected school board. He was instrumental in getting the measure on the ballots two years ago. There has been one major change in the current proposition, though:

Robert G. Nelson

In 1969, Nelson's measure called for district-wide voting of the members. Nelson discovered that although there was great independence by each neighborhood, the City tended to vote the same as a whole. The new ballot measure calls for city-wide voting.

Scholarship Bias Willed by Donar

Over twenty percent of all scholarships offered in the 1971-1972 City College catalogue can be awarded only to women students.

None are offered just for men. Kenneth V. Castellino, financial aids officer, clarified this significant point.

"When someone dies," he said, "the terms of a money gift are specific in the will. Sometimes the condition is, 'I want the money left to a woman, see that it gets to one.' The school is only the agent."

City College accepts any money it can get for scholarships. This amounts to approximately $3,000 annually.

Three women's organizations, two women alumni and former assistant dean Edith Pence have founded scholarship funds for which only women are eligible.

Castellino thinks that these women may have felt that it was a man's world and they wanted to get more women into their fields.

The only male students at City on specifically men-awarded scholarships are those who have received the BIG HAND AWARD for athletics in high school.

There are none of these students attending City this year that Mr. Castellino is aware of.

The head of financial aid said some scholarships tend to go to men because many awards are offered in particular fields that are now predominately male, such as engineering.

"The prejudice is not built in by any requirement. The student with the highest grade point average is selected in many awards," according to Castellino.

The scholarship breakdown for prizes given last June were 23 for men and 20 for women. Figures for hotel and restaurant management awards were not available.

Scholarships are not the primary source of financial aid at City College.

Grants, loans and jobs account for one half million dollars of federal and state aid annually.

These are usually awarded according to the financial need of the student.

Castellino said, "If I were leaving any money, I would leave it with no strings attached, unless I had a feeling for a specific field."

Westbrook Wants More Youth Jobs, District Elections

"It's not a matter of stepping into politics, it's a matter of steping into place," said Yvonne Westbrook, who gave a campaign speech on campus last week.

Yvonne is running for a seat on the San Francisco board of supervisors.

If elected, Yvonne intends to open more jobs, for the under and non-employed, especially among youth. She also will call for a change in the abortion laws, and will propose more and better facilities for drug rehabilitation.

Yvonne says that currently supervisors are elected at large, therefore allowing those with larger bankrolls to prevail. She feels a district election plan is needed so that the various San Francisco communities can be better represented.

Yvonne, who has no previous political background, is a native San Francisean and a student at the University of San Francisco.

At Herbert Hoover Junior High she was class president and at Polytechnic High School she was president of the Black Students Union.

"Some people will say young and previously inexperienced candidates don't know what to do in a position of authority but that is in correct," Yvonne asserted as her audience buzzed in agreement.

Yvonne said she entered the supervisor's race when the influence of many friends sharpened her interest. She emphasized there is no connection with her running and that of Mary Rogers of the Western Addition Project Area Committee.

Yvonne is a WAPAC member and a close associate of Mary Rogers. Yvonne's political career was launched when she took a job with WAPAC and served in the capacity of a representative at various city planning meetings.

"These meetings helped me to better understand the needs of the people. I am now able to whether or not the needs of the people are being met. After careful analysis of the situation I decided to run for supervisor."

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Get off of Your Butt And Register to Vote

The student has finally achieved the long awaited dream of political power.

This student power was made real when the United States Supreme Court ruled that those people between the ages of 18 and 21 years of age have the right to vote in federal elections.

At this point, voter registration in this age group has been of a very low percentage.

There are over one million potential voters in California between the ages of 18 and 21. So far only 10 percent have registered to vote.

Most people in the 18 to 21 age group attribute their lack of enthusiasm in registering to the fact that this is an off year, with no national elections.

It is a sad fact that many of these people will put off registering until election day. However you cannot vote if you haven't registered ahead of time.

Students and young people want change, voting should be the most important and influencial force that these people have at their command.

The 18 to 21 year old age group should realize that there is power in numbers. This large new voting bloc could swing an election for a candidate. The candidate would be willing to work with and for programs appealing to this new group of voters.

Politicians would be certain to fulfill their campaign promises knowing that if they did not this young group would be swift in seeing that their re-election never took place.

The young voters should be able to do the most to combat problems in which students are interested, such as the Viet Nam conflict, the polluted environment, civil rights, the draft etc.

It is surprising to see that the minority groups have not been pushing voter registration in the 18 to 21 year old age group. They should realize that students seem to be most aware and receptive of the minority groups and their problems. Thus far there has been no big push from any of the minority groups.

Actual student power will get most of its strength from its voting force. After a student registers, he will then have to take the next big step and actually get out and vote to utilize this power. They are also going to have to go out into the community to register other 18 to 21 year olds to reach their full potential as a voting bloc.

Now is the time to get interested in voting. Register to vote and get others to register, only then will students insure that their power will be felt within the democratic system.

New Comer's First Problem

Every semester hundreds of new students are admitted to City College. Each one of them is faced with many challenges throughout the term but the challenges mainly occur during the first week or two.

The student's first problem after he has encountered the masses at registration is to locate his classes. To do this one must have some knowledge of the campus, but it is not provided by the school.

There are no maps except for one small, obscure one in the back of the college printed time schedule. It is difficult to decipher its abbreviations. A student then has to resort to inquiry which is not particularly reliable. Rather than going to the gymnasium on the northern end of the campus, he may be headed for the theatre on the eastern side.

Once he has reached his destination he may run into another problem which not only affects him but all students. . . overcrowded conditions.

Students new to City College should become familiar with the regular activities of the school which may be open to him. Only a few posters scattered about show any sign of social organizations. . . and these are confusing as well as limited.

Becoming familiar with a new school is important and should be given more consideration by college officials. An orientation program should be offered to new students as an introduction to the college. If this were done, perhaps more people would know where they were going.

How to Elect Supervisors

As important as who we elected to office is the method by which we elect them.

Currently, a person running for supervisor in San Francisco must be elected at large, meaning by the city as a whole rather than by district.

Two propositions, S and I, which call for an elective school board and a separate board of governors for City College respectively, also specify that the two boards be elected in the same manner as the supervisors.

The major drawback to this method of electing public officials is the lack of representation the neighborhoods receive. The Chinese, for example, have no members on the Board of Supervisors, although they constitute one of the largest ethnic groups in San Francisco.

Appeal of candidates and their understanding of each neighborhood's problems; a resident of Hunters point, Chinatown, or the Mission district is much better equipped to understand the issues of these areas than a person who lives in the Sunset or Saint Francis Woods.

If we elected congressmen in this manner, a candidate would have to be an expert on every district in the country.

And must the voters in one area lose out on representation of the person they like because he or she can't impress enough voters in the rest of the city?

Election of supervisors, and of other public officials, by district would rectify this problem. Split the city up into voting districts, much like congressional districts, and allow the people in each section to elect men and women that will best represent them.

Tommy is Never Going to Die

"Tommy" is a show that looks as though it's never going to die. Nor should it because it is this youthful, vigorous, vibrant, rock opera.

Written by Peter Townshend, the work first received public notice via the recording by the "Who," British rock group.

Earlier this year "Tommy" was presented at Lone Mountain College. So popular was the show, the limited run was extended and two performances a night played to capacity weekend houses.

Now, after a stint in Berkeley, the cast has moved to the friends and relations hall on the Great Highway for a run that closes October 25th.

The "Tommy" of the title is a young man who becomes psychologically deaf, dumb and blind after seeing his father kill his mother's lover. Guided through life by a white-faced mime, Tommy develops an extraordinary sense of touch and becomes a pinball wizard.

He undergoes a "miracle cure" and becomes a new Messiah with followers flocking to his rock rallies. The converts revolt, though, when Tommy demands that they, too, become deaf, dumb and blind. Rejected and alone, Tommy is finally a shattered shell.

Under the direction of John Pasquletti, this rather banal story has become a thing of great beauty...a profound and moving sensory and sensually experience.

Using 26 young dancers, who must surely be the most physically fit and the most beautiful people in the bay area, Pasqueletti has filled his open stage with a constant surge of vitality.

The title role is danced by John Loschmann, and the casting couldn't be better. A skilled and attractive dancer, Loschmann is perfect as the bewildered young man who becomes the pawn of quack doctors, a gypsy acid queen and a pederastic uncle, among others.

His small, waiflike face if framed by an aureole of hair that makes Jerome Rigel look like a Marine recruit by comparison. He is so trusting, so innocent that you want to reassure him that everything will be all right.

Special praise goes to Mallorie Robinson, Patrick Bagwell, Andrew Wood, Marianne DeFilippo and Fred Bratcher if only because they had the bigger, showier roles.

The singers (Ted Hall, Norman Meister, Jeanie Scolini and Ron Sullivan) are fine and their lyrics seem much more easily understood now than at the Lone Mountain production.

The orchestra, too, is very good though at times their decibel level becomes actually painful.

Entertainment Rip-off at Pepperland

After attending a concert at Pepperland one must come out with some painful conclusions. You are subjected to sitting or standing on a hard floor, listening to poor sound that is billed as being quadraphonic, and suffering through a 90 degree heat. One's first concert at Pepperland is often his last.

Since the closing of the Fillmore West live rock concerts are only available in limited quantities. The concerts that feature the top rock groups are brought to this area by two groups of producers. Bill Graham is one, the other major producer is Fun Productions which works mainly through Pepperland in San Rafael. Fun Productions does little for the audience but prevent the rock group.

Every aspect of a Pepperland Concert is second rate up to the cheap printing of the tickets. The producers obviously take little interest in their audience by not providing proper seating or other accommodations.

Pepperland was closed for several months and was just recently re-opened. In order to enjoy a concert at Pepperland one must be prepared to pay the cost.

CONGESTION - It is still a problem to park at City College. This cramped reservoir is the college's obsolete answer to student parking needs.

California's Ineffective Planning

Floyd H. Hyde, assistant secretary of the department of housing and urban development, recently charged California's state government with ineffective and inadequate planning.

While in San Francisco, Hyde stated that despite having the largest urban growth problems in the nation, California spends less than any other state on urban planning, with the exception of Indiana.

This outspoken public summation of the situation at last gives Californians at least a possible glimmer of hope. It's not really surprising that the comment came from someone on the federal level, either. State officials for years have seemed to remain blissfully unaware of California's monstrous spreading urban and suburban cancer, which threatens not only natural resources and wildlife, but the very survival of the state's residents themselves.

The ongoing myth of California as hub of the "Golden West," land of rugged natural beauty and wide open spaces, is grinding to a smoggy halt like a freeway traffic jam.

No longer can Californians delude themselves that the real pollution problems are "back east in the big cities." The fact is that for years California has led the nation in outright abuse and rape, for commercial gain, of the land, air and water.

Legislators continue to behave as if Los Angeles smog, fires, floods, and landslides are all jokes invented by the L. A. Times, or merely rallying points for chronic malcontent citizen groups and hippies.

Other states have demonstrated an awareness of their urban problems. Massachusetts and Washington, both spend ten times more than California on state planning and coordination of urban programs.

Rams Prepare for Basketball Opener

Seeking his seventh consecutive Golden Gate Conference basketball title, Coach Sid Phelan has been working approximately 40 City College hardcourters in preparation for their Nov. 26, non-title season opener here against a formidable Long Beach City quintette.

Since his arrival at City 16 years ago, Phelan has won 12 cureuit crowns.

Returning lettermen for the Rams are Steve Flaherty, Terry Bradley, Charles Goodwin, Robert Taylor, Willie Daigle, all backcourt performers, and Ron Dale, switched to forward from his guard duties of last year.

Although Coach Phelan deems it too early to forecast his varsity roster, he nevertheless has indicated that two first year men, Center Cliff Williams (Balboa) and Forward Bobby Pruitt (Wilson), have shown sufficient ability to don the spangles of CCSF.

Phelan ranks league opponents Merritt, Chabot and Laney as the main threats to snap the Red'n White's domination of loop play.

Two important tournaments await the Rams during the latter part of December.

The Modesto Tournament, embracing 16 contestants, is slated for Dec. 15-18. Last year, Phelan's charges went to the finals of this meet and lost a heartbreaker to Long Beach by the slim margin of three points.

On Dec. 27 the three day San Joaquin De Ja Tournament gets under way with eight teams participating. In the 1971 tourney City College was eliminated in the second round of play.

The Rams open conference play on the home planks, Jan. 4, when they face Foothill junior college.

FOXY CHICKS - Dylan Schamus and Rosemary Tobin model two of the many costumes to be sold by the Drama Department.

Costume Sale To be Held

M-G-M has nothing on the CCSF Drama Department. Following in the footsteps of the major movie studio, the campus theatre will hold a huge costume sale Tuesday October 26, from 9 till 11 am in the courtyard of the Little Theatre.

For an absurdly low price, you can outfit yourself in any of the overflow of costumes from past productions. Ranging from funky to exotic, utilitarian to psychedelic, the clothes are being sold off to clear out the overcrowded wardrobe department and to defray the costs of future shows.

The Doctor's Bag

QUESTION: My ex-boyfriend recently forced his attention on me in spite of the fact that I told him I was a virgin. When he was through with me, he stated that I couldn't have been a virgin because "it went in too easily" and I didn't bleed. It is my body and I know that I never had previous sexual relations. Please clarify this because he honestly believes I'm a loose woman.
I'm writing this the day after it happened, but are there any very early signs of pregnancy? I seem to feel sick to my stomach.

ANSWER: Very sadly, situations such as the one you describe happen frequently, and I, for one, have a difficult time distinguishing such an event from rape. In addition to being grossly selfish, your ex-boyfriend is also ignorant of some basic sexual facts. Ease of intercourse the first time and an absence of bleeding is no indication of a lack of virginity.
A woman has the right not to have intercourse unless she wants to and this should be unrelated to whether or not she is a virgin. Rather than hide behind technicalities, she should be prepared to take drastic measures to insure her basic human rights.
It is too early to tell if you are pregnant now, but it sounds as if the way you feel may be related to the upsetting experience you had. In such circumstances you may miss your next menstrual period without being pregnant; instead of becoming panicked, you might visit a physician that you know if you have not had a period in another month. In the meantime, if you remain upset very much longer, it would be wise for you to talk this out with someone so that this experience does not jeopardize future relationships with men. Your ex-boyfriend sounds like he needs professional help.

QUESTION: Recently there have been many advertisements for "water beds." Are they good for the back? Over a long period of time could they be harmful to posture? Are they better than a firm mattress?

ANSWER: Waterbeds are mattress-shaped bags made of a heavy weight flexible plastic and are filled with about 200 gallons of water. Because the water can shift around within its container, a comfortable sensation of lying on a supporting surface that yields completely to any small movement is created. People who purchase them claim that they help induce restful sleep. Advertisements play up how enveloping, security inducing and relaxing the waterbed is. They also hint that there are some sexual benefits to be reaped from their use.
Whether the waterbed enhances sensuality would be difficult to evaluate. A friend indicates that a new dimension is added to intercourse since the bed is so responsive, but he adds that if one is in a hurry, it is easy to lose your balance.
The recent medical literature does not contain information about harmful or beneficial effects when the waterbed is used for back trouble or posture. My orthopedic consultant advises that sleeping on your abdomen in any kind of bed would aggravate back trouble. For low back pain, sleeping on your side on a firm mattress or placing the mattress on the floor is recommended. If you must sleep on your back, pillows should be inserted under the knees to flatten out the hollow of the back.
A word of caution, a gallon of water weighs eight pounds. Some waterbeds weigh nearly a ton. Not all second floor bedrooms in old dwellings can support such a weight.

Jesus Christ Crucified

The rock-opera Jesus Christ Superstar, wound up its two-day assessment at the Oakland Coluseum with Christ, sung by Tom Westerman, accepting a bottle of whiskey from one of the cast's groupies!

Two thousand years ago, Christians were thrown to the lions in the coluseum as opposed to today where the fat-walleted audiences were thrown to the Christians, or were they trying to portray the life of Christ in today's language really?

It was interesting to note such delineations from the book as not even including a resurrection scene, or perhaps portraying Christ, a carpenter, as a pale, sniveling "miracle worker".

Another interesting portrayal was of Judas, Iscariot, sung quite well by Carl Anderson, a Black man.

In general, it was very difficult to tell whether the production was sincere or just very, very profitable financially.

But the music was very nice.

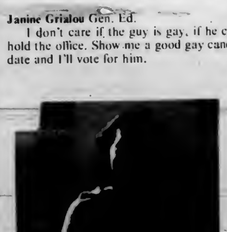
Student Stike Planned for Nov. 2

This year, as last year, a student strike is planned for the second day of November. The object is to protest the Viet Nam war. The strike is to last for two days, but strike organizers claim they don't expect this year's strike to be quite as successful as last year's.

Supposedly the strike is against the war, but a second effect it will have is to be against education in general for the two days.

The strike will mean that all who participate will have to cut classes, which, ultimately, is the purpose of the strike. Will the strike really help to end the war or will it put a dent, however slight, into the education of those who participate?

There is agreement that the war must end but not at the price of education. After all, isn't it the educational system and the schools that keep so many students out of the Army?



Why not hold the strike on a Saturday instead of a school day?

QUESTION: Would you vote for a "Gay" candidate for public office?

Janine Grialou Gen. Ed.
I don't care if the guy is gay, if he can hold the office. Show me a good gay candidate and I'll vote for him.

Ilona Oba Gen. Ed.
I don't really give a damn whether he's gay or not. If he is qualified, it doesn't really matter what his sexual background is.

Elaine Krelle Secretarial
If he is qualified; although he really wouldn't have much of a chance against the straight world. However, he shouldn't let his sexual preferences get in the way of his candidacy.

Paul Heaney Astronomy
Yes, simply because if a person is qualified enough for any job, I can't see how his sex life enters into it. How a person makes love is his own business.

Andy Billips Business
It really depends on his qualifications. It makes no difference if he's gay or not, the qualifications are what matters, not what he does on the side.

Phil Bazell Journalism
Sure, he has the same sexual freedom that I have. I don't see, if he's a sound candidate, his being gay should have any effect on his holding office.

World Powers Under Morgenthau Scrutiny

So it is today. Mao and his government have worked and are working to wipe out the colonial influence that had become so much a part of China's life before 1949. "In effect," stated Morgenthau, "Mao is working to restore China to its former greatness as the middle kingdom of the world."

In its role as a future great power, China must realize that she is a nation among other nations, and must deal with other world powers on a level not above, but equal with them.

With this in mind, Morgenthau commented on Nixon's upcoming trip to Asia, "I would prefer not to see Nixon visit China. There are other ways of recognizing a nation. Chou en Lai has the best cards . . . It would be interesting to see if Nixon can survive politically."

The future of the great powers will be a tripartate of leadership: China perhaps the dominate nation, followed by the United States and Russia. Morgenthau concluded, "In the end nobody can say."

Anti-War Action Conference Being Held Next Sunday

A conference to plan the actions for this year's fall anti-war offensive will be held this Sunday, October 24 at San Francisco State College.

Speakers will include John Williams, Coordinator of the National Peace Coalition, Hal Rankin, Editor in the G.I. Press Service; and D'Army Bailey, Berkeley City Councilman.

The Conference is planning most of the action for the two main activities of this year's fall offensive, the national strike on November 3 and the march on San Francisco, November 6.

Supervisorial Candidates Speak At Campus Anti-Busing Meet

side of Phelan Avenue. She is also one of the few conservatives in the supervisorial race.

She is running for two prime reasons: She feels that the people of San Francisco have been disenfranchised by the Board of Supervisors and she would like to see more women on politics.

She is concentrating on the busing issue because she feels that if you can get people to look at the educational system, you can get them to look at any other issue. This is one reason she says she can sway the youth vote.

She supports Proposition "S" and agrees with Robert Nelson about the City tending to vote as a whole. Mrs. Lemlow said that it would be discrimination if a voter could only vote for one candidate for the Board of Education.

She would like to lower taxes and have the tax money spent wisely. She called the new sewer tax "for the birds".

She supports the Duskin petition (Proposition "T").

Continuing to speak about busing, she claimed that Lowell High School's status is being changed due to Judge Weigel's decision. It is helping to lower its present standards, Mrs. Lemlow predicts that a terrific battle will be waged over this.

Mrs. Lemlow did say that Judge Weigel is a "World Federalist," which means he is in favor of one world government. She said he is more concerned with factions than with the majority of people.

Mrs. Lemlow cautioned that there might be inter-county busing going on. There have already been four meetings of school superintendents from three Bay Area counties to discuss plans.

She claimed that the reason for this was due to the middle-class exodus to the suburbs.

State Applications

Students wishing to attend any of the 19 state colleges in Fall, 1972 must file an application between November 1 and November 30. Applications may be obtained from your counselor.

Chancellor Glenn Dumke stated that veterans and community college transferees will be given first preference.

The chancellor also insisted that applications received during the month of November will be judged on an equal basis.

"A student who files for admission on November 29," said Dumke "will receive no less preference than a student who files on November 1."

La Raza Receives Money to Help Stop Drop-Outs

Student Council allocated $420 in student funds to La Raza Unida's self-help organization composed of Spanish speaking students of City College.

The group is attempting to fight the extremely high, 15% drop out rate of Spanish speaking students, which is attributed to the despotic economic condition of the Spanish community. This small grant will be used in purchasing text books and food for needy students. A small portion of the funds will also be used to obtain office supplies and print an information pamphlet.

La Raza Unida also intends to sponsor benefit concerts and other fund raising activities, since the demand for its services far exceeds their supply of money. Their goal is to work until they remove all social and economical barriers suffered by its members.

Anyone wishing to join or lend a helping hand should contact Sam Martinez, Sam Sanchez or any of the other people in B-5 or B-6. Membership is free.

Photography Student Proves Ability in Contest

Dennis Barloga, a San Francisco City College photography student, won second prize at the first annual San Francisco photography fair held at Washington Square last week.

Dennis's photo is a picture of a very tired young man who ran from the water and jumped in the sand exhausted. The facial expression and the setting of the photograph add to the realism of human experience.

It was taken at Lake Temescal in Oakland, on a San Francisco Unified School District field trip outing.

Co-sponsored by City College and the North Beach Camera Shop, the fair drew 120 entrees from professional and amateur photographers.

Four judges, including Maury Cambi and Bob Stronmeyer of C.C.F.S.'s photography department, picked freeplance photographer Rudi Bentman's entry for first prize.

The photographs were unmarked so the judges would have not pre-conceived opinions of the photographs.

Other C.C.S.F entrees who placed in the finals were Mike Snowden and Calvin Jeung.

A photographer for only three years, Dennis Barloga plans to become a freelance photographer after graduation from college.

Dennis's prize winning photograph and all other top sixteen photographs are on public display at the North Beach camera shop.

HEALTH SERVICE FEE PROPOSED

The Student Health Advisory Board set the ground work to propose a referendum which, if passed, would require at registration, a mandatory fee of $3.75 per semester per student.

The money collected would be redistributed to the student in the form of new and improved health facilities and programs.

The proposed action came at the Student Board weekly meeting.

Jim O'Donnell, newly elected fiscal chairman for the committee, explained the planned program as being extremely benificial to students with low incomes.

Student health programs of this type which are already in existence on a number of Community College campuses in California will be studied before any definite action would be taken here at City College.

The proposal will be voted on during the election of City College's Spring '72 officers.

The remainder of the two hour meeting was spent zeroing in on the definite areas of concentration the board intends to pursue this year.

Past reports of board work in the Mission, Western Addition, Chinatown, OMI and Richmond-Sunset communities were presented.

Mike O'Shaughnessy, a board member and representative of the National Council for Prevention of Drug Abuse, presented information on his pilot program of drug abuse.

O'Shaughnessy's program will be presented next week to a number of specific health classes. It is geared to the collegiate level, and its success will determine City College's course to combat widespread misuse of drugs.

Bob Owens, publicity director for the Student Board, presented a number of new programs, one of which was a proposed half-way house for City College students. Further action on the house would be taken later. — Mike Lorenz

City Government Topic of Robert Mendelsohn Talk

Incumbent supervisor Robert Mendelsohn appeared at City College last Friday as the guest of political science students.

The articulate and youngest member of the Board of Supervisors talked about the idiosyncracies of San Francisco government.

"We have a hybrid form of government here in San Francisco," he stated. "We have combined both the city and county ruling agencies." Mendelsohn then presented a concise and informative explanation of San Francisco politics. He defined the mayoralty and the board of supervisors as the executive and legislative agencies that work together to govern San Francisco.

"The power of the board of supervisors is in the city budget. We allocate some 500 million of a 700 million dollar budget. The school board regulates the remaining 200 million." He explained that the leadership of the executive office is shared by the mayor and the chief administrative officer.

These two men are helped and advised by various commissions and boards that report to them on a regular basis. San Francisco's current city/county government is the result of the 1933 City Charter which grew from people's rejection of the politics of those days.

With this explanation of city government as his background, Mendelsohn began to attack present city problems.

He described San Francisco's basic problem as the allocation of funds at a local level to maintain effective government. Mendelsohn stated that San Francisco, in order to survive and serve its people adequately must have help from the suburban resident, who draws his pay from the city and utilizes city services.

Cloud Hall East Design Comes Under Crossfire

City College overcrowding is of concern to everyone. Cloud Hall East is a proposal by administrators to alleviate the problem. The five-story, 7.86-million dollar extension wing would house classrooms, labs, faculty offices, and possibly a cafeteria facility.

Victor B. Graff has responsibility for the project as District Director of Physical Facilities. In his office at City College Mr. Graff supplied facts and figures concerning the structure. "Cloud Hall East was first conceived in 1967, when the 10-year plan for new facilities was drawn up," he recalled, "at first the idea was to extend the present library; but it was later decided to use the wing for other purposes, and eventually build a separate library. The current design is the third."

Red tape lies ahead prior to final approval by the School Board Oct. 28. By Nov. 1 it must go to Sacramento for approval by the Chancellor and the Legislature's Finance Committee since fiscal year 73-74-75 funds are sought for the construction. The earliest date envisioned for completion of the 100,000 gross-square-feet building is mid-1975.

Mr. Graff stressed, "We must get this approved now! It is badly needed and construction costs are rising each month by one per cent."

Opposition to the proposal from many students and faculty has arisen, primarily over location of the building.

Lawrence Francheschina, head of architecture division of Engineering Department, stated, "I was opposed to the idea at first. The preliminary design involved removing the first and second floors of Cloud Hall, and adding an extension to the library. It was bad planning."

Franceschina helped form the building committee of concerned students and faculty which was instrumental in changing the first design.

"More space is obviously needed on campus. The administration has had a hard time trying to satisfy everyone, and the new designs are therefore a compromise. They include multi-leveled patios and terraces to preserve the area as a place to eat and enjoy the view," he continued.

Student Endorsed

The Associated Students Council has officially endorsed the supervisorial candicy of Tom Ryan, a City college student who also works at City Hall.

Basing his campaign on efficiency of city government, Ryan is advocating charter revision which would give the board of supervisors power to make changes in city agencies.

On other issues, he would like to eliminate tenure for Civil Service employees as well as speed up the testing for new employees.

One plank on his platform ould also give more independence in budget matters. Ryan himself is limiting his campaign budget to $25 to keep from being "bought out by power groups."

Mayoral Candidates Hustle for Student Vote

A mayoralty candidate's day was held at the Little Theatre on October 21.

Mayor Alioto walked onstage of the Little Theatre almost unannounced. He talked a short time about his accomplishments and then opened up his ten minutes to a question and answer session.

He told his interrogators: He didn't favor abortion and community control of the police. He had the FBI investigate the killing in Hunters Point. He favored Proposition "L" and said he would appoint students to the Board of Governors. He said he favored an elected school board.

Alioto called the lawsuit in Seattle a "political knifing" and claimed that the possibility of such a similar incident in Colorado was a rumor.

Throughout much of the questioning, Alioto was hissed at, shouted down, and booed. When he left, he was booed again and many of the audience followed him in his hegira.

Mrs. Feinstein faced a more sedate audience.

She called this election The City's last chance for a change. Mrs. Feinstein said that the people of the City have been driven apart.

She told the audience that if she was elected, she would set up a young people's cabinet.

She said she would emphasize housing during her tenure, called the housing system archaic, and said she hopes for a minority-run broadcast station.

She would also set up a neighborhood service corps. She also supports proposition "L".

After some persiflage, she admitted that she would not stand for discrimination on the basis of sex or sexual orientation.

Candidate Harold Dobbs was detained that day due to a prior commitment, so he sent his wife as his representative.

Mrs. Dobbs talked about her husband's background, saying that he was the yet youngest member of the Board of Supervisors (he was 31 in 1951 when he was first elected).

She quoted her husband's slogan as "You can't take from the community - you have to give."

She said Alioto has added five new taxes to the people: sewer, utilities, gross receipts, parking and employee's.

She compared Mrs. Feinstein's one percent City Income Tax proposal to Mayor Alioto's proposed Commuter Tax, saying that both were illegal.

She told the assemblage that her husband would replace every commision and would put the police department under the Chief, and not he Mayor and Police Commisioner.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Support the Bill To Save Our Land

Since the beginning of this century, man has destroyed more of his environment through pollution than he has destroyed in the combined total of all of his years of recorded existence.

The California Department of Fish and Game in a recent assessment of Northern California streams stated, "It is likely that some of these streams may never run clear again . . . may not support game fish for ten to 30 years if ever."

This statement also accuses many businessmen and land speculators of using and abusing these now beautiful but endangered lands for their own selfish capitalistic gain.

According to wildlife experts, many of these developers are responsible for causing increased amounts of watershed erosion. To economize , these people and their engineers design poor roads, shoddy construction and, in general, use bad planning in most of their projects.

As a result, thousands of acres of once beautiful thriving land and hundreds of miles of mountain streams have been damaged.

In one such case, United States Steel which operates a plant in Pittsburg, in Contra Costa County, received notice in 1964 that it was discharging waste material into the Sacramento Delta, a violation of state water quality regulations.

U.S. Steel complied to these regulations in an inadequate manner. After six years of beating around the bush the company was ordered under the Porter-Cologne Act to cease and desist from this action and to comply with even stricter and more stringent requirements.

They filed an appeal but finally decided to settle out of court. The steel company was forced to pay the State of California $15,000. This may not be a large sum of money for a huge company the size of U.S. Steel but it is the first cash settlement of a water pollution case in California's history.

United States Steel finally appears to be complying in full with the state standards which is even more important than their cash payment.

In the bay area there are now ten more industrial firms under the same cease and desist orders, as well as a dozen others who are faced with time limits to straighten out the practices of their companies.

Although these cases have been discovered and regulated by the state, the blame for these polluters lies mainly at the county level.

Rural supervisors are too anxious to have these businesses and developers move into their counties so that they can collect all of the new tax money that comes in with them.

Assemblyman Joe McCarthy has introduced Assembly Bill 1301 which is now on the Senate floor.

AB 1301 would impose more stringent requirements upon these land salesman and would require county supervisors to deny approval of subdivision designs if they are likely to cause substantial environmental damage.

This bill which would seriously curtail further damage to our beautiful lands and waters faces strong opposition. It needs a great deal of support. — Jim Toland

STICK 'EM UP— The campus bookstore has often been accused of robbing the City College student. Perhaps it is because they charge almost full price for used books and buy them back for less than half the original price.

Address letters to Dr. Arnold Werner S-60, 50 Phelan Avenue, San Francisco 94112.

QUESTION: Is it true that if a man has intercourse every day the sperm will not be fully developed and thereby pregnancy will be prevented. If so, how long does it take for new sperm to develop? My wife would like to get pregnant; does this mean there should be a day or two of rest before intercourse?

Also, I have heard that more frequent intercourse will tend to favor producing a baby girl rather than a boy. Is there any evidence to support this?

ANSWER: Very frequent sexual intercourse can result in a decreased sperm count and may make pregnancy difficult in a case where a man has a low sperm count to begin with. No physical harm results from such a situation. As a means of contraception, it is totally unreliable and is more complicated than the usually recommended techniques. A four to five day rest period before attempting conception probably would enhance the possibility of success.

There is some evidence that the sperm cells carrying the male producing chromosome have a shorter life span and survive poorly in certain types of situations. The female chromosome-bearing sperm cells are hardier, but there are also circumstances that do not favor their survival. By utilizing circumstances where survival of one or the other of the sperm cells is enhanced, attempts have been made to determine the sex of the baby. A book which discusses this topic at length is "Your Baby's Sex, Now You Can Choose" by Rorvik and Shettles, published in 1970 by Dodd, Mead and Co., Inc. There is some question as to whether the claims of the authors can be verified by other investigators, but they don't seem to be recommending anything that is harmful.

QUESTION: My roommate has a very big problem. It seems as though his feet sweat quite a lot and as a result I nearly die when he takes his shoes off. What can he do to alleviate this problem.

ANSWER: The answer to your problem falls into a very special category called "treatments they never told me about in medical school." I'll proceed now to give you a logical explanation and suggest some remedies. I warn you however, nothing may help! I had a roommate like that myself for three years.

Foot odor is caused by the action of bacteria on perspiration. Working in a warm, closed, moist environment, the right type of bacteria have a field day. Usually, the relationship between the bacteria and the person's feet is a friendly one and no infection exists. On the other hand, sometimes foot odors can be due to infections so if there is any doubt your friend's feet should walk over to a physician and be seen. Wearing socks made of synthetic fibers sometimes cause more perspiring. So do shoes with rubber soles, boots, wearing rubbers or overshoes and shoes made from synthetic materials (polymetic plastics).

Your friend might try wearing absorbent wool or cotton socks, washing his feet frequently and making sure they are thoroughly dry before shoeing up, using talcum powder on his feet and in his shoes and alternating pairs of shoes so they dry thoroughly. An underarm deodorant used on the feet may help but caution should be observed as irritations can result. . .

Letters to the Editor

Editor:

In regard to Bruno R. Forner's article, "Parking: CCSF's Vicious Circle," I wish to inform him, as well as the rest of the student body, of the existence of the Bike Club.

The Bike Club, whose sole purpose is to prevent theivery of bikes on campus, is located in the basement (3rd) level of the student union building. The club maintains student guards from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. daily.

Not only does the bike rider feel secure in the knowledge of the safety of his bike, he is free from the persistent hassles that student drivers encounter daily in the form of traffic and parking problems and is also independent of the unreliable Muni system.

The Guardsmen and Bruno Forner in particular, should be more thorough in the research of its topics prior to expending valuable time, energy, and paper on inaccurate articles.

Editor:

I am submitting this letter for your acceptance in the Guardsman. I hope it will present an interesting cultural activity to the student body of this fine institution.

One of the most pleasant experiences I've had the opportunity of enjoying during the last few months was the Czechoslovakian Folk Company's performance this past weekend at the Masonic Auditorium.

This was the first time that Czech Folk Company has performed in North America.

Their enthusiasm as well as that of the audience was quite apparent to this observer. The show consisted of a variety of folk dances, musical solos, and a beautiful rendition of a Czechoslovakian Folk Wedding.

A wooden shoe dance was one of the additional highlights of this fantastic production.

Of the many entertainments I've had the good fortune to experience here in San Francisco, this production put on by John Kornfeld Associates was probably the most creative and enjoyable.

Many more shows and concerts are scheduled to be put on at the Masonic Auditorium during the next year by John Kornfeld. If you are interested in attending these upcoming events, you can obtain information at the City College bookstore through the Creative Entertainments representative who is currently offering a passbook with many more discounts such as the free admission I received as a bonus for joining their exciting new social club. I really think their new organization is out of sight.

"What Direction Am I To Go?"

There is an age old dilemma for the high school graduate. He or she must ask, "What direction am I to go?" The decision has limited alternatives of military duty, employment, or education. It is, an important decision to make.

Those who choose college suddenly find themselves in a different life-style. It is a moderately independent awakening. The student is on his own in a real sense. It is his turn to guide himself in a particular field. Although a community college may appear to some to be nothing more than a continuation of high school, the true working student is apt to taste the sensation of personal and intellectual growth.

City College of San Francisco is, to the average person, a place to find oneself in a practical and consturctive manner. To the instructor it might represent an attempt to expand the knowledge of fresh minds. To the student, well, it's a, it's a ...

Last semester in a poll taken from a psychology 1 course it was noted that out of approximately three hundred or more students three fourths were taking general education. The experiment was to find out what community college was giving to them, what they were getting out of it.

From such a study it is safe to assume that these people were going to City in order to discover what they're best suited for, and to pursue the field in a four year college. So the reasoning here is that a community college perhaps prepares one for a state college, giving one the insight, stamina, and overall equipment to aid further endeavours.

The diploma stands as the symbol of acheivement in formal education A community college is just another stepping stone toward the opportunities that await outside. What foundations are you building?

Booze Versus Grass

If the battle for legalization of marijuana is to continue, which it undoubtedly will, there is one element of the controversy which should be removed.

Proponents for the legalization of pot are adamant in their belief that pot is no more dangerous than alcohol, and, indeed, medical studies of marijuana seem to confirm this. In fact, one study of marijuana, recently released in the newspapers, stated that alcohol is considerably more dangerous than marijuana, and the pro-pot elements cheered.

If pot is no more dangerous, or less dangerous, than alcohol, argue the pro-potters, what possible reason could there be for not legalizing it? The problem with this line of argument is that it makes alcohol the standard-bearer of pot, the forerunner clearing the way for legalized hemp.

What gives alcohol the right to such a revered position? The virtues of alcohol are dubious, at best. Alcoholism is, perhaps, the nation's most serious and most neglected health problem, and drunk drivers are the nation's most deadly killers.

Alcohol is responsible for thousands of deaths each year, though many doctors try to cover up this unfortunate fact by using polite terms for "cause of death".

Alcohol can also be directly related to many crimes, barroom and domestic brawls, and even broken marriages. And let us not forget that alcohol can lead to some Gargantuan hangovers.

The evils of alcohol are numerous, the virtues few. Thus, comparing marijuana to alcohol says very little for the merits of marijuana. It's like comparing a pistol to a high-powered rifle. One is definitely more dangerous than the other, but both are equally capable of killing.

The battle for legalized pot should go on, and hopefully someday the pot-smoking public will be able to enjoy their week unoppressed, content in their realization the cops are out busting drunks rather than pot smokers. But in arguing for legalized marijuana, let's leave alcohol out of it.

QUESTION: Do you favor the legalization of marijuana?

Steve Webster—Broadcasting
"Yes, I think it would be very nice but after reading the editorial in the paper, I don't know what to believe."

Paula Miller—Teaching Assistant
"Oh hell yes. It's not harmful, so why not legalize it? It's not as bad as drinking."

Bill Hall—Art
"Of course. By all means. I feel it's less harmful than alchohol. You feel better in the morning and smile more."

Mary Doyle—General Education
"Yes, because it's a personal matter whether they use it or not. The more laws they make, the more criminals they create."

Doris Davis — Nursing
"Yes I do favor it, not that I use it. It widens your mind. I've tested it. Alcohol lessens your resistance and endurance."

Paul Wong—Business
"No. I don't see any point in legalizing marijuana. You can smoke a cigarette and still drive but I don't think you can smoke marijuana and drive because it takes your complete concentration. The people don't want legalization but make the laws less stringent."

Mayoralty Candidates Speak

Scott Newhall is running for mayor to do something about the "mess" the City is in. He wants to be mayor only one term. He called this one term the "Transition period" for the city.

With a semi-heinous grin on his face, Newhall said that everyone in City Hall has an accomplice for a Supervisor. He stated that he would limit their terms to one.

Nathan Weinstein

Nathan Weinstein, talked about why he was speaking that Thursday instead of the prior Tuesday. He also spoke of the treatment of "major and minor" candidates.

Weinstein also told of his victory over not paying the filing fee for the office ($892). He called the fees a "conspiracy of Capitalists".

He spoke on the recent killing of a youth in Hunter's Point by a police officer, and, to the audience's delight, asked for the suspension of the officer.

Weinstein said that there was a need for a new approach to politics.

Serra was represented by Ron Lamberg. He told the dwindling audience that Serra is a lawyer.

Lamberg said that there are too many people who think they know how to run things.

He said that Serra would eliminate victimless crimes and turn San Francisco into a Renaissance City. He wants it to be a major supplier of marijuana and a sanctuary for draft dodgers. Serra also wants the streets torn up in downtown San Francisco.

Fred Selinger looked at Mayor Alioto's record and told the aggregation that, despite his 1967 promise, property taxes went up 45 percent in San Francisco and the gross receipts tax "which is hurting the small businessman" has been doubled.

He looked at Dianne Feinstein's record and said that there has been no prison reform as she had promised two years ago, Selinger called her one percent City Income Tax illegal. "It hurts the poor more than the rich," he said.

He said that he would reappoint the Police Commission and that people have lost confidence in their leaders. Selinger pointed out that the City hasn't bothered to pick up $93 million in grants dating from 1964. He called the San Francisco General Hospital an abysmal failure. He told the audience that he can bring back life into the City.

John Diamante asked for horizontal communication if he was elected.

He said that Alioto was through as mayor and would be a sure loser if he ran on his record. He figured if any candidate wasn't aware of the priorities, he shouldn't run for public office.

He would demilitarize society by having the police go after crimes of violence (which he put the use of heroin under), crimes of discrimination, and crimes of pollution.

cies can really move this city.

He said that City Hall should be given back to the citizens by the next mayor. Diamante asked for better health service and for the City to take care of its own sewage.

He said that the poorer constituencies can really move this city

Stanley Cotton didn't begin with a speech. He began with a song. He even got the crowd to join him in singing: "Nigger, Nigger, White Trash, White Trash."

He told the sparse crowd that the rich will never be poor and the poor will never be rich.

He is running on three platforms: He is the first social outcast ever to run for public office; he doesn't believe in bricks and blood for revolution; and he believes in humanity. He wanted to make the people of San Francisco the most loving and forgiving people on earth. Cotton also wanted more control of sexuality and the free distribution of marijuana seeds.

I.R.A. Speaker Blasts British Control of Irish

Sean Kenny, an official spokesman for the Irish Republican Army, came to City College last week to present his views of the current struggle going on in Northern Ireland.

"A class struggle is now taking place to free the Irish people from British imperialists," Kenny said," and to grant economic freedom to the Irish people in their homeland."

Kenny pointed out that the struggle in Ireland is not a religous revolution, but a class struggle. It is a struggle between the poor working class Irish people and the British who control the Irish economy.

The revolution attempts to end background of British repression upon the Irish people, Kenny explained. Inadequate housing forces the Irish people to live in slums in Belfast. Also British control the natural fishing rights of Irishman. Kenny pointed to an example where an Englishman bought a river in Ireland and forced the Irish people to pay compensations when fishing in the river.

"The IRA hopes to free the Irish people from British rule. Only then can the Irish control their own economy." Kenny pointed out that political freedom without economic freedom will still leave Irish people in their slums.

The IRA also works to change the system. Another aim is to establish a Democratic-Socialist Republic under which all peoples of Northern Ireland will be politically and economically free.

Kenny's facts pointed out that over 200 IRA members are being held in concentration camps. "Some are not imprisoned but tortured."

"The IRA will fight for Irish independence and "liberty at any price."

Kenny emphasized that the IRA cannot win their struggle alone but need the support of all Irish peoples of the world.

Bicycles Find Sanctuary In Fall Bike Club

If you ride your bicycle to school and need a place to keep it while you're in class, the campus bike club has just the solution. With the help of some interested students and the student council, the Bike Club has obtained the use of the bottom floor of the Student Union Building for parking their bikes.

The problem of bicycle theft cost 40 students their two-wheeled transportation last year. With the help of the storeroom, bicycle thieves have claimed only two bicycles so far this year.

In addition to protect bikes from rainy weather, the club also provides volunteer guards to watch bikes left in the club storeroom.

Headed by Nancy Sullivan, the club claims a membership of 150 students. On a normal day, the club stores between 40 and 60 bikes. A makeshift lounge complete with coffee is available to the weary pedaller.

Many club members, however, are upset because of students who fail to use the free storage space and instead chain their bikes to trees and fences.

This, they say, creates an extra burden for Ortamental Horiculture students and groundskeepers who must work around the bikes.

Among the other services provided by the club include bike safety information and heavy gage chains which are available to members at reduced rates. The club also sponsors weekend bike tours, usually on sunday, and is working on the formation of a bike repair clinic. Presently, it is making a survey of local bike shops and comparing them according to friendliness, repair work, and prices.

Two of the five stories will be below present ground level: The construction, according to Francheschina, is part of an overall long range concept which would include turning the large circular driveway into a mall for pedestrians, with a walkway to the nearby BART station.

Compromise or not, opposition to the plan continues. Xandra Malandra, an architecture student here for three semesters, remains undaunted in her opposition to the structure. She is circulating petitions on campus and will appear with them at the Board meeting Thursday.

"We oppose the location and design of the building;" she clarified, "of course more room is needed, but behind Cloud Hall is the only pleasant, sheltered spot people can relax, study, eat, or enjoy the view. A beautiful city like ours should keep its hills, and its schools, esthetically pleasing as possible."

Malandra criticized the plan architecturally as "mediocre, unimaginative, like the other buildings on campus." The architect hired by the School Board is Milton Pflueger Co., designers of Cloud Hall, the Arts Building and Visual Arts building.

Controversy continues and expediency versus esthetics appears to be the issue as the Nov. 1 approval deadline looms near.

Basketball Score

A determined CCSF womens basketball team in the last three minutes of play overpowered Cabrillo's defending league champions, 26-22, Tuesday, Oct. 5, on the losers floor.

Outstanding performers for the Ramettes were center Lizzie Jones, guard Marsha Miyamoto and forward Linda Sekino.

Jones tallied eight points on four field goals. Miyamoto split the nets for six points on three fielders and Sekino rang up six points when she found the hoop for a brace of field goals and two gift shots.

The victorious locals were stung with a first quarter deficit of 2-12 and at the half narrowed their short end of the score to 11-12. At the close of the third period they trailed 14-16.

Making a strong point, Mendelsohn charged that those who seek to escape urban problems by moving to the suburbs are contributing to the crumbling of the urban core.

"When the city core crumbles so too will the suburbs."

Mendelsohn sees a solution to some of these urban problems in the form of a regional government, but with a limited purpose structure. He used as examples the effectiveness of regional regulation in the areas of pollution, water control, transportation and conservation.

Mendelsohn expressed the need, especially in San Francisco, for additional services in the areas of suicide prevention, and treatment of drug addiction and alcoholism.

March Fong Assemblywoman, Oakland

Fong Sites Chinese Role in California's History

Assemblywoman March Fong of Oakland recently spoke at City College on "The Minority Experience in America."

The attractive legislator stated that the Chinese have been both honored and hanged in the streets of San Francisco.

Fong cited the facts that the Asians have been subjected to some very grotesque treatments. The Chinese, for example, have rights they are not to enjoy listed in the California state constitution. Among these rights are those of economic success and the right to own land.

She delved into the history of the Chinese in California, who came to California to the oppressive Mandarin Manchu dynasty. Soon 100,000 established residence in this state. The population increased until 1880, when immigration of the Chinese was outlawed.

Even to this day, Fong pointed out, there are less Chinese now than there were in 1880.

The Chinese began their own communities in the Mother Lode country, but "most ended in an ancillary position".

Soon, the state legislature imposed a $20 miner's tax on the Chinese. They prohibited them from appearing in courts and from attending the public schools.

In 1853, the Chinese founded the salmon industry in this country. In 1872, they were producing the most vegetables in this state. They were also instrumental in building the first transcontinental railroad in this country.

But the Chinese were still defenseless socially. In San Francisco, politicians were elected on the strength of an Anti-Sino campaign. During the depression of the 1880's the blame fell on the Chinese for putting the white workers out of work. Miss Fong noted that one half of the factory workers in San Francisco during 1872 were Chinese.

It wasn't until 1952 when the laws were finally repealed from the State Constitution.

In 1882, the Chinese were barred from immigrating for ten years. From 1882 until 1920, the Chinese poulace in the state dwindled. It wasn't until 1944 when the law was finally lifted.

Fong then spoke of the Japanese struggle. While the Chinese were barred from coming to this country, the Japanese were welcomed. But from 1913 until 1944, the Asian Land Law prohibited Asians from holding land in this state. In 1922, the Supreme Court ruled that Japanese couldn't become citizens of the United States.

Fong said that the most horrible treatment of any Asian group came during World War II when Japanese Americans were forced into internment camps. Ironically, the Japanese-American were honored for their battle records during the war.

Fong said that the Chinese have been working quietly for the last 50 years, yet they are still discriminated against in the areas of jobs, housing, and education.

Power to the People Cut

An administration interupted anti war rally marked the November 3 student strike on this campus.

The rally, attended by over 500 students, featured the rock group "Ice" and many speakers including John Goebel, member of the campus student mobilization committee and Lloyd Kinney, head of the campus Black Moratorium Committee.

According to Goebel, the rally was officially scheduled for two hours, 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. However, 25 minutes before the rally was to end, Student Activities Adviser Ralph Hillsamn told Goebels that Assistant Superintendant Harry Buttimer had requested the rally be cut short. It was claimed that the noise from the rally was disrupting classroom activities.

Goebel refused to end the rally. "I made all the arrangments; everything was legal for the time allotted," commented Goebel. We were well within our rights to hold the rally for the entire time period."

Then, after a few minutes, the power for all of the sound equip- ment was shut off. Goebel immediately went to the student council meeting, and asked the council to request that the power be turned on. The council, which had approved the rally two days before, passed this request unanimously.

After a long delay, the power was restored.

"I've never heard any student complain about the noise" Goebel said. "Anyway, even if one life is saved by our rally, I'm sure that the life is far more important than any class in this school."

Alioto Wins Re-election Five Students Defeated

By Ed Hartzler

Mayor Joseph Alioto won re-election and five youth candidates went down to defeat as 18 year-olds voted for the first time in a San Francisco municipal election.

Alioto polled 95,744 votes giving him a comfortable margin over his nearest opponent Harold Dobbs at 68,637. Dianne Feinstein came in third with 53,941.

Other candidates in the order of their totals were: Scott Newhall W 8534), J. Tony Serra (2724), Nathan Weinstein (1541), John Diamante (1477), Stanley Cotton (670), John Gardner Brent (661), and Jeffery Chaskin (304).

In the supervisorial race, incumbant Ronald Pelosi, Robert Mendelsohn, Robert Gonzales, and Terry Francois easily won re-election and John Molinari and Quntin Kopp were also elected.

Of particular interest to college students were the number of young people in the race. Four candidates running for supervisor are students at City College of San Francisco.

Michael Wong, the central figure in the court decision that invalidated the required filing fee for public office, ran a race dedicated to helping the various free health clinics in San Francisco. Operating without funds--any contribution he received went to free health clinics--he obtained 14,585 votes.

"I was shocked to receive so many votes," remarked Wong, "and so were a lot of other politicians."

"I'll be in politics for a long time, I think things are swinging toward our issues," said Wong.

Wong, however, has not lost interest in City College.

"I think that Dr. Buttimer should be the next president of City College. I also have great regard for Dean Brady. Both these men are concerned with the well-being of the students, whereas other administrators such as Dr. Louis Batmale, Dean Ralph Hillsman, and Dean Warren White are definitely anti-student."

The three Socialist Workers Party candidates - Jeff Berchenkó, Jane Sica, and Bonnie Shepard - received 4348, 4848, and 6275 respectively. Both Berchenko and Sica felt that job was to present an alternative to the Democratic and Republican parties. In addition, Berchenko commented that the elections showed that "unless you have a lot of money, you don't stand a chance."

"I felt that I delt with important issues, that I forced other candidates to deal with these issues," said Tom Ryan, who polled 7,173 votes. Ryan, who works as a librarian-page, ran his campaign on a promise of ending "inefficiency in City government. He had planned to spend only $25 on the campaign but was forced to increase it to $35.

Dr. Harry Buttimer, Assistant Superintendent, stated, "Having City College students run in such an important race as San Francisco supervisor is a great sign of the times."

"Generally," Buttimer said, "the interest in politics increased with the 18 year-old vote. Students are more concerned with and aware of current issues now than ever before."

Mike Wong may have lost the war but he did win at least one important battle.

This victory resulted in ending the required filing fee for public office which Judge Albert Wollenberg ruled on September 17 to be a violation of equal protection of the law for poor people.

Wong was only required to swear under oath that he was a pauper and was unable to pay the fee. As a result of this, Wong refused to accept peronal campaign contributions, donating any money he received to various free health clinics throughout the city.

Wong, however, was unsuccessful in his court attmept to force television stations KRON-KPIX, and KGO to give him free television.

He had claimed that the requirement of having to pay for TV time was discriminatory toward poor people.

U.S District Judge George B. Harris ruled against Wong after attorneys for the stations claimed that such an injunction would force the stations to give free TV time to all candidates.

War and Racism Denounced By Third World Speakers

Imperialism, racism, and sexism on the part of the United States government were strongly condemned by Third World representatives speaking at an anti-war rally at The Ram.

The rally, sponsored by the Black Moratorium Committee, a new and as yet unofficial campus organization, served as a warm-up to the nation-wide Anti-War March, which was held on November 6.

Angry Athletes Confront Council

Associated Students Council meeting of October 27 had a mysterious air to it.

The normally half-empty gang room of the Student Union building, where the meetings take place, was filled to capacity whit scores of unfamiliar faces.

When the agenda was read, ti became apparent that the gang room overflowed with mmen who were members of CCSF's athletic teams.

The athletes came to the meeting because they were scared - scared that the money needed to pay for the injuries they received while playing for CCSF had been cut off.

Then the facts came out. Currently there is a catastrophic insurance policy covering all serious athletic injuries. However, the policy has a $500 deductible clause; on any expensive injuries the first $500 must be paid by the athletic department.

In the past, the athletic department submitted the bills to care Anderson, head of the student bank, and then a check was made out, using students funds to pay the bills. This amounted to an open, unregulated acoount.

Yet, ujder new regulations adopted this semester, the student council financial chairman must co-sign the check. He refused to sign the check since he knew nothing of the matter. This was interpreted as a freeze on all athletic funds by the department.

After many minutes of shouting and accusations, Council Adviser Ralph Hillsman rose to speak. He said that the major problem was a lack of communication between the student council, the athletic department, and the administration.

Hillsman explained that the administration was clearly at fault in the matter and offered to go to the student bank with representatives of the atheetes to clear up the matter.

Proposition "L" Successful -- College Gets Own Board

By King Thompson

With the passage of Proposition L, students at City College will now have a chance to literally run the school.

Proposition L sets up an elected governing board for the Community College District like that of the Board of Education. (The CCD actually separated from the San Francisco Unified School District in July of 1970, but still came under the control of the B oard of Education.) Since 18 year-olds are able to vote, they are able to hold office, and will be eligible to run for the board.

"There's nothing wrong with that," said Dr. Louis Batmale, President/Superintendent of the college district. "A student point of view might be a real good thing for the board. Nobody's hung-up about students serving."

The proposition calls for the election of seven members next June on an at-large basis. It has been criticized on the basis that election on an at-targe basis may not afford adequate minority representa- tion.

"The important thing is that there will be a board devoted solely to the problems of the Community College District," said Batmale. He indicated that the new board will be able to give more time and attention to community college problems than the present Board of Education did.

Superintendent Louis Batmale

On the question of minority representation, he said, "As we move ahead as a community, this (that only whites will be elect- ed) will be less likely to happen." He also stated that at-large elections "could be a positive force in the direction of giving more exposure to minority people."

Financially, the situation is virtually unchanged. No new money will be available as a result of the passage of the proposition. However, unlike the Board of Education, the CCD has not reached the limit on its taxing power and it still has money to work with.

The proposition is relatively on the taxpayer's pocketbook. Each member of the board will receive $100 a month, which amounts to $8400 a year. This is equivalent to 36 thousandths (.036) of one cent in the tax rate.

Few Surprises in San Francisco Election

Politics became more than an academic classroom discussion. For the first time in history 18-year-olds could exercise their right to vote.

City College students witnessed the parade of candidates to the campus hustling for the so-called "youth vote." What impact did the new voters have on San Francisco elections?

There were still lessons to be learned. The campus proved no barometer of the choice of San Francisco voters. Mayor Joseph Alioto won a resounding reelection victory despite the shadow of a federal indictment and a pending lawsuit claiming the Mayor was libeled by LOOK magazine.

Mayor Alioto secured his winning vote margins in neighborhoods where the City's cosmopolitan ferment is greatest. He easily outdistanced his strongest rivals, Harold S. Dobbs, former supervisor, and Dianne Feinstein, president of the board of supervisors.

Political analysts stated that Alioto's winning combination consisted of a coalition of minority and labor support; outstanding precinct work by 700 volunteers, plus a well financed, high professional campaign organization; a relatively poor showing by his challengers.

The vigorous 55-year-old Mayor Alioto added his own candid analysis. "I guess I was the issue. The national administration was trying to knock me out of the box."

Supervisor Terry Francois had his own routing section at City College because he is also a member of the faculty. The popular instructor teaches political problems and problems of Afro-Americans.

Obviously delighted after the election results came in, Francois stated, "I hope that the young people will not get discouraged by the poor showing of registered 18-year-old voters. This kind of apathy must be overcome and young people must take the initiative to register, become involved in campaigning, and help to turn out the new voters."

"After the Ball Was Over"– Students Reacted

San Francisco Election'71 was the most colorful and rambunctious political race in the city's, and the nation's, recent history. A multitude of candidates, from all sexes, races, and walks of life ran for Mayor. Despite tough competition, controversial bribery charges by candidate Scott Newhall, and Federal court action against him in Washington, Mayor Alioto was re-elected for a second term.

The victory, however, was by a minority mandate. Apparently the very number of candidates was largely responible for this, by splintering the vote. To conservative political observers, this seems to lend validity to traditional concepts of a two-party system with primary elections."

Speculation on this and other pecularities of the unique campaign will doubtless continue for many weeks to come. One undeniable important new factor in the contest was the untested impact of 18 to 20 year olds voting for the first time.

Candidates across the nation spent time and money to lure the student electorate. City College hosted the would-be Mayors on October 21 to present their views. Politicians everywhere, from Presidential hopefuls on down, anxiously awaited election results. Emphasis in future national campaigns will be re-directed toward youth accordingly.

To test reactions of tese newly enfranchised voters, following their first historic flexing of new-found political muscle, The Guardsman recorded the initial post-election reactions of several City Students:

Paul Snodgrass

Joe Alioto's victory in the San Francisco mayoral campaign came as no surprise. Political speaking, there was not a great deal of difference between the major candidates, at least on the major issues.

Thus the election was reduced to a clash of personalities, and the strongest personality won. Right or wrong, like him or not, Alioto does present a strong and forceful character, and it is this quality that won him the election.

I am not exactly pleased with the election results because I was not pleased with the candidates running. But I'm conforted by the fact that it could be worse. t least this is not Chicago.

Richard Wolff

It appears once again, the candidates with the most money won. Political advertising in the media is of paramount importance in a state so saturated with TV, radio, and advertising in general.

Although it has been exposed in such books as "The Selling of the President," "The Hidden Persuaders" and in the movie "Millhouse", the fantastic subtle power of TV advertising continues to hold the public in its grip.

Ronald Levy

I am pleased that Alioto won the election for mayor. I feel the other candidates weren't running on the basis of who's most qualified to service San Francico, but that they were running just to "get" Alioto.

Alioto is a brilliant attorney. He's settled countless city strikes and various union disputes. He appointed Cahill as as Chief of Police, a choice that deterred crime greatly. He is firm and practical in his decision-making. The run-in with Look magazine was cheap publicity. The landslide outcome shows the majority cannot be so easily twisted by political scandal. People vote for what they believe in and false promises are not a part of that belief.

Jan Gainer

First of all I did vote in this election and I voted very seriously for the candidates that I chose. But, afterwards I didn't have any real interest in the outcome because I started to think about how many people wouldn't come to the poles and cast their vote.

Besides, I had a pretty good idea that folks I didn't want to win would win just because they were financially able to.

I really think it is a sin and a shame when an individual cannot be judged by his abilities but instead by the amount of dough he has in his pockets.

I also feel that this is a very racist attitude to have against your fellow man.....Dig?

— Linda Neel

The huge campaign cost of the candidates in the election of November.2nd has made it imperative that the Board of Supervisors in conjunction with Mayor Alioto, seek immediate election reform. Many prospective candidates, highly qualified for the office of supervisor, were deterred from entering the race due to the excessive campaign expenditures.

Chubba Csavossy

Election outcome came as no surprise to me, although the margin of victory was. I had thought that Dobbs and Feinstein would run a closer race to Alioto.

First of all, obviously the Look-Mafia articles did not seem to hurt the Mayor. Neither did the fee-splitting trials in Seattle.

Secondly, money played a great deal in the role of vote-getting. I believe that Supervisor Robert Gonzales' proposal to cut campaign spending down to a maximum of 35 or 40-thousand dollars should be put into practice immediately. Besides, Alioto, Molinari and Kopp had the most colorful and most numerous billboards.

Jan Arnold

This did not surprise me. The political machine, the great amount of money Alioto had for his campaign has proven democratic processes are trampled.

People feel helpless to change the political climate because the same frauds are re-elected, so they don't vote. Alioto is experienced in how to win an election and so he schemed by convincing his newspaper friends and businessmen and the public through media. His endorsement of Yvonne Westbrook was a trick to try and get in with the Black voters.

As far as I'm concerned, We, the people, lost another chance to save ourselves. How can we make the same mistake twice?

Peter Robertson

Mayor Alioto won because he spent more money on his campaign. His TV ads featuring testimonials of his prowess by other mayors (such as John Lindsay) were especially effective.

Joe just didn't care whether they liked him or not. The newspapers and other big city mayors were already behind him.
good.

King Thompson

Personally, I am sorry that Alioto was re-elected, but then I wasn't gung-ho for Dobbs or Feinstein either. I voted for Selinger, but I knew he didn't have a chance. Am A A guess, that Alioto won by such a large margin. He GAn A say that the people decidedly wanted him and thi(jik A him in accomplishing whatever he tries to do. He is still minority mayor, however.

I was very sorry to see Proposition A lose. The mne AC will just have to come from somewhere else, and it all c ;A from our pocket anyway. I voted for Proposition LA bA somewhat doubtful of the method of selection. I w hB 5 A Proposition T lost, since I feel that it would be too awkwBkA and time-consuming to have a vote on every building proposed over six stories.

Bob Guichard

If you liked San Francisco before the election, you'll like it after. However, if you wanted changes-Mayor, Proposition T - too bad. The election proves again that where the money is, the votes are. Alioto won easily because he had a lot going for him, such as money, friends, and a well organized campaign. He acted like a winner and he certainly won.

Paul Gruesser

Within the short time I've lived in San Francisco, a matter of a few months, I'T come to know the political situation but vaguel.

What I do know of anbody's qualifications for office came to be shouted down by legal suits, "one-upsmanship," and allegations meant to tarnish.

The "dirty politicking" I've always hated anywhere else has prompted me to stay voting time in any other city. It has reached its apex here in S.F. However, I've never been more drawn to keep pace with a city's political life as here.

My short time in the city does not allow me to make a fair comment on the outcome.

Oscar Vinson

My reaction to this year's election was purely negative, as for the mayoralty race was concerned, because it was apparent that Alioto was going to be mayor again before the actual polling had started.

The race for the six seats on the B sard of Supervisors drew more attention than the maoralty race, because a young black woman (Yvonne Westbrook) was running.

In the future I'm hoping that there will be other black candidates whom blacks can support and feel truly represented in our political structure.

The only way this could be accomplished would be to create a Black political party where primaries would be held so that no two black candidates would be running for the same office, thus increasing that individuals chances for election.

— Pamela Hobbs

Those who did enter the race were handicapped with the lack of money and consequently many were defeated. It is unfortunate that the liberal incumbents with access to unlimited funds can, in essence, buy the election.

Gloria Weinstock

I would have been very surprised if Alioto had lost. I don't feel that the past publicity on his connection with the Mafia hurt him. The people of San Francisco are too hep to let the word "Mafia" scare them. It may excite them a bit, but that's the extent of its effect.

I didn't vote because I haven't been stimulated by San Francisco politics. Everthing I do is done with a certain amount of emotional involvement. The only element in this election that wasn't in previous elections was the 18 year-old candidate.

The result of this year's election is standard procedure: the expected.

Tim Drilling

I think it's a damned shame. Joe Alioto, reeling from "knifing, after political knifing", easily won his bid for re-election as mayor.

The new sheriff wears corduroy instead of leather. The height limitation bill is defeated. Everybody is winning and losing graciously, except me.

I'd like to suggest this: City Hall needs a lost and found for souls. I'm at a loss for words.

Jim Dwyer

Dobbs had lost twice before, Feinstein was too uptight for this city, and Alioto had the backing of the coalition of mayors newspapers and other big city mayors were already behind him. which has sprung up recently, a power to be recokoned with in the political future. I envision a R ichard Laley in every major being booed off the stage here at City College.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

A Break for Prison Reform

Over one half of the jail inmates in the United States have not been convicted of a crime. They are in prison awaiting trial.

Even though the American system of justice is supposedly based on the practice of "innocent until proven guilty," prison officials tend to treat convicted criminals and inmates awaiting trial equally.

On November 13, 1969, President Richard M. Nixon said, "A nation as resourceful as ours should not tolerate a record of such futility in its correctional institutions. Clearly, our rehabilitative programs require immediate and dramatic reform."

A Justice Department survey in 1970 indicated that 89 % of the 4,037 jails in the United States had no educational facilities and 86 % did not have recreational or exercise facilities.

Forty-nine per cent of the jails were without medical facilities while 26 % did not have visiting areas of any kind; 1.4 % of these jails did not even have toilets.

Only 2 % of the total jail population was involved in any kind of rehabilitation program. More than 25 % of the cells were in buildings over fifty years old.

Richard Carlson, Director of the United States Bureau of Prisons, declared in a recent interview, "Anyone not a criminal will be one when he gets out of jail."

This statement is verified by the unbelievable statistic that four out of five prisoners released are convicted of repeat offenses.

With this dreadful reality confronting him, President Nixon said, "If we turn our back on the ex-convict, then we should not be surprised if he again turns his back on us."

The administration has encouraged citizen support for new efforts to upgrade corrections programs.

The increase in money available for improving the physical facilities and modernizing rehabilitation programs illustrates how fast the government can move when it wants to.

For the fiscal year 1969, the corrections budget for the U.S. was three million dollars. For the fiscal year 1971, it has been raised to 175 million dollars. The budget will reach an estimated 300 million dollars by 1973.

"None of our vocational education programs, our work-release efforts, our halfway houses or our probation systems will succeed if the community is unwilling to extend a new opportunity," remarked President Nixon to Attorney General John Mitchell.

The only way to change the prison systems in the United States is to have the average citizen become involved with and interested in the reform and rehabilitation of its prisoners.

Children Will Suffer

When he heard of the United States Senate's action in cutting back foreign aid, an anonymous UNESCF official complained, "It is obvious that it is the children who will suffer the most from this decision."

The remark was correct, as far as it went. Actually it is the poor throughout the world who will suffer. And our own country won't exactly benefit from the action either.

Basically the decision reflects a long-standing American hostility to giving aid to what we like to call "ungrateful nations," e.i. countries that claim the right not to follow United States policy down the line and are there fore accused of "not loving us." Our foreign aid program has often resembles a politician who helps his constituents only as long as they re-elect him to office.

The most recent example of this thinking is the controversy over the admission of Red China to and the expulsion of Ta iwan from the United Nations. It caused a great deal of anger in the United States and undoubtably influenced the Senate's vote on the foreign aid bill. Aside from the childishness and petty vindictivness of the Senate, one important fact must be pointed out: none of this money would have went toward paying any membership dues in the United Nations. But our $100 countries and to impoverished people around the world. Just as was slated for U.N. agencies that give aid to underdeveloped countries and to impoverished people around the world. Just as the poor in this country are hurt by Senate cutbacks in programs designed to help them, so will the poor around the world be hurt by this tragic action.

Since we are so concerned with gaining the love of the world, it might be interesting to hear some Senator explain how the cutback in aid is going to convince the affected countries to like us. Perhaps Ye can even send a Senatorial delegation to some of these countries to explain that to the people who will starve to death or die of disease that the country which made all of this misery possible is really their friend; it would be interesting to view their reaction.

Finally, it should be noted that is our military aid, not our foreign aid which often causes so much anti-American feeling in the world. There would be less animosity toward us if we would end our policy of boilding up the armies of corrupt regimes, intervening in other countries affairs, and arming both sides of a war. Alot more butter and a lot less guns and we might have a better relationship with other countries, not to mention a better world to live in.

CAMPUS DRAMA - Ken Kuta and Larry Shaughnessy in a lighter moment from Six Characters in Search of an Author, a recent drama department production.

Six Characters Still Search

Luigi Pirandello's Six Characters in Search of an Author is a 50-year old play and it's beginning to show its age. The revised version of the play, presented for the past two weekends by the drama department, is a terribly dated, often imitated show whose imitations are frequently better than the original.

The play begins with a company of actors in rehearsal for a comedy. The rehearsal A J A is interrupted by the arrival of the "six characters." They are, they explain, characters invented by a playwright who never finished the play and so they are doomed to wander in limbo until a play is fashioned to tell their collective story.

In the first act the Father (Steve Henry) and Stepdaughter (Susan Pellegrino) try to convince the Director (Ken Kuta) to let them play their story out, while the Mother (Brenda Nickerson) wails and keeps behind a black lace veil and the son Fred Marcus) sulks.

It's all very tedious business, rather like being told the plot of the last 18 episodes of "As the World Turns."

Admittedly, director Walter Krumm was faced with a problem: How to deal with a hackneyed melodrama and make it relevant for today's audience. He succeeded in part by staging the rehearsal scene as a typical City College rehearsal, the actors using their real names, and in many cases, their own personalities. Thank God for small favors, for these were the only moments of relief in the first dreary hour.

Kuta, as the properly harrassed director having to cope with a haughty leading man (Larry Shaugnessy) and a late-arriving leading lady (Wylan Schamus), bumbling stagehands, Rosemary Tobin's mugging, Michael Pulizzaon's fey posturing--all of this worked and worked well. The soap opera histroinics of the Six Characters did not.

The second act picked up a bit when the Characters actually began to act out their story. Here Srumm, with the aid of designer Winston Tong, used some basic theatrical wizardy to transform the bare rehearsal stage and the shallow characters into something with life and depth.

Catherine Martin very nearly steals the show in her brief scene as Madame Pace, the milliner-madam. Outlandishly costumed and speaking a nearly incomprehensible olio of Spanish and English, she is patently theatrical and delightfully so.

After this high point, ithough, the show begins to slide downhill again and ends up wallowing in its own bathos. After all of the super-theatrics of act one, the real climax (the drowning of the young daughter, the suicide of the young son) comes off as a rather silly anti-climax. On opening night the audience actually tittered.

The Six Characters were especially well played, considering the material with which they had to work. Susan Pellegrino gave a gripping portrayal of the daughter, a perfromance full of fire and music. Steve Henry was very effective in a difficult role, as were Brenda Nickerson and Fred Marcul, though these latter had little to do save weep and scowl, respectively. In the non-speaking roles of the young children, Janet Piercy and Timothy Barna were attractive and well-disciplined.

The fault, dear Brutus, lies not in our stars but in our play. Six Characters in Search of an Author needs more than a visit to a play doctor. It's ready for a quiet senility in the Sun City of the stage.

A Catholic Looks at Abortion

An issue that has currently been made, or at least essayed, into a hot national controversy is something called abortion.

Abortion constitutes the expulsion of a foetus before it is viable. There are three methods of doing so. The first is miscarriage in which the foetus of embryo (if has been conceived less than three months) leaves the mother's body and dies naturally. The second type is a natural abortion where the embryo or foetus dies in the mother's womb.

It is the third type that has been considered to be the most worthy of controversy is the therapeutic abortion. Here, the unviable foetus is removed from the uterus and is allowed to die or induced to die outside the womb.

Forces in favor of therapeutic abortion say it prevents unwanted pregnancies due to the fact the family may not want the child or the mother may be unwed or the foetus is deformed.

Forces against therapeutic abortion have claimed that it is murder. Their main bone of contention is that the foetus is still a human being, and has been one from conception.

The controversy over abortion cannot be resolved. The Pope could not resolve it with his encyclical "Humane Vitae". The California legislature could not resolve it with a liberal piece of work.

As a personal feeling, abortion constitutes outright homicide. If the woman is insipid enough not to take necessary precautions to prevent the conception of the child the same goes help.

Also, any doctor should be tried and convicted on a count of first degree murder if he performs an abortion, regardless if he had the mother's permission or not. He is not God.

If a woman wants an abortion or not it must not be her own right. The fact that abortion is murder descends it to a sordid level.

It's confusing, but thats the way it is and always will be.

SCHOLARSHIP WINNER — another honor is brought back to City College.

Another City College Winner

Timothy Shea, winner of Host International's annual Scholarship Award, received check representing first half of $1,000 award from Host Vice President Arthur T. Spring as Dr. Harry Buttimer, Assistant Superintendent, City College of San Francisco and Mrs. Hilda Watson Gifford, Director of Project FEAST looks on.

Shea, who is presently enrolled in the Hotel and Restaurant School at City College, graduated from Sequoia Union High School in Redwood City last June. He was chosen from students in high schools in six western states majoring in Food Education and Service Training to receive the scholarship presented annually to a student planning a career in the food and hotel management field.

Shea was presented the check at a recent luncheon given in his honor by Host International at San Francisco International Airport. In addition to city and State officials many prominent educators were in attendance. Among the guests were: Lawrence B. Wong, Chairman, Hotel and Restaurant Department, City College of San Francisco, Warren R. White, Assistant Dean of Instruction, City College of San Francisco, Hotel and Restaurant Department and Peter Cisturo, Counselor, City College of San Francisco.

Host International operates food, beverage and gift shops in major airports of the United States as well as the "Charley Brown Restaurants" located in Burlingame and Redwood City.

Where Have All the Morals Gone

The moral standards in our city are disgraceful. The decline shows how corrupting the morals of our society are, and how people have changed the focal point of their lives away from the spiritual and intellectual activities that are more physical, and sensual.

Pornography as manifested in films and reading materials has reached a disgusting level in our society.

It seems that whenever you turn on the TV set, or open up a Newspaper, there is always some program, or article relating to the use or abuse of sex in our modern society.

As for prostitution, it shows how weak and uncivilized our society must be, for people to find this activity as a necessary physical outlet.

Because pornography and prostitution are accepted as a part of everyday life, the living standards of people in our city is declining, and therefore man is bringing about his own corruption through the use or abuse of pornography and prostitution.

As the living standards decline, the decay of moral standards in our city are declining too.

Vets Chance to Get Straight

Help for veterans who want a review of their "other than honorable" discharge from military service is available at all Veterans Administration offices, according to E. W. Christensen, Director of VA's Northern California Regional Office.

A VA directive to this effect was sent to field stations, following an announcement by Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird that military departments would "review for recharacterization administrative discharges issued under other than honorable conditions solely on the basis of personal use of drugs or possession of drugs for such use."

The primary purpose of the new policy is to provide an opportunity for this group to become eligible for VA medical treatment. Drug abuse treatment in VA is being increased sixfold, Christensen said, but the agency is barred by law from treating veterans with discharges other than honorable.

Less than one of every 500 men released from service during 1969 and 1970 received other than honorable discharges because of drug abuse, according to Department of Defense figures. Out of some 2,000,000 separations during that period, 4,152 undesirable discharges directly attributable to drug abuse were issued.

It is the responsibility of the veteran to request a review of his administrative discharge, and the application for review of his administrative discharge, and the application for review must be submitted to the military department that issued the discharge, Christensen emphasized. A self-explanatory form for applying (DD Form 293) is available at VA offices and at all military installations, he said.

VA employees have been instructed to "be alert in all their contacts with each former serviceman, to ascertain the character of discharge of separation.

QUESTION: What is your reaction to Red China's admission to the U.N.?

Mike McCain--Biology. "Oh man, I think it's really great. The Senate reacted like a bunch of little boys who had their suckers taken away."

Nancy Davison--History. "When it means losing Nationalist China, it's really disgusting. I think it's like turning our backs on Nationalist China. It also reflects the attitudes of other countries of the world opposed to the U.S."

Chris Heuvel--Artisan of the Arts. "I think it's good. It's about time. When you think about the U.N., it's got to be all nations. They shouldn't kick anybody out, though."

Gregory Gross--Pre Med. "I have no reaction to it at all because I have no interest. I'm just starting to get interested in politics and how countries are run."

Eileen Granic--Ornamental Horticulture. "I'm very happy about it. I think it's a very sensible thing. It's going to be good for business too. I'm glad."

Morris Olson-General Education. "I think it's a farce letting Nationalist China out, as I see it. About Red China though, I think it's about time."

What's Going Down

(by May O'Ralty)

To: President, Student Freeloaders Association
From: Paul Mobley
Subject: Expense Account

Here's my expense account for my November 2 survey of political victory parties around the city:

Item: $1.00 - Screwdriver

This was at Harold Dobbs' party. I had heard that at most of these parties the drinks are free, but when you consider that candidate Dobbs had to hire a fancy hall like Bimbo's 365 Club with all those waitresses and stuff, the tab goes up.

I did get some free food though. Since Dobbs was the founder of Mel's Drive In, there were sandwiches from Mel's as well as fried chicken and some soggy salad. I guess he got some sort of discount on the food.

Item: $1.50 - Chili con carne, wine and beer.

Dianne Feinstein saved money by holding her party in her volunteer headquarters, an old parking garage on California Street.

Item: $10. - Parking Ticket

When I went to Alioto's party, Van Ness Avenue had no parking spaces at all so I had to park illegally. Funny, but this was the only party with a lot of cops around.

I tried to get in the front door, but they told me that it was for "the family." I don't know if they meant the Alioto family, the mayor's political family or the one that Look magazine referred to!

Anyway I went in the back door (another old garage. . . wish I'd parked inside) and everything was over, sort of. All of the free booze had been consumed or ripped off and there were a lot of people staggering around. They were unplugging the television sets by then and you could hardly breathe for all the legalized smoke.

A motherly-looking lady was pouring coffee for those who needed it, but I didn't and so I left and found the ticket on my car.

Item: $1.10 - Gin and tonic

The returns were mostly in and it was obvious that Ron Pelosi was ahead in the supervisor's race, so I shot down to Del Webb's Townehouse and the Garden Room. I figured that a winner like old Ron ought to have some free drinks. No luck, though. They were ten cents higher than Dobbs' had been, but a little stronger. The only thing to eat was a too-sweet cake. There were lots of family groups and, since I didn't have any kids with me, I decided to call it a night.

On the way out, Matt Carberry shook my hand and thanked me for my support. Maybe he'd been watching Merv Griffin and hadn't heard the news.

Meanwhile in the lower mission at Giovanni's Pizza parlour:

Dianne: Well Harold, we put up a valiant fight, eh?
Harold: Yep.
Scott: Why Harold, you seem bitter."
Harold: Well hell, four years is a long time."
Stanley Lee: "I'm a pauper and a poet and you and I know it. It's all over now and I know not fear, so let's turn on the box and see what we hear."
Click--"And now gang we have an oldie mouldie from the thirty-third layer down in the Gold Mine. Do you remember when? --"Now there's a man in the City Hall that we all know,
Alley-o...to...um..Joe..um..Joe, Joe.
And he's lived in the city since...
CLICK
Dianne: O God!
Harold: Oh White House!
Stanley Lee: Oh both!

All right, people, what happened to the 18-21 year old vote?

Ask the 400 or so young voters who didn't even get a packet or ballot in the mail.

They'll tell you how they were hustled, busteld, and finally misled.

They'll tell you how powerful their bloc vote could have been.

They'll tell about the 600 votes cast for Stanley Lee Cotton, the Mount Shasta Visionary.

And finally, they may tell you how after doing their damnedest to be an active member of their society, they didn't even get to vote at all unless they went down, down, down, down to the registrar's office at City Hall to get a clearance.

One would think that with the modern mechanical monsters used for the voting trip that such blatant blunders would have been foreseen and made impotent.

If you can get these newly disenfranchised citizenry excited enough, they might even tell you the repercussions of the "No" vote on Proposition "T" Dhich they wanted to win or at least lose by a small margin instead of the overwhelming defeat that will, no doubt, tell the city planners that the people of San Francisco want to get high in building size as well as in mental state.

City College Gay Day Brings People Together

November 4th at City College was officially billed as Gay Day. The event was sponsored by the Free Gay Students Association at the Experimental College.

Held in the Student Lounge of the Student Union building, Gay Students celebrated the event by passing out free fruit, introducing guest speakers and the appearance of various singing groups and rock bands.

Germaine Greer, a spokesman for the Free Gay Students Association aid that "the purpose of Gay Day is to help raise the conscienceness of students on campus. Also our goal is to let gay students know that the Free Gay Students Association is around if needed."

Guests included a representative from Assemblyman Willie Brown's office, Charles Turner and well-known community worker, the Reverend Alice Normoff.

Discussions focused on Willie Brown's Assembly Bill 437 which was recently defeated in the Legislature. The bill would have legalized sexual conduct between consenting adults in private.

Entertainment was furnished by the Claytonian Gospel Pearls, the Angels of Light, the Glide Dancers and various unnamed rock bands.

Don Pickering of the Free Gay Students Association summed up Gay Day simply as: "The idea is to make people aware that gays are human beings".

Rams Blasted by Bulldog's Bomb Attack

By Andy Maker

The injury plagued City College Rams were intimidated by the state champion San Mateo Bulldogs at Ram stadium as the Bulldogs ran and passed to a 37-19 victory.

With quarterback Don Nava throwing three touchdown passes and fullback Mark Shea running for two the Bulldogs managed to keep the Rams behind most of the game.

San Mateo scored first when Mark Shea ran a 20 yard touchdown and failed to convert on Al Addy's wide right kick but was overtaken at 7-6 after Ram Ed pArker scored on a two yard run and Willie Daigle's conversion was good. Parker's first touchdown capped an 80 yard drive highlighted by exciting running of Darrell Mitchell and Ron Hackett.

The first quarter ended 7-6 with the Bulldogs in possession. Quarterback Nava mixed his plays and on second down handed off to Mark Shea from the three yard line for Shea's second touchdown and a two point conversion run by Pete Jordan making it 14-7 Bulldogs. A defensive battle occurred two possessions apiece. After not being able to move on the next series San Mateo fell back to punt once more. But alas a hard rush by the Ram front four and a juggled snap caused a blocked punt. The Rams Derrick Williams picked the ball up and sped 72 yards for a touchdown with an escort by 250 pound Ram tackle Jr. Togiai making the final block. Williams was out of breath when he missed the conversion and the score remained 14-12 Bulldogs.

It looked like the Bulldogs would be in for a tough afternoon. The unflinching Nava kept his team rolling and pushing the Ram defense back. Nava connected with tight end Ron Bletramo for a 16 yard touchdown. After Al Addy's conversion the score was 21-13 Bulldogs which increased a 24-13 halftime lead when Addy added a 23 yard field goal.

During the third quarter the teams played defense with each other and were even until Nava slipped Kevin O'Donnell out of the backfield and threw his second touchdown pass, this one went for 48 yards.

The third quarter ended with San Mateo holding the cards. They began substituting freely where the frustrated Rams were having difficulty with passer to receiver troubles. Ram quarterback Tim O'Shea was getting time but couldn't keep the drives alive. O'Shea's running attack limited to Wilson and Hackett didn't have the breakaway threat of Floyd Coleman, who is one of the injured Ram starters.

San Mateo, having built a solid lead and solid confidence, added another touchdown on Nava's third touchdown pass. This one went to split end Dan Romeo and was good for 24 yards. Nava went all the way for the Bulldogs and passed for 193 yards and a 37-19 rout of the Rams.

The Rams hope for calm in the storm as they try to get back in the win column against San Jose Friday at 2 p.m. Ram Stadium.

Judo for the Defense

Judo is an art that was developed in ancient China approximately eight centuries ago. Lama monks developed the art to combat bands of thieves that roamed the country.

Although the Chinese developed this art the fine points were added by the Japanese who developed over 300 holds and throws.

Today Judo has become popular among women. It can be used as an unarmed weapon and a surprise element in times of emergency.

Judo student Wanda Grant took the course so she could learn how to use Judo for protection. "But I have a lot more to learn for it takes time to develop your skills." Wanda was interested in Judo only for self defense "but I was delighted to find out the different skills involved."

Judo and Karate are one and the same. They are both of the martial arts, karate being the highest. Judo is preparatory for karate. Where you would be likely to hit your Judo opponent you wouldn't see him if he were using Karate on you, Wanda explained. In learning techniques of Judo extensive practice with an opponent must be gotten. And if you have long hair a headband is handy to have available.

Elston: "Morale Is Good"

City College's football coach, Arthur "Dutch" Elston, is fairly optimistic about the outcome of hs team's effort in the final moments of the season.

"The boys are working hard and there is an improvement from previous instances," he said.

Noting the team's overall outlook, Elston insisted that "they're a conscientious group."

San Mateo, he said, is a traditional rival. Next for the team to do battle with will be San Jose on November 15. Diablo Valley will follow on the thirteenth. "San Jose is a solid ball club," he added. Foothill, Diablo Valley and San Jose are coming threats.

Elston, a lightly grey-haired man with a deep voice and a husky build declined to admit comparisons for the team being either better or worse than in the past. "It's relative...the league is a little stronger".

"Quarterback Tim O'Shea, fullback Ed Parker, and running back Ron Hackett contribute a lot and I get good workouts from them. Elvin Smith has a good attitude. We're not winning too many games, but the morale is good."

"There are three games left and possible we could win in three or lose in three for it's pretty even."

Asked to comment about some of the imminent problems the team might have, Elston said "pass defense and pass rush are in need of improvement, the pass coverage isn't too good and we're spotty and can't combine all of it in three."

Continuing in his views, Elston said "At one time we'll play better offense and other times defense. We haven't put it all together,"

The record speaks for itself. In the conference games, the team is one and three. Overall, they are one and five.

With a sly, easy grin, the coach added, "The kids are still hangin' in there. We're still hopeful."

Cross Country to Head for NorCal

The cross country team, led by Dave Muela, are rolling along in anticipation of invitation the Nor-Cal Championship. The squad dashed past San Jose City College 50-15 and just missed Laney 27-28.

Terry Smith and Benito Rodriguez have lived up to Coach Vasquez's expectations as they have finished in the point totals every race they've entered.

"Even if we can't get to the NorCal meet this year we will next. We have a fine team and are loaded with returning lettermen," Said Vasquez.

On the season the team is 3-4. They can improve their record because their inexperience is the faoor that lost early meets.

Overdue Books Will Force Library to End Registration

A new policy has been put into effect by the college library regarding overdue books and cancellation of registration.

If a student has not returned library materials on time he will be sent two notices, the first of which is a reminder and the second is a letter from John J. Brady, Coordinator of Student Welfare, stating that the student's registration will be cancelled if he does not return the materials.

A period of one week is given to return the books or to pay the outstanding fines. Those who have received the second notice will be charged two dollars per book as a delinouent fee.

Students who refuse to respond will have their registration cancelled and will not be permitted to attend classes.

The reason for such drastic measures is that there are some 500 overdue books since the beginning of this semester and about 1,000 from previous semesters by students currently enrolled.

Ann Roberti, a library staff member, stated that the library had sent notices to these people before but they are just not effective. She said that the library is not really interested in the money but wants the materials returned so that others may use them.

The library does not have enough books as it is, without the added absence of the overdue ones.

Ann Roberti also reminds students that the library is now open on Sundays from 1-5 and all regular services are offered at this time.

VESTER FLANAGAN—New Director of Student Activities

New Dean of Activities Assumes Tough Position in Mid-Season

City College has a new director of student activities. He is Vester Flanagan.

A graduate of McClymonds High School in Oakland, he spent five years in Humbolt State College where he received a bachelors degree.

He was named Little All-American on the Humbolt State football team and was the Fareastern Conference Champion in the javelin throw. Picked on the ninth round of the professional football draft by the Green Bay Packers, he decided against a football career in order to work for progressive reform in the field of education.

The main function of the student activities advisor is to help sponsor and organize activities for City College students. As Mr. Flanagan noted he plans to "work effectively for the students with the programs that are here and also help start new programs."

After serving as a teacher in San Francisco's Everett Junior High School, Mr. Flanagan was recently the Dean of Boys at Polytechnic High School in San Francisco. At Polytechnic, he instituted a so-called Student Directed Curriculum Program, the first one of ts kind in the Bay Area, where the emphasis on running and controlling school activities is based wholly on the students themselves.

He plans to continue the same close student-administrator relationship at City College that he had at Polytechnic High School. As Mr. Flanagan sums up: "I want the students to know that I listen and can move in a direction where I can help them."

Rising School Costs May Force Colleges to Close Admissions

California community colleges are running out of money.

With student enrollment growing at the rate of ten per cent each year and inflation steadily inflating, CCSF is still better off than most community colleges in California.

The financial pressure is on almost all of the 93 California community colleges because they have reached their local tax ceilings. This means that the only way colleges can get addition al money is to have the voters approve a tax override which in turn would mean higher property and sales taxes.

"We have a couple of years before we are financially limited" said Dr. Harry Buttimer, Assistant Superintendant of San Francisco Community College.

Cost

The average statewide cost for one year's of a college student education runs between $700 and $900, but at city the average cost is $880.

Unless the community colleges get some relief the traditional "open door policy" may be on its way out.

At present City College is subsidized in the following manner: the Federal government provides four per cent; the state, 27 per cent; local governments provide 69 per cent of the annually required funds.

Help

Karl Drexel, President of California Community College Association, said that his organization is look ing for ways to help for the community colleges from the Federal government,primarily through general financial aid to students.

Governors Argue Make No Decision

Final approval for Cloud Hall East was denied by the Community College Board of Governors at their monthly meeting Oct. 28.

Instead, the board kept the matter open setting an April 1 deadline for submittal of alternate plans as to location and design for the building.

Opposition to the current plans, voiced by students Bob Kahn and Xandra Malandra, concerned both the loss of green area behind Cloud Hall, where the building was to be con structed, and the loss of view from classrooms in Cloud Hall.

Both Martin Pfluger and son John Pfluger, architects of the project, were quick to point out that the view lost from Cloud Hall would be made up by new view from classrooms and offices in the new building.

As to the loss of green area, the architects mentioned that two plazas were planned to be used for open space. Although these were orignally designed as concrete areas with planter boxes for tree, they could be replaced by grassy areas. At this comment, loud cries of "no more astroturf" came from the large audience.

Both sides were in general agrement as to the need for more classroom and office space. Yet, the students were opposed to the urban sprawl effect; low, long building spread over every area of the campus.

The board will decide at it's March meeting what to do with Cloud Hall East, if anything.

Conference

Want to see America changed - by peaceful means? Then go to Chicago! December 3, 4, and 5 an emergency conference for new voters will be held at Loyola University.

The conference will mark the birth of a national Youth Caucus, (similar to the already-formed Black Caucus and Women's Caucus), to struggle for delegate power in the 1972 Republican and Democratic nominating con ventions.

Chairman of the conference s steering committee is Duane Draper, President of the National Association of Student Governments (in Washington D.C.) In a letter to The Guardsman, Draper stated the conference will seek to consolidate the 18-24 year-old vote into a formidable political force in 1972, 'to insure that one or both national parties nominate candidates acceptable to the young and the poor in this country.'

'Serious reform in the parties is dependent upon the mass numbers which only young people can bring to bear... If you care about using the 1972 elections as an effective mechanism for change in America, we invite you to join us in the work of the emergency conference in Chicago.' Draper continued.

City College Passes Test Receives New Accreditation

October 26 thru the 28 marked the return visit of the Western Association of Schools and Colleges accreditation team to City College.

The team, composed to twelve representatives from the seven western states, including Hawaii, visits the college once every five years to determine if City's facilities and cirricular programs are up to collegiate standards. The College can receive accreditation approval for a period of one to five years.

Some six months beforc an accreditation team is scheduled to visit a college, a questionaire is sent. The college responds by submitting a survey of its cirricular and programs responds by submitting a survey of its curricular and programs and when the team arrives, the college is reviewed on the basis of the survey submitted.

City College's accreditation team completed its work on Thursday the 28 by presenting a verbal report to students, faculty and the college and district administrative staff.

A formal report, comprised of the evaluations and recommendations of each of the twelve team members, will be presented to the college within several months. Within the report will be the reccommended period of accreditation.

Accreditation for a college may not be for the entire period of five years or even a single department of that college to be accredited for one to five years.

City College's accreditation this year had one added dimension it had not experienced before. Evaluation also included the adult and vocational programs located throughout the city. Total student population in this district is over 90,000.

Little difficulty is expected by the college in receiving its accreditation for another five years.

It was hinted in the Team's verbal

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Planning An Education

Achieving higher education takes a lot of serious work and planning. Many students bypass the opportunity to continue their schooling simply because they do not plan their program courses to fulfill graduation or transfer requirements.

Ther is a large staff of full time counselors available to students wishing guidance in planning a course of study at City College.

Most of the counselors have specialized in different majors and their experienced advice can be very beneficial.

It has never been easy to continue your education in a four-year college. But today, attending the college of your choice is almost impossible except for the very alert or the very lucky.

It is of the utmost importance not to rely on luck but to be alert and begin plans for transferring now.

City College students, as well as others enrolled in California community colleges, sometimes have a tendency to dabble a little in every course without taking the time to complete lower division requirements.

The excuse for taking hodge-podge courses is that a student is enrolled as a General Education major. This in itself is valid. However, this same student burts himself when he cant transfer to another college after two years because he has to make up three units of political science or English 1-A.

Whether a student is self-programmed or not should make regular appointments with his counselor to alleviate any problems or questions.

Within every list of required courses there are a number of subjects from which to choose. This system gives the student the freedom to select a course that may interest him and yet contributes to the list of transfer requirements completed in his two-year program.

There are many other advantages in seeing your counselor regularly; information on college admission procedures, requirements of the college for transfers, etc. But the student must make that first giant step toward the educational services building.

For anyone who wants to 'go places' academically, every opportunity to make the transition to a four-year college or university is available.

November is the month when most of these colleges begin accepting applications for next fall.

This is also the for students to see counselors about planning a program here.

Social Barometer Attacked

One of the functions of City College is to train people to become capable law enforcement officials. It is obvious that much contempt and disrespect for those who have chosen this field exists on campus among many students.

This attitude is also the general trend throughout America. Often the policeman is regarded as unintelligent, unfeeling and power abusing. This may or may not be the case.

The policeman has become the social barometer and is often the target of violent and unjust hostility which is a grave mistake. Capable, well-trained, understanding and humane law enforcement officials are vital to the public safety and well-being.

It must be realized that no matter where the corruption and abuse of power exists, human relationships between law officers and the public are of the utmost importance to the furthering of understanding and respect.

City College should not become a breeding ground for this hostility. The campus should be a tool for constructive social change and a beginning of a new and human culture.

It is the student s responsibility to yield an enlightened attitude. Regardless of personal differences of opinion or existing social codes, City College students should go out of their way in establishing good relationships with our future policemen and policewomen.

Each individual should overcome indifference and instill a sense of respect, equality and responsibility with these people and encourage them to do their utmost to promote true justice throughout their careers.

Letters to the Editor

Editor:

The special election edition of The Guardsman was good. Usually I don't read the school paper but this week I did.

There is usually not much in newspapers that Ican relate to but I notice that The Guardsman has changed quite a bit in the last couple of semesters.

The only thing I don't like is that you rarely publish letters from readers. Will you publish this one ?

J.Fong

The Guardsman staff is very glad that so many more readers have joined us. We hope that you will enjoy our future editions.

As for publishing your letter, here it is!

Congratulations Jim Toland! You and your staff have put out the first 12-page edition of The Guardsman.

I think that Ed Hartzler and Bruce Bosso eespecially deserve to be complimented for their find job in handling all of the news that appeared in the November 11 issue.

Bruno Forner and Andrew Maker did a nice job on sports and Jim Serpilio and Richard Blair excelled in their photography.

Linda Carcia

Thank you for your support. Although you mentioned several of us in particular I must say that

This semester we have the greatest staff I have ever seen assembled on The Guardsman

Editor:

Recently I saw a member of your staff writing graffiti in a men's restroom in the Arts Building.

It was the guy with the 1952-style haircut who wears his pants and shirts too large and who looks like a nervous chipmunk.

Isn't this carrying freedom of the press a little too far?

Mel James

Many of our staff members are such enthusiastic reporters that they can't stop writing, even at the most inappropriate moments.

As for freedom of the press in the United States and throughout the world, it bas recently been described as a complimentary laundry ticket.

Editor:

How come there are no ads in The Guardsman?

Other school papers have interesting ads that keep the students informed on local activieties, shows, sales, etc.

I think its is a disservice to the City College student not to see ads in the paper.

Janet Bradley There is no advertising in The Guardsman because like other academic courses, It is totally supported by the San Francisco Community College district as a laboratory project of the Journalism classes.

However your letter does bring up an interesting suggesion.

Bury Dying Peace Rallies

Peace rallies are becoming a dying occurance as was witnessed on November 6 at the Polo Fields. The failure of peace rallies occur for several reasons. Future rallies may be affected badly because of the November 6 rally for peace.

Apathy was most apparent in the relatively small crowd that witnessed the rally. The crowd was far from vocal and seeemed to be more concerned with what speakers represented than what they actually said. This took place because of the failure to get important spokesmen. Unknown speakers addressed the gathering more often than not.

Another problem was that the speakers did not differ in speech but merely in presentation. The afternoon seemed to be one speech given by different people in different tones.

It seemed as though every six feet there was a person peddling something. If it wasn't 'Quotations from Mao' it was 'Out Now' buttons that were being sold. One was constantly hassled for donations. Poor planning was again the cause of the problem.

As one speaker pointed out, this is the most important time for the peace movement, if it hopes to survive. Rallies that are ill-planned and ill-conceived no longer have a positive affect. Rallies such as the one witnessed on November 6 may hurt the movement more than help it.

Rams Lose to San Jose in Valiant Effort

The City College Ram defense stopped the San Jose running attack after the "Red People Eaters" Homer Lewings and Junior Togiai led the front four in devouring all running plays attempted but the Rams fell anyway, this time 27-6.

A disappointed sun-beaten crowd watched San Jose dominate the game after a scoreless first quarter.

San Jose opened the scoring with 5:55 left in the second quarter when quarterback Dave Gonzales went back to pass and spotted tight end Jeff Wilson for a 24 yard touchdown play and Pete Caldwell's conversion, putting the Jaguars ahead 7-0.

The Rams had the opportunity to go ahead on turnovers but instead of capitalizing on it they turned the ball back over as they have done so many times this season. Junior Togiai picked up a fumble for the offensive charges but on the next play Jaguar safety Fred Trugillo picked off one of three Tim O'Shea pass interceptions—to kill that drive.

The Red'n'White defense denied the Jaguars any ground and were aided by a 15 yard penalty, an incomplete pass, and a minus yardage pass play that forced the Jaguars into a punting situation. But the hapless Ram squad caused a fumbled punt at their 10 yard line with the Jaguars recovering. But the great Ram defensive unit valiantly held the Jaguars scoreless and forced them to punt and kept the game in sight.

The offense plagued with injuries, played without breakaway threats Darrell Mitchell and Floyd Coleman. The offense another opportunity when tackle Leroy Butler recovered the second fumble for the Rams and the Rams were rolling. O'Shea handed off to Rich Harrison for 11 yards, continued with a 16 yard pass to Jim Odoms, running back Ron Hackett picked up two yards and on second and eight they were hit with a five yard penalty for delay of game.

O'Shea tried to keep the team momentum going down the field but after a four pass completion to end Bob Del Torre. A clipping penalty was marked off. On the next play O'Shea was sent to the deck by the Jaguar pass rush.

After two fruitless ball exchanges, O'Shea and company took over again. O'Shea had thrown three straight completions but on the fourth, cornerback Bob Barnes retrieved the interception for the Jaguars, setting up a 45 yard scoring drive for San Jose.

With six seconds left before halftime, tailback Frank Bistolfo bulldogged his way into the end zone from four yards out. The kick failed but the late touchdown killed the Ram spirit and put them in a hole they never were able to climb out of.

In the second half the action was very much like the first. The Rams were killing their hopes by penalties and by San Jose killing them with all control and the strong arm of quarterback Gonzales (who added another TD pass of 37 yards to split end John Gurich) and wisely sent Dave around the front four to a 26 yard end sweep touchdown.

The Rams finally got scored when O'Shea clicked with Rich Harrison for a four yard touchdown with the conversion pass failing. FINAL SCORE: San Jose 27-City College 7.

Vets to Get Paid for Tutors

The Veterans Administration reminds veterans studying under the G.I. Bill that they can hire a tutor at VA expense, if needed, and still get the full educational allowance.

About 4,000 veterans received more than 60,000 hours of tutorial help in connection with their G.I. Bill educational studies, VA reported today.

VA officials noted that to be eligible for this benefit (established by the Veterans Education and Training Act of 1970), the veteran must be enrolled under the G.I. Bill above the high school level on a half time or more basis.

If the veteran needs tutoring to pass a required course, VA allows up to $50 monthly for a maximum of nine months to pay for it.

These tutorial fees are in addition to the regular monthly education check the veteran receives, and are not chargeable to his basic entitlement, officials pointed out.

VA urged veterans interested in tutorial assistance or education benefits to contact their nearest VA office, or local veterans service organization representatives.

QUESTION: ARE YOU RELIGIOUS?

Mike Lorenz—Cultural Anthropology
Yes, I suppose I am. It's part of my philosophy of life. It's woven into my fabric, but not a crutch. My personal religion makes the sense of my life.

Jan Kovalick—Astronomy
"No, because I read a book by Bertrand Russell on why you should not be a Christian and he gave lots of convincing arguments against religion."

Gwen Holman—Social Welfare
I believe in Jesus Christ. It's not really religion but I have a personal relationship with him. Through Jesus Christ I've found a peace and a calmness that equips me for the everyday hassles of life.

Andrew Maker—Nuclear Physics
I am not religious because religion seems to be theory only. There is no solid evidence that confirms religion or its characters that suit me. Religion is a form of capitalism!

Marian Hoo—General Education
"I believe in God. I believe in Jesus Christ. I believe he's real. Life wouldn't be anything without Jesus Christ. Christ said, "I am the way, the truth and the life."

Gregory McKeag—Journalism
"Yes, I'm a firm believer in the unity of God and Man in an attempt to live a life that is beneficial to oneself and the whole of mankind."

Assistance Now Available at the Health Service

The annoyance of an irate student combing City College campus to secure needed assistance can be reversed with Student Health Service involvement.

For the most part, individuals are partially or entirely unaware of the variety and depth of health services offered and of the warm, confidential atmosphere underlying the effectiveness of these programs.

Although various services extend beyond its confines, the actual operating base of the health service is located in Room 190 of the Science Building. The staff consists of nursing and mental health personnel, a vocational rehabilitation representative and office secretaries.

The collective purpose and motivation behind Student Health Service was outlined by Barbara Cabral, PHN: "Administratively, the service was originally instigated because the college needed a center for first-aid and emergency treatment, but the actual purpose has evolved into actively counselling and educating students about mental and physical health problems, and contraceptives."

Each of the four aspects of the Health Service in turn has its own particular operating functions and purpose. Nursing aid includes referral to community resources, birth control counselling and pregnancy testing and counselling. The mental health services revolve around individual and group therapy oriented to crisis prevention and resolution. One day per week, a vocational rehabilitation-assistant aids the physically and emotionally handicapped to secure money for schooling, and an office staff handles availability of health information and issuance of elevator keys and P.E. course drops.

While a speculative average of 20 students frequent S190 daily, this student service remains an untapped source of aid dealing in almost any aspect of physical, emotional, and mental medical needs.

Services are primarily on a drop-in basis, with an appointment policy for mental health counselling.

VETERANS— Van Furlough Bob Hughes, and Ed Hartzler rap about new Veterans Fraternity

National Vets Fraternity Opens City College Chapter

A chapter of Alpha Sigma Mu has been established at City College and is now holding regular weekly meetings every Thursday in room C-222 at 11 a.m.

Alpha Sigma Mu is a common medium in which veterans can express themselves regardless of political views. The fraternity does not involve itself in partisan politics, but does voice its opinion in civic action areas.

These areas include legislation or proposed legislation that directly or indirectly affect the lives of all veterans, and concern on topics which adversely affect the lives of all citizens.

Activities of A.S.M. range from various forms of social, athletic and community service to a strong involvement in veterans problems of today.

The fraternity hopes to familiarize veterans of the Armed Forces with scholastic life and to foster, contribute to, and to promote the aims of the institutions of higher learning.

The City College campus chapter presently includes some 30 to 50 members. Current business includes the setting up of courses in veteran's benefits at the Experimental College, the formation of a football team, visiting V.A. Hospitals and a mailing system to inform veterans of all benefits available to them.

The fraternity is also active in current legislation concerning veterans which is now under consideration by Congress.

In the future, scholarships will be available through the national organization. One such scholarship is the David J. Penyak scholarship Fund which was set up in memory of the past president of the International Federation, who was killed in an auto accident recently.

The fraternity is also making available information on a Scholarship Search Program sponsored by Continental Bank.

Alpha Sigma Mu was established approximately eight years ago in a community college in northern New Jersey. For the past three years A.S.M. has been expanding rapidly throughout New Jersey and part of Pennsylvania, Georgia, and now California and Florida.

Four year colleges and universities include Villanova University, Seton Hall University, Fairleigh-Dickenson University, and Newark College of Engineering.

The City That Knows How?

The YerbaB wena Center is finally being constructed after many facetious delays by the city fathers.

These delays have taken their toll, though. Once the arena is built, there will be no team that will be using it.

The Warriors got fed up and scurried across the bay to Oakland. The question is, will Frank Mieuli return Al Attles and his crew to Bagdad by the Bay or will he keep them in the land of Oaks?

The Seals, twice champs of the Western Hockey League, were accepted into the National Hockey and immediately took hold of two new places: Oakland and last place. It is destinctly back to the city once a competent sports arena was built. The owners sold out to Charles Finley. It is certain the team will never move back since Finley is trying to do to Oakland hat the Barbary Coast did to SAn what the Barbary Coast did to San Francisco.

So, that leaves the Yerba Buena Center without a permanent team to base itself there.

thout a doubt, roller derby and all its sweaty splendor may come there, but the hometown of the Bay Bombers (our local team) is in Oakland. Exhibition wrestling, currently usurping the Cow Palace, may move there, but it is an exhibition operation with promotional broadcasts out of Sacramento much like roller derby has their's out of Kezar Pavillion.

The city that knows how has done it again. They're in the process of building a sports arena two years too late. Now, no one major sports team wants to play here.

New Benefits for Vets

New benefits and programs are provided for veterans.

E.W. Christensen, Director of VA's Northern California Regional Office states that service-connected GI's are now eligible for various educational benefits.

If the veterans death was service-connected a life insurance policy will proceed upon his death. Dependency and indemnity (DIC), checks will follow monthly. VA benefits are based on at least 90 days of military service for the veteran.

The maximum VA loan available for a mobile home is $10,000 payable over 12 years and 32 days.

Questions may be asked at Veterans Administration on 4th and Mission from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., Mondays thru Fridays.

Russ Jews Demand More Travel Less Restrictions

A lecture and discussion on the history of Soviet Jewry was presented last Tuesday in the Arts Building Room 115 to a small but interested audience of 20 students and teachers. The informal talk was delivered by Rabbi Roger Herst, Professor of History at S. F. State college representing the Hillel Foundation.

In his talk, Herst made it clear that the most important issue that Jews are currently fighting for is their inalienable right of immigration (from Russia) ...When forced to live out of their land, they lose some of their Jewishness."

When asked about treatment of Jews in America, Herst explain ed that, "the only real outbreak of Anti-Semitism here was during The Depression of the 30's because of relatively wealthy Jews legal and medical practices), non-militancy."He attributed the rationale behind the oppression to the threat of Communism since most of the Jews came from the U.S.S.R.

After discussing more points on the history of Jews in Russia, Herst concluded the meeting, promising, on popular request, to return to CCSF for more talks on the subject.

The chairman of the counseling department, Donald Marcus, recently announced rules for registration for Spring, 1972.

Any student who did fill out an open hour form, and does not receive a counseling appointment by Jan. 3, 1972, should contact his counselor immediately after that date.

'Rally Was All a Mistake,' Claims Hillsman

Music of volume equal to that of the Nov. 3 anti-war rally will no longer be allowed.

In fact, it was only through a mistake by the student activity office staff that music for the rally was permitted in the first place.

"It never would have been allowed if it had gone through my office or Vester Flanagan's," said Dean of Students Ralph Hillsman. Flanagan is the new director of student activities.

Because of complaints registered during the rally with Hillsman and City College President Harry Buttimer, power to the rock group "Ice" was cut off.

Student mobilization committee member John Goebel complained on the grounds that all the arrangements had been made and that everything was legal for the time allotted. The council had approved the rally two days before.

Dean Ralph Hillsman

Dr. Buttimer decided to let the rally continue. "The decision was to back the council because we had scheduled it," said Hillsman, who at the time was doubling as the student activities director.

"But hereafter there will be no more music at the Ram area," (between the science building and Smith Hall) he said.

Rallys will still be permitted as long as the noise level does not interrupt classroom activities.

Complaints on the Nov. 3 rally came from classes at the south end of the science building and Cloud Hall.

At least four petitions have been filed with Dr. Buttimer protesting the

Glen Dumke Drops Dead Degrees

Chancellor Glen Dumke announced that nineteen rarely used degree programs at the state colleges have been discontinued.

The trustee's policy of dropping program's in which so few people take degrees was given as the reason for this action.

The cuts would probably produce little, if any, savings. Students in these programs would probably switch over to other similar majors. Many of the courses would be retained under other degree programs and virtually all of the faculty would be kept.

The trustee's committee on educational policy also voted unanimously to eliminate 78 other degree programs due to be started soon, and postponed the starting date of 110 others scheduled to begin within the next few years.

Of the 19 existing programs dropped, 15 were at Northern California campuses.

Similarly, most of the 78 eliminated and the 100 postponed were at Northern California campuses.

The 19 abolished degree programs were chosen because they had produced fewer then ten bachelor's degrees or five master's degrees graduates per year.

San Francisco State College lost its bachelor of arts degree in Chinese studies, Latin-American studies, Psychology-Speech and its bachelor of science degree in Science-Business.

San Jose State students will no longer be able to earn a master's degree in German, or a bachelor's in German, Russian, Life Science, and C onservation.

Chico State lost its master's programs in Chemistry, Economics and Spanish.

Fresno State lost its master's programs in French and bachelor's programs in Philosophy-Psychology.

Sacramento State lost its master's program in Applied Blological Sciences.

Joseph Smith is Unsighted Not Blind

Despite his name, Joe Smith is no ordinary person.

Last August he was involved in an accident that would have driven many men crazy. Riding a motorcycle in the downtown area, he smashed into a building at 50 miles per hour.

He suffered a fractured skull, which mended, but lost something that is irreplacable—sight.

"I had the feeling my life had come to the end—I didn't need to end it," he said. "It was only after counseling with doctors and other unsighted people that I realized I could have a very full life."

Joe has a word of warning to motorcyclists who don't wear helmets.

"If I had been wearing a helmet I would not have received a single injury. I didn't have a bruise below my neck."

He added, "I am personally opposed to motorcycles now. You're in great shape as long as you don't have an

"Obscenity is a matter of opinion," says Essay Contest Winner

Daniel G. Russell, a psychology major at City College, was a winner in the $25,000 National College Scholarship Competition sponsored by Greenleaf Classics, Inc., a San Diego book publishing firm.

Russell received a prize of $500 for his essay on obscenity which appears in "Winning Essays on the Subject: Obscenity: Censorship or Free Choice?"

His essay is about the suppression of obscenity. The essay claims that it has generally been accepted that obscenity is damaging to a person's life, and corrupts all who are exposed to it.

Obscenity is defined as "material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest".

Russell believes that obscenity is just an opinion. In fact, the only real harm derived from obscenity would be that it tends to have a disturbing effect on certain people.

Russell also claims that such laws toward obscenity should be more selective for society has no right to legislate morality. He also feels that society is the victim because valuable time, energy, and money is sent on the victimless crime where it could be better utilized in fighting more serious crimes.

He concludes his essay by stating that if a man is to be free "the less freedom he receives and the more animal-like he gets." "The suppression of obscenity then" said Russell "far from enabling man to rise further above the state of animals, instead will tend to bring him closer to the animal state by depriving him of a portion of the most vital element of his humanity, his freedom."

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Taxpayers Pay for Inefficiency

The latest reapportionment plan unveiled by the chairman of the California State Assembly makes good sense, if the assembly's Democratic leaders are bent on political suicide.

The new plan proposed by committee Chairman Henry Waxman will unseat or weaken a large number of incumbant Republicans.

It would deny fair representation to thousands of Mexican-Americans, fragment natural communities and divide much of the state into legislative districts with conflicting interests.

Legislators in both parties feel that the Waxman proposal is a joke. It seems that the Democrat leaders hoped to panic the Republican incumbants so that they could shatter opposition to a less ambitious gerrymander.

There is considerably more logic to support the "scare" theory than the Waxman plan itself. Waxman once cited "technical difficulties" as his reason for his committee not producing a redistricting plan months ago.

Forty-one votes are needed to pass a reapportionment bill. With one seat vacant there are forty-two Democrats in the assembly. Some of these Democrats are disgusted at the apparent lack of ability shown by their own reapportionment strategists.

A few will vote for the bill in the name of party loyalty while others have been embarassed by this latest attempt to gerrymander the state.

This last group has threatened to bolt their caucus and vote against the Waxman bill if it gets to the floor.

The Republicans have only thirty-seven votes in the assembly. But they also have the governor's veto power.

Speaker Bob Moretti and Waxman both know that Governor Reagan would never sign this bill. It denies fair representation to millions of Californians and guarantees the defeat of Republican legislators.

Waxman told reporters that should the Governor refuse to sign his bill the legislature might pass a reapportionment plan through both houses in the form of a resolution. Resolutions, he noted, do not require the Governor's signature.

But resolutions do not make laws. Only bills signed by the Governor or approved by a two-thirds vote to override a veto can become statutes. The Legislative Counsel has specifically ruled that reapportionment can not be accomplished by resolution.

Unless the Democrat leaders are willing to come up with a sound plan soon, reapportionment may eventually be decided in the California Supreme Court.

The Republicans have proposed a non-partisan approach to redistricting that seems to respect community boundaries and insures better representation for ethnic minorities. Considering this, it would be difficult for the court to uphold a plan that simply increases the Democratic majority at the expense of voter equality.

Waxman's bluff is not very impressive, it is annoying to see legislators playing around with such important matters as assembly resdistricting while taxpayers pay them high salaries to play these little power games.

ENVIRONMENTAL RAPE — This blemish on the face of the beautiful Redwood Park in northern California is the result of clearcutting.

State Tree Genocide Attacked

Two years ago, while flying over the green mountains of northern I Corps in Vietnam in an Army chopper, there were huge craters making the forests like a checkerboard.

The craters were the result of dropping 500 pound bombs and averaged one-half mile in diameter. It certainly destroyed the beauty and effectiveness of the country's forests.

There's a war going on in California's northern forests also. Just fly from San Francisco to Portland, for instance, and huge bare areas which used to be green with forest are now evident.

These barren areas weren't caused by bombs, however, but by the destructive influence of big business.

Our forests are being ravaged by large lumber companies.

The lever with which our beautiful woodlands are being dwindled is called "clear-cutting."

Clearcutting is the policy by which large areas of forest are totally cut down, leaving ugly bare brown patches.

In their attempts to make money, these lumber companies seem to be oblivious to the harm that they are doing. These bare areas not only look atrocious but:

(1) take away the natural canopy of forest which keeps the ground cool and keeps fire danger to a minimum.

(2) allow mass breeding of destructive insects and disease.

(3) allow the elements to destroy the natural quality of the soil.

(4) alter the natural watershed and set the land up for severe erosive action.

There is a war going on right now to try to save these beautiful forests. What the individual can do to help is to be informed of the problem. It is up to everyone to save the natural beauty and purposes of the forests and to preserve the wildlife.

'Great White Hope' Set Under Construction

The streets of Chicago, a San Francisco gym, a Budapest cabaret, the London Home Office, a Belgrade railroad terminal, the Havana racetrack and other bits of travelogue scenery are gradually filling up the backstage area of the Little Theater.

They are all part of the round-the-world settings for The Great White Hope, the drama department production scheduled for January.

The Pulitzer prize-winning play, based on the life of Jack Johnson, is the biggest production ever staged at City College.

The show calls for 18 different settings to follow the global travels of the first Black heavyweight champion.

The production will utilize a combination of multi-purpose sets, wagons, revolving stages and flying scenery to achieve the split-second set changes.

PRODUCTION — Skip Blas and Pat Vaughn compare set model with construction-in-progress for the upcoming production of THE GREAT WHITE HOPE.

Letters to the Editor

To the Editor:

If the book store charges almost full price for used books, why can't you get more than half price on all return of books, providing it's in good condition.

The book store is connected with city college and should benefit the students, most of whom are poor.

Are the profits of the bookstore given to financial aid for needy students, or do they pay for the new campus buildings?

The Minority students feel that most of the book stores profits should be given to financial aid for the students who are hanging by their belts, to stay in school.

Since he regained control of "Winterland West", he has presented weekly shows there since its mid-September opening. Aong the groups that have headlined the Winterland marque include It's a Beautiful Day, Black Sabbath, Allman Brothers, Pink Floyd, Van Morrison, Traffic and Ten Years After only to name a few.

Rumor has it that Graham will lose his lease on Winterland come January. If so, then the Graham concerts will be sorely missed as Bay Area Rock audiences have been accustomed to spending weekends at the old Fillmores and now Winterland.

Ten Years After
Nov. 12 at Winterland

Ten Years After is a group that was born in ten minutes at Woodstock while playing "I'm Going Home." They became superstars overnight playing to sellout crowds that screamed for them to play "I'm Going Home".

Now Ten Years After is trying to change their rock-roll image. The release of their latest L. P. "A Space in Time" shows a breakaway from the long Alvin Lee solos that appeared on their previous recordings. The group is more of a unit now than a one man band.

They played three songs from "A Space in Time" opening with "One of these Days", "Once there was a Time" and "Baby won't you let me Rock and Roll you" as an encore. And just a touch of the past in "Coming Down the Road", "Good Morning Little School Girl" and of course "I'm Going Home".

Alvin Lee played as expected, faster than the SST could ever go. Most impressive is his use of the mike stand for a bottle- neck sound.

Chick Churchill on keyboards, Leo Lyons on bass and Ric Lee (no relation to Alvin) on drums all had their own little solos in a jam that lasted at least 30 minutes.

Also on the bill were Big Brother and Holding Company who proved that they can rock and roll even without Janis on stage and Gold, a local band that plays San Francisco's "Mission District" sound.

CONCERT PREVIEWS:

Upcoming shows include the Doors with Albert King and Dan Hicks and his Hot Licks Dec. 2 at the Berkeley Community Theatre; the Youngbloods Dec. 4 also at the Berkeley Community Theatre; the Beach Boys at Winterland on Dec. 10 and 11 and The Who at San Francisco's Civic Auditorium on Dec. 12 and 13.

RECORD PREVIEW:

New L. P.'s to hit the record stores include Led Zeppelin, Leon Russell, Bob Dylan, Grand Funk Railroad, Paul McCartney, the Faces (with Rod Stewart), the Who, Elton John, Ike and Tina Turner, It's a Beautiful Day, Jeff Beck, Fifth Dimension, Chambers Brothers, Aretha Franklin, Chicago, Sly and the Family Stone, Pink Floyd and a three record set recorded at the Madison Square Garden "Bangla Desh" benefit concert featuring superstars George Harrison, Bob Dylan, Ringo Starr, Eric Clapton and Leon Russell.

TEN YEARS AFTER-Changing their "I'm Going Home" image.

PART I of a Series

Military Control: Sailing On the Coral Sea

And now for a few words for our brothers on the Coral Sea, and all the others like them... Now that they've left Alameda, their families, friends, lovers. Now that reporters have gone on to greener pastures of fresh controversy. Now that the Peace Movement and the radical clergy and all the other movements have lost a cause celebre. Now that the huge silent TV and radio audience has tuned its consciousness to fresher news tid-bits. Now it is only beginning for our brothers on the Coral Sea.

If you're thinking "What have those sailors got to do with me?"—then think again. The Armed Forces today are no more and no less than a cross-section of American youth. Rich, poor, radicals, conservatives, hip, straight, black, brown, yellow, red and white. It could be you on that ship. Unfortunately the military still remains remote, removed, alienated from the mass consciousness. This is the bitterest cross of all to bear for someone in the military. If you want to feel it from the inside; get a short haircut, put on Navy dress blues, and walk down Market Street; you'll get the idea.

Servicemen lucky enough to be from California can (when not overseas), lead a sort of "double life" at least on the weekends. But leading a normal life while on liberty, then returning to the military madness every Monday morning, only intensifies the trip and leads to a sort of schizophrenia.

So now the Coral Sea is off to 'Nam. Two or three weeks steaming, depending on maximum knots available. Four or five days in Subic Bay, Phillipines to load up on bombs and fuel, then out to the "Line". The Line is just that: American naval forces drawn in a line, north and south, up and down the coast of Vietnam.

Down around I Corps, II Corps, and III Corps destroyers and cruisers, many all the way from the East Coast, steam endlessly on bombardment missions. Yankee Station is the rendezvous point for the carriers and their center of operations. Up north around the DMZ more tin-cans provide artillery support and illuminate vast areas by flare at night. Meanwhile support ships ferry out ammunition and supplies from the Phillipines, and the "Brown Water Navy" patrols the rivers and swamps in their armored gunboats.

Abortion Editorial Rebutted

"Abortion constitutes outright homocide. If a women is insipid enough not to take necessary precautions to prevent the conception of the child the same goes, help." This statement was made in a previous editorial and should be ringing in the ears of every woman who has read it.

The editorial goes on to say that a doctor who performs an abortion is playing God. Right away we know the writer has had limited contact with women, complete insensitivity to feelings of women, and he is placing his life in God's hands.

Contraceptives are far from perfect. Contraceptive conceptions are common. Wasting money on the space program and imperialist wars instead of spending it on research for safe and effective methods of birth control is how society cares for the needs of women.

It's not even considered by man that he should share in contraception and develop methods for his own use if he so objects to abortion. Even the one available to men, the condom, is hardly used. It's all a part of the attitude that women are responsible for children, so why worry, Mr. Man?

What of a woman or child who is raped and conceives—should she be forced to bear a criminal's child? What of a woman whose birth control fails and would endanger her life through childbirth due to a weak heart? What of a woman who feels she should not bear a child she does not want? Do we have no say about what we want to do with our bodies?

A foetus is not a life until the fourth month, in my opinion. I can not agree with you sir, when you say women murder in abortion. If a woman is not capable of making the decision on what to do with her own person, who is? Is the state to make us robots? It's bad enough that women's bodies are used to sell advertised products. But we are also considered products.

The days of ancestor worship are gone; why must we make you a child, why not adopt one? The earth is overpopulated with hungry children.

Looking at woman as a 'creation machine' and not a human being is the problem. Not all women are supposed to be mothers. We will make our own decisions whether you approve or not. So I suggest to the man who calls abortion a murderous act to be sure never to be a part of the dreadful crime and to abstain or obtain a vasectomy.

QUESTION: What makes you happy?

Oscar Porter - Welding and Engineering Technology:
To keep animals from being slaughtered and to do away with unnecessary violence would make me happy.

Ron Kim - Biology Major:
Having something in my mind makes me happy. The act of having something to think about; something I can mentally construct. Right now - I don't have anything...

Michael George - Music Major:
To see everyone else happy and to see that there's total harmony within the universe.

Colbert Dare - Architecture:
Talking to girls on campus. Girls keep coming up to me to talk, and as long as they keep noticing me, it keeps me happy!

Donald Nikolich - Drafting Technology:
Security. Finding security in just about anything; that's what it's all about anyway. If you're not secure you can't be happy. If you have hang-ups you can't be happy or secure.

Phil Harley - "Life" major: To have a good warm loving body next to me when the winter rains come. A fire, and some good dope. A good, rich life in the country where anyone can love.

Feature Photographer Focuses For Fun

In a campus knee-deep in hot-pants, and with minis on the munis, high hemlines continue to climb in popularity. Viewing this phenomenon as a step in the right direction, our photographer (after stretching his budget and stocking up on film), went out on a limb to take a stand on legs, in an effort to dress up our pages.

Putting in a lot of legwork he trotted from one extremity of the campus to another, getting his kicks, and nearly getting booted off campus.

Tired of toeing the line, we decided to step forward and publish this photo essay - hoping to step up circulation.

Women's Lib will probably put the shoe on the other foot by accusing us of being heels and "skirting the issue" (Not realizing we're only trying to poll their legs).

But, "Fools run where angels fear to tread!" So, at the risk of putting our foot in our mouth - Heel and toe and away we go . . .

Yes, Virginia, There is a Ram Football Team!

The win-hungry City College Rams finally won another football contest but it took them until the final game of the season to do it. The Rams stoned the Foothill Owls 42-10 at Ram stadium before an excited sunbeaten crowd.

Smith and Cloleman Lead Rams

Unstoppables Floyd Coleman and Elvin Smith led the scoring parade with three TD's apiece. Fullback Ed Parker's six yard touchdown plunge in the first quarter rounded out scoring for the Rams who failed to make a conversion all game.

Floyd Coleman

Elvin Smith

Smith took a pass from quarterback Tim O'Shea and went 14 yards for the first score of the day. In the second quarter O'Shea rolled right and found Smith drifting to the end zone and connected with the 170 pound flanker for the second touchdown.

Floyd Coleman, fully recovered from tonsilitis, returned to play for a sufficient amount of time for the first time in three games. Coleman's scoring thrusts came in the second half. With only 2:55 of the third quarter gone Coleman took the handoff from O'Shea and dashed untouched into the end zone for a six yard score and a 24-10 lead at that point. Still in the third quarter and just 5:03 later Coleman was handling the ball and appeared to be closed in on, but he made a brilliant cutback that electrified the fans, put him out of reach of Foothill defenders, and sent him on his way to an 85 yard touchdown run. (Once made the cutback at his 30 it was obvious he'd go all the way.) Between Coleman's showboat exhibitions slick Elvin Smith had snatched an Owl pass and returned it 62 yards for a score.

Coleman's third touchdown came on a two yard run.

After the shouting in the Ram dressing room subsided Coach Elston extended his congratulations to the team and added, "I'm glad you kept up the spirit after many frustrating injuries..."

Ed Parker

Frank Johnson

Notes: The week before the Rams dropped a 14-13 game to Diablo Valley who beat them by a point last year 13-12. Elvin Smith had two interceptions a touchdown and a blocked punt to his credit. Frank Johnson stole the show with flashy running and pass catching ability. The other victory came against Merritt 7-0. Ed Parker did the honors in scoring.

scoring summary:
Smith 14 pass from O'Shea
Parker 6 run
Rich Morgan Blocked punt recovered in end zone (Kiss kick)

Soccer Stalwarts Clinch Crown

It has happened! Yes, City College has won another Northern California championship. City's Rams Soccer team took the Conference title.

How is it possible to have a championship team in the school, yet there is no support for the team? Ask yourself. Think about it next year.

The practice season really prepared the Rams for the league title. In the preseason openers the Rams had three wins and only one tie. The Rams beat Skyline 9 to 1 and went on to beat Ohlone 3 to In the next practice game our Rams beat Diablo Valley 9 to 2. The big event of the year was playing against a nationally known soccer team, the USF Dons, which wound up in a tie 1 to 1.

Now was the time for the Rams to show themselves at their best. The league was starting with City matched against Marin J.C. which they beat 4 to 0. The league games were really great games, but not any competition for our boys.

The Rams went undefeated throughout the season downing: Marin, West Valley, Canada, Skyline, DeAnza, Diablo Valley, and Ohlone. The total amount of goals which the Rams scored in the league games mounted to 28 while only allowing three goals to be scored on them.

Team

The soccer team carried a total of seventeen players. The Rams won for a variety of reasons, all leading up to one major reason. As it was expressed by both Angie Karas, the right halfback, and Al Quinto, a 45 year old player, the team played and worked together as a team.

Angie also said that Coach Diederichsen played a big fact in them winning. Angie said, "He is the type of coach who helps you with your homework, outside problems, as well as your problems with the game." The Rams placed six players in the All-Conference group.

Play-Off

In the playoffs the Rams beat DeAnza by a score of 3 to 0. This made the Rams record 11 - 0 - 1. With only one team left to beat in order for them to go to Los Angeles for the state championships Rams practiced and beat Canada, the defending champions for two years, by a score of 2 to 1.

The goals were scored by Ron Van Velthuysen and Tony Perez with an assist by Frank Alcaraz. Other important players on the team are: Marwin Sahovrieh, Ramiro Castro, Tony Perez, Tom Bartunek, Bill Berzin, Jose Olmedo, Mauricio Arce, and Gary Meroff.

What do you do that is athletic at night? The men's gym and Chris Davis, the student body co-ordinator have started a basketball league. Everyone is eligible to play. All it takes is five guys and a team name.

This program better known as, "Intramurals," takes place each semester, yet there is very little participation. Is this because no one knows about it? If you want to play sign up next semester. Each team in the league competes for a trophy and a chance to play in sports night.

The original purpose of the intramurals was to give everyone who wanted to test their skill a chance to test it. It is a good project for it also gives people a place to go on the game nights and the games are free. In watching these games you can really see the talent that is in this school.

The teams in the league this semester are: Young Lions in first place; the New Generation in second; the Showstoppers Association in third; the Beta Ballers in fourth; and the All American Armidillos in fifth. At the end of the season the second and third place teams battle in order to see who will play the first place team in sports night. So if you aren't doing anything on a Tuesday or Wednesday night, come up to the gym and from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. watch the games.

accident. If you do, they afford no protection at all. I think they should be banned."

Now enrolled at City College, Joe has set the goal of earning a PhD in psychology in six years. Psychiatry, like so many other things for the blind, is not available.

"I miss running, simply the exuberance of running," he said. "Horseback riding is also out of the question. I loved to scuba dive, and now that's out."

Is there any hope?

"There is always hope. Present technology is unable to help, but technology is a very transient thing."

The 21 year old ex-marine is currently taking classes in Braille, which takes about a year to master. He will soon be going to a guide dog school in San Rafael, one of the best in the nation.

Joe found few problems in getting around the school or the City. He said that he can find all his classes with no trouble, but if someone asked him to go somewhere other than his regular classes, he would be lost.

"There are no major problems except for students who don't keep their eyes open," he said. "They run into me. The outside stairs are also a bit of a problem."

In regards to transportation around town, Joe gave the Muni a hearty vote of confidence.

"The Muni is extremely cooperative. I ride for free on the buses, and the drivers are very friendly. The City is basically a polite city. I would never live in L.A."

Joe also wanted to set the record straight on the use of the word blind. "It grates on unsighted people," he stated. "It has a bad connotation."

'My first thought was suicide; other unsighted people assured me my life was truly worthwhile.'

"If I Had Worn My Safety Helmet, I Would Not Have Suffered Any Injuries."

Conley knew him as an informal, gregarious person who responded to the many people who were frinedly with him.

Health Center Prepares For Mistletoe Invasion

Christmas. Pine-tinted holly, golden streams of tinsel, spiced nutmeg in warm mugs...and contraceptives?

The association isn't common but it is relevant since holiday seasons and romance are ageless partners.

So an unprepared Christmas doesn't yield an unexpected New Year's guest, the area of Student Health Service dealing in birth control counseling and pregnancy testing has submitted some useful information for all involved.

There are five basic methods of contraception, each having varying degrees of effectiveness.

Men can assume responsibility by purchasing a condom (rubber) at any drugstore. Women may purchase foams or jellies at a pharmacy, or secure them directly through the campus health center.

Women may also have a diaphragm fitted by a physician, but the most reliable contraceptive methods for those who have intercourse on a regular basis, are use of the pill or the insertion of an intra uterine device (IUD) by a doctor.

Other methods include withrawal, rhythm, and douching which a health service staff member branded as "extremely unreliable methods of contraception."

Information of the above methods are available at St. Luke's Clinic, 647-8600, at 555 San Jose Ave. in San Francisco.

In Southern California she studied with Bela Lewinsky and at the American School of Dance.

She is now director of dance for the Oakland Parks and Recreation Department besides performing at local colleges and at the S.F. Opera House. She was also filmed for the KQED television series entitled "Portrait of a Black Artist."

Opportunity to Get CROC-ed Over Obnoxious Commercials

CO-ED CROCETEER—Pegi Hjermstad, University of Minnesota student, shows her new CROC poster. Pegi, a senior majoring in theater, has clipped her "Let's Get CROCed Together" button to her earring. As a member of the Committee for Rejection of Obnoxious Commercials, she will vote in the spring on the 10 worst TV commercials of the year.

College students across the country are being asked to support a movement to try to ridicule irritating and obnoxious television commercials to the point where they are off the air.

Bill Bentzin, a Minneapolis public relations man and founder of the Committee for Rejection of Obnoxious Commercials (CROC), launched the campaign November 10 in a talk to the Mankato College Marketing Club in Mankato, Minnesota.

CROC was formed in September in Minneapolis, and now has more than 1,000 members from coast to coast. The organization hopes to improve the quality of television commercials by calling attention to the bad ones, at the same time recognizing some of those which CROC members feel are good.

The main activity of CROC will be a balloting by members in the spring to name the "10 Biggest CROCs of the Year"--the 10 worst TV commercials of the season. CROC award winners will be nationally publicized.

"There seem to be enough bad TV commercials to offend just about everyone. We've got memberships from the grade school set to retirees," says Bentzin. "College students I've talked with feel very strongly about improving commercials. They're much too sophisticated to be impressed by the ridiculous things that some of the agencies resort to in commercials."

Membership in CROC costs $1.00 and all college student members get eight "Your Commercial is a CROC" protest cards to send to companies sponsoring bad commercials to let them know they may be heading for a CROC award; a membership card; a "Let's Get CROCed Together" button; and a "Crush Revoltingly Obnoxious Commercials" poster, plus the right to join in the spring voting.

To receive all CROC material and get on the spring ballot list, send $1.00 to COLLEGE CROC, Box 1022C, Minneapolis, Minn. 55440.

College students also are being asked to participate in a "CROC art" contest to create a new poster for the organization.

The "CROC art" competition is open to any college student and has a first prize of $100 for the best poster capturing creatively and imaginatively the goals of the organization. Second prize is $50 and third prize, $25.

Posters should be done in black and white. Choice of media and size is open, however consideration should be given to possible photographic reproduction and use in a 17 x 22 inch size.

Entries should be sent to CROC art, Box 1022CA, Minneapolis, Minn. 55440, postmarked no later than December 15, 1971, and arriving no later than December 20, 1971. Winning entries become the property of CROC and other entries will not be returned unless accompanied by a postage paid, self addressed envelope. Decision of the judges is final. Winners will be notified by January 31, 1972.

Another petition was signed by 21 students in a math class in science 211. Seventy-one criminology students backed still another petition, and 15 more business students in Cloud 230 signed yet another petition.

In addition, the Executive Council representing the faculty said it is "definitely opposed to amplification of music at the Ram area."

Complaints reportedly also came from the library and music departments.

Vets Fraternity Doing it Right

Alpha Sigma Mu, the veteran's fraternity met on November 18 to discuss the goals and purposes of the fraternity and its place on campus and in the community.

The small but enthusiastic membership piloted by their well-versed president Bob Hughes, is working toward making Alpha Sigma Mu an integral part of the City College campus.

During the course of the meeting, members discussed whether or not the fraternity should join the Greek Council. The motion was voted on and approved.

It was brought to the attention of the members that there is a great need for volunteer workers at the V.A. Hospitals to help with patient care.

Other topics discussed were the establishment of a "Halfway House" for ex-convicts, the co-ordinating of a health plan on campus and the setting up of a scholarship committee.

An amendment was made to the fraternitys constitution changing the meeting times to every second and fourth week.

Hughes invites all veterans on campus to join Alpha Sigma Mu, not only for the various social functions that are being planned but to find out what rights and priveleges they are entitled to as veterans.

Ozawa Successful Symphony Head

The San Francisco Symphony with Seiji Ozawa conducting, opened it's 60th season on December 1 at the Opera House. This season marks the second year of Maestro Ozawa as Conductor and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Since the arrival of Ozawa, the San Francisco Symphony has taken on a new image. Ozawa's youthful features and exciting wardrobe add much needed color to the Symphony's concerts.

Musically, he is considered a genius, a wizard with the baton and literally produces magic when the music starts.

As for the orchestra, Ozawa is molding their sound into the best in the country. As noted in a press conference held last week,... when considering the improvement in the quality of the Orchestra's sound: "I hate to let a man go, but if he can't grow with his colleagues and with me, then I must."

He also revealed plans for the San Francisco Symphony to record commercially and a Europian tour in 1973.

Guest conductors for the anniversary season include Dean Dixon, Fruhbeck, de Burgos, Kertesz, Kletski, Krips, Paulik, James Levine and associate conductor Nicklaus Wyss..

Box office wise, Ozawa's presence last season brought on attendence records and this season points to even greater ticket response. Season subscriptions have already been sold out and very few tickets remain for the individual concerts. For information concerning ticket availability, call 861-6240.

INNOVATOR — Seiji Ozawa has worked hard at improving the San Francisco Symphony. He plans other changes in the future.

GROUND CREW — Aeronautic students overhaul new airplane

Aeronautic Students Fly High with Surplus Airplane

Suzanne Satriano

The Aeronautics Program of San Francisco City College has acquired a Cessna 310 for its student's use.

The plane is a twin engine aircraft that was obtained from th U.S. Air Force this semester. It is in excellent condition and is equipped with the latest radio navigational aids. The Aeronautics Department also has a twin engine Navion and a four engine Super Constellation available to their students.

This program, located at San Francisco International Airport has recently been added to large number of courses offered by this college.

Students enrolled in aeronautics, numbering 100, are given theory and practical projects involved with aircraft maintenance and repair. It is necessary for a student upon completing a designated curriculum to take the written portion of his Federal Aeornautcis Association mechanics examination.

Upon passing this, he is eligible to undertake the practical part of his exam. The student will be issued a Federal Aviation Agency mechanics license in either the airframe or powerplant area. Usually, before completing their studies in aeronautics, students will have obtained both airframe and powerplant licenses.

The aeronautics department has six instructors and invites students to come to the airport to become acquainted with this very unique program. The course is worth eight full college credits. Mr. Ed Miyamoto urges interested students to contact Prof. Hutton at 588-0325.

License Challenge Causes Concern

By Bruno R. Forner

One of the two campus radio stations has had its license challenged by a student group from the University of San Francisco.

KALW-FM, operated by the San Francisco Unified School District, broadcasts from City College from noon to 3 p.m. on weekdays.

The station, with its transmitting facilities at John O'Connell High School, pipes into the City College broadcasting department during these hours.

Steve Kushman, program director for KCSF, unaffected by the challenge and KALW, said, "As far as I know it's not being done by the university but by a student group who wants a radio station out there."

Bill Miller, the station's news director, commented, "It's not the first time we've been challenged. Poor People's Radio tried it the last time."

Miller said that the student group's main complaint is that there isn't enough educational programming and not enough broadcasting hours, but pointed out that the station now broadcasts ten hours a day.

Both station directors felt that the group will not be successful in their challenge of the license.

If KCSF is not able to broadcast over the FM dial from 12 to 3 p.m., then they will continue with closed circuit broadcasts in Statler Wing.

Women Stuck Behind Desks

Al Levin

The criminology department has only five women students. Does this constitue a man's world and a cause for women's lib?

The opinion of one woman student in criminology is that women do not get enough actual experience. She further feels, "the future will entail more than the work I am now doing in criminology."

Women students in the CCSF criminology department are relegated mostly to clerical work, although they are sometimes uniformed to work social and athletic functions.

There have been women in the department for over three years. A woman student enters the field of criminology at CCSF taking the same classes as men. On her first counseling interview she is told that the field is currently very limited for women.

"The women in the field are probation and parole officers although there are exceptions. It is seldom that police women are used the way they should be used. We tell women in criminology that the opportunities are limited," said Timothy Foley, head of the criminology department.

Foley did point out that the trend is changing and the future in criminology for women is opening up.

Foley sees the patroling of the campus by uniformed women police as a useless experience for them.

"The criminology department provides the experience that might help a student get future work, said Foley.

STEVE KUSHMAN — "It is the action of an individual group and not that of the university.

Anaheim Scene of Violent Junior College Conference

Bruce Bosso, a City College representative to the California Community College State Government Association conference held in Anaheim recently, claims that he was threatened three times over his support of a candidate for president to the conference.

Bosso felt that the threats stemmed from his support of a write-in candidate for the office.

"I was working for a write-in movement for the past-president of Area 6, Roberto Albanese. Two candidates came out of the primary - Ed Mayfield and Jose Torres. I felt that neither of the candidates could represent City College."

Bosso was at a meeting for constitutional review when he received another threat. He received two other threats in his hotel room. All were made on November 23.

"Nothing came of the threats," said Bosso, "but I did see guns there."

Bosso was the only person from City College threatened, but Rusty Rhodes, former administrative vice-president for the state association, was threatened with a gun pointed directly at him.

Ed Mayfield was eventually elected state president.

The association, whose main purpose is to represent community college students in the Sacramento State Legislature, holds these conventions in order to adopt resolutions which can be proposed and supported in the legislature.

The three day convention adopted a number of strong resolutions, which, if passed by the state, could benefit the students of City College.

The minorities committee proposed a resolution asking that a course in ethnic studies be mandatory for graduation from a community college.

Out of the financial aids committee came a resolution asking the state legislature to veto Governor Regan's budget cuts in the Economic Opportunity Programs.

Another resolution asking that all college information be printed in both English and Spanish was passed by the committee. It was amended, by City College, to include both the Asian and Pilipino languages, but the amendment was defeated.

The gay students of City College sponsored a resolution, which passed the financial aids committee, that asked for legalization of financial aids for gay students. Presently, certain sexual practices are illegal, making gay students ineligible for financial aid.

A state-wide policy of mutual acceppability for all college hiring was proposed by the child care committee. Currently, this policy is practiced in the hiring of City College's administrators and counselors. It was recently proposed to the CCSF Board of Governors that this policy be adopted in the hiring of faulty, but no action has been taken as yet.

The ecology committee asked that all community collges offer courses in the fields of conservation and environmental protection. It appealed for laws to protect the mountain lion, golden trout, and bobcat.

A student member on all Boards of Governors of Community Colleges was requested by the effective political action committee. Legalization for marijuana was also proposed.

The brightest spot of the convention was the veterans committee. More resolutions came out of this committee than any other at the convention.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Abortion Pros and Cons Continue to Stir Up Controversy

The highly controversal subject of legalized abortion has recently been debated in the pages of The Guardsman.

In a poll given by the American Council on Education to entering college freshmen in the Fall of 1970, there were some interesting results concerning this subject.

At City College 82.2 percent of the male students and 77.2 percent of the female students questioned agreed that abortions should be legalized. The City College total average was 79.6 percent.

The national average was 79.3 percent for legalized abortion. Males were 80.0 percent in agreement while females were 78.5 percent in favor of the question.

With the first year of legalized abortions behind them, the city of New York reports that there have been notable reductions in legitimate and illegitimate births. Maternal deaths and admissions to the city's homes for unwed mothers have also declined.

Various clinics in New York did studies of the last year's 164,000 abortion patients. One clinic, The Eastern Women's Center, recently released some statistics compiled from cases drawn from 2000 patients records.

The average patient age was 22.5 years. The greatest number of patient's ages are 19 and 20. The youngest patient was 18 and oldest was 45.

Marital statistics show that 68 percent of th patients are single while 15 percent are married. Twelve percent of the women were separated and 5 percent divorced.

Seventy-seven percent of the women had no children. Interestingly, 20 percent had previous abortions before going to the clinic.

Besides the views of college age students, there have been some other interesting viewpoints on abortion.

Albert Schweitzer said in his book "Reverence for Life," "The fundamental fact of human awareness is this: 'I am a life that wants to live in the midst of life that wants to live.' A thinking man feels compelled to approach all life with the same reverence he has for his own. Thus, all life becomes part of his own experience. From such a point of view, 'good' means to maintain life, to further life, to bring developing life to its highest value. Evil' means to destroy life, to hurt life, to keep life from developing. This, then is the rational, universal, and basic principles of life."

"Humanitarianism consists in this principle, that a man is never to be sacrificed for an end."

In Mohandus Gandhi's book, "All Men are Brothers," he states, "It seems to me as clear as daylight that abortion would be a crime."

On the other hand, Adolph Hilter has been quoted, "We have a duty to 'depopulate' much as we have the duty of caring for the German population. We shall have to develop a technique of depopulation. You will ask what is 'depopulation?! Do I propose to exterminate whole ethnic groups? Yes, it will add up to that. Nature is cruel, therefore we may be cruel, too."

Two female doctors reporting in "Family Planning Perspective" estimate that the population in the United States would be controlled by 1.7 million per year if abortion was legalized across the country.

The moral question of abortion will always be open. The voice of the majority may or may not be right. But there is one thing that is definite. The decision to abort should be left entirely up to the pregnant woman when she has been confronted with all the facts concerning her own individual case.

TO BE OR NOT TO BE — that is the question.

Reflections of an Unchanging Campus

People might say there is little spirit among the students at this college; in fact, that cry has been sounded loudly and repeatedly as long as the college has been in existence.

Maybe this condition of spiritlessness did exist in past years; there is reason to doubt it. But that it does not exist today is evident. To rave and rant that we "must get some real college spirit" is entirely an excess.

What is true is that the boisterous, enthusiastic loyalty which was heretofore defined as constituting real college spirit is passe today.

Now students find themselves bound together by common goals and interests, rather than merely by rah-rah enthusiasm evidenced in the revered athletic teams. Students have found that it is not entirely necessary to be rabid football fans in order to say that they have attained a certain degree of education.

There are, without a doubt, many who enjoy sports events with all their hearts, and who can still find time to attend games in addition to homework, and what goes with studying. They are bound together in the traditionally spirited way and lend an air of pre-war college live-wired zealousness to the campus.

However, there is also a large group, perhaps more than half, who have either escaped from or have simply outgrown this youthful form of exuberance, and who are content with a more sedentary existence, substituting mental exercise for the physical. This is the group whom the more energetic among us condem as being spiritless, in fact utter drudges and grinds, and who we are always trying to persuade to buy tickets to this, that or the other event.

Even though it might appear from outward observation that there is a definite rift among students because of these two very diverse attitudes, there is no real reason why there should be, since the college itself is by far the strongest binding factor.

As long as the intrinsic factor of people working side by side, under the same roof towards a definite goal exists, whatever their methods and means of achieving that goal are becomes secondary in importance, and unity of objective is primary.

Cat Stevens LP Rides High

CAT STEVENS AND ASSOCIATE ALUN DAVIES: Perhaps we just expected too much of him.

Riding high on a wave of hits from his latest L.P. "Teaser and the Firecat," Cat Stevens returned to the Bay Area November 24 before a sellout audience at Berkeley's Community Theature.

Cat Stevens is basically a folk singer (with long time associate Alun Davies accompanying on accoustic rhythm guitar) although he does employ bass and drums in the lightest fashion.

Stevens played his "greatest hits" collection, mostly songs from "Teaser and the Firecat" like "Moonshadow," "Peace Train," "Bitterblue," "Changes IV", and some oldies in "Wild World" "Sad Lisa" and "Longer Boats," nearly 20 in all.

Although Stevens did not project the looseness that he had during his summer concert, he did play well enough to see him again his next time around. Perhaps this latest concert's faults stem from a hastily arranged U.S. tour that the Cat was probably not yet ready for.

Since reaching superstardom through a barrage of hits on AM radio, Stevens may have lost that communication with his audience by being carried away by his success.

But maybe we just expected too much of him in the first place.

Also on the bill were Mimi Farina and Tom Jans who probably wouldn't be around if Mimi weren't Joan Baez's sister.

Veteran's Administration Gives Answers

Q - What is the maximum VA loan available for a mobile home?

A - For the purchase of a mobile home only, it is $10,000 payable over 12 years and 32 days.

Q - I withdrew from school under the G.I. Bill at the end of the semester two years ago, and plan to return to the same school to pursue the same program. How do I start my benefits again?

A - You should notify the school to submit a re-enrollment certification to VA. This would start your benefits again, provided you have not exhausted your entitlement and the school and program are currently approved.

Q - My deceased father was a VA pensioner. Because of a childhood accident, my sister is unable to work, and will never be able to do so. Is she eligible for a pension?

A - VA considers a helpless child as one who became permanently incapable of self-support before age 18. If this is the case with your sister, you should submit a claim, with supporting medical evidence, to VA.

Exempting insurance payments and service-connected disability or death, most VA benefits are based on at least 90 days of military service by the veteran or serviceman. Post Korean and Vietnam Era veterans and servicemen must have at least 181 days of service to qualify for G.I. home loans and educational benefits.

Full details on these and other veterans' benefits are available from any VA office or veterans service organization representative.

Ethnic Theatre Pioneered Here

BLACKNESS '71 — Producer John Fisher.

"What I want to see here on the campus...is a production of ethnic choosing . . . which would include . . . Oriental theater, the new Latino theater and Japanese theater."

Those words were spoken by John Fisher, instructor of Drama 30 and the man most responsible for "Blackness '71".

Last year, in Drama 42, Fisher helped in the production of Happy Ending by Douglas Turner Ward. The play was produced during two college hours and throughout the Unified School District.

The idea of doing other ethnic theater is very appealing to Fisher.

"Black drama is the start in bringing in other ethnic theater. I stress Black drama now because it's the only one I can relate to."

His concept is to have two productions a semester, a contemporary play, a historical play and two ethnic plays which will give the students a new perspective in the theater.

The department needs a larger technical staff, directors and teachers of technique.

The different ethnic groups that make up our campuses have a lot to contribute to the cultural development of their fellow students.

"We need library reference programs...to bring in information to the students...Somewhere!...There's not enough material available," Fisher continued.

There is a research group on the east coast going into black colleges digging out material already done and updating it. When this material is made available to the local colleges it will add to the progress of our theater departments. A reference program would make it much easier for students to learn about the different ethnic works and experiment with them.

People ask why "Blackness '71" had a 99 percent black audience.

"The program wasn't geared to a white audience...The black theater can be appreciated from a white point of view...However, when you're dealing with something new such as Black theater...and with the same rhetoric throughout each production...the rhetoric becomes everyday talk and people are able to relate to these words...these symbols. They get tired of this and they look for something new...The black man can listen to it everyday, the white man can't," Fisher said.

In the second half of the semester, Drama 30 will deal with scenes from different plays to develop acting technique, the Harlem Renaissance and Black productions which have been done on Broadway.

Next semester, Fisher hopes for help from the drama department in doing Phormio, a Roman comedy by Terence.

AMERICAN DEFENSE — Although they are well armed, Americans are still being slaughtered in Viet Nam.

Martyrs to a 'Just Cause'

The Department of Defense announced recently that the number of American soldiers killed in action that week had dropped to only two.

It was observed that when this good news hit the streets, the American people were far from a state of joyous ecstasy. The fact that only two American boys died in a war that the people no longer support clearly shows the Nixon administration's insensitivity toward the public on this issue.

With Secretary of Defense Melvin Laird's happy announcement on the weekly body count, one would take it that these men were actually pleased to see that two boys had died. This is horrible, for it is not necessary for anyone to die. This could be achieved by getting out now.

But we remain in South Vietnam, and for what reason? Nixon has spoken many times about our honorable and just solution to this war. He even talks about how history will recall that America stood its ground, and was not disgraced.

In other statements, Nixon has again referred to the way history will remember America. Do the families of those two boys care about how history will remember America? Do the families of all the Asian boys care about history?

But we remain in South Vietnam. We remain in South Vietnam in the name of history, pride, and a President's vanity.

In the name of national honor, we sacrifice the lives of Americans and Asians. This is an obcenity and a crime.

The body count was two men in the cited week. What will it be this week? Will more, or fewer boys die? Stop this insanity, Mr. President. Bring the boys home now!

Who will be accorded the honor of being the last American to die for "a just cause?"

PART II of a Series

Military Control: Sailing On the Coral Sea

For the Navy it's a different war. They don't have to worry about being shot at by snipers. They don't have to see the bodies in the "My Lais" they create every day with their shells and bombs. But in many ways the mental strain is worse than for those ashore.

Picture this as an experiment in social psychology, or in sensory deprivation: You take a grey steel box, 200 feet by 300 feet, let's say. You divide it up into compartments, like a laboratory maze for rats. Then you fill it with say 1,000 men, of all ages, backgrounds, races, and walks of life. You set up a bureaucratic hierarchy. Some wear brown clothes and are in charge. One man has gold on his hat and has total power, including life or death, over everyone else in the experiment. The rest of the men wear blue clothes and are subordinate to the wishes and whims of those in brown clothes.

Then you fill the rest of your box, the part not used for sleeping and working, with bombs, ammunition, and high-test fuel and oil. Maybe add a few screaming jet engines for effect. Now you shove this whole box out into the middle of the Pacific Ocean for 6 to 9 months (for added effect, you constantly postpone the date scheduled for ending the experiment).

Blue-grey sky, blue-grey ocean, blue-grey walls and floors and ceilings, and blue-grey clothes provide the sensory deprivation.

Every month or so you release the "guinea pigs" for a couple of days into towns full of alcohol, drugs, prostitution, poverty, thieves, and disease (this is called "Rest and Recuperation"). Maybe add a plane crash or two, a fire, or a typhoon just to stir things up a little.

There you have it: probably one of the quickest ways possible to drive people out of their skulls.

Rams Exhibition Record Hits 1-1

After the first week of basketball the Rams have posted a 1-1 exhibition record. They lost to Long Beach 75-68 but regrouped with a victory against Modesto the next night 79-69.

A victory against Long Beach would have boosted team spirit because they are the defending state champions of the junior college circuit. But "we weren't running like we can," said veteran star guard Robert Taylor. Also, it was learned that Long Beach isn't planning on giving its title up too easily because they've been in training since March!

"Given a good break and a team effort we'll meet Long Beach in the Modesto Tournament finals and we'll get this settled," said Taylor.

The Ram team has potential but the exhibition season has shown weaknesses they didn't see at this early stage of the season.

The team should concentrate on taking shots and getting in condition before the season opener on January 4th against Foothill here at 8 p.m.

Luckily our basketball woes are minor. All should have had their fill of losing by now.

Next game: San Jose Dec. 11 Here 7:30
Modesto Tournament December 15-18.
Delta Tournament December 27-29.

WHAT GOES UP-may not go in. Taylor watches the ball dance around the hoop as Terry Bradley (15) prepares to rebound just in case. USF'S Brad Quonstrom (34) looks on

Soccer Champs Come Home

The California State junior college soccer champions attend C.C.S.F. In a hard fought and well deserved victory, coach Roy Diederichsen's eleven prevailed over a stubborn East Los Angeles College.

Inside Left Ron Van Velthysen scored in the first quarter and the Rams never trailed. Ruiz of East Los Angeles tied the game at one apiece in the second period. Then after a scoreless third quarter Van Velthysen did his thing again in the fourth period. Alfredo Vidrio put the icing on the cake with a final goal on a penalty kick and City College won the state championship by a score of 3-1.

The championship game was an appropriate ending to a perfect season for the soccer team of '71. During regular play the Rams beat every team in the conference to take first place and then defeated DeAnza 3-0 and Canada 2-1 in the playoffs to win the Western Junior College Championship.

The absolute zenith of California junior college soccer competition was reached only by a well-coached team effort. Nevertheless we must give recognition to the individual efforts that placed six players on the All-Conference team.

These outstanding players were forwards Ron Van Velthysen, Bill Fielder, and Alfredo Vidrio, backs Art Padilla and Miguel Roliz, and Ed Huber, the goalie who allowed only five goals all season.

Van Velthysen was also selected Best Player in our conference and the state's best junior college player following the championship game.

The Rams rolled over regular season competition with the following scores:

CCSF 4 Canada 2
CCSF 3 West Valley 0
CCSF 5 DeAnza 0
CCSF 2 Ohlone 1
CCSF 4 Skyline 0
CCSF 4 Marin 0
CCSF 6 Diablo Valley 0

Students Plan Improvements For Health Care Services

A bold new experiment in student health care is now underway at San Francisco City College. This comprehensive medical plan for student health care benefits students in two ways.

First; low-cost health care on campus will be improved and expanded with low-income students in mind. Second; the students will have 50% control in the staffing and running of the campus health service, sharing control with the administration and health service staff.

Among the anticipated improvements in the student health service would be hiring a doctor to work on campus. At present the almost 20,000 students here have no doctor available on the campus.

Another innovation will be the setting up of a family planning clinic on campus. It is hoped that this family planning clinic will provide free or low-cost contraceptive devices and information as well as abortion referral.

Another service in the planning stages is first rate emergency care. This would include laboratory tests for sickle-cell anemia and venereal disease, and transportation for those cases where an ambulance would normally be needed.

Several student run and student staffed programs are currently in the works. Some programs of this nature already exist on campus such as the draft counseling program, the child care center, the experimental college and the Student Advice Center. The Student Health Advisory Board will work closely with these existing programs to coordinate services.

Hoped for student run and student staffed programs include a rap center, crash pad, drug treatment, women's clinic, career counseling, and the continuation of the Student Health Advisory Board.

The Health Service's nurses will have additional leeway to act, and prescription of various medications will be allowed.

Campus emergency treatment and transportation will be available and birth control services in the S.F. community will be investigated and reported.

In addition to these improvements the mental health aspect of Student Health Service which was operating on various grants that have expired, will be provided with enough funds to continue serving the campus.

Only through establishing a required $3.75 student health fee, payable at registration, can any of these needed changes become realities. Provisions will be made for those who cannot afford the fee, and all funds will go directly and solely for health services and supplies.

Given the cost of medical care today, especially for minor illnesses, all students will potentially be saving a great deal of money through services made possible only in the application of the minimal fee.

The issue of establihsing a health fee is the decision of City College student seconded by campus administration.

A vote to decide the issue will take place Thursday, Decembec 16th.

Influenza and tetanus toxoid immunizations are available to registered City College of San Francisco day students.
TIME: DECEMBER 9, 1971--THURSDAY--10 to 12 A.M.--Second Series
COST: $1.50 per shot
Written parental consent for immunizations is required for any student under 21 years of age who lives at home. Bring this signed consent form with you when you come for immunization.

Conference Violence

Some of the more important proposals included granting honorable discharges to all military personnel discharged for drug abuse or homosexuality, amnesty for all men who left this country in order to avoid service in the military, the granting of P.E. units for service time, and funding by the state for all book costs and tuition incurred by veterans.

The effective work of the convention, unfortunately, was marred by violence and destruction produced by some of the delegates to the convention.

In a three-day period over $3,000 worth of damage was done to the Royal Inn Hotel, the residence of most of the delegates.

The finale of the convention occurred on the last night. Three TV cameras in the hotel lobby, used for security purposes, were removed from their mountings and stolen. Within an hour, Anaheim Police were in the halls, knocking on doors and searching many rooms.

After destructive action of some of the delegates, rumors were flying that the CCCSGA would fall apart; many schools, including CCSF were considering dropping out of the organization.

The last day of the convention partly confirmed this rumor. Fifteen schools, located in the Central Valley, grouped officially in the Area 8, dropped their membership.

Currently, City College is evaluating its membership, and will decide what course to take. Student Council feels that the organization has tremendous potential for action, but it gets bogged down in petty differences between delegates.

Bookmobile Expands City College Minds

R. Buckminster Fuller, Edgar Cayce, James Joyce, Isaac Asimov and Kermit the Frog all share the same four wheels and sound like an haranguing soap box politician from a distance. There are others, however, that share the Whole World Bookmobile most notably, all of San Francisco County.

On December 2 the pleasure of the bookmobile's rounds were all CCSF's. If you had wanted to lose weight through self control or hypnosis; check your stock market horoscope for the year; indulge a penchant for Agatha Christie or review the sixties, it's possible you may have indulged your whim or have missed your most convenient chance.

In conjunction with the San Francisco Public Library you can sign out Nurse Jane or William F. Buckley, Jr. without a card. Then the oppressive obligation of returning your choice is directed to any of the county branches. No obligation for just looking, howeyer, and for only two cents you can watch and listen to film clips of the sixties.

If you missed your chance, and not many did, with the bookmobile at The Ram or at the Arts building, you blew it. The Bookmobile is a trip in itself.

School News Roundup

A Sierra Club planned carpool, eliminating the $7.50 student body parking fee and sticker and replacing it with a campus wide $1.50 registration fee, is in the planning stage.

This initial fee will enable any car carrying three or more passengers to park free in the student lots.

Cars carrying less than three persons will be charged 25 cents.

A tentative idea for car filling is locating an individual or individuals in various geographic locations of the city to take students to school.

The plan's obvious asset of freedom from muni dependence is coupled with others.

"We want to try to bring people together," said Robert Valen, chairman of the on-campus Sierra Club.

He noted vacuous stares of persons driving alone.

Smog is also a consideration. Fewer cars on the road means a decrease in the burning of fossil fuels.

A carpool program has been in progress at the College of Marin since the start of this semester.

More student activity group interest is desired by the club who need help in the possible formalization of the program by September.

Persons involved in similar programs elsewhere or anyone with ideas on how to implement the plan are wanted by the Sierra Club group which meets every Thursday at 11 a.m. in S 313.

The San Francisco Ballet Company will present "The Nutcracker Ballet" at the Opera House between December 12 and 28. Anyone wishing to see it may purchase tickets from $2.50 to $6.50 or else be an usher and see it free.

Ushers are needed for all performances and anyone wishing to volunteer their services may contact Mr. Beckerman at 10:00 am any day in Arts 204C.

It is very easy to usher and Beckerman says it mainly consists of showing people to their seats and handing out programs.

The only requirements are to report an hour and a half before the performance and to dress neatly. Meh must wear a white shirt, tie, dark suit or sport coat and slacks. Women are to wear a black dress and heels.

"This is an excellent opportunity for those who wish to see a beautiful ballet as well as experience a visit to the Opera House", said Beckerman. Performance dates are as follows: December 13, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28 - 2:00 pm. December 12, 19, 26 - 7:00pm. December 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 27, 28, - 8:00pm. December 24 - 11:00am.

The College Hour committee, headed by Austin White, met November 30 with a list of 24 possible speakers for next semester's lecture series.

White said that he received complaints from various departments on campus that their interestes were not represented in the College Hour. Therefore, said he, the criteria for the Spring '72 College Hour will be a broad interest base.

A wide variety of possible speakers and subjects were suggested for the nine, as yet open lecture dates. They range from Al Young, a novelist and poet through John O'Toole, an advertising man with an agency in the city to some of the presidential hopefuls in next year's election.

One of the major problems that the committee is encouraging is a low budget. The submitted budget request is for $4,000, of which only $2,500 can be used for speakers. The other $1,500 goes for advertising the College Hour and other needs.

Because the money comes from both students and faculty, the committee consists of four faculty members and four students.

White said that there has been a lack of interest in the committee by students but that the trend seems to be changing.

The Student Council, which helps support the College Hour financially, was to appoint representatives to the committee but never did so. Other interested students took it upon themselves to join the committee.

New general education requirements adopted by the City College Board of Governors will impose a 15-unit minimum on all future students.

Dr. Harry R. Buttimer, assistant superintendent, stated that the board had not previously taken a stand on general education requirements.

The new requirements will affect students who enroll after September 1, 1973 and will not affect presently enrolled students.

Students entering after that date will face a minimum of 15 semester units of general education with one course in each of the areas of natural science, social science, humanities and learning skills.

Although certain courses must be taken to fulfill the general education requirements at present, the new ruling will be more specific as to the number of units required in each area. Additionally, the new requirements will be more in line with those of state colleges and universities.

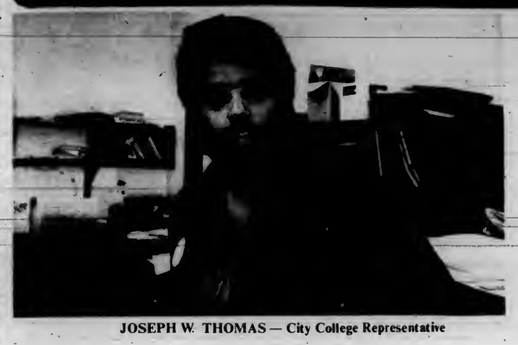
The Red Coats have occupied the campus. But they're as American as a corps of uniformed student volunteers from the campus office of physical facilities.



The facilities office which takes care of the non-educational services on campus such as security, is directed by Victor Graff. According to Graff, the students' duties will go no further than "to provide information to visitors on campus and direct unauthorized vehicles away from the faculty parking lots."

In effect Nov. 11 and continuing for the rest of the semester, the volunteers, or "student parking aides" have been assigned to patrol key spots on campus grounds.

Although they were trained by the campus police, the students will in no way serve as police officers.

WOMEN! Have you been thinking about a career in law? Did you know that many law schools accept students who have completed only 60 units of college work? If you would like to know more about becoming a lawyer, come to Room 214, Arts Building, on Thursday, December 9, 1971 between 11 and 12 Noon. There you may talk to women students from many of the Bay Area Law Schools and pick up various law school bulletins, Law School Admissions Test Bulletins and Applications, and information sheets about what it takes to become a lawyer in California.

Brothers Travel to Fun City to Discuss Black Health Topics

By Greg McKeag

Two City College students represented San Francisco last week in New York at the Black Medical Conference.

The conference was held to inform potential medical students and encourage more Black students to enter the medical field.

Joseph W. Thomas III and Philip Gross, both premed. students with "B" averages were recommended by their counselor and subsidized by the City College Student Council to make the trip.

During the course of the conference, sickle-cell anemia, a disease prevalent among Black people, was discussed. A report of African medicine was also presented.

According to Thomas, the most controversial topic discussed was abortion and how Black women are affected by the problem.

The conference discussed the creation of coalitions for the purpose of including other ethnic groups in the program while allowing the groups to retain their individual cultures.

One program discussed was that of encouraging junior high school students to go on to college. This would work like the "Big Brother" program where members would visit schools and have students accompany them to a college campus to experience a little of college life.

Presently, national chapters are being set up to inform potential medical students of available curriculum and transferability of units to universities.

For instance, City College offers 90 units, 70 of which are accepted by UC, Berkeley.

Kahn Lectures on Flight on Jews to Israeli Fatherland

"Out of all the people that I passsd on the street, the Russian Jews were the only ones to smile," said Doug Kahn, a 21 year old sociology student at UC Berkeley. Mr. Kahn gave a lecture with slides at City College on Russian Jewry last Tuesday. He told the audience of the terrible life that the Russian Jews have in the US.S.R. Because of this, Mr. Kahn is actively engaged in freeing his people, so they may emigrate to Israel.

Kahn spent two weeks in Russia last September. He traveled to Moscow, Kiev, and Odessa in his search for the truth about Russian Jewry.

"My people want to be Jews in the U.S.S.R. or go to Israel," said Kahn. He also explained that being a Jew is more than a religion. It also is culture, history, language, heritage, and country.

"The Russian government won't allow this, consequently; the Jews exodus to Israel."

Currently there are about three and one half million Jews in Russia; and out of this half a million have petitioned the Russian government to leave. Kahn believes that another half million Jews also want to leave.3 "The Russian government is making it very difficult for their Jews to leave for Israel. They have an arbitrary system of who shall go. This year 12 thousand have already left, but many more yearn to go."

Kahn said that Americans can help the plight of his people by writing to President Nixon and asking him to relay this feeling to the Russian government upon his visit this spring.

Former President Candidate Raps Critic Political Bias

In January City College will have its annual Student Council election, but the dust from the last one has not yet settled.

The May election left some people a bit unsettled, especially Darryl Pilcher an unsuccessful candidate for president of the Student Council.

In an interview with the San Francisco Progress Pilcher blames the Free Critic as the main reason for his losing. "The Free Critic used unfair campaign tactics by promoting mainly USA (United Student Alliance) candidates in their May issue," said Pilcher.

The USA candidates received publicity in four out of eight pages of the Free Critic while Pilcher, the only other candidate to get any publicity in the Free Critic, had his campaign printed in small, lightface print on page seven next to a list of the USA candidates in large boldface type.

Jocelyn Won, one of the editors of the Free Critic said at the time of the election, "We never claimed to be the official student paper." Bue Pilcher and other disgruntled candidates claim that since the paper is funded by the student body, it should be representative of all the students.

Money

Pilcher also charges that the USA candidates violated election rules that limit the spending by candidates to $200 on an election. The May edition of the Free Critic cost $520 to publish, learned Pilcher, and he maintains that it would cost more than $200 for the four pages of USA publicity.

Pilcher will meet with Dr. Harry Buttimer, Assistant Superindendent of City College, in the hope of avoiding the same thing next election. So far, the school administration has not been involved in this controversy.

Pilcher believes that if election issues are printed all candidates should receive equal space. He also said that a student "supreme court" should be set up to review student council decisions that are unfair.

Critic

Jack McCloskey, editor of the Free Critic said that there will be no candidates' platforms or pictures in the May issue. "We would be aecused of using unfair political means" said McCloskey. "We're just going to print the names of candidates the Free Critic supports."

Sierra Slopes Packed With Christmas Show and Skiiers

by Suzanne Satriano

Anyone going skiing over Christmas vacation? With two weeks of leisure time ahead many students will be dusting off their skis and heading for the slopes.

It will be a busy time for most ski areas. If you can handle crowded slopes and lines then you'd better go and conquer those mountains. For many people this is the only chance to take advantage of the season.

The Berkeley "Snowphone" reports this week that there is heavy snow in the Sierra Nevada area as well as at Mount Shasta.

Tahoe has about 4-5 inches of new show with good conditions reported and more snow expected.

Mammoth has a 24-36 inch base and Silver Basin has an estimated 3-6 feet base. Three inches of new show was recorded at Squaw Valley over the week-end.

The Berkeley "Snowphone" reports this week that most roads leading to these areas require chains so don't be caught without them.

For more current statistics and conditions, there are three places that give snow and road conditions. They are: The Ski Association at 781-2535, the Berkeley Snowphone at 848-7717, and Road Conditions at 557-3755.

Council Condemns Campus Calendar

CCSF's calandar, distributed at registration will not be produced next semester. This was the decision of the student council.

The council felt that the money invested (approximately $3,000 last semester) was not worth the product. Aslo, the A. S. council declared that much better uses for the money could be found.

STUDENT VIEWS STUDENTS' WORK - One of the visitors to the annual photography department student show which is held in the display room of the visual arts building and will run through the Christmas vacation. The show presents work of the photography students, first through fourth semesters, in both black and white and color.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Christmas Ban on God

The observance of Christmas in American public schools ins now subject to "constitutional guidelines" set up by the American Civil Liberties Union.

These champions of constitutional freedom are deeply concerned about the possible infiltration of religion into school festivities during the coming holiday season.

The Southern California chapter of the ACLU has warned school officials that any display of nativity scenes, cribs or other religious symbols is a threat to the separation of church and state and is a constitutional violation.

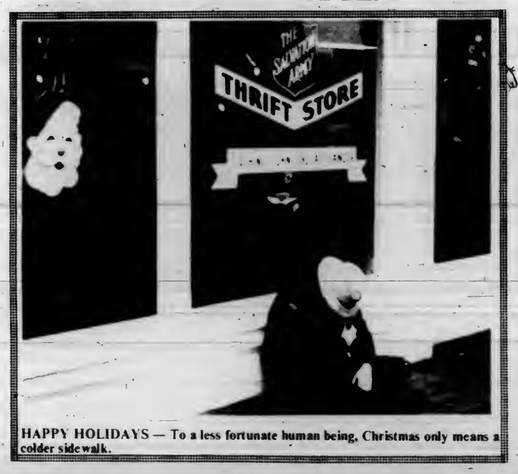
A nativity scene or other Christmas season display with any sort of religious connotation is hardly going to bring instant religious devotion tho those children who happen to glance at it.

It would seem unlikely that such a display would infringe on anyone's religious freedoms or cause a confusion over the separation of church and state.

It is ridiculous to restrict these displays in schools when children will see them in street decorations on television, and in department store windows.

Christmas is a word derived unquestionably from religious origin: This in itself clashes with a federal law which makes Christmas a legal holiday. Does the celebratin of Christmas as a national holiday challenge the separation of church and state?

In a strict interpretation of these new "guidelines" the very word "Christmas," being religious, should not be mentioned in the classroom. Nor should any Christmas carols be sung, especially those mentioning old Saint Nick or that traditional threat to the state, God!



The ACLU is trying to uphold the separation of church and state seems to be missing the point of religious freedom.

It would make a lot more sense to allow individual school teachers to determine the Christmas festivities that their students will engage in while in class. Christmas is celebrated by almost everyone in America, either as a religious holiday or as a day of festivity.

In any case, this Christmas' role as Scrooge has definitely been awarded to the American Civil Liberties Union.

HAPPY HOLIDAYS — To a less fortunate human being, Christmas only means a colder sidewalk.

How Much of Chicago is too Much?

The new album "Chicago at Carnegie Hall" is a test of how much of Chicago one can endure.

The four record set, which plays for 2 1-2 hours, has too much of one thing and too little of another. The group depends too much on its lead guitarist Terry Kath, while saxophonist Walter Parazaider gets only two flute soloes and no saxophone soloes. The "hamonies" aren't harmonic at all and the improvisational leans a little toward banality.

"25 or 6 to 4" is great. But, they completely butcher it live. The guitar solo is done in half time, the vocals dissonant, and the horns come in at the wrong time. "I'm a Man" is completely wasted in a useless drum solo that doesn't get anywhere.

If you can stand 15 1/2 minutes of "South California Purples" or thirteen minutes worth of "Sing a Mean Tune, Kid" or even the overlong piano solo on "Does Anyone Know What Time It Is?" you must have extaordinary staying power.

Of course, there are some good moments. "Ballet for a Girl in Buchannon" is much better than the recorded version. "Motorboat to Mars" is a neat little drum solo that leads into "Free," making it a nice little romp.

The first three Chicago albums were two record sets and even then they were a bit too much. Now that they have four records of them live, a two record set would do them some good. At least they played enough good music to take up four sides. But four discs is a bit too much for any individual to take.

The recordings were made from a series of concerts at Carnegie Hall, and I'm sure the audience enjoyed themselves immensely.

The problem is the music, there is too much of it, and too much of it is bad. As the old adage goes--"Keep 'em comin' back for more." The people at Columbia Records didn't follow it in the case of Chicago.

Chime Time Still a Question

In the crisp December morning, a young coed rushes across campus for an eight o'clock class. Near one of the great halls, a group of men with shuffling feet and pocketed hands, discuss the fine philosophical points of a football victory. On a weathered bench, a freshman ponders Shakespeare.

Above all this, with exact precision, the campus bells chime out the beginning of a new day.

This scene of campus life is not drawn from Harvard, Michigan State or Berkeley, but here at City College of San Francisco. The people are familiar, but the bells perhaps cause a bit of confusion.

City College does have chimes. The campus, since about 1961, has played from four large speakers atop the Science Building, a tape track of chimes consisting of four basic notes.

The tape was played every hour on the hour from 7 am to 6 pm. There were few complaints from students and neighboring residents and many warm compliments about the atmosphere the bells added to the college.

The chimes, though are noticeably absent this year semester.

The explantion is simple but follows a MASH-type plot.

Several months ago, the faithful but aging clock was replaced. The new one proved highly efficient, but weeks after its installation, new telephone lines were installed. In the process one of the chimes cables was cut...somewhere. The exact cut has not been found. Now, plans have been made to replace the tape, which after over ten years of use has become worn.

Work continues.

Ironically it is only a question of time before the chimes sound the hour across the busy and colorful campus.

Letters to the Editor

Jim Toland:

My congratulations on this semester's paper.

It is pleasure to read articles written in readable English.

I have never expected to agree with every article in any publication, but it is satisfying to have more than one opinion presented. This is what a "good" paper should do.

We do not subscribe to the SF papers because we feel they present a biased version of the news. Too many comment on rather than "report" the news today. There is a difference.

Gift Giving Compulsive Madness

Nothing pinpoints the ludicrous madness of compulsive gift-giving so much as the Christmas catalogues that clog the mail beginning in mid-summer.

There must be thousands who "shop" the catalogues motivated only by the drive to one-up their friends with the most useless Christmas gift obtainable.

How else could you explain the artificial marijuana plants offered by The Alexander Sales Corp. of Mount Vernon, N.Y., as "the double-take accessory of the year?"

From poring over dozens of catalogues you get a funny feeling that we're a nervous people, or should be, if we're not. Somebody must be ordering all those shriek alarms (10 times louder than the human scream), the gendarme whistles, the pocket-size "protectolocks."

Our appearance and health obviously are of major concern. For $2.99 you can have an "incredible chin-trimmer" from Sunset House in Beverly Hills, California, which is "guaranteed to help smooth away neck and facial wrinkles, eliminate sagging chin." Or if your idea of fun is to check your blook pressure, there's a $17.95 do-it-yourself machine.

The Neiman-Marcus Christmas Book for 1971 is a marvel of fantasies. For $75.00 you can have a clock that runs backwards, if you're one of those who'd like to turn the clock backwards; or if you prefer to be ahead of your time, you might go for the Lunar Watch, "a timepiece engineered to reflect the passing of time on the moon" for only $700.00.

For the kiddies there's an inflatable whale that can crawl into, priced at a tiny $495.00

For the kiddies there's an inflatable whale they can crawl into, priced at a tiny $495.00.

And the His and Her authenticated Mummy Cases (vacent), approximately 2,000 years old, would be worth every penny of the $16,000 they cost -- just to see the look of startled surprise of the recipients.

Beint sort of old-fashioned and homey, I think I'd have more fun with a $2.95 branding iron from the Sandt Store in Pan Argyle, Pennsylvania. It heats in less than a minute and you can stamp "Good Morning" on your toast.

LOADING BOMBS — Arms are loaded onto the Coral Sea.

PART III OF A SERIES

Military Control: Sailing On the Coral Sea

As the months of a far-East "cruise" drag by everyone gets edgy. The lifers get more authoritarian and paranoid every day. Every error or oversight by subordinates is seen as rebellion, a challenge to their authority, and a personal insult. The men in dungarees feel more and more trapped in an artificial world of hypocrisy, injustice, petty jealousy, and mental harassment. But there is nowhere to go, no escape. Not only must they work under these men they hate, but they must further suffer the indignities of having to eat, sleep, and shower with them.

Official punishment takes the form of "Captain's Mast" (Commanding Officer's Non-Judicial Punishment). On a ship at sea the captain is god. There are no lawyers and no appeal. A man finds his rights and freedoms, which he has been told are "inalienable", in fact no longer exist. He is at the mercy of men who resent everything about him: his youth, his intelligence, his beliefs, his attitude toward life.

Often the only way to stay sane is by getting stoned as often as possible. But privacy isn't as easy to find on a Navy ship.

All in all it is little wonder the number of psychiatric and administrative discharges continues to climb at an amazing rate.

So there it is: The Other Vietnam War. A war of nerves, tension, strain. So next time you see a sailor: smile or shake his hand, but most of all don't just mentally stereotype him. He is your Brother, and man, he has paid his dues at the hands of the Establishment.

Incidentally, if you want to write to any Navy ship in the Pacific: just put the name and rank of who you're writing to, or "Commanding Officer" if you want him to get it, or "Ship's Crew" if it's to everyone (hopefully it'll end up on a bulletin board). After that just put the name of the ship (e.g. USS Coral Sea) on the envelope, followed by FPO San Francisco, Calif. 96601.

MERRY CHRISTMAS — Although it never snows in San Francisco, other areas of the State reflect the atmosphere of the season.

Attractive Dean Added to U.C.

The assistant dean of admissions at the University of California's Boalt Hall Law School is a long-haired blonde who rides a bicycle to work and often is mistaken for a student.

She is a Georgian named Colquitt Walker, the first woman in the school's history to attain so high a position.

She admits to being 31 years old, but concedes, "I guess I look younger."

"A lot of students and prospective students come into my office, look right at me, and ask 'Where's the dean?'"

She feels that the shock, when they get the answer, works to her advantage.

"I think it breaks down a lot of barrie. o people who would feel uptight about talking to somebody older," she said.

The Atlanta-born attorney said she doesn't fall into the stereotype of the woman who clawed her way to the top despite her sex.

"I never felt discriminated against at all in law school," she recalled. "I was one of three women at Atlanta's Emory University Law School in a class of 100. But I was just so grateful to be there. I got to know many of the professors and just really enjoyed it."

She spent two years with the Oakland Legal Aid program on a Reginald Heber Smith fellowship and was asked by some women law students at Boalt to teach a course on women and the law.

"When they found out that this position was open, they asked me to apply," she said.

In addition to counseling students, Dean Walker and an assistant are responsible for handling all the files of prospective students -- "and we're expecting 7,000 applications this year for 275 places!"

"I'm going to have to say 'no' to 6,500 people right off -- and many of them are very qualified," she said. "It's really sad."

Two of her major concerns are building up a scholarship fund for women and seeing that firms which discriminate don't use UC facilities for job interviews.

'On the Air' Radio Dilemma

City College has two radio stations, KCSF which just broadcasts around the campus and KALW 91.7 on the FM dial. Although City College does have these facilities available to their broadcasting students this is one of the few junior colleges in northern California that doesn't broadcast their football and basketball games.

This is really a crime because the only way in which a student can improve his skills is "on the air" broadcasting, which here at City College is non-existent. The department does offer "on the air" time for regular broadcasting shows but does almost nothing in the way of sports for those broadcasting students who are interested in this journalistic speciality.

Just a few weeks ago the college did air two high school football games live from Kezar Stadium, but they let a person who is not a City College student handle all the play-by-play, while another student did some color work. So out of all the students interested in doing sports work only one City College student got experience in a limited capacity.

A new building is being constructed to house the broadcasting department,. This building will help broadcasting in the future but as of now there is nothing available to those interested in sports. In broadcasting sports is an important communication technique. The system needs young, trained people to carry on in the growing industry and the only way which this can happen is to have live "on the air" announcing.

The teachers in the broacasting department are capable poeple, who know the industry, but I think it is time the department realizes that "on the air" sports announcing is a vital part of learning the business.

QUESTION: What does Christmas mean to you?

Joseph Charles De Ramon-Forestry
It,s the one time of the year that most people are friendly. I enjoy it a great deal. I only wish people were like that all the time.

Nancy Farnham-Astronimical Engineering
It's a happy time of year. I don't believe it should be religious. It's hypocritical to be relisious one time of the year.

Marcella Yee-Zrt
It means hour after hour of boring Christmas programs. All your friends go broke for you, and I go broke because of everyone else.

Laura Waite-Art Illustration
It means renewing friendships, giving, living and loving. It's a feeling . . . a spirit.

Lance Huntley - Biochemistry
Christmas means nothing and has no meaning. I am not a Christian. Christmas is not commercial enough.

Allen Thayer-Education
It means very little. Christianity has no significance to me. It's good because it helps people reflect on some of the things that need doing, brotherhood, peace and creativity.

GUARDSMAN SPORTS

Basketball TDA: The Front Line

Someone said, "as soon as our front line gets together the squad will start rolling."

Well, what are those big fellows thinking and what are they doing to make the other team look bad or good? Ron Dale and Bobby Pruitt, stars of last week's game explained the importance and expectations of their positions of center and forward. Bobby plays both positions, as does Cliff Williams, the 6'6 rebounder.

"Primarily we're out to beat the other team to the punch and make as few mistakes as possible," said Pruitt.

Bobby Pruitt

That theory was proven when the Rams steamrolled Hartnell. City's tall front line outhustled and outmuscled the Panthers in a second half uprising. They accounted for 32 points.

We're not making excuses but the Guardsman feels that Bobby's presence could have made a difference in the outcome (75-68 Ram loss).

Sometimes the tall, talented Rams are so dominating it calls for more than one player to stop their superiority in rebounding and scoring. Thus, "it makes them easier for our team to keep an unguarded man," explained Pruitt.

The forwards more or less decide the kind of luck their team will have, for they are expected to get the ball and score. Their chief concern is in getting the ball. Dale explained, "the forwards usually average 10 rebounds and try to hit in double figures." Asked what strategy was used on his team, Dale replied, "If the shot is there I'll take it."

The big front line of the Rams is as tall as any other team in the GGC but lacks in height at guards. Robert Taylor and Willie Daigle are both 5'10".

The Guardsman Staff Wishes You A Happy Christmas

Rams Rip Panthers in Late Rally

Jump Ball*High Jumping 6'5" cente Cliff Williams (42) goes for the tipoff against an unidentified player.

The City College Rams pulled to a 69-59 victory over the Hartnell Panthers of Salinas.

The Rams were outplayed in the first half and were down 28-25 at halftime. With eight consecutive turnovers, the Rams are lucky that they were that close.

The supreme rebounding power of City's Bobby Pruitt, Cliff Williams, and Ron Dale along with 23 of 27 free throws aided in pulling the Rams exhibition slate to 2-2 on the season.

The second half was a team effort that hasn't been topped at anytime this season. After some halftime talk to the players the exciting Coach Sid Phelan (exciting? excitable?) had made necessary adjustments to the outside sharpshooting of Panthers Reggie Holmes and Jerry Hagins, who collected 10 and 15 points, respectively.

The Rams fast break was too much for the tired Panthers. The Rams recognized this fault and kept the court smoking with netburners from Robert Taylor who led all Ram scorers with 14. Also hitting in double figures for the Rams were Ron Dale and Cliff Williams with 10 each and Bobby Pruitt with 12.

Ram Scoring:
Robert Taylor 14
Bobby Pruitt 12
Ron Dale 10
Cliff Williams 10
Terry Bradley 8
Willie Daigle 9
Charles Goodwin 4
Vince Chambers 2

Notes: Last week the Rams lost to USF in a poorly played contest 72-68. "They outhustled us all the way around," said Coach Phelan. During the holidays the Rams will compete in two tournaments. The Modesto tournament will be December 15-18 and a re-match with Long Beach who beat City in the first game 75-68 is a possibility. The San Joaquin tournament will be December 27-29.

Notes:

City College, appearing in its third practice game, goes against San Jose Frosh, at 7:30 p.m., December 11 at CCSF. In the last game City College lost 75 to 68 to Long Beach City College, but the Rams show great promise this year.

They have a strong and big team. Height is an important factor in basketball, especially for rebounding, and baby we have an average height of about 6 feet. The Rams have a long and rough road ahead of them, but they should end up with a victory and another Golden Gate Conference title, and then in the state finals.

Basketball Team Heights

Adams, Art - 6'3
Atchan, John - 6'3
Bradley, Terry - 6'4
Chambers, Vince - 6'5
Daigle, Willie - 5'10
Frazier, Ray - 6'1
Goodwin, Charles - 6'1
Jackson, Julius - 6'4
Jones, Mike - 6'2
Monncy, Kevin - 6'2
Pruitt, Bob - 6'5
Ridgeway, Reggie - 6'4
Taylor, Robert - 5'10
Williams, Cliff - 6'5
On an average, the Rams have scored 65 points in each preseason game.

The Guardsman could use a photographer for sports pictures. If you're interested contact Andy Maker in S-304 daily from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m.

Coach Takes A Shot

"Although the squad has more scoring potential than last year's," said Coach Sid Phelan, "we are not handling the ball as well as we should...yet. Coach pointed out that his team strength lies in rebounding, "but if we can't handle the ball when we have it rebounds won't do us any good."

The basketball team, usually in the role of the aggressed will find themselves in the role of the aggressor, or at least that's what the coach said. "Merritt has it's finest team in school history and this season it'll be a case we've got to beat them instead of them having to beat us."

Although the Ram basketball squad has been known to devour opponents the way our team looked in a losing effort to USF 72-68 caused alarm to fans and Coach Sid Phelan. "We lost because USF outhustled us all the way around," snapped Coach Phelan.

Coach Phelan analyzed his team weaknesses; the scoring punchand ball handling to be the area of trouble for this year's squad "if we don't do any better than we are now."

Team outlook: Coach Phelan hopes for the best but is worried because the other teams are stocked with as much talent as we have.

Guardsman prediction: Rams finish first and take the title again.

Council-Administration Row Rages over Liquor Issue

By Bruce Bosso

The consumption of alcohol, normally not a controversial subject among college students, was the main point of discussion at the student council meeting of Dec. 13..

Harsh words of cirticism were leveled at the college administration by Council Members Jack McClosky and Jim O'Donnell because of the administration's stand on the serving of alcohol at City College.

The dispute was centered around the refreshments to be served at the council's Christmas party held on Dec. 15. Associated Students President Tom Lai asked council approval to spend $20 of A. S. funds for coffee and donuts for this party.

However, council members felt that student funds should not be used and instead, councioll members hsould bring refreshments for a "pot luck" party.

At this point, Council Member Jim O'Donnell stipulated that the list of refreshments should also include beer and wine.

The council's adviser, Vestor Flanagan then informed council that the California Education Code prohibited the serving of alcohol on any junior college campus to any person.

This statement was questioned immediately by many council members because of a dinner that was held in Statler Wing, when the accreditation team recently visited City College. At this dinner, held to introduce the team to the council and administration, wine was served.

When questioned about this action the Hotel and Restaurant department explained that alcohol could be served at such a dinner, since the serving aprocess was part of a Hotel and Restaurant class. Upon hearing this the council decided that members of the beverage servingclass would be on hand for the council's party in order to serve the beverages, and make their consumption legal.

O'Donnell set up a meeting with the

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Get Out and Vote Today

Once again campus elections are at hand. To most City College students this ballot will be somewhat anticlimatic since they have already participated in the excitement of state and local elections.

The polls on this campus, however, are equally as important. The school election outcome affects the City College voter as much if not more directly than do the municipal ballots.

The City College electorate has been disgracefully apathetic in past elections. Less than ten per cent of all eligible o)r usually turn out to choose their representatives.

Many of City College's 15,000 students fail to vote because they don't know that all they need to cast their ballot is their college-issued identification card. A voter does not have to own or purchase an associated student body card to participate in the election.

Others feel that their vote is not important or that student government is not an essential or powerful influence.

The student council has a great deal of power. This power could be used to the advantage of all students, if only they would seize it.

A student who has a complaint of any nature can meet with the president, have his item placed on the agenda and be given a chance to bring it up before the council.

The council can only be as powerful as the students allow it to be. If only nine or ten per cent of the college's electorate show up at the polls, the council has no choice but to be "unrepresentative" of student needs and demands.

The choice to be represented is up to the student voter. Political interest has been gradually mounting at City College. It is time for the voter to carry this mounting interest over the summit and to let it flood into the fulfillment of these student wants and needs.

There are necessary and timely changes that must take place on this campus. These changes can only be achieved through elected representation.

The Associated Student elections take place today and Thursday.

Electrifying Group is a Shocker

Rock music's most exciting experience, the Who, came back to the Bay Area after nearly two years absence with two electrifying performances at San Francisco's Civic Auditorium last December 12th and 13th.

The Who are the ultimate in rock music. The release of their critically acclaimed L.P.'s, "Tommy", "Live at Leeds" and "Who's Next", coupled with their amazing theatrics and powerful music in their live performances, make the Who incomparable with other rock groups.

Opening with oldies like "I Can't Explain", "Summertime Blues", 'substitute", "Magic Bus" and moving to current material from the "Who's Next" L.P. like "Baba O'Riley", "Bargain", "My Wife", "Behind Blue Eyes" and "Won't Get Fooled Again".

Then came the announcement that the band was going to play some "choice cuts" from their rock opera "Thomas". By the time the crowd had regained their sanity, the band was into playing the opening chords of the "Overture", "Amazing Journey", "Underture", "Pinball Wizard" and a truly moving version of "See me, Feel me" during which four huge blinding flood lights were turned on and pointed at the audience for special visual effects. As if this weren't enough, the bank launched into a lengthy version of "My Generation".

Lead guitarist Peter Townshend, attired appropriately in a white jump suit, leaps and lurches across the stage, plays the guitar by swinging his arms in a clock-wise motion, then strikes chords powerful enough to lift you out of your seat.

Lead singer Roger Daltry shouts and moans but still sings, throwing the mike around like a juggler. Drummer Keith Moon assaulting his instruments with intent to destroy. And bassist John Entwistle, arranging and composing some of the Who's best numbers, remains motionless in the background.

Townshend - Daltry - Moon - Entwistle, the best integrated team in popular music today. The Who, a truly amazing experience. Long Live the Who, for so long will live rock music.

"Cruising Speed" Cruises At Usual Buckley Pace

Cruising Speed - A Documentary by William F. Buckley Jr. (Putnam; $6.95; 250 pp.)

Reviewed by Bruno R. Forner

If Bill Buckley would collaborate with Samuel Beckett, what would you get? Cruising Speed. If William Buckley were to document a week of his life, what would he call it? Crusing Speed.

The week is November 30, 1970. It is not a typical week because the man with "the agenbite of inwit" (at least according to the Atlanta Journal) has as many weeks that are typical as Heinz has varieties - and then some.

During the course of the book, you find Buckley visiting a discotheque with Truman Capote, mooning over Rosalyn Turcek (whom he tries to seduce at a giddy dinner party that he and his wife throw), receiving congratulations over his big brother Jim's recent election to the U. S. senate, debating Ramsey Clark, delivering Speech No. 3 at Yale, lamenting over his lack of education (he only holds a bachelor's degree) and taking in an evening of Virgil Fox at the Fillmore East. And much, much more. All in one week.

The book, with all of its desultory comments, is pure Buckley - more than enough to give any dyed-in-the-wool liberal a spasm.

Typical comments are:

"It fell to Lyndon Johnson to be the personal victim of the end of that very long hallucination which John Kennedy was never exposed to...no free people could lead happy or full lives by buying one share each of common stock in - The State."

"I am not broke, but I think that if I were, I would repair to India, haul up a guru's flag, and...I would be the most successful guru of modern times."

"The absolutizers, in their struggle against what they call repression, are doing their best to make the Constitution of the United States incoherent."

"The Jeffersonian ideal continues to be exemplary: the Hoffmans and the Dillingers and the Cleavers should be laughed...into impotence."

"Cruising Speed" provides many insights into Buckley's brilliant mind. Why he laments a lack of education escapes the reader early in the book.

It is doubtful the reader will escape the book early.

Rams Win Season Opener

The City College Rams, led by Willie Daigle and Cliff Williams won their season opener against the Foothill Owls 41-28 at the Rams Gym.

The game never found the Rams trailing but the foothill Owls closed a 20-12 Ram halftime lead to 25-20 on K.C. Jackson's 10 second half points. Jackson was the only Owl to score in double figures. He ended the game with 13 points.

Strong team unity and patience combined with the capable coaching of the exciting (exciting, excitable?) Sid Phelan, Cliff Williams 18 rebounds and Willie Daigle's 17 points kept the Rams a safe distance ahead of the never stopping Owls.

Coach Phelan stressed working the ball to the spots where his team was having the most success. Having Daigle blast on numerous 20 and 25 footers loosened the Owls up and made them come out thus enabling Williams to enjoy less competition under the boards.

Williams delighted the spectators as he scored, rebounded and nawed the Owls after blocking 4 attempted field goals.

The low scoring affair was pleasing to the home fans because it was a victory but the low scoring contest was uninspired and proved noohing as far as a continuation of the Rams holding the GGC title.

Coach Phelan explained, "It was a routine Foothill game. For the past five years we have had difficulty fighting them off. We tried to forcd them to play man to man because it would have given our team a greater advantage as far as rebounding and all around ball control."

Mao isn't Going to be Easy

So President Nixon is going to China! He seems to have hope and faith in his new friendship with China. He claims settlements will be made with China regarding Vietnam and Taiwan. His new self-image is 'President Nixon the peacemaker shaking hands with Mao.'

But I have a feeling Mao isn't going to be so easy for Nixon to negotiate with. The increased bombing of Vietnam this past week was severely criticized by the Chinese press. They don't trust the present U. S. administration.

Being accepted into the U. N. recently, China feels like a great nation having power in world affairs.

The Chinese have an old custom. When an emperor was to visit another emporer of a greater province, the smaller emperor would go to the greater emperor, while the great emperor relaxed in his throne.

Good luck to Nixon if he goes.

Veterans for Peace Give A Piece of Their Mind

It was 9 a.m., Tuesday, December 28, 1971. The orders had been given, the equipment was ready. Surveillance and communications stations had been established. Eighteen men approached the objective laden with food and water. The Consulate would be taken, without force.

During that week, symbols of Americanism were being seized by members of the Vietnam Veterans for Peace Organization; the Statue of Liberty, Betsy Ross's home, Valley Forge, Travis AFB Hospital, and the South Vietnamese Consulate here in the city.

CCSF and Antioch West student Jack McCloskey took part in the demonstration and is presently freeon bail charged with trespassing along with the other eighteen men.

The takeover itself was accomplsihed relatively easy. Eighteen chapter members walked into the consulate and told the consul,e staff, "We would like you to leave."

Telegrams to the Saigon Embassy and a phone call to the White House were sent. However, all power was cut as the messages were being transmitted. The telegram set to the Saigon Embassy detailed the "Seven-Point Plan" for peace as proclaimed by the Vietnam Veterans for Peace Organization.

At approximately 9:30 a.m., four police officers arrived an asked what they were doing there and left. Thirty minutes laterpolice and tactical squads surrounded the building armed with high powered rifles and tear gas; the vets were unarmed. Somehow the police obtained a key to the door and entered pushing the barricade aside. Without a confrontation, police led the vets to waiting paddy wagons.

Jack McCloskey noted that they received good treatment while in jail, especially from the older policemen.

According to McCloskey, "the young cops were hostile towards our actions, and noe of them had ever been to Vietnam."

"The government trained us for combat, but our organization is nonviolent now," said McCloskey. "Only time will tell."

Question: How did you spend New Year's Eve?

John Thronson - Photography

How did I spend my New Year's Eve? - getting extremely stoned. I spent a nice peaceful New Year's Eve with friends getting stoned. We listened to "Dead" on the radio; kind of a put on New Year's Eve.

Dee Dee Marovich - Social Work

"I went to parties. Yeah, that's what I did. I didn't really do anything else. A friend and I went to two parties. The first one we stayed at until 1:15 a.m. I spent a lot of time talking to friends I haven't seen in a long time. The time went by really fast; I was out for seven hours."

Russel Buttons - Engineering Physics

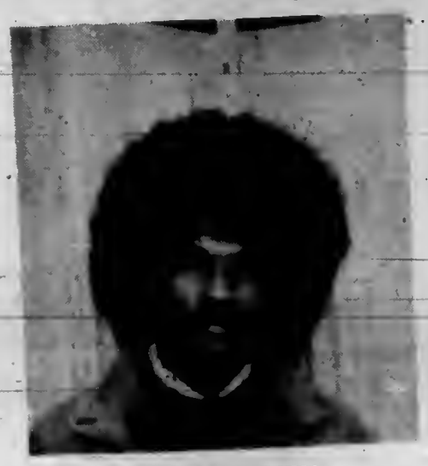
"I made a monster movie. I was the mad scientist. At the stroke of midnight, I played a trumpet fanfare from Mahler's first symphony. It was a sober New Year. I had nothing to get drunk about."

Evie Del Costello - Dental Assisting

"I was at a party. Why? Are you quoting me directly? Don't do that. It really wasn't very good, because one guy got drunk and made everybody nervous. I guess it was a good New Year's Eve."

Gary Pool - Business Science

"We started out to get drunk. We went down Broadway... Got thrown out of Big Al's for harassing the Go-Go Girls. Then we went to - I forgot the name of the restaurant. We were wasted that night... Started Kissing everyone in sight. After that they drove me home. Then I don't know what happened."



Paul Mobley - Drama

I went to a costume party. I sprayed my hair and mustache gold and wore white face. The rest of my costume No point in describing it because I ended up doing a striptease.

★★ Presidental Candidates Speak - Choose Your Man ★★

LLOYD KENNEY

As part of the Young Socialists for Jenness and Pulley slate, my campaign believes that student government should be welded around concrete issues that tie in the problems of students on and off campus — City College and American society as a whole.

We believe that those who have a real stake in the outcome of the educational process — the students and faculty ourselves — should make the basic decisions of the college. We believe that the only purpose the administration serves is to see that this college be run like a well-oiled factory for consumption by the San Francisco business establishments.

Linked with our concept of Student-Faculty control is our support for independent Ethnic, Women, and Gay studies departments controlled by the students and faculties of those departments. Again we ask the primary question, who runs this institution and for whom does it exist?

We call for free speech and no administration control over recognition of campus groups, student government decisions, the school newspaper and the general political or social life of this campus.

We cannot afford the luxuries of short-cuts. We must ask fundamental questions and attack our problems at its roots. This is the basis for why we run.

RAYMOND HING, UNITED STUDENTS ALLIANCE CANDIDATE FOR A.S. PRESIDENT

I am running for the office of A.S. President along with 15 other students, who are seeking the other various A.S. Council positions. We are running united, under the banner of the USA. The USA is a grassroots coalition, working together in a united front effort, to correct the injustices committed by the educational system against the students at City College.

The difference between the candidates of the USA and the other candidates is that the USA candidates are the only ones who have been putting themselves on the line to carry on the struggle for student rights and who have acutally done work to institute change on the campus. The administration is upset at our accomplishments (such as MA) because we are upsetting their beauracracy to keep the students in a second-class position on the campus.

To insure that the victories of the students will not go down the drain and that the struggle for student rights and power will be carried forward, vote for the USA. The only way that the A.S. Council can work effectively is if it is united. VOTE UNITED STUDENTS ALLIANCE!!!

BRUCE BOSSO

The office of student body president is one that demands experience, responsibility, and an ability to chair a student council that spends over $80,000 a year. I, Bruce Bosso feel I am the only candidate with these qualifications.

My experience speaks for itself. In the past semester, I hae served on the financial committee, been an official delegate to all Community College student government meetings, and served on the student review board. None of my opponents can claim such experience.

For the past semester I have been co-news editor of the Guardsman. This job has forced me to accept responsibility, to meet strict deadlines, to make last minute decision.

Finally, I am currently the chairman of the student review board, one of the most poweful committees on campus. I am the chairman of this committee, the first student chairman in the history of this tri-partite board.

Once again, my oppoents can claim none of this; they can only make wild promises of what they'd like to do if elected, not knowing the structures of procedures they would have to follow to accomplish such action.

I promise to represent all of City's students, not only the ones who support or vote for me.

Editors Note: Due to the fact that this candidate is a late entrant, the Guardsman was unable to obtain his picture. We will however, present his statement.

I feel that I am the best qualified for the job of Student Body President because I have had an opportunity to attain leadership capabilities while serving in the armed forces. My strong feeling is that student government must represent all students and not just certain segments of the student body, as in the present and past.

I am determined to return a voice in governing policy in all campus affairs to the students.

I plan to keep students informed of current business and all ideas on matters of student concern and to act impartially on all business.

H and R department in order to make the necessary arrangements for the party.

At this meeting O'Donnell was told by Larry Wong, chariman of the H and R. department, that no alcohol would be served to Council members by his students. O'Donnell questioned the right of the department to serve alcohol at anytime on campus, even with the stipulation that it be done for educational purposes. At thistime, according to O'Donnell, Wong quoted the Calirnia Education Code, which according to Wong, allows for the serving of alcohd, if done as part of a classroom activity.

O'Donnell claims that the California Education Code says no such thing, "That man is a liar. I went to thelibrary after the meeting and read the code. It states, "No alcohol is to be possessed, served or consumed on any junior college campus!"

At present, the controversy is unresolved. All that was served at the party was hot coffee, and cold stares.

Little Hope Seen for Disarmament

By Bruce Meek

On Dec. 16, The College Hour presented a three-student Task Force from the International Relations Center at S.F. State. The subject of their briefing was the S.A.L.T. (Strategic Arms Limitation Talks) between the Soviet Union and the United States.

CCSF students were presented a program of three 17 minute talks outlining the current world nuclear situation and describing the S.A.L.T. in general. The Task Force presented slides illustrating the possible results of a nuclear attack on San Francisco. Also shown was the current spectrum of nuclear weapons ranging from long range bombers, ICBM's, IRBM's, to the newer weapons such as MRV (Multiple Reentry Vehicle), SLBM's (Submarine Launched Ballistic Missiles), and ABM (Anti-Ballistic Missile) to the latest concept of ULMS (Undersea Long Range Missile System). ULMS is the U.S. project which during the 1970's would replace the Poseidon Missile System (SLBM), which is in the process of replacing the Polaris SLBM system, with mobile launch pads which would ride barely above the ocean bed and could be moved to any location under the ocean at will.

S.A.L.T. - Being discussed by San Francisco State students.

The Task Force presented opinions and political analysis evidently based on well researched facts.

The history of nuclear disarmament talks was described in great detail as well as the fruitless results of those talks and many of the current demands of each nuclear power were outlined.

The basic conclusion was that the US and the USSR are still unsettled after five years of efforts in the direction of nuclear disarmament on such aspects as which missile system or bombardment system of one power was equal to that of the other power and what are the definitions of such terms as offensive, defensive, strategic, and tactical. The Task Force concluded that these governments over and above the talks still hold that the only way to achieve World Peace is through military might. A question and answer session followed.

Data briefs of about 20 pages describing the facts and issues were available to the audience and were prepared by the members of the Task Force.

The Task Force approach is a relatively new effort in education and affords maximum student participation.

Candidate Speaks Here

"The Vietnamese are not outlaws, it is Nixon and his system that are outlaws" said Linda Jenness, Socialist Workers Party candidate for U.S. President, when she spoke at City College February 15.

Even though there were only 42 people there to hear her speak, she received an enthusiastic welcome.

"I discovered that most people agree with me ... we have to completely change the system," she began. After digging into past and present administrations about their ineffectiveness in stopping the Viet Nam war she charged that "to support Democrats and Republicans is to support oppression around the world."

Giving an outline of our present system's inequities, she said that "elections are undemocratic and unfair ... over 90 per cent of campaign funds come from businesses." The government is "controlled by a tiny group of big businesses." She did not state, however, which big businesses did the controlling.

City College Wins Five Year Accreditation

With little fanfare, City College was awarded a new five-year accreditation by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges.

The announcement was the final step in CCSF's review, which was begun in late October when a team of 16 representatives from the seven Western states reviewed City Colleges facilities and curricular programs.

Dr. Louis Batmale, President of CCSF and Superintendent of the San Francisco Community College District said that the accreditation was especially significant since it represents the first official critique of the new college district.

The Community College district was formed in July of 1969, when City College was separated from the unified school district.

The college was commended for leadership in developing ethnic studies programs, new courses dealing with the role of women, for encouraging an experimental college and 44 "semi-professional" majors.

The college enrollment is 50 percent non-caucasian, Batmale noted and the accrediting team praised the active recruitment of qualified minority faculty members. It recommended more hiring of minority administrators, who now total only 12 percent.

The accreditation report also praised the district's "bold, new approach to partially decentralizing the educational functions of both the college and adult education programs to serve the needs of San Francisco's largest ethnic population centers."

ADMINISTRATORS — Chris Davis and Vester Flanagan battle students.

Violence Shakes AS Elections

A confrontation between members of the Young Socialists for Jeness and Pulley and representatives of the administration erupted into violence, January 12 at 11 am.

The confrontation occured when Vester Flanagan, director of student activities, asked the group, who were running an organized slate for student body office, to remove a banner placed in front of Smith Hall. Flanagan contended that the sign was not approved by a representative of his office and that it was within 25 feet of a polling place, a violation of election rules.

Jeff Berchenko, a candidate for student council from the party, said that the regulation was an old one that was dredged out to use against the Socialists. Bob Kahn, an election commissioner, pointed out that a sign in Smith Hall for the Concerned Students Committee was taken down the week before for the same reason. Kahn said that the whole affair was in the hands of the administration, that the rule was set up by the campus building codes and by the administration.

Flanagan began conferring with leaders of the YSJP as well as with Kahn and Ray Bazurto, the other election commissioner. He told them of the reasons for the action.

Berchenko asked Flanagan for money to pay for the paper, since it had been torn in a futile attempt by the assistant director of student activities, Chris Davis, to take it down. No action was taken on the request.

After this, Davis mounted a ladder to remove the sign. A scuffle came about. Berchenko claimed he was struck by Davis. Lloyd Kenney, YSJP candidate for AS president, was seen ripping Davis' leather jacket.

Flanagan intervened to prevent any further outbreak, but was unsuccessful. Steve Gabosch, YSJP candidate for student council, struck Davis in the groin area with his briefcase and another scuffle ensued.

The campus police were called in at this point.

Members of the political pary then began a series of speeches as a large crowd gathered in anticipation of more

EDITORS — Jim Toland and Ed Hartzler switch positions.

Guardsman Editor Chosen

A new Editor-In-Chief has taken office at The Guardsman, replacing a former editor who held the office for two semesters.

Ed Hartzler, a graduate of Riordan High School and a veteran of the United States Navy, has been selected as the new Guardsman Editor-In-Chief for the Spring 1972 semester.

Hartzler is in his fifth and final semester at City College. He plans to transfer to San Francisco State College next fall to continue his major in journalism.

Ed started out as a cub reporter on the Guardsman during the fall 1970 semester. By fall 1971, he had worked his way up to news editor, a tough and demanding position.

Hartzler replaces Jim Toland as "the boss" in S-304. Toland is a graduate of Balboa High School and spent his time in the U.S. Army. He will transfer to San Francisco State next fall.

Both editors are 23 years old and have worked harmoniously together on The Guardsman for three semesters. It will be a total switch for both of them, Ed will take the Chief's position and Toland will spend his last semester coordinating the news on campus.

Bruce Bosso Elected President

A very small two-day turnout of 838 voters decided the fate of the 52 candidates running for student government offices.

In the four-way race for the presidency, Bruce Bosso, polling 282 votes, finished ahead of Ray Hing of the United Students Alliance with 240 votes.

Rich Ward, an independent, was third with 117 votes and Lloyd Kenny of the Young Socialists for Jenness and Pulley brought up the rear with 94 votes.

In the Vice Presidential race, Nelson Lum, chief of the Campus Police, with 343 votes finished ahead of his only opponent, Earlene Walters of the U.S.A. who received 322 votes.

In the battle for the 14 council seats the outcome was a bit more confusing.

Elected to the council were U.S.A. party members Florence Chan, Felica Cala, Mabel Wong, Faris Hill, Fayez Darris, and Ray Barciaga. Independants Guymond Louie, Chester Lau, Tom Ryan, and David Young also won seats.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

GOP Hopefuls Desperate: Lack Issues, Money, Support

With the large-scale coverage given to the upcoming Democratic presidental primaries, the Republican party has been virtually ignored as a source of campaign news. With this in mind, a few words about the Republican campaign trail are necessary.

To start with, we should assume that Richard Nixon will win re-nomination for President.

Many observers feel that Nixon is in the same kind of trouble that Lyndon Johnson faced in 1968 and that Representative John Ashbrook (R-Ohio) or Representative Pete McCloskey (R-Calif) could steal the nomination from him.

Although Nixon does face opposition in his party similar to the kind that Johnson encountered in the Democratic Party, there are crucial differences between the two situations.

The biggest differences are in the areas of issues and of constituency. The former will hurt Ashbrook while the latter will hurt McCloskey.

When Eugene McCarthy and Robert Kennedy decided to oppose Johnson in 1968, they had a wealth of issues to use against the administration. Johnson had involved the country in an unpopular war: taxes were rising; the ghettos and colleges were in a state of turmoil. These issues were tailor-made for liberal candidates like McCarthy and Kennedy.

But what issues will Ashbrook campaign on?

One of the main objections to Nixon was Nixon's trip to Red China. But, except for a small group of conservatives, most of the American people supported the opening of better relations with China. And with Nixon coming out against forced busing, Ashbrook will lose votes in another important area, the anti-busing voters.

McCloskey, on the other hand does have a liberal program that appeals to many voters, especially the young. But Kennedy and McCarthy were members of the Democratic party,which has traditionally been the more liberal of the two major parties. These men had a constituency that reacted favorably to a liberal alternative to Johnson. McCloskey will have to confine his appeal to the more conservative Republican voters.

Secondly, Democratic candidates such as McGovern, Muskie, and Humphrey are expected to gain the support of the young and the labor unions, two voting blocs that McCloskey desperately needs.

Ashbrook and McCloskey therefore suffer from a lack of issues and the machinery to build support for what issues they have.

Those of us who seek an alternative to Nixon will have to look outside of the Republican party.

BUSINESS AS USUAL - Registration lines get longer each semester as more and more students scramble for classes at CCSF.

Unrecorded Band Hit at Winterland Concert

The excitement of the new and the experience of the old were the high lights of an entertaining weekend of music held on February 4-5

The Winterland show headlining blues Kings B.B. King and Freddie King and introducing Copperhead and Malo, members of San Francisco's third generation of rock bands, produced some of the best music that could ever be heard with the price of one ticket.

Malo without a question carries the same magic qualities as its' big brother Santana. The 11 member band recently released their first LP already on the best selling list.

Led by lead guitarist Jorge Santana and vocalist Arcelio Garcia, the group produces a hard driving Latin-rock sound marked with heavy percussion and just a touch from the three member horn section.

After witnessing their performance, Malo, as polished as Santana is, should surpass all other competitors in playing the Latin-rock sound, given the time.

Copperhead, led by brilliant ex-Quicksilver guitarist John Cipollina, is another group that should carry the San Francisco music tradition to greater heights.

From slow blues numbers to fast driving rock n' roll, Cipollina and Co. excecuted everything as near to perfection as any rock band will get.

Although yet unrecorded, many who witnessed their performance at Winterland are waiting for their first release.

Freddie King turned up his amplifiers and with it the audience, with a hard driving blues-rock sound. Especially not able were his slow blues solos and a rockin' version of Goin' Down.

B.B. King simply does not belong in the big concert halls. His music his ideal in small night clubs or a place such as the old Fillmore West where the artist can reach the audience visually as well as through the very special and personal kind of music that this artist excells at. And this simply cannot be done to a mass audience at Winterland.

Time Tells Tastes Never Change

Ironically, one of the freshest shows in town uses some of the oldest material around.

Four On the Floor is a musical revue that is now in its ninth month at the Savor-Tivoli, on Upper Grant Avenue. Conceived and directed by Don Sheffey, the show is a zesty, nostalgic romp.

During the evening-long entertainment, the four performers explore the music of a few decades ago in various "sets" concerned with Irving Berlin, Noel Coward, The Talkies and other special material.

Not a mere "stand up and sing" affair, Four On the Floor is a full-scale show with evocations of Busby Berkeley, the Marx Brothers, Marilyn Miller, Carmen Miranda and a host of steely-voiced tenors.

Despite the age of the songs, nothing is dated. For one thing, Sheffey is a musicologist with a Comstock Lode of nuggets to draw from, and he has produced some 14-carat gold. More amazingly, even after ten viewings, the entire show seems freshly minted.

In a production with only four entertainers (all of whom triple in brass) it is nearly impossible to single out a "star."

If one were forced to do so, however, a double honor would have to go to Sheffey and his fantastic two-keyboard piano. With the aid of Larry Vincent, Sheffey makes this unique instrument sound like an entire orchestra.

Next would come Elinor Anderson, if only because she carries the greatest weight of the material. She is a truly amazing entertainer, able to make the transition from a little old lady who has disposed of an annoying dog to a recreation of a Helen Morgan torch song in the twinkle of one of her merry eyes. Her range as a singer, as an actress and as a comedienne is a beautiful thing to behold.

In addition to playing Ferrante to Sheffey's Teicher, Larry Vincent provides the keyboard intermission music and sings in a voice and manner that brings to mind all of those old Dick Powell movies.

Hands clasped before him, eyebrows slanted toward the middle of his forehead, he brings down the house every night with his YMCA number. He also plays accordian, kazoo and Harpo Marx, though not necessarily in that order.

Robert Cowell is the lecherous ladies' man of the show. A fine voice, an ingratiating smile and a blase attitude all add up to create just the sort of sophisticate that Cole Porter and Noel Coward wrote so well about.

Four On the Floor runs from 9 pm until 1 am each Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Sunday shows begin at 7:30 pm. There is a $1.00 cover charge and drinks are reasonably priced.

Dolls, Dolls Newman Asks Help

By Mike Lorenz

Like many sad Christmas stories with hopes for happy endings, this story involves a hospital, a little girl and a doll.

It happened last Christmas at Sonoma State Hospital to a nameless girl hospitalized for a nameless illness:

The San Francisco State Newman Center visits Sonoma Hospital on a regular basis to spend one Sunday afternoon with the mentally ill and disturbed children. The time is spent usually consoling, laughing, and playing with the children.

Last December, for Christmas, the State Newman Center brought on their monthly visit several carloads of toys to distribute to the children as Christmas gifts.

With eyes aglow the children gathered around the gifts. Within a short time the gifts were almost all gone. Then the little girl's turn came to receive her gift.

A doll. That's what she wanted and she eagerly waited to wrap her arms around her new soft and cuddly friend.

There were toys, but no dolls. They all had been given away. The girl's shattered hopes soon gave way to tears and the condolences that followed could do nothing for that Christmas.

That heartbreak of Christmas has reached students here at City College. The CCSF Newman Center is now collecting dolls and material to make dolls clothing. The material will be cut and neatly sewed so that each donated doll will have a wardrobe.

The Newman Center, located at 210 Phelan Ave., is calling upon all City College students to donate whatever dolls or material they can. There is a special hope at Newman that someone will donate a sewing machine so that the doll work can progress smoothly and be completed right at the Center.

The Doll Drive will begin this semester and will continue throughout the school year.

Se Battre Contre des Moulins

Editor,

On Monday of the first week of school, the Muni presented to the Public Utilities Commission (PUC), a proposal that the Muni service be changed. The Proposed changes would halt 90 per cent of all Muni service on weekends, holidays and possibly evenings.

In the public PUC hearing, scores of people from the general public appeared and argued strongly against the proposal. However, despite, or possibly because of, the presence of the TAC squad the San Francisco Police Department in the next room, things were fairly orderly.

After listening to the Muni and the public, the PUC adjourned to another room and returned shortly with the statement that they would return the proposal to the Muni for "re-detailing" and would listen to the revised proposal in a private hearing at a later, unspecified date.

Obviously there are several important points for CCSF students to consider in the above report. First of all, no specifics were given as to the required "re-detailing". Hence, the Muni could conceivably come back with a proposal even more disastrous for the public then that already presented.

Second, by calling for a private hearing (public testimony is NOT received by the PUC) the PUC has attempted to remove public influence and pressure.

Third, as anyone who is familiar with the PUC knows, even attendance at such private hearings is extremely difficult since those desiring to attend must first find out what date and time the proposed secret hearing will be held, and then register in advance.

Such bureaucratic totalitarianism is by no means new to San Francisco. But since this action will directly and adversely effect the general public, it is my opinion that in this case it is more abrasive than normally.

If the public makes it clear that the proposed change would be disastrous, and if it is also made clear that such high-handed action by the PUC will not be tolerated, the case of the missing Muni may be solved.

Dear Editor:

The administration has launched a campaign against the civil liberties of City College students. The Young Socialists for Jenness and Pulley has been singled out as the prime victim.

We broke no rules on January 12. We did insist on following the rules and prevented Deans Flanagan, Davis, and Frank from physically injuring anyone while they destroyed the YSJP banner. The criminals were the ones who destroyed the banner; instead, the victims have been declared the criminals.

We were originally expelled and are now suspended for unclear reasons. The Student Review Board, one-third of whom are administrators, made this decision behind closed doors without prior trial.

This cannot be tolerated. The CCSF Four Defense Committee, a civil liberties organization, has filed a lawsuit against the administration, its undemocratic procedures, and its unconstitutional rules. The committee demand that all charges against the four students be dropped and that all restrictions on free expression of ideas on this campus be repealed.

The address is: CCSF Four Defense Committee, P.O. Box 40541, San Francisco, California, 94140.

Solution to Women's Lib: Draft the Defiant Dames

The women's liberation groups are demanding all the rights and privileges that men have, but they are forgetting all about the obligations such as the draft, that men have to face.

American women have gained the right to vote in 1920, when the 19th amendment was adopted. Women's rights and equalities have been flowing and building ever since. But what of the obligations that must mount as rights increase? What of them?

For example we quote from an article in the San Francisco Chronicle that has to do with Swiss women's right to vote, which they gained only late in 1971. The contention is that since Swiss women now have the right to vote, they should also bear arms in military service.

"The idea that a voter is one who carries arms for his country is traditional in Swiss history. In the ancient democratic local assemblies father and son, master and servant, rich and poor stood side by side with equal voting rights because they all carried arms in the defense of the community."

This line of reasoning seems clear and logical.

What have American women done since they gained the right to vote? As they gained more and more rights, their commitments seem to have diminished, not only in the home but also to their country.

To help remedy this inequity why not establish a women's draft.

It may sound more foolish than feasible, but think of all the jobs being done by men in the armed forces that could just as easily be done by women. Then consider the civilians employed by the military, at ridiculous salaries, whose jobs could be done by military, female, personnel, thereby relieving the general public of some of the taxes that support military employed civilians now.

The present requirements for a woman to join the Army are that she be at least 18 years of age, single, have a high school diploma and be willing to spend three years in the Army. The duties that a WAC (Women's Army Corps) performs are identical to those of a man except that she cannot become a paratrooper or perform any combat duties.

But once a woman is in the Army, she is in. It is hard to get out again except when her enlistment is up. The old adage of "have a baby and get out of the Army" does not work any more because Army doctors are allowed, legally, to perform abortions. So, if a woman changes her mind about the Army after she has signed on the dotted line, she will find it a hard task to get out.

With women being drafted they would commit a great service to their country as well as taking a big load off the make draft.

Question: "Why is There so much Litter on City College's Campus?"

Vonnell Bettencourt, Psychology Major-"Mostly because people aren't as responsible for their pleasures as they are for their vices. Many people seem to be suffering from infantile paralysis of the mind."

Steve Halquist, Horticulture-"They don't know how to control their desires. They have too much money. They should get people to bring vegetables and start a vegetable stand."

Doug McCaughan, Industrial Arts-"The main reason is that people won't take ten steps to a trash can. They worry too much about getting to class. They're in too much of a hurry. We need more trash cans. There's no place to put it."

Sabra Richey, Anthropology-I just don't think people are practicing what they preach. With most people it's easier to talk rather than act."

Lee Pennywell, Radiology-I think it's because the students don't take the time to take paper and throw it in trash cans. I think they really don't care that much about the campus looking clean. I would say they have the feeling that they don't have to do it. They don't care at all about it.

Wing Hsieh, Electronics-The garbage cans are too far apart and everyone is too lazy to walk to them, anyway.

Small Turnout Decides AS Election

According to the constitution of the Associated Students, all elected officials must carry 10 units with a 2.0 grade average in the semester prior to taking office. However, a constitutional amendment which would have removed this requirement was on the ballot.

Bob Kahn and Ray Bazurto, election commissioners, allowed any student to run, regardless of his grade point average, pending the outcome of the amendment, which failed.

Three candidates, Jack McClosky, John Griffin, and Charles Taliaferro did not meet the unit requirement.

These three empty seats were filled by independents May Wong and Joseph De Ramon, and U.S.A. party member Gil Mangaouang.

Administrators Battle YSJP At Smith Hall

violence. Berchenko spoke first, saying that Davis had hit him and then threatened him. Jane Sica, another council candidate, blamed the administration for what was going on.

Lloyd Kenney spoke, saying that the real issue of the election was students versus the administration and explained the YSJP positions on certain campus situations. He said "we do not want to fight blacks", an obvious referral to Davis and Flanagan. He also said that both Davis and Flanagan did not talk for black students but for the administration.

Joseph Thomas, an independent council candidate, told the Guardsman that the money to pay for Davis' jacket will come from AS funds. Tom Ryan, another candidate, announced that the election commissioners will side with the administration.

The affair lent a carnival atmosphere to the usually sedate area in front of Smith Hall. Several independent candidates and the United Students Alliance political party used the opportunity to hawk leaflets for their platforms.

Jim Toland, editor-in-chief of the Guardsman, had possession of pictures taken of the riot by a reporter and by assistant news editor Bruce Bosso. As he began walking up the hill toward the science building, someone screamed "He's got a gun!" Toland, thinking someone wanted to confiscate the photos from him, began running toward the campus police office in Cloud Hall. He was being chased by a group of campus police who thought he was carrying a gun. The situation was cleared, and no charges were pressed either against nor by Toland.

A hearing will be held later to settle any claims made by both sides involved in the fracas.

by Jeff Berchenko

The YSJP at no time hit or struck anyone. We did no more than to ptotect ourselves from being pushed and shoved. At one point, when an UNKNOWN student hit Chris Davis with a brief case, Davis grabbed the student by the neck. YSJPer's and bystanders pulled the two apart, ripping Davis' jacket accidently.

Jenness Speaks at City College

"This is the wealthiest nation the world has ever known, but children (in Georgia) go to school with an empty belly," she said. "The only group of people who have the guts to stand up and say 'I don't want any part of it' is the Chicano, which is a great step forward."

Jenness went on to say, "as different sections of society stop believing in the system, you will see the change in the capitalist. You have to build those movements that are changing the system right now. Go outside the two party system. Shed the illusions of the American public about the democratic system."

Linda Jenness concluded her half-hour speech by stating "We are for restructuring it (the democratic system) from top to bottom, to build a just and humane society."

After her speech, buckets were passed to collect money for the Socialist Worker Party, followed by a question and answer session.

When asked how she would change the present system she stated that natural resources should be under the control of the people. She then rooted for liberalized abortion laws and women's rights. Then she went on to support black control of black communities and said "Blacks know best what is good for blacks."

When asked why the Socialist movement in England failed, she replied that "it was not a movement towards Socialism, it was a maneuver to put industry back on it's feet." She said that Sweden was not a Socialist country, but only had "superior Socialist reforms."

On a final note Candidate Jenness said "the only way to overthrow the capitalistic government is through social revolution." This can only be achieved, she stated, with the majority of people and organizations "deciding that they want to change this government through implementation of the will of the majority against the force of the minority.

Vets to Help Ex-GI Addicts

Alpha Sigma Mu, the recently formed City College Veterans Fraternity, is devoting its energy to creating a program geared to help drug addicts who are veterans.

Jim Newsom, the fraternity's treasurer, thought of the idea as something different and constructive. The hope is that veterans with a drug problem will feel better turning to fellow veterans for help.

The main problem is finding a building and getting the funds they need. One of the requirements for receiving government funds is to have a pharmacist and a Medical Doctor to serve as program director.

The fraternity is also offering a $500.00 scholarship to a deserving veteran in memory of the late David J. Penyak, former president of the International Federation of Alpha Sigma Mu Veteran Inc.

Membership in the fraternity is open to men and women veterans.

Fourth Place Rams Post 6-5 Conference Record

The 1971-72 City College Rams headed by Coach Sid Phelan has posted a 6-5 conference record and are in fourth place in Golden Gate Conference standings. In first place the Laney Eagles stand alone at 11-0 and are followed by Chabot (9-2) and Merritt 8-3.

For the first time in the history of the Golden Gate Conference the Rams won't be the champions. CCSF has won nine conference titles in the league's 10 year existence.

But as Coach Phelan explained at the beginning of the basketball campaign, "Laney and Merritt have their best teams in the history of both schools."

Playing only one game over .500 ball is not an indication of the team's desire or hustle. Inexperience played a big part in the dethroning of the Rams. First year men peppered the squad and second year men were collecting splinters last year, for the most part.

Quite often the squad couldn't get the right combination of men on the floor.

The Rams dropped three contests by a total of five points. Perhaps this is the point at which the season started turning around. Merritt dropped the Rams 59-57 at the buzzer and the following week Chabot froze out until they manuevered themselves to a 62-60 showdown. More recently (2-15-72) Chabot beat the Rams 59-58 after a critical foul by Kevin Mooney with 13 seconds left.

Officiating wasn't at its best either. Crucial, imaginary fouls cost the Rams at least two important games. Specifically, the second Chabot game found Willie Daigle guilty of a charging foul while backing up (thanks to good acting by the Chabot player who pulled it off).

Although we aren't competing for the title this year, it was an exciting season and next year promises to be more exciting. The return of Cliff Williams, Bobby Pruitt, Art Adams and Ray Frazier is promising to put the Rams back on their rightful throne.

Next edition we'll give the scores and stories of games played to date.

City College Hosts PA-AAU Judo Tournament

The PA-AAU Novice Senior Championship Judo Tournament was held at City College on February 5. The match, co-sponsored by CCSF and San Francisco State was nothing if not spectacultar.

Strong competition, good throws, impossible breaks and real tests of courage, endurence, and skill were the rule rather than the exception. The hearty applause of the audience attested to the spectator value of a match where there were no losers present.

A tribute (and source of self-satisfaction) to Coach Brad Duggan was John M. Guerin and J. Richard Wolff of CCSF who won first place in the light-weight and heavyweight divisions respectfully.

Anthonty Bibos and R. Lauser of CCSF both won third place in their weight divisions as well.

Student Council Endorses Pot Initiative

On Wednesday, February 16, the CCSF Student Council endorsed the California Marijuana Initiative by a vote of eight to zero. There were five abstensions.

The motion for endorsement was introduced by councilmen Joe DeRamon and Tom Ryan. It was supported by Associated Student President Bruce Bosso.

"This is not an endorsement of the use of marijuana," said Ryan, "but it only allows California citizenry to vote on the issue."

The state-wide iniative is coordinated by Gary Hunt of Cabrillo College.

Hunt described his major concern about the initiative as follows:

The major concern is doing away with marijuana laws that have:
...forced government to interfere with socially harmless conduct by methods that infringe on our personal liberty. Such things as "no-knock" raids, wiretapping, undercover agents, and selective enforcement.
...alienated millions of young people
...damaged the credibility of legitimate drug abuse information and programs
...exposed users to the suppliers of hard drugs
...diverted police, court and correctional resources from the control of more serious crime
...and, destroyed the reputations of 60,000 Californians a year with a criminal record.

The initiative, if it received the sufficent amount of signatures would be placed on the November ballot.

The new act would add section 11530.2 to division 10 of the health and safety code and read as follows:
...No person in the State of California, 18 years of age or older shall be punished criminally, or be denied any right or privelege by reason of such person's planting cultivating, harvesting drying, processing, otherwise preparing, transporting, or possessing marijuana for personal use, or by reason of that use.
...This provision shall in no way be construed to repeal existing legislation, or limit the enactment of future legislation, prohibiting persons under the influence of marijuana from engaging in conduct that endangers others.

Novelist to Speak Here Today

POET - Al Young will appear in the College theatre today.

Al Young is a novelist and poet who specializes in original sights focused on the contemporary American scene. He is a fiction and poetry writing instructor at Stanford University, and he is the recipient of a variety of awards for his books, essays, and poetry collections.

Young was formerly a professional musician and disc jockey, two career stints that offered extensive opportunity for observing the America he now captures and transmits through words. His recent lecture and reading appearances (including U.C. Berkely and Mills College) have established his popularity as an entertaining and thought-provoking speaker.

Al Young is a lot of things. This Thursday, March 2, at 11 a.m. in the College Theater, he is the City College Hour's guest speaker.

WATCH OUT - Last week the City College parking area was nearly flooded with rain. This week, Campus police will begin issuing parking citations.

Black History Week Celebrated

The week of February 14 the Black Studies Department presented a very successful first annual Black History week program.

Among the many activities presented were representatives from the Angela Davis Defense Committee and the United Prisoners' Union Local No. 9 in the persons of Tim Marshall and Popeye Jackson.

Mr. Wilbert Baronco's music 23 class held a jam session with the Duayne Roberson Quintet from the Black Light Explosion Company and Michael George on bass.

Connie (Connie's West Indian Restuarant) donated her famous cocoanut bread, which highlighted the African food festival consisting many East African delicacies.

Most of the dishes were prepared by Lensey Odlem, who is a hotel, restaurant managing major from St. Lucius West Indies. More of these African dishes will be offered this semester.

Other activities included Tangila Dixon's dance troupe, "Flowers for a Trashman," and a stimulating presentation of Langston Hughs' "Montages of a Dream Deffered" by Raye Richard-

Health Service Aims at Growth

The Student Health Service, as part of its expanding programs, is offering three groups aimed at fostering personal growth.

Two groups, directed at interpersonal growth, have been used by students in the past to get a perspective on what bothers them, and this has usually been in the area of interpersonal relations. These groups, meeting on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday afternoons, have been especially useful for shy people who confronted by the impersonal atmosphere of campus life, needed a place to rap.

The third group, which is a pilot effort, will focus on how students can use their resources to academically improve and overcome classroom policies that discourage intellectual growth.

Anyone interested in these groups should contact Sam Edwards or Ron Orme, at Science 190, or phone 587-7272 ex 110.

Cross-Registration Approved

Cross-registration of students between campuses has been given tentative approval by the presidents of six Bay Area colleges and universities.

The plan, which will go into effect in the fall if approved by the governing boards of the various institutions, will allow students attending any one campus to take courses for credit at an of the other five institutions.

After the student registers and pays the required fees at one college, the college will determine what course or courses he may take for credit elsewhere while the receiving school will decide whether or not to accept the student.

The participating schools-City College of San Francisco, San Francisco State College, the University of California Medical Center, Hastings College of Law, Lone Mountain College, and the University of California - are members of Consortium, an organization founded in 1967 to find solutions to educational problems in the urban environment.

The seventh member of Consortium, Golden Gate College, refused to participate in the program. Golden Gate President Otto Butz claimed that the program woud weaken his school's offerings in public administration.

A method of coordinating the registration system of UC and the other colleges (UC operates on the quarter system) as well as a way to reimburse private schools for courses it gives to public school students and vice versa must be worked out as well.

Suit Filed Against City College

Four Young Socialist students have filed a law suit against the City College of San Francisco administration last Feb. 15th. The Socialists, Lloyd Kenny, Steve Gabosh, Jeff Berchenko, and Joe Ward, claim that the administration expelled them "without notice of specific charges and without a previous investigation."

The struggle stems from an incident on Jan. 12th when violence erupted between Socialist students, Dean Flanagan and assistant dean Davis over a campaign issue. The administration, claiming that the Socialists assaulted administrators, expelled the four Socialists.

The Socialists appealed to the Student Review board, claiming that it was dean Flanagan and Davis who assaulted the students. The Student Review board consisting of Willis Kirk (dean of instruction), Edna Pope (dean of women), Bill Willer (dean of instruction), and students Bob Kahn, Lance Cochrane, and Connie Louie, reduced the expulsion penalty to a one-semester suspension for Kenny, Gabosch, and Berchenko while Joe Ward got a censure.

The Socialists, determined to get reinstated, and as Berchenko puts it "it abolish vague rules that permit undemocratic action," decided to take the issue to court. The hearing is scheduled for Feb. 25th at 11:00 a.m. with Judge Samuel Conti at the Federal building. The hearing will be open to the public.

Berchenko thinks that the Socialists will lose because "Samuel Conti is a reactionary." Dean Flanagan says that he is "not at liberty to talk about the suit now."

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Meeting At The Base

Although Indochina and Formosa were to be the biggest topics of discussion during Nixon's China visit, the most significant development so far was the possibility of a student and reporter exchange program.

Under this proposal American, students and educators would be allowed to travel to and study in China while Chinese students attend American universities for the same reason. Similarly, each country would be able to send correspondents to the other country.

If such an undertaking proves successful, it will contribute greatly to better relations between our two countries. Since the United States initiated its policy of containment 22 years ago, much of what Americans and Chinese know of each other consists of second-hand information obtained through third parties. But this is no substitute for on-the-spot reporting. For example, the issues behind the Cultural Revolution of 1967-68 may have been much clearer to the American people if American reporters had been allowed in China at the time.

The human element is also important. To the average American, the Chinese are atheistic communists; the ordinary Chinese feels that "imperialist warmonger" is an excellent description of the United States. This chauvinistic attitude, encouraged by both governments, limits us to seeing the other guy as less than human, someone to be killed without qualms.

But familiarity can breed respect. Students, as well as journalists, carpenters, artists, and scientists, are members of a common brotherhood. So, for that matter, are other professions and individuals. When Americans and Chinese are able to see and work with one another, we may find out that the other person is not as evil as we think.

While our leaders argue at the summit, an exchange program will enable the rest of us to live together at the base.

There are many services available to the City College student on campus. Each semester there is confusion over the function and location of many of these beneficial organizations and groups.

The following is a listing of the most frequently asked about services.

The Center of Independant learning (COIL) is an organization which helps students to prepare for entrance into various courses, to satisfy requirements in courses that they are taking for credit, and to broaden their academic background without formally enrolling in a course.

Further information about COIL can be obtained from City College counselors. COIL is located in Cloud Hall room 306.

The tutorial center provides a place where tutoring can take place in an area conductive to studying. The center is located in the Science Building room 347.

The Learning Resource Center is a combined effort of the library and the audio visual department to supplement classroom instruction. Further information can be obtained at the library circulation desk.

Audio visual listening and viewing facilities for students are located in Cloud Hall, room 249.

A Veterans counselor is available in room 202 of the Educational Services Building.

There is a fully equipped student health center on campus directed by a full time registered nurse. The health center will counsel students in any physical or mental health problem that may arise during their stay at city college. The health center is located in the Science Building room 190.

Students interested in obtaining employment should register at the placement office room 132 in the Science Building.

Students interested in learning their draft rights and who may need a draft counselor can find one in Bungalow Drive.

The lost and found is located in the campus police office which is in Cloud Hall, room 119. Lost articles can he claimed there.

Students seeking financial aid should go to the Financial Aids Office located in the Educational Services Building room 1109.

City College does not provide housing for students but housing information, as it is, can be obtained from the assistant dean of students in the Educational Services Building room 106.

QUESTION: "Are you a liberated woman"

Judy Dean — Psychology
I'm married and have a child. The Day Care Center gives priority to minorities and people on welfare and that leaves me out. So I am able to take only six units. No, I'm not liberated.

Roccio Luna — Art
No, I don't like that termihology. If I say I'm a liberated woman it puts me in a stereotype. I don't need to be liberated because I don't feel oppressed.

Mary Raggeri — Social Science
Yes, I do. Because for one thing I am going to college. Unlike my mother's generation and I don't feel any overwhelming urge to get married and abandon my education either.

Emma Lasiera — Pre-Nursing
I don't consider myself liberated. The organizations are really demanding too much. A girl should be a girl.

Elizabeth Richards — Astronomy
I don't have anything to be liberated from. I don't feel it has anything to do with any movement. That's just the way it's always been with me. Some women in Women's Lib represent me and others don't. I agree with people trying to fix things but most of them are too angry.

Roberta Tanksley — Sociology
I think I'm liberated. I just feel I do what I do; and if I do something for a man, it's because I want to—so I'm liberated!

-College Hour-

A Man of Many Faces

By Mike Lorenz

His tattered guitar case lying on the empty stage above him, Ric Masten introduced himself to the chillness of the Little Theatre.

A short order cook, trashman, cement finisher, day laborer, offset pressman, artist, newpaperman, songwriter, poet, reader/singer Masten, a guest of the College Hour Concert and Lecture Series, had something to share with his gathered audience.

"The poetry, that's all it is with me," smiled the bearded Masten, And with that he began his hour long "conversation" with the swelling audience.

Masten's philosophy was simple: through his poems and songs, he and his audience would be aware of mutual experiences. To exemplify his point, of conversation, Masten sang a simple song about eating corn flakes alonc at the breakfast table and reading the profound message found on each corn flakes box. "Now that," he said, "you all have done." That was his conversation—a reaction of the audience, a sharing.

Masten sat, stood and walked in a small area between the stage and audience. He did so, he later explained, so that there would be no barrier for sharing.

Masten's half of the conversation was his monologue of life. It contained poems and songs which were his diary. His works were simple and personal and within his anthology he included works on education, kindergarten, blindness of race, notice me and sensitivity.

"Its a mad house we live in. You go crazy in our society if you are sensitive."

He grew still and footnoted his statement of sensitivity with the story of his near suicide at Big Sur.

His hour ended, Masten sang his final song and bowed out to the warm applause of his grateful audience.

Ram Cagers Post 6-5 on Season

Merritt 59 CCSF57

After two easy wins over San Mateo and Foothill (some smart person got rid of the sports records of last semester. With them were the accounts of those intial games..Andy) the Rams went to Oakland to meet their Waterloo; not Merritt but the officials.

CCSF was called for fouls it did not commit and Merritt wasn't called when they did violate. The biggest violation was when Glen Berks carried, everybody present saw but the ref said no violation. Anyway with about 10 seconds left Merritt froze the ball long enough to run the clock out and in the process scored the winning basket.

Chabot 62 CCSF 60

After coming off of an exciting letdown loss to Merritt heartbreak still hadn't stopped for the Rams. Chabot came to the Ram gym to steal another victory from the clutches of the Rams as Coach John Wagoner ordered the Glads to freeze out until Brad Tausechek found the range from 10 feet with a jumper and 1 second left.

Chabot called time twice in the last 15 seconds to plan the strategy that sank the Rams.

The Rams were hindered in that Cliff Williams had 3 fouls before halftime and thus had no one to compete with the tall Glads. Coupled with Williams trouble was the turnover blues for CCSF. With the score 55-56 Kevin Moomey couldn't handle a pass and lost it out of bounds. However the Rams headed Chabot off and led 59-58 on two Williams free throws. Chabot regained the lead but Mooney stole the ball and tied the score on a one shot foul at 60 all.

Then came the freeze.

For the winners Bill Kellar and Brad Tausechek had 24 and 21 respectively.

CCSF 67 DVC 66

After a 40-28 halftime lead and sketches of good play a dream almost turned into a nightmare revisited. The Rams beat DVC 67-66 but if a one handed tip (which is illegal at the buzzer) had borrowed another hand we would have known how it feels for the third time. But it just wasn t DVC night.

CCSF lost the twelve point bulge and struggled for its life against the surging never-say-die Vikings. The Vikes outscored CCSF 38-27 in the second half and almost sneaked all the way in on them/ but blew it.

They tried to freeze the Rams out and it backfired when 6'6 forward Kevin Mooney batted the potential winning DVC shot down. The illegal tip took place, the ref called it and it was good night DVC. Ken Cobb had 17 and Mike Harski had 13 for DVC.

With pressure not as great as in the two weeks before Coach Phelan practically emptied the bench.

Vince Chambers came off the bench against Diablo Valley to block an important Viking shot, rebound and feed Robert Taylor for his 13th, luckiest and most important field goal in an exciting 71-66 victory.

The game tabbed as the "win this one for me," by Coach Phelan wasn't won easily. Mainly because Ron Dale's field goal with 3:45 left before halftime was the first contributed to the cause by a Ram other than Taylor.

Ken Cobb was a tough assignment for the Rams Cliff Williams. Cobb outscored Williams 23 to 6 and the Vikings Mike Harski held supreme rebounding control.

The swift Vikes outran CCSF in the first half and led 34-26 at the half.

In the second half DVC maintained their lead but the Rams came back shooting. Ron Dale (AKA Rubberman) blasted 18 points for the Rams and achieved position for rebounds that made the game more interesting for the Rams and fans.

In the late stages the game turned into a seesaw battle. The Rams went ahead 63-62 for the first time but DVC tied at 63 all, Chambers put CCSF ahead 65-63 on a field goal and Cobb answered for DVC, 65 all. Finally Bobby Pruitt put CCSF ahead to stay at 67-65. On DVC's next offensive thrust

Vince Chambers--leads the way for Rams to win a tight one.

Chambers batted the shot away, rebounded, and passed to Taylor who fired up his thirteenth field goal. This cushion was all the Rams needed to post an 8-5 conference record.

The Rams enjoyed brief success against the Eagles by running up an 8-0 lead but their countless errors made them fall short against the new champs of the GGC. The Rams were caught dribbling instead of shooting under the basket and as a result Tyree Foster made All-American overnight. Foster batted approximately 15 shots away and dominated the boards well enough that CCSF was getting one shot to Laney's 2 or 3.

Lacrosse Action Begins

With the early thaw of spring, the snowy athletic fields of the eastern United States are giving way to what is probably America's oldest competitive game.

Two teams of ten players each assemble on a field and proceed to run, slash, hack, dodge and pound at each other until one is victorious. The game-Lacrosse.

City College has a special tie to this brutal game. The Golden Gate Lacrosse Club, Club, now in its third year in the Bay Area, was once the City College Lacrosse Club. The team drew players from the college and used City's equipment and facilities. Eventually problems developed and the Lacrosse club was disbanded but immediately reorganized and appeared as the Golden Gate Lacrosse Club.

Lacrosse is a game that originated with the North American Indians. Through the years it has been standardized and strict rules applied to the method of play.

It is usually played on a field from 70 to 85 yards wide and 110 yards long between goals. There are 10 players on each of the two sides. Each player carries a long-handled racket, or crosse. The ball is not handled, but caught, carried and thrown with the crosse, the object being to throw it through the opponents goal.

With the season now scheduled to begin March 12 against Stanford, the Golden Gate Lacrosse Club is recruiting players. Men, both with and without previous experience in Lacrosse, interested in playing this season with Golden Gate may obtain further player information by contacting either Tom Clark (564-5165) or Jay Goldsmith (285-1572)

The Golden Gate Lacrosse Club is a member of the Northern California Lacrosse Association which includes some seven other teams. Road games are played in Marin, Oakland, Stanford, Palo Alto and Monterey.

This season All-Star games will be played with visiting collegiate teams including Arizona, Air Force Academy and the Australian National Team.

College Veterans Feel Pinched

"Today's veteran in college is out hustling like never before. He's dedicated to working for his college, his community and himself. And he is really feeling the financial pinch," said Neal C. Clark, president of ALPHA SIGMA MU national federation, before the Congressional Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs.

Clark is seeking public support on four bills that would aid the veteran-college student in a direct way.

The most important of these four bills is S-2161, which would increase Veterans Educational Benefits from $175 a month to $220 for single veteran-students; from $205 per month to $265 for married veteran-students; and from $230 a month to $305 for those with two dependants.

The second bill, S-740 would make a three month advance possible to those veteran-students that have to comply with most college's requirements that tuitions be paid at the beginning of each semester.

Amd. HR-6531, the third bill supported by Clark, would require that full-time VA counselors on campus be provided at the VA's expense.

The fourth bill that the ALPHA SIGMA MU fraternity is interested in, S-2091, would require that companies with government contracts give veterans priority in hiring.

Clark asked those "who feel these bills merit their attention and support" to write their senators and congressmen in Washington, D.C.

"For those of us who are attempting to better ourselves through education," said Clark, "for those who have returned home only to hear 'sorry, no jobs,' it would be a great boon to know that the public is backing us in our quest."

Spring 1972 Budget Surprizes Few

STUDENT COUNCIL AUDIENCES - Take an active part in semi-weekly meetings.

The Student Council finance Committee recently approved the budget for the various campus student activities for Spring 1972. As usual, the largest sum was granted to the Physical Education Departments which collected over $15,000 from 100 per cent of A.S. Card sales.

The rest of budget moneys came from other sources like bookstore profits, and totaled over $20,000 which was distributed among 21 other college services. Almost twenty-five percent of the money for that catagory went to the Student Accounting Office(E5,000). The Student Vehicle and the Concert Lecture Series followed with $4,000 each.

The future of the Experimental College and the Free Critic was assured when they each received what they requested — $2500 for the college and $2800 for its newspaper.

Many organizations received much less than what they asked for, but none was as disappointed as the Student Mobilization Committee. It had requested over $26,000 for its operation on the campus but was given nothing. Two other political associations, the Young Socialists Alliance and the Socialists for Pulley for President were also refused funds.

Other allocations went to: Free Gay Students ($280); Legal Aid Defense Organization ($500); Day Care Center ($1443); Rally Committee ($1911), to name a few.

Women's Lib Meets in Boston

During the weekend of Feb. 11-13, 1300 women from 26 states came to Boston University to participate in the Second National Abortion Action Conference sponsored by the Women's National Abortion Action Coalition, (WONAAC).

At the Friday night rally 300 people came to hear many prominent feminist speakers. Featured among them were Lana Clark Phelan, from National Organization of Women, and Shirley Wheeler, the Florida woman who was convicted of a felony for having an abortion.

Saturday was filled with workshops on varied topics of concern to the movement. These included health care, high school, black and chicano women, legislation, litigation as well as how to organize abortion groups. At the session that night a proposal from the WONAAC staff passed overwhelmingly. This proposal called for a week of activities built around the necessity to repeal the anti-abortion and restrictive contraception laws, and forums about the forced sterilization that still occurs with many poor, and welfare women.

These activities will take the form of teach-ins, panels, conferences, rallies or any other effective activity.

This week of activities would begin May 1 and culminate in local demonstrations and rallies on May 6.

A highlight of the Conference came with the news from a representative of Bella Abzug about plans to introduce a national bill to repeal all anti-abortion laws.

Litter Problem Picking Up

It is obvious to most of us that the litter situation at City College is getting out of hand. The trashstrewn campus in the afternoon has all the surrealistic air of a violence torn ghetto or the aftermath of a Woodstock. This is the first of a series intended to explore the roots of this problem.

The man with ultimate responsibility for such practical considerations as trash removal is Director of Physical Facilities Victor B. Graff. In his office in the Science Building we asked, "Why is there so much litter on the campus?"

Graff began, "The problem, as usual, is money. For grounds maintenance the lawns and flower beds we have seven gardeners. They must also work at the District Office downtown. We have asked for three additional gardeners to work in the Veterans' Work Study Program."

Asked about the custodial staff, Graff explained that only three custodians can be permanently assigned outside buildings. The rest are kept busy on duties inside the rooms and hallways. City College has 53 regular custodians. Of this number 36 work nights and 17 work days. Ten part time student custodians will be hired this semester, however, to help out.

In reply to a query about the apparent scarcity of trashcans, Graff stated, "The littercans seem to disappear constantly and there isn't money availble now to replace them." He provided figures regarding litter removal costs. A "Scavenger" company gets approximately $1,000 a year to dump the large red bins every morning. The City Street Cleaning Department will clean the campus drivewarys with their equipment — at a cost to the school of $1,000 a shot. With a fiscal year budget of $4,000 for this purpose the roads get cleaned a maximum of four times annually in this way.

Graff concluded, "There'll always be two problems; lack of funds — and lack of co-operation on the part of the people on campus who create the litter. I might add that I refer to faculty as well as students."

We next visited C-100 (home of the custodial staff) to talk with the people who deal most directly with the problem. Lulu Hepburn, a female custodian, sat behind the desk in tthe small office and gave her views.

"There are sides to this people don't realize", she commented, "The smoking in classrooms and halls for instance. It takes so much longer to do the floors. The worst mess outside is from people eating lunch. It's really bad around the canteens. Then there's the dogs on campus."

Apparently there have been instances of dogs, running loose, who have "done their thing" in the hallways, leaving the custodians to clean it up. "You can see why they get upset about having to clean it up!" Lulu said, laughing.

Another (male) custodian felt that the situation would improve when the student custodians are helping out on a regular basis. He explained that most of them were still trying to reconcile their school schedule with their working hours.

We learned at C-100 that seven of the ten positions mentioned by Graff are already filled. At time of writing there were 3 openings remaining. Pay is $2.34 an hour if you qualify. (Some of these positions are funded as custodial jobs, other funded as Lab Assistants.) Applicants should contact the Financial Aids Office.

CCSF Radio Sees Changes

"We are no longer a club, but a class" said Bill Miller, Program-Director of KCSF, one of the two radio stations on campus.

Broadcasting used to be open, to anyone who was interested, as a non-unit course. Now, even though there are no pre-requisites to fulfill, students can register only with the consent of the instructor, and faculty advisor, P. Brown. There are three courses in radio broadcasting, Broadcasting 30, 31 and 32, for one, two and three units respectively.

The ruckas about financing the classes by the Student Council is avoided this year because the $2,000 requirement comes from the School District. The money goes for such things as rental of phone lines for KCSF to broadcast in Statler Wing; records, which are bought through distributors and record subscriptions; to replace equipment that wears out, and new equipment and supplies.

To give an example of the cost involved, a turntable alone costs $200 and that does not include the tone arm or the stylus. The reason such costly equipment is used is that "we have to have professional equipment because the people that use it train for the broadcasting profession," said Brown, "there are FCC (Federal Communications Commission) standards to be met and Broadcasting equipment is more rugged than the home components," it has to be because it gets more use.

Vending Machines On the Outs Here?

Associated Students President Bruce Bosso brought before the Student Council the demands of the vending machine companies to raise the price on the vending machines from ten cents to 15 cents.

The companies want to raise the prices to compensate for the pay raise given to the vending machine servicemen after their three month strike.

Bosso stressed that the demands be denied and the Council agreed. Bosso said that the companies are not responsive to the college and are slow in repairing machines. With this refusal to raise the prices we may see the vending machines taken away.

THE LEGACY — One of the exotic prints at Student Art Show.

Student Artists Sold Out

"I like it!"

That was the murmur of those attending the Fine Art Print exhibit and sale held March 3 in the Visual Arts Building here.

The exhibition was under the direction of John O'Brian, Chairman of the Art department, and Instructor Fred Berensmeier. It was a show of last semester's class in Art Print making.

"It is easy to make prints from the blocks," said Berensmeier "the students made what they wanted and donated the rest to the Art Department. The sale is designed to gain money and thereby lower the art lab fee."

The print designs were all student originals and sold for $2 to $15.

The types of prints exhibited included:

Etchings, which are basically scratches in a zinc or copper plate which is then inked. The ink is wiped off with a tarlet cloth and only the ink in the cuts and burrs remains. Placed into an etching press, the etching is then reproduced on high quality, damp paper.

Block Printing, which most people are familiar with, is made by cutting a design into a soft material such as linoleum; the remaining plateaus are then printed.

Serigraphs, which is the same process as silk screen, a stencil printing process. Pigment is pushed through stretched silk onto a stencil which is over paper. and Collographs, which is a built-up surface, similar to a collage, that is printed.

The course in Art Print making was taught for the first time during the fall 1971 semester under the handicap of lack of equipment, material and high cost to students.

Besides the financial gain f the Art department, there may also be some benefits to the artist-students who made the prints. "If we run out of prints we will put the buyer in contact with the students," said Berensmeier.

There will be another Art Print exhibit during the Fall '72 semester which will feature Christmas prints.

Lecture Series' Hand Slapped

The City College lecture series has had its hand slapped. The reprimand was administered by the Student Council to hit the series directly in its pocketbook, by refusing to renew the $4,000 grant from the Associated Student's fund.

The Council and the lecture series committee differ on several major points. All begin with the lecture series' purpose. Austin White, a history instructor who coordinates the committee, sees the program's purpose as serving the entire population on City College campus: "To be informative and bring in authorities in areas interesting to both students and faculty."

But the Student Council, represented by President Bruce Bosso, sees this purpose and its actualization in the past series as inadequate and biased: "I think Austin White was more responsive to faculty and administration than to the students."

The Council indignantly points a collective finger at the committee under White's coordination as proof of their accusation. This group, they maintain — consisting of four faculty members, four students, and one administrator all involved on the basis of interest — is not a fair representation of the student body's tastes or of their substantial $4,000 share in the project.

However, White stated that he sent requests to each consecutive student council, to produce official representatives for the committee. The Councils have always played deaf and dumb.

The deaf and dumb game was a popular sport between White's committee and the Student Council.

White states that he was never called in for a budget review prior to the fund cut-back, but the Student Council maintains that they sent three forms on that project to the student body members of the White committee.

Conversely, the Student Council complains that the suggestion of various club representatives they sent to Austin White to secure speakers or shows went unheeded. White maintains that the series represented a cross-section of students and touched a wide number of different subjects that drew ample audiences.

As a result of the continuing disagreement the Student Council will set up a Speaker's Bureau (open to any interested students) to run a lecture series alongside that of White's, who still has a $4,000 operation budget from the

Dance and Scuffle At Gay Ball

The Free Gay Student Association held a dance in the Student Union Building from 11 am to one pm on Tuesday, February 29.

At its peak, approximately 75 persons were at the dance with only 25 at the most dancing. Unfortunately the rest of the students seemed to have thought that they had stumbled upon some sort of "freak show" and only spectated the event.

At the dance's climax a scuffle between some students from outside of the dance and the campus police broke out. The cause of the fight is not known but no overt homosexuals were involved.

The gay students were surprised at the number of students that came to the dance merely to "look at the faggots."

A few of the gay students said that they felt somewhat like animals in a zoo.

"But that's to be expected and we're getting use to it," said one gay student.

Women spectators shared their response to the dance while the men declined to comment.

Ond female said, "It's trippy." Another felt, "It's too much," while another had mixed reactions.

"I think it's dirty but if they want to dance, I guess it's okay."

Still another said, "I'm a Christian and it's an abomination!"

The atmosphere in the audience prompted a female spectator to question

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

U. S. Democracy Falls Flat When Politicians Save Face

The greatest strength of democracy can often degenerate into its greatest weakness.

Most students of government recognize the importance of citizen participation in decision making. What these same people ignore is the fallacy of believing in "the sanctity of public opinion."

The real tragedy of the "public knows best" philosophy are the politicians who care less for the public good, and care more for public good will. Equally galling are those who feel that reform must have the support of the "silent majority".

Like the nickel beer, an electorate concerned with social reform is nice if you can get it. Unfortunately, we can't.

Even the most casual study of American history reveals that reform is instituted by a few dedicated individuals and groups. The Abolitionists, like their counterparts in the modern civil rights movement, were in a minority. Early labor unions encountered as much hostility from workers as they did from businessmen. Before opposition to the Vietnam war became acceptable, the peace movement existed only as a voice crying in the wilderness.

The recent furor over the abolition of the death penalty in California is another example of the reformers being in the minority.

Once again, we are not opposed to the idea of a democratic society. What we do object to are necessary reforms left undone by politicians who are afraid to offend the voters' prejudices.

A true public servant will use his position to educate the people, to make them realize the necessity of a certain action on his part.

"Your representative," said Edmund Burke, the famous British statesman, "owes you not only his industry, but also his judgment...and he fails you if he does not offer you both." We recommend these words to the American politicians and voters.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY — Ivy Bookman and Paul Mobley are the sinister guests at The Birthday Party, Harold Pinter's play currently in production at the Little Theater.

Black Drama Class Seen as Benefit to Black Actors

Drama 30's fall semester class decided to offer the profits from Blackness '71 as a scholarship to two deserving students of the class.

Claude Everhart, a pre-law major, who displayed his talents as actor and director in the show, and Fred Blanchard, a visual communications major, who devoted his energy as stage manager, were voted as the two most deserving students by a class elected board.

Claude expresses his personal feelings about the class:

"Drama 30 is a very constructive opportunity for black students to come together in a common cause."

He continued with, "What black folks need are specific goals toward which to work."

"Black drama affords such an opportunity. It is very beautiful to see brothers and sisters throw away their individual egoisms in order to produce a completely community orientated program." Claude added, "Black drama must serve the needs and desires of black people to express the black way of life."

Fred Blanchard would like to see Drama 30 do more classics.

"Black contempory theater is great, but there are sides of the black life style that aren't expressed enough," Fred said.

"Just like there are many sides of white life, we as black people have many sides of our life," He continued.

Fred is not alone in his idea for more classics to be done. John Fisher, the drama 30 instructor has already started the ball rolling for a Roman Classic, "PHORMIO" by Terence.

Drama Department Awaits Birthday Party March 15

The drama department will kick off the new semester with a production of Harold Pinter's The Birthday Party, opening March 15 for a four-performance run.

The play is directed by Dr. Walter Krumm and the cast features Ivy Bookman, Delano Cox, Lance Greenfield, Paul Mobley, Carol Nelson and Dylan Schames.

When The Birthday Party first opened in London it was roundly panned by the critics. Pinter's later success with other plays, however, forced the critics into a reassessment of this early work and it has now become a classic in the repertory of modern theater.

Since then, the play has met with resounding success all over the world.

The production was designed by Mobley and W. D. Harris. Set and costume construction is by members of the Drama 19 class.

Curtain time is 8 p.m. and admission for the four regular performances is $1.00. There will be a special preview performance on March 14, however, at which no admission is charged.

Reservations may be secured by telephoning 587-7272, extension 132.

Rams Violate Federal Law by Shooting Down Eagles

In what easily qualified as the GGC game of the year, the tough City College Rams beat the formerly undefeated Laney Eagles 75-58.

The Eagles, going into their last regular season game sporting a 13-0 record, received their first setback in San Francisco at the hands of the domineering Rams as a result of consistent scoring and rebounding throughout.

From the beginning the Rams never trailed and in running up a 10-2 lead the Rams were unanswered on eight straight points. In contrast the Eagles had fumble-itis in the early going and it was too late in any stage of the game for them to catch up.

Cliff Williams gave his best performance by scoring 17 points, 14 of which were scored in the first half.

As Robert Taylor, Willie Daigle and Ron Dale took up the scoring when Williams slacked up the Rams continued to beat the shaken Eagles.

"We just wanted to show them that we could beat them and that they could be beaten," explained Bobby Pruitt.

Perhaps the most important phase of the game for Sid Phelan's Rams was in the area of scoring. Williams, Taylor, Dale and Daigle hit 17, 16, 13 and 12 respectively. Along with that the supporting cast tossed in 17 helpful points. As Coach Phelan explained, "all this team needs is scoring punch. (Well, how's that for scoring punch, Sid?) Notes: At one stretch in the Laney game the Rams pulled out to a 21 point lead and at no time in the second half did the Eagles get closer than 15 points to the cagey Rams.

Rams closed with 9-5 season record.

In the Laney vs. the GGC All-Stars game Laney won, 102-91. CCSF players were represented by Cliff Williams and Robert Taylor who accounted for five and nine points respectively.

Sanchez Elected to Presidency of Governing Board

Dr. David J. Sanchez, Jr. was recently elected President of City College Board of Governors. He serves as President of the Board of Education of the San Francisco Unified School District as well.

The two-hatted job, however, will be shortlived. In the last election, the voters of San Francisco approved two measures that will affect the public school system and Dr. Sanchez' position.

In the future, Board of Education members will be elected at large, as will the City College Board of Governors. Dr. Sanchez, however, plans to run for one of the Boards in June but has not yet decided which one.

In a recent press conference with Guardsman staffers, he touched on the following points:

HIS JOB — "Some people think if you have a job working for the city that it's great, but it's time-consuming and the pay is $100 a month."

COMMUNITY COLLEGES — "There is a definite need for expansion of community college facilities. Seventy percent of all freshmen and sophomores in the Bay Area are in community colleges."

BUSING — "Parents involved in school, teachers involved with parents, this proves that there are some good things happening. You just have to see if it will help in the betterment of education."

MEDIA — "The most powerful forces in what happens in our city are those who write the news. Mass Media must program positive and negative thinking to get an overall view of situations in the community college."

MUTUAL ACCEPTABILITY — "The quality (of the faculty) is greater if students are involved. Students on committees tend to vote more conservatively than the faculty."

OVERCROWDING AT CITY COLLEGE — "You can't turn down students; everyone has a right to education."

FUTURE PLANS — "I will run for one of the Board openings, but I don't know where I'll get the campaign funds of $50,000 or more."

Dr. Sanchez is a record-setter by virtue of being the first Latino to be appointed to the Board of Education and Board of Governors, as well as being the Board's youngest member at 32.

Sanchez is employed full-time as an Assistant Professor of Ambulatory and Community Medicine at the University of California Medical Center.

Additionally, he serves on the Board of Directors of the Catholic Social Service, the Catholic Youth Organization and of Centro Latino.

He holds both a Bachelor of Arts and a Master of Arts degree from San Jose State College. In 1969 he received his Doctor of Philosophy degree from the University of California at Berkeley.

The show investigates the life of Christ in an open, innocent and down-to-earth fashion, utilizing contemporary language and rock music.

Mancall Explains New Chinese Role

Editor's Note: In view of the new developments in Sino-American relations, we feel that this speech is of particular interest to intelligent students.

A well-timed opportunity to understand the Chinese role in the ever-altering play of modern history will be available on March 9, at 11 am in the City College theater. Against the backdrop of a unique Presidential visit, Mark Mancall is delivering a lecture entitled "China in the New International World."

Mancall, formerly a professor of history at Harvard and Yale universities, is well acquainted with the Asian world through contact afforded him by various travel grants. He has produced numerous articles and manuscripts including Russia and China: Perennial Conflict, and has authored the book Formosa Today.

The writer's current activity includes a long-term, comparative research project on "revolution", centering on Chinese History, the Tai-ping Rebellion and the Chinese Communist revolution.

Communiversity State's Success

For the past semester, the Associated Students at San Francisco State College have been putting their time and energy into a community-involved project of alternative education. The result is the Communiversity, a free university which will bring people of San Francisco, students and non-students, young and old, and of all ethnic origins in touch with cultural and educational activities in their communities, free of cnarge. The Communiversity will also offer classes of its own.

Alternative education courses will rangé from "Quality of the Environment, Unlimited" to "Small Appliance Repair." Both classes and projects are coordinated with a number of alternative-education activities and community projects already in progress in San Francisco. They include such groups as Draft Help, Project Artaud, and Airwaves.

It is the hope of Communiversity to provide alternative education to students on campus. It is also the ambition of the Communiversity to put members of the community in touch with the cultural and educational facilities at their disposal. To do this, the Commu niversity has printed a catalogue of courses offered, other groups involved, and specific projects planned.

The Communiversity is seeking more than "educational alternatives" or community involvement, however. They are seeking a new sense of community, of sharing among all kinds of people.

"I can only hope that the spectators here are not good representatives of the average students attending college today. At this we can only hope that future dances put on by the gay students will be more like dances and less like circus side shows."

Where Austin White is skeptical that the Council is aware of the complexity of running lectures, concerts and films, Bruce Bosso is confident of the tentative new plan and its co-ordinators. "I think the students have the maturity to run it at least as well as him," he asserts.

Even though there are two stations on campus, they are as different as night and day. The major difference is that KCSF is closed circuit station that broadcasts only to Statler Wing, from 8:00 to 12:00 a.m. and from 3:00 to 4:00 p.m. KALW, on the other hand, speaks to the general public at 91.7 on the FM dial, five days a week from 12:00 to 3:00 p.m. as well as closed circuit to Statler Wing at the same time.

Another difference between the two stations is that KCSF goes on the air with information of interest to CCSF students, such as "Job Finder", a list of jobs that can be obtained through the job placement office; campus calandar, giving dates and times of events on campus, as well as public service announcements involving students. "KCSF is an active outlet for any organization on campus" said Miller. KLAW, transmitting at 3000 watts, reports facts that are of general public interest, it is community oriented.

Both stations are run and operated by students. KCSF is comprised of the beginning broadcast students while KALW is run by the best students of the class.

Bikers Unite Against Rip Offs

Biker freaks on campus are uniting and joining City College's bike club to protect their cycles against theft. The club has been set up for the mutual protection of bikes on campus and has a storage room for members' use during school hours.

The bike club has been operation for three terms and now protects some 150 members without a single loss. The only requirement this semester is that members watch the bikes for one hour each week or pay two dollars membership fee.

The club sponsors trips on Saturdays open to anyone and other activities such as a tour during Easter and a possible class for bike care and repair.

The headquarters is located under the Student Union off the Ocean Avenue parking lot for anyone interested in joining. Last semester 40 bikes were stolen from this campus.

Council Pulls Juke Box Plugs

Student Council this week tabled indefinitely a resolution concerning student compact car parking and a trial test of juke boxes on campus. Also tabled was a motion concerning concerts and a matter of formality report to be presented by Bruce Bosso.

Jacque Burchell was appointed and approved as secretary of the Student Council. The budget request from the Greek Council of $100 was cut to $80 and approved.

The rest of both meetings was spent arguing about and voting on censureship of council members who leave at one o'clock when the meeting is not over.

New rules of order came into effect Wednesday. Among these rules was the ideal that voting should take place on Monday only after careful evaluation of issues on Wednesday except in cases of emergency. In no way did the new rule stop the same motion, guised in different points of parliamentary procedure, from being defeated three separate times. The motion? Censureship of students who leave when the meeting continues past one.

When it was discovered that the scheduled guest speaker had left, a motion for adjournment was entertained, defeated, brought up and defeated a second time and finally carried through on the third effort.

Aquarian Age Creativity Realized

In its first presentation City College's lecture series featured Al Young, poet and fiction writer from Stanford University.

Speaking before a group of some 100 people Young began by stating that it is difficult to relate to a writer, especially if a person is unfamiliar with his works. To acquaint his audience with one of his books, the writer quoted his novel, Snakes. The title, he explained, had to do with a recording by a fictitious group, the main characters in his novel.

"I tried to write a book about growing up in a Midwestern city," he said. Snakes is centered on a character ophaned at infancy just outside Detroit in Ypsilanti, Michigan, and left to be raised by his grandmother. This youngster, M.C., has an ambition to form a band and uses music as his form of expression. From this point the novel develops the four band members and how their early fairly large, success affects their lives.

The reading from Snakes concerned a boy called Shakes (short for Shakespeare). This light account of his youth focused on some humorous recollections while striking a very realistic note with the listener. Young's writing communicates with our personal experiences and is not just a piece of rhetorical fantasy.

"Real liveliness and vitality goes back to the people," he said "poetry is a phenomenon among all peoples at all times." The poet, novelist stressed this idea throughout his speech emphasizing the bonds between people rather than the gaps.

The Aquarian Age, according to Al Young, is a time marked by the speeding up of invention, thinking, everything. "People reject the material sides of life . . . look for spiritual meaning." Mysticism was used as an example as Zen Buddhism was popular in the '60's.

In Young's opinion we're now turning to other horizons. "Religion, science, art are more interrelated than people believe." This concept of harmony between all areas of knowledge, and further, of life itself, through the search for truth is important to all of us.

The writer stated that we tend to think on mass levels and compete with technology today. It deceives us to think religion, science, philosophy are separate from one another. It tends to fit us into a particular workable niche.

But the search for truth, Young contends, should create more interaction. There is a "movement toward world organization through music, art and writing."

"Creativity is at last being realized in the Aquarian Age," says the poet. He emphasized that we are all artists and an artist should reach out to bridge the gaps artificially forced upon him.

State Axes CCSF Aid

The State of California has considerably reduced the amount of financial aid grants given to the City College of San Francisco. CCSF's student body has increased 10% and the number of applications for financial aid went up 20%.

State grants were reduced by $82,000. Therefore CCSF students seeking financial assistance are having harder times than two years ago when $182,000 was funded.

Kenneth Castellino, CCSF financial aids officer, points out that the total sum of State grants was not reduced, but CCSF was cut short so that the grants could be spread to more colleges. He feels that "if they wanted to spread the money farther they should have appropriated more money."

At any rate, the CCSF State grants, which were funded in September ran out by February and so now almost all CCSF financal aid is coming from the Federal Government.

Environmental Science Handbook May Be An Answer to Man's Fate

There is more than a hint of trouble in the air, water and the food that we eat, drink and breathe.

According to Edmund Bedecarrax. Life Science instructor at CCSF, students are becoming aware of, and are concerned about, environmental changes that are taking place in the Bay Area.

To combat the ever worsening ecological situation, City College students are compiling an Environmental Science Handbook that is designed to orient students and the general public in the Bay Area as to what can be done to solve environmental problems.

The handbook, which is scheduled to be available by mid-May 1972, is tentatively financed by a $500 grant from the San Francisco chapter of the Sierra Club. All work on the book will be done by students. It is to be printed on donated, recycled paper and hopes are that the printing can be done at school.

"There is a need for this type of information to the students on this campus and to the San Francisco community in general," said Bedecarrax, who will be checking the booklet for accuracy and giving technical support when needed. "Air and water pollution hazards are right in the home, in foods," he continued. "There is a more immediate threat to your health in the home with foods than outside."

The illustrated, 15 page booklet will treat a variety of subjects that will include:

Recycling — The how, where and when of it. What to do with cloth, paper, glass and aluminum.

A list of California Senators and Assemblymen, United States Senators and Representatives, as well as Pollution Control Agencies that can be contacted about environmental problems.

Detergents — The amount of phosphates they contain and the manufacturer's name.

Pest control — Insecticides that are safe to use and the ones to stay away from as well as alternatives to poisons.

A glossary of environmental terms.

Many other topics relating to ecology and the environment will be covered as well.

"We don't expect quality laws from Washington," concluded Bedecarrax "consumer concern and awareness will exert the greatest pressure on manufacturers (of pollutants)."

EDMUND BEDECARRAX — An ecology and life science instructor, will also become advisor to the City College Environmental Science Handbook.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Thought For The Week

We are students of words: we are shut up in schools and colleges and recitation rooms for ten to fifteen years, and come out with a bag of wind, a memory of words, and do not know a thing.

— Ralph Waldo Emerson

A Little Knowledge Can Be Dangerous

Mutual acceptability could be an improvement in hiring teachers at City College. Or it could become a case of the young leading the old with both of them falling into the same ditch.

The best judgments of professionals are rendered by their contemporaries. Oscars and Emmies are given to actors by fellow thespians and critics; the winners of the Pulitzer Prize are determined by experts in the fields in which the awards are given. This same philosophy should apply to the teaching profession.

Unfortunately, mutual acceptability will destroy this professionalism and replace it with a hiring process which includes unqualified judges, in this case, the students.

"A school," as Eric Hofer, the longshoreman philosopher once said, "by necessity, must be a dictatorship." Students attend a class because they wish to learn and not because they have been designated to instruct the teacher.

How, for example, is a student who has completed one semester of science qualified to evaluate the qualifications of physics or chemistry teacher? Would a first year history student be able to judge a person who holds a doctorate in history and has taught this subject for ten to twenty years?

An intelligent person should leave this type of judgment in capable hands and acknowledge that some individuals are more qualified in certain areas than he is.

A second defense of mutual acceptability is that students somehow are hampered under the present system. How is this true? Most people have had to learn their job from a person who knows better than they what the job involves. This has not destroyed us or sent us into some kind of a mental trauma.

A student should realize that a teacher is more qualified in a field of study than he is and therefore should not be subject to the whims of a board consisting of students who do not know better and educators who should.

The biggest danger in mutual acceptability is the possibility of it descending into a popularity contest. Most of us, at one time or another, have been taught by a hard teacher who in reality has had our own best interests at heart. The best teachers are often the ones who make us work the hardest. In this way they attempt to instill some knowledge into heads that cannot be reached any other way.

Let students have a say in the hiring process and many otherwise qualified instructors may remain uninvited to faculty parties because they are not "with it" or "one of the boys."

We feel that mutual acceptability will destroy the professionalism of teaching and will make good looks more important than good sense. Any person concerned with the quality of higher education will oppose this proposal.

Black Model is only Second Priority

Afro-American Studies Department of City College serves as a model for growing departments at other schools around the country despite its second priority status here on campus.

George Crippen, chairman and assistant director of placement, has developed a program of lasting benefits for black students.

The program is not a model one in terms of new courses, City College's Black Studies Department has "lower priority as far as development, expansion and coordination of program in subjects from the administration and counseling level," Crippen said.

"Unless the administration realizes that Black Studies are here to stay as an applicable program in subjects they will find difficulties," he continued.

According to Crippen, the department hasn't been viewed with any permanance. Most students are given the courses with a "Go slow, proceed with caution attitude."

Students seeking an A.A. in Black Studies should not be limited to becoming teachers. Black lawyers, doctors, social workers and engineers need a background in Black Studies in order to be more effective in their field.

Not only is Black Studies beneficial to black students, but with more and more elementary and high schools being integrated through busing, white students going into the teaching field will do a much better job with some knowledge of Black culture.

Although the department is housed in a white institution and normally would be subject to white values, the students psychologically gear themselves away from these values.

Crippen believes the student who chooses Black Studies as a major has to absorb the importance of the subject matter and because there is no encouragement given by counselors, students and instructors are the soul of the department.

CONGRATULATIONS! — Lance Greenfield is the recipient of the surprisse in The Birthday Party, the Harold Pinter play currently at the Little Theater.

Birthday Party A Success

Harold Pinter's The Birthday Party, playing through Saturday at the Little Theater, is an enigmatic play.

The action takes place in a seedy seaside boarding house managed by a loquacious flibbertigibbet named Maggie (Carol Nelson) and her taciturn husband, Petey (Delano Cox). At the outset, they have one boarder, Stanley (Lance Greenfield), an out-of-work pianist who apparently never leaves the house, despite the entreaties of the next-door doxie, Lulu (Dylan Schames).

Maggie exhibits a more-than-motherly interest in Stanley and, as an excuse to give him a present, decides that it is his birthday and, since he doesn't have a piano, gives him a toy drum.

Into this message comes a sinister pair, Goldberg and Jackson (Paul Mobley and Ivan Bookman). Ostensibly, they have come to the beach for a short vacation but it soon becomes clear that they are looking for someone and that someone is Stanley.

From this point on The Birthday Party develops into a surrealistic horror tale, made all the more horrific by the black humor that abounds. Nothing is clear and yet everything is natural, much like life, much like a nightmare. The play ends on the same simplistic note with which it began.

The performances are uniformly excellent, with special honors going to Carol Nelson as Maggie. Her gawky, giggly portrayal of the landlady is just right, without becoming caricature.

Lance Greenfield is a convincing Stanley, alternately boasting and whining, ultimately collapsing into a state of vegetation under the pressure of the evil intruders.

As the ministers of death, Paul Mobley and Ivan Bookman make a menacing pair. Mobley is a strutting, cocky little braggadocio spouting platitudes and doubletalk with equal facility. Bookman is perfect as the strong and silent half of the duo, displaying his versatility with the sharp departure from his recent essaying of Jack Jefferson in The Great White Hope.

As the brow-beaten husband, Delano Cox does what he can with a less-than-meaty role and he looks the part to the nines.

Dylan Schames plays Lulu as to the manner born. From her initial flirtatiousness to her final outrage, she is indeed "a fine, bouncy girl."

The direction by Dr. Walter Krumm is very good, especially the madness of the party scene. The setting, by Mobley and W.D. Harris exactly captures the essence of Pinter's abstruse work. Angular, tilted, soaring, it is both realistic and theatrical at once.

The Birthday Party will run through Saturday. Curtain time is 8 pm and all seats are $1.00.

18--Too Old to Play!

March 4 was the magic day of adulthood for the 18 to 21 year olds of this state.

This age group now has the right to sign contracts, serve on juries, to sue and to have suit brought against them. In general, they now have all the rights that were formerly reserved for those over 21, with the exception of the purchase of alcohol.

Do they really have the rights of adulthood?

The college student, particularly here at City College, is in a legal limbo. While he is an adult off campus, he is considered a minor on campus.

The most blatant example of this policy exists in the laws concerning physical education. The state law plainly says that all persons under the age of 18 must take P.E. This law excludes most of the people who now take P.E. at City College.

The Board of Governors, in light of the fact that over 70% of the students that now take P.E. would drop the course if it were not mandatory, has decided to make the P.E. requirement stick until next semester.

This is a blatant denial of the adulthood rights of the 18 year old. Of course, a 70% reduction in the enrollment of the P.E. department would mean a 70% reduction in the faculty of the department, a proposition that the teachers' unions would never stand for.

It's time that teachers' unions quit denying students their legal rights. P.E. requirements should be dropped.

Rams Bat Vikings

By Emmet Barton

The City College Rams began their 1972 baseball season successfully on March 7, beating Diablo Valley, 9-2. Dave Weidinger, the big right-hander, gave up only four hits and struck out seven. The Rams peppered Viking pitching for 11 hits, two each by Dan Ferretti and Dave Giorgi. Weidinger also drove in two runs with a single.

It was rumored that Oakland A's owner Charlie Finley had a scout at the game — not to look at players, but to study rightfielder Randy Karp's fire-engine red shoes.

QUESTION: IS THERE ANYTHING YOU WOULD DIE FOR?

Deborah Tripp — Medical Assistant
I wouldn't die for anything. I have a lot of things in life to be and do for myself. Like being an entertainer, like a good dancer.

Herbert Smith — Architecture
I might die for immortality! I wouldn't die for any political cause. Right now I can't think of anything I'm devoted enough to die for.

Mike Naughton — Horticulture
I guess I'd die to protect people I love. I wouldn't die for anything else unless I could be certain that I was going to someplace better than this, like a Utopia.

Desiree Keate — Sociology
There's no specific cause I would die for. But if I felt I wasn't fulfilling my potentialities in life I would probably give up and commit suicide.

Ben Goyhenetche — Horticulture
I wouldn't die for my country, that's for sure! I don't believe in what this country's doing. I'd only die for my family and loved ones.

Peter Schumacher — Chemical Engineering
I would die to keep this country free. I couldn't just stand by and watch tyranny take over.

Concerning "Solution to Women's Lib: Draft the Defiant Dames"

What a cop out! Draft the dames — sure fellas, but before the draft, let's spread the equality a little more. If I were to be drafted at this point, I would refuse induction without reservations, as I don't care to be hypocritical in my beliefs.

Israel drafts women, but please keep in mind that those people have very strong and righteous feelings about their present situation. If the United States were to come under attack, or if speculation of war was imminent, then perhaps, if deemed necessary, I would go.

I had to laugh when you said "Then consider the civilians (meaning men, no doubt) employed by the military, at ridiculous salaries, whose jobs could be done by military female personnel" etc.

Let the women make the low wages...typical chauvinist rhetoric. If you're into statistics, why don't you look a few up? They'll tell you how many more women seek psychiatric treatment than men. Statistics will also tell you why. A syndrome? No. Betty Friedan (Feminine Mystique) calls it "The problem Without a Name" and so do various medical people. A woman can't even get help from the government. Nixon just recently vetoed The Comprehensive Child Development Act of 1971, which would have allowed many more mothers to assume full or part-time employment with the knowledge that their children will be cared for. It would have provided a full range of quality health, education, nutrition and social services for American children of all economic strata. Vetoed.

More statistics? Check the books as to how many women were in the armed services during World War I and World War II. They don't just have babies. Those women worked in the making of uniforms, the technology and medical units, and they volunteered.

So you see, when the country is in need, the women help out, but when women are in need, where is the country?

Sincerely,
Nancy Spear

Editor—

We need your help. We need it today, not tomorrow. City College of San Francisco doesn't even have a doctor on its campus. We have no emergency transportation. We don't have a screening test for Sickle Cell Anemia.

The nurses in the Student Health Service do what they can but they are still overworked and understaffed.

This is ridiculous.

We, the students, don't have to put up with this.

The Student Health Board is a group of students trying to change this situation. We are united around the purpose of getting health care on this campus with consumer control.

But change requires energy; and big change requires big energy. The Student Health Board needs you and your energy to accomplish these changes, especially if:

you are active in your community, you would like to see the energy of CCSF's 20,000 students organized into constructive organization, you can work with organizations, you are tired of being powerless and agree that the student health service here is worth improving.

If you are interested, attend our meetings every Wednesday at 3 pm in the Gangroom of the Student Union Building. Everyone is welcome.

What Ever Happened to Goldfish Swallowing?

The fraternity culture is dead; long live the fraternity and sorority! While the golden era of indigestion from swallowing too many squirming goldfish passed the reigning crown to its successor long ago, a semblance of that time's spirit remains today on the campus of City College.

Several fraternities and sororities exist on the campus, despite a popular sentiment that the fellowship organizations should have gracefully bowed out when the final, glorious record for phone-booth stuffing had been achieved. And the relevance of fraternities and sororities - of pledges and hell-weeks and cotillions - to a modern, non-residence community college, is under fire from inside and out its exclusive walls.

'Greek-letter societies' originated in the late seventeen-hundreds as little more than secret literary or debating organizations. Over a period of time and transition, fraternities and their female imitators acquired what are now infamous characteristics: secret handclasps, initiation ordeals, law codes, and inter-organizational rivalry and jealousy.

The societies thrived on campuses where many students found themselves estranged from friends and customs 'back home', and sought security and acceptance. Most fraternities and sororities were geared to some form of service and to social intercourse and prestige, in a fairly stable balance of interest.

The fellowship societies on City College campus maintain the brotherhood/sisterhood and service ideals of their ancestry in formal constitutions, but their actual functions center around creating close friendships and establishing an effective avenue for social exchange.

Dean Edna Pope, sponsor of the campuses two sororities, Phi Beta Rho and Theta Tau, sees the opportunity for close friendships as the organizations' most valuable asset: "Basically, a student is doing his own thing, worrying about world problems, and I think this is part of the problem in society. Loyalty and friendship are not easy to come by — or at least many times the students can't find these things within themselves."

The fraternities and sororities are acclaimed by their members for promoting lasting and solid friendship bonds. And City College's fraternities and sororities do give limited justice to their 'service' ideal in sponsoring a blood drive, hospital entertainments and other community oriented activities.

But overall participation is slowly dropping and a number of 'sisters' and 'brothers' view the societies with an eye wide open to change and re-organization, focused on a major role in campus activity and community service. As Margie Gunnell, former president of Theta Tau assesses the conflict, "They have to find out what their role is in 1972, if they want to survive.

Survival has always been a matter for the fittest. For City College fraternities and sororities, its a matter of just where the 'fit' is.

For the next eight weeks, until June 16, 1972, Student Health will include the services of Ronald Caldwell, M.D., who will be available to students three days per week for 3-4 hours a day.

The same intake procedure will continue, and any student who requests medical care will first be seen by a nurse and then, if necessary, referred to the doctor. While emergencies will be taken care of as usual, no student should have to wait more than two days for a regular appointment.

The doctor was hired in response to a long standing student need for physician care on campus. The funds for this pilot program will come from a Special Opportunity Grant from the federal government awarded to Student Health to plan health services for community college students.

The Alpha Gamma Sigma Honor Society, Omega Chapter, once again urges all eligible students to join. The pupose of this club is to promote academic achievement and to serve the college community.

This spring, there will be a conference at which we will meet with various California chapters in order to exchange ideas on A.G.X. activities.

Basically, one needs a 3.00 grade point average from last semester to join the club. New students with California Scholarship Federation Life Membership are also eligible. For further information, contact Mr. Wallace Wells n E 205h. Dues are $1.25 per semester.

A foreign film festival is being presented at the City College of San Francisco. The Foreign Language Department is sponsoring the festival on an "intellectual and fun basis" according to Dr. Doris Hernried, chairman of the Foreign Language Department.

The first movie was presented on January 11 and films are continuing to be shown on almost every Tuesday at 11 am and 8 pm in E101.

It is costing City College $750.00 a semester to present these films. There is no admission charge and students may bring guests. A complete schedule and short description of the films is posted and available in A304.

Unique Training Program Begins

A unique vocational-training program is headquartered in a sheltered bungalow at City College. And a unique lady has recently assumed responsibility for its operation and continued success.

The project is the Feast-Hospitality program, and the boss-lady is Denise Plamenac.

Originated in 1964, Project Feast's (Foods Education and Service Technology) objective is to prepare upper division high school students for employment in various aspects of the food and service industry. Plamenac's responsibility is to channel this objective into an occupational reality.

A summer teacher-training workshop at City College orients instructors with information and referenda stressing the practical application of academic subjects in a vocational context.

The direct liaison between education and industry is Feast-Hospitality's greatest virtue, and its greatest challenge. This dual programming is extensive and complicated, by nature demanding a fully qualified co-ordinator who can effectively mediate between teachers and administrators, labor and industry.

Palamenac qualifies with a polished background record of involvment in a variety of administrative outlets for the food and service industry, and in the atmosphere of charm, and witty confidence she easily establishes.

Her position includes a wide range of duties, but focuses on the role of an overall co-ordinator for Feast's programs. "It's one of my purposes to visit schools, but we have a varied batch of duties during the school year. I'm a liaison person between industry and the schools."

The Feast-Hospitality program has been widely acclaimed throughout its seven year operation, and Miss Palamenac intends to expand its record of practical success.

Cultural Events Offer Free Admission

City College, along with several other Bay Area schools, is participating in a program that allows students free admission to some of the cultural events around the City.

The San Francisco Opera House, Masonic Auditorium, and ACT need volunteer ushers. For an evening of ushering work, the student can save himself the price of a ticket.

Sponsored by Merrit Beckerman of the Humanities Department, the program provides students, who have not seen any musical acts except for rock, to treat themselves to a new experience.

Only requirement is to follow the dress code set by the theatres. Usually a black of navy blue suit is required. Length of hair is not questioned.

The appearance of Dean Dixon, the first black conductor in the United States will consist of a rap session on April 18 in the faculty dining room at 7:30 pm.

Students who wish to attend "One Flew Over the Cucoo's Nest" may buy tickets at a discount at $2.00 per ticket for the April 9 performance.

Beckerman should be contacted at A-204C for information concerning any of these events.

Writing Clinic Provides Help

Having trouble writing? The Writing Clinic is on campus to help.

Located at S-347, the Writing Clinic provides assistance to students who are having trouble writing essays, exams, term papers, etc.

Students who drop in on the Clinic are met either by Richard Lippmann or Ellen Nold who will immediately offer their friendly assistance.

Many students have general writing problems. The Clinic will assist the student with anything from writing simple paragraphs to essays and term papers.

Most of the work done with students is on a one-to-one basis. Students are asked to bring in recently written papers or essays to pinpoint specific errors they may be making.

In addition, the Clinic provides free upon request two monographs: "Suggestions for Essay Writing" and "A Student Guide for Writing Tests".

These two booklets contain everything a student needs to know about writing tests and essays. For further help though, the instructors are always there.

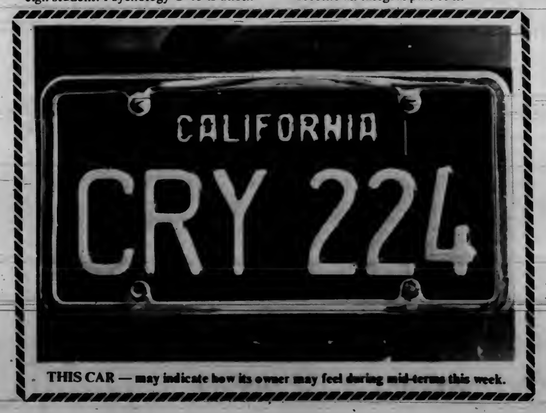
Sponsored and funded by the English Department, the Clinic was designed primarily as an experiment to help students outside of the English Department who were having trouble writing their assignments.

Last year in it's first semester of operation, the Clinic handled approximately 1,000 students coming in for help.

"It's been so successful", says Rich Lippmann, "that the Department is considering making the Clinic a permanent service.

The Clinic is open Monday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m., in S-347.

Foreign Students Cut Back Here



A highly select group of students on campus are learning how to speak and write English. They've tried it and they like it.

There are more than 1500 foreign students at City College from far away places like Iran, Nepal, and India. Foreign student counselor Dr. Joseph Jacobsen, finds that after a six month adjustment period, most foreign students "like the U.S.A." He is also quick to point out that "they're brighter than the average American student", "and the same type of person that made this country."

The English Department's English as a Second Language Program (ESL) has been a great success in aiding the foreign student. Psychology G-13 is another course designed for the foreign student with the purpose of teaching the student how to take tests and program his own curricula.

Admission of foreign students is another responsibility of Dr. Jacobsen. Due to the overcrowded conditions at City, admission to foreign students has to be seriously cut-back. At the present time, Dr. Jacobsen's office is accepting applications for the fall 1973 semester with inquiries coming in at the rate of ten to fifteen per day.

Thanks to the concerted efforts of CCSF's department heads and Dr. Jacobsen's office, the foreign student has been able to successfully make the transition to American College life and to become an integral part of it.

City College Sierra Club Cleans Up

Members of the Sierra Club feel that the organization is now a "definite success because there are no sleepers and everybody is active."

Under its new order of leadership, with no President or Vice-President and governed by a Board of Directors, the club is aimed at one major theme, "ecology, preserving the wilderness around us."

The Sierra Club is presently concentrating on Bay Area clean-ups and another Earth Day. If the weather holds up there will be a rock climbing class to begin the activities.

There are between 25 and 30 members and they are looking for joiners. There is no registration fee.

"We want the community to help. The students don't seem to give a damn on littering," said one member. Another said "It's the clean spots that seem to attract garbage." Yet another dismayed student added "People often tend to think of Earth Day as another Mothers Day or Valentines Day.

If the group decides to go ahead with Earth Day they felt that next week would be the right time to do it.

Other prospective ideas were aimed at recycling and working with grammar schools to get an environmental awareness.

There are no requirements to join. "You go to the meetings and sign you name."

The major drawback for the Sierra Club is its lack of money. Sierra Club representative Bill Stephen explains it this way: "We've merely 30 dollars in the treasury and without enough funds it's difficult to function fully."

Stephen is on the board along with Pam Barbe and L. H. "Mac" McInot. They need publicity and try to get guest speakers to give people an idea of what's going on.

Most of their meetings are held in the Science Building. What they want is a "response" to their activities and assistance to their various causes.

As one girl pointed out, "it is too bad that so far as something like ecology is concerned, many people tend to think of it as a fad."

CCSF Expands to Serve Chinatown

To begin to serve the growing needs of Chinatown residents, the San Francisco Community College District has expanded its programs and facilities in that community.

Evening courses in basic business, history and language are being taught tuition-free at four locations in Chinatown.

The overall program is under the directorhsip of Ronald Lee, an administrative intern working through the CCSF Office of Instruction, Evening division.

Lee assumed the directorship of the program in November of 1971 and immediately sought more representation from the Chinese Community in implementing new beneficial courses.

The current semester includes eight courses and all, except for the language courses, are taught in English.

Instructors for the courses are drawn from the business and academic communities and cleared by City College.

Full Credit

Students who complete the courses receive full credit at City College.

Lee pointed out that one of the unique problems of his program is that the courses must appeal to immigrant and native born residents, both young and old.

The spectrum of course enrollment reflects the diversity of Lee's program.

The business courses, which teach the basic skills necessary to gain employment, are filled with young and old and native and foreign born Chinatown residents. The language courses appeal to the immigrant Chinese wishing to learn English and American-born Chinese who wish to learn either Cantonese or Mandarin.

By far the most popular course is the history of China (35B). Lee stated that it is comprised almost entirely of City College students.

Lee stated that the program has been highly successful and though no plans exist for summer, the Fall 1972 semester will mark another step in the growth of the community classes.

Ceremony Vetoed

The students of City College will have no graduation ceremonies, this year.

According to Dr. Harry Buttimer the reason is "a decline in interest on the part of the students". In a separate interview Dean Willis Kirk said, "The students didn't want it, but individual departments may have their ceremonies, such as nursing, etc.".

Dr. Buttimer, however, said that the "faculty requested to review the situation even though there are no plans for ceremonies in the future."

Instead, the diplomas for those graduating will be sent in the mail.

Asked what schools are most popular for transferring students, Buttimer said the first choice is usually S.F. State. "It is close, economical, and the expenses seem acceptable."

As for those who are turned away, he said "it is because of overcrowded conditions. They also have their budget problems. Often students may find themselves suddenly diverted to another chosen school. The squeeze is on."

Kirk, when asked of the estimated number of students who carry jobs said "60% or perhaps three fourths are doing

Dr. Mancall, who has spent three years of study in Taiwan, Leningrad and Japan, is considered to be one of the top American experts on China.

Thefts Mount

A 50,000 book library is not very big to begin with, yet there are some faculty members who feel that the City College library is big enough for them to check out books and never bother to return them.

To be more accurate, out of 558 books checked out by the faculty 482 are overdue, most of them since last semester. Some of the books were due in 1969, others in 1967 and one was due March 22, 1963.

"We don't even consider something due in February overdue," said one librarian.

Faculty members with outstanding books are sent overdue notices regularly but to no avail. To combat this negligence on the part of the faculty, the cost of the books will be charged to the respective department budget after the book has been overdue one semester or more.

This could be very expensive for some departments since there are certain names that come up very frequently on the check-out cards. One member of the faculty has over 25 books checked out, all of them overdue.

The play Rosencranz and Guildenstern Are Dead is one example. It has been checked out since February 23 and is not available yet.

When asked when the play might be returned, a librarian replied, "Oh! That one is checked out by faculty. I don't know when it will be back, they keep them as long as they want. Maybe if you 97-39, to San Jose City College, 90-48,

Chief Puts Away The Big Stick

"The image of law enforcement. as someone with a big stick who hits you over the head, has to be changed!" stated Campus Police Chief Nelson C. Lum in an interview with The Guardsman.

Lum assumed duties as head of the 41-man force beginning this semester. He is a native San Franciscan and a graduate of Washington High. Entering City's Criminology Department after two-and-a-half years with Army Airborne in Vietnam, Lum is now in his fifth and last semester here. He plans to either continue his training at Golden Gate College or join the San Francisco Police Department.

Chosen to replace departing chief Gile Pursley, Lum has brought to leadership some new ideas and attitudes.

Faculty and administrators were surprised last month by a memo from Lum requesting "Your cooperation in parking in designated lots marked for "A", "B", and "C" permits only . . . We will also be issuing citations to ALL cars . . ."

Policy

Asked if this constitutes a change of policy, Lum replied, "Yes. Previously the policy was to extend 'courtesy' to faculty members. Their cars were seldom tagged. But I feel that if students are cited for parking, that faculty members should know campus rules better by now and should be cited too."

Campus citations are just like the ones issued off-campus. They are processed by the city, and fines go to the city. Most violations are a $10 fine. Obstructing a fire hydrant is $15.

"Students don't realize that once an officer starts writing a ticket, he is required to complete it, even if the driver arrives at his car — it is his duty," stated Lum. "Many citations have already been issued since March 1st. Next semester they will be written starting the first day of school, on both student and faculty cars."

Campus policemen are criminology majors sworn in as peace officers by the City and County of San Francisco. They are promoted according to merit. The force is largely autonomous under its chief. Criminology Department Chairman Tim Foley is the adviser. Uniforms and headgear are issued and funded from the Department's budget. All leather gear, shoes, etc. must be purchased by officers. Campus Police carry no guns. "I am against guns in law enforcement," declared Lum, "Personally I favor the policy of England's police — not to carry guns."

Goals

Lum articulated his goals for the unit as "Establishing communications between the police and other campus groups. There is a lot of misunderstanding concerning law enforcement in general and the Campus Police in particular. Some students associate us with the SFPD and so blame us for their mistakes. I happen to care about this campus. We need more communication, understanding, and cooperation. The Campus Police has been isolated long enough!"

Asked about prisons, Lum alleged, "The present penal system isn't working. The goal must be to rehabilitate — not turn out more professional criminals."

The new chief declined comment on controversial. Sheriff Richard Hongisto, saying, "I've never met him, so I don't have any conclusions about him."

Lum ended, "Any person or group with a problem should feel free to contact me." Lum's office is in C-119. Phone: Extension 201. — Paul Snodgrass

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Do-It-Yourself Earth Week

Thousands of schools and communities across the Nation are expected to join hands for the third consecutive year in observing the new awareness of our conservation needs — Earth Week '72.

Set for April 17-23, Earth Week has grown to symbolize the coming age of the environmental issue and it provides the opportunity to learn something about that issue. As was the case last year, the National Wildlife Federation has joined other conservation groups in urging participation at the community level, with local and statewide groups utilizing their own resources and establishing their own priorities.

For instance, this could be a good time for the residents of Rock Springs, Wyo., to start a community recycling center, or perhaps the citizens of Tuscaloosa, Ala., should collectively examine the implications of Birmingham air pollution in their local area, or students in Montpelier, Vt., could focus in on pollution problems in their local area with a display of their personal artwork. The ideas are as limitless as the problems. Grass roots actions all across the country can focus new attention on air and water quality, land and resource use, transportation, technology, and urban and population growth.

For the first time in history, the environmental issue will be a major part of the political dialogue of nation-wide elections, with public leaders and candidates addressing various concerns. Earth Week '72 can give state and local groups a platform on which to determine the environmental positions and actions of present leaders and candidates.

In addition, global pollution concerns are especially timely this year in view of the NWF "Uniting Nations for BioSurvival" international symposium to be held in conjunction with the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment in Stockholm, June 10-12.

Due to the grass roots emphasis on Earth Week activities, there will not be a national headquarters. Interested persons and groups should contact environmental and citizen organizations at the state and local level in order to make their own Earth Week plans.

Organizations, Houses and Reading Matter

The Student Communication Center, headed by Trina Semorile, has begun operation in the booth of the student lounge. The purpose of the Communication Center is to disseminate information to students, organizations, faculty and community.

"Too many organizations die because no one knows of them and when organizations give dances and parties they are poorly attended because no one knew the date on which the event was set. So, thats what we're here for," Trina beamed.

Trina explained that the Communication Center is impartial to all and will accept announcements from all organizations and individuals but to have announcements out in time interested individuals and groups should turn their material in before Wednesday noon.

For students looking for an inexpensive place to live while attending school, the Student Advice Center has established a special housing file.

The file, open to all students, is a composite of vacancies and requests usually for temporary rentals, registered by visitors to the center, and is open to all students from 8 to 4 daily.

The person responsible for almost every operation in the program, Linda Hicks, hopes to eventually expand services by setting up cooperative correspondence with major realtors in the college community.

The file, becoming larger every day, can be found in the advice center's new location in E109, around the corner from the bookstore and facing Smith Hall.

Creativity reaps its own spiritual reward, while the Experimental College offers a supplement in cold, hard cash.

CCSF's Experimental College is coordinating publication of a student literary magazine, and offering three fifty-dollar cash prizes as incentive to produce the best in the essay, short story, or poetry category.

All work submitted in these three sections and any graphic entries must be turned in by April 15.

Entries may be deposited in boxes situated in front of the campus book store, in the library, and at the communications center in the Student Union Building, or they may be directly submitted to an editorial staff member at the Experimental College office, Bungalow 5.

The literary magazine is affiliated with the English department through a one-unit class entitled Forum. Forum's solitary mission is to prepare, compile, and present a college magazine, and under Brown Miller's direction the task is accomplished through use of the facilities at Experimental College.

After the entry deadline, a general meeting of all contributors and editors (Forum students) will be held to decide general organization of the yet unchristened booklet. For this purpose and for general communication, all entries should include the name, address and phone number of the contributor.

Dennis Fong, co-ordinator of activities for the Experimental College and a member of the Forum class, hopes for a more professional literary publication on a higher level of achievement. "We're attempting to make a work of art."

The Guardsman is published weekly by the Journalism students of San Francisco City College as a workshop project in reporting, copywriting, editing, proofreading, layout, typography, and photography.

SPECIAL REPORT

Our Man on Ireland

Paul Snodgrass

Author's Note: I lived in Belfast until I was 12 years old. My family and friends were moderates who couldn't care less what a man's religion was. I didn't attend church, although my grandparents were Protestant. I have two aunts in Belfast. One is Protestant and one is Catholic. My concern is with objective journalism — not to take sides.

The violence in Northern Ireland remains a mystery to most Americans despite extensive and continuing press coverage. No matter how much we hear or read, nothing seems to quite put the situation in a clear perspective.

Why is this so? The reason is that reporting of the violence has been one-sided. We have heard the complaints of the Catholic minority repeatedly. The I.R.A. or Bernadette Devlin say almost anything and it is immedately quoted. When British troops shot 13 demonstrators it was on our front pages, but day after day reports of civilians shot and bombed by the I.R.A. are buried in the back pages and fine print.

Let us, then, broaden the view of the Ulster conflict by exploring the other side of the issue (the Protestant position).

The northernmost area of Ireland has historically been Protestant. This was largely due to the Calvinist influence from nearby Scotland and the Anglican influence from England across the water. The larger, southern portion of the island is almost totally Roman Catholic due to missionaries like St. Augustine and St. Patrick who came from France and Italy to the south. In fact, Irish Catholics today are some of the most devout followers of the Pope to be found outside Italy.

Six Counties

Northern Ireland consists of six counties and is part of the United Kingdom (along with England, Scotland, and Wales). The term "Ulster" is technically incorrect. Prior to the Irish Rebellion it referred to the nine northern counties of Ireland. Separation of the land following the rebellion was the only possible solution to end years of bloodshed. The six northern counties, which had supported the British troops, remained within the United Kingdom. The south won its indenendence from British rule and became the Republic of Ireland (Eire in Gaelic).

The I.R.A. (Irish Republican Army) rebel force, which had fought the British tropps for political and religious autonomy, was disbanded by the new Dublin government. However, the most fanatical of the rebels continued to operate in secret to oust the Protestant-British regime in the north, despite their own government's policy of "burying the hatchet". It is the sons and grandsons of these men who today are blowing up buses, shops, and pubs in Belfast and Londonderry.

Today, Protestants in Northern Ireland make up two-thirds of the population. They are proud to be British subjects, having fought with the English, Scottish, and Welshmen in two world wars.

Ulstermen do not see themselves as "oppressed" by colonialism or imperialism. They have full Parliamentary representation, including M.P. Devlin. In fact, they are beneficiaries as members of the British "welfare state" (free medical care, welfare, etc.). The British Army is their army, not some "outside invaders". Rather, many Protestants see Eire as oppressed — by the Roman Catholic hierarchy. They see the Republic as conservative, backward, poor and agricultural due to the immense power of the Pope and his doctrines.

In an average small town in Eire the real power in the community is wielded not by the mayor, but by the village priest. Birth control and abortion are illegal. Books and films are censored by the church.

Terrorists

Protestants consider the I.R.A. fanatical terrorists and cowardly murderers who flee across the border to avoid justice. They see the idea of a united Ireland as ludicrous: much as the U.S. once viewed Joaquin Murietta's rebels and their attempt to unite California with Mexico.

There is prejudice in Northern Ireland against Catholics. There is also "de facto" segregation as an inevitable result of it.

Protestants in Ulster (right or wrong) feel justified in their fear and suspicion of Catholics for several reasons. They believe that practically every Catholic either has relatives in the IRA or contributes to it financially.

Recent events indicate this to be unfortunately largely true. Even moderate Catholics who abhor violence are forced by social, economic, religious and physical pressure to "play along". The two girls tarred and feathered publicly in a Catholic neighborhood (because they dated soldiers) shows this all too clearly. Non-violent Catholics would have to be brave indeed to oppose the I.R.A.'s reign of terror.

So, for example, a factory owner will claim that he doesn't hire Catholics lest his building be bombed, his safe robbed for funds, or his trucks stolen for IRA "raids".

With such prejudice prevailing, especially among the more avidly Protestant working classes, why then has the Catholic population increased so rapidly in Northern Ireland since the rebellion and separation? Ironically, despite such discrimination, Catholics continue to migrate north.

Ulster, with it's modern industries, economic ties with England, and liberal welfare policies enjoys a higher standard of living than most rural areas of the south with its largely agricultural economy. Often with no technical skills, and usually with many mouths to feed, the newly-arrived Catholics are "Free-loaders, living off welfare taxes" to many Protestants.

The IRA's terrorism, however, remains the primary cause of ill-feeling toward Catholics. We are all familiar by now with revolutionary tactics and morality (or lack of it). Che Guevera blew up bridges and government buildings. The Viet Cong bomb nightclubs full of Amer. an soldiers. American revolutionaries dynamite police stations and banks.

The IRA go beyond such strategic targets. Indiscriminate, random, seemingly pointless murder is their specialty. Pubs, buses, theatres, department stores and houses — all full of civilians — have been bombed without warning or without apparent reason. IRA snipers pick off pedestrians at will.

The IRS's atrocities go on day after day. You'll find the reports of them somewhere in the back pages of your newspaper. Everyone in Ulster (Protestant, Catholic, atheist, liberal, conservative, young or old) lives in constant danger of sudden death — every minute of every day. Most Ulstermen see this as no "revolution" or "war of liberation". They see random murder and terror by a group of religious and political fanatics. Many Protestants believe the IRA is trying to kill off the entire non-Catholic majority.

Tactics

If Protestants do begin to retaliate in organized groups, using IRA-type tactics, (as Irish and British leaders fear) the result could be genocide. This is why the army was brought in, at the request of Catholic leaders, to protect Catholic lives.

But IRA ambushes and sniping have killed so many of these young British men that the army has gone beyond their policing and peace-keeping duties to search houses and intern suspected IRA members. There is no hope whatever of any kind of settlement as long as the IRA persists in its campaign of murder, terror, and destruction without conscience.

* Sports Round-Up *

After a successful season opener, the City College baseball team has taken a nose dive. The Rams used every possible method to lose five straight games, blowing leads against San Jose City College and College of San Mateo, allowing ten walks vs. Chabot, being edged by Foothill College by one run, and blasted by Laney on four homers.

Lack of talent has not been Coach Ernie Domecus' problem. He has the ballplayers. Steve Pointer has pitched well, but his fielding support leaves him at crucial times Mike Howard is big and strong, but tends to be wild. Dave Weidinger has yet to repeat his season opening form, when he handcuffed Diablo Valley College. John Grazioli has arm trouble.

The hitting attack has not been strong. Randy Karp and new second baseman John Trent are solid at .476 and .357, respectively, and Craig Cohen and Tharlo Johnson swing clutch sticks, but the rest of the line-up might as well not be there. Dave Giorgi leads the other four starters with a flaccid .150 batting average.

The next home action is Saturday, April 8, vs. Foothill at Balboa Park, game time: 11 am and Tuesday, April 11 vs. CSM, starting at Balboa Park at 3 pm.

The Rams' track team has enjoyed little success, dropping its first three dual meets, to Diablo Valley College, 97-39, to San Jose City College, 90-48, and to Foothill by an undertermined score. Coach Vasquez's thinclads lack the depth to prevail in the duals, but do have several individual performers who should excell at the inter-conference relays.

Ron Ruffin looks good in the sprints and sparks the 440-relay team with Gary Adams, William Wilder and Willie Frances. Cirlo Morgan shows promise in the 880, and Bob Falo can throw a good discus. The mile relay team and the long jumpers are strong, but they're not enough to keep the Rams from losing the dual meets.

QUESTION:

Jim Masters - General Education

I think we're spending too much money on it. It's used to take the spotlight off more important things.

Joe Gregory - Radiology

I guess it's O.K. But the money should be spent on stopping wars and pollution.

Harold Albury - Mathematics

It's a good thing. The space industry helps the economy by creating high-paying jobs. If the space program was bigger there would be less unemployment among professional people.

Dave Piepmeier - Photography

I think it's good to explore the universe, to learn more about why we're here and what's going to happen. The more we know about the universe the more we know about ourselves.

John Clark - Mathematics

Yes. What else is there to study? We get a lot of new information from it. It will be worthwhile in the long run although there are no immediate financial benefits from it.

Rutha Lemons - General Education

It has advantages and disadvantages. It's good for learning more about our environment. But it takes a lot of tax money. It's a good idea to explore other planets because of the ways we've messed ours up.

Mark Mancall Raps About China

came. These changes affected the US relationship with China and hence China's relationship with the world.

Admission to the U. N. along with US lifting of travel and trade restrictions were small but important indications of this change.

New China

A new "international China" is emerging, Mancall noted. One that is different from the past hoards and from the nation that was exploited by the Western powers. This new China is demanding that it assume a role in world leadership.

Mancall continued by noting three important facts about the "New China".

—The new China is no longer hungry. They are at least well-fed. "This," Mancall stated, "is a victory for Communism."

—For the first time in 150 years China is effectively governed to the village level, with no distinction between the rulers and masses.

—Finally China is confident of its future. In the early 20th Century, the emerging China turned to the West for direction. Now it is convinced that it can go its own way. It is a militaristic state, but it stood up to Russia in the interpretation of Communism, built its own atomic arsenal and successfully challenged India in a border dispute. The atomic arsenal is the most important sign of confidence for it is a sumbol of interenational power.

Nixon's Visit

"A week that changed the world? I doubt it." smiled Mancall.

With this, Mancall carefully probed for the significance of President Nixon's journey to Peking.

According to Mancall, Nixon's visit to China was used by the Chinese to "broadcast," on an international basis their new image and international role.

His reception, one that significantly lacked crowds, was a statement to the world that China didn't really care about Nixon's presence. China would not gain from him, nor would it give any concessions to him. Nixon was merely a tourist.

Mancall termed Nixon's visit a week of non-negotiations.

His journey did create some international rumbles. "The important development," said Mancall involves Russia and Japan." The Russo-Japanese relationship involves trade. The Russians, needing technological help will supply the Japanese with the natural resources needed to keep their industrial economy going. The Japanese will in turn supply the Russians with new technology. The full materialization of this relationship could affect both China and the US; the US by increased trade competition, and China by a political power struggle on the Asian Political stage.

Dr. Mancall concluded by stating that if it could maintain its present rigid form of government for two more generations, China would be an extremely potent force in world affairs.

But the problem, as Chou-En-lai himself noted, lies in the Chinese communist Government: "Our leadership is extremely old," Chou is noted to have said, "Where will our leadership come from?"

SUPERVISED PLAY — Responsible adults look on as children amuse themselves at the City College Child Care Center

Child Care Center Plans Expansion

With three semesters of experience behind them, the City College Child Care Center is making bold plans for a possible summer session and an expanded program for Fall '72.

The Child Care Center, located in Bungalow seven, is funded by the Associated Students and provides free care services for the children of daytime students.

In one of their recent weekly meetings, the Child Care Steering Committee, made up of faculty, administrators, parents and students, reviewed eligibility for children and released a time schedule for summer and fall enrollment.

The Child Care Center was established almost two years ago to provide child care services for the children of students attending CCSF.

Its main objectives, as outlined by the committee, are to provide a safe and enriched environment for children, provide care services to the maximum amount of students and, finally, to provide an educational experience for students and parents interested in learning a variety of positive ways to interact with children.

The only requirements for a child's admittance to the program are that a parent be a student at City College, the child be toilet trained and between the ages of two and five years nine months.

The time table for summer and fall enrollment in the Child Care program is as follows:

May 15 - Applications available at Center. (B7)

May 30 - Deadline for returning applications.

June 9 - Registration packets available at Center between 9-3 p.m.

June 14 - Applicants who have been accepted but who have not picked up packets will have them mailed.

Due to program limitations, children May be at the Center a maximum of four hours per day. Parents classes should be scheduled in four hour blocks. (8-12 am and 1-5 pm).

INSTRUCTION — is also part of the center's attraction.

BOOK DRIVE

City College Contributes to Jail

CCSF is one of the operating bases for a specific plan in a multi-phasic program to upgrade the level of San Francisco county jails.

In appeals through the media and in personal appearances, Sheriff Richard Hongisto initiated a large-scale book drive two months ago for the inmates at San Francisco and San Bruno jails. City College is participating in the drive as the major outlet for literary contributions from students on campus.

Steve Robertson, a member of Hongisto's volunteer workers and acting liaison between the Sheriff's program and City College, berated campus participation and active interest to date. "To be up front, I was very disappointed with the response. Only about four boxes have been collected so far."

As a result of Hongisto's personal rallying, the general public has responded with well over five thousand donations, brought directly to Robertson or the Sheriff's headquarters.

The two campus donation points are the library, and the Experimental College, but Robertson urges anyone with a large amount of books - CCSF student or not - to call him at 387-8803 and arrange to have the books picked up. Every kind of book in good condition is acceptable, from paperbacks to current textbooks.

The concept of an inmates book drive originated during Hongisto's tour of the county jails soon after his election. The inmates inadequate library proved to be a refuse dump for people's unwanted literature, with an abundance of outdated books of little interest, in various stages of dilapidation.

Robertson summarizes Hongisto's purpose in initiating the collection program, as a definite step forward in the movement to humanize S.F. county's jails. "The idea is to generally upgrade the emotional level at the jail, so the inmates don't sit in a cubicle twenty-four hours a day going batty . . . the greatest need in any prison is something constructive to do."

Part of the operation plans include developing a small book outlet on each tier of the jail, and possibly converting a prison classroom into a major library. Most donations will go to the San Bruno jail, where inmates have already been tried and are serving sentences.

Robertson's job is to collect the City College contributions, process them against contraband and put the Sheriff's official stamp on each while wading through "many pressures and bureaucracies".

City College is currently the only collection base, but expansion to other campuses is a plan for the future.

Gays Urge Homosexual Learning

The Free Gay Student Association of City College is having Gay Rap sessions this semester in B221 on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 11 a.m. to 12 p.m. and in S-257 on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays.

The Gay Students welcome all students to come and talk with the gays about anything. The association particularly urges straight students to come and learn the truth about homosexuality and get rid of the salsities pertaining to "the gay life".

Radiology Club Sponsors Spring Boat Dance

The Radiology Club at City College exists to help radiology students meet their professional goals. The group holds tutoring sessions and obtains literature on radiology for students, besides keeping students informed of job opportunities, lectures, and demonstrations of interest.

Some 200 students are enrolled in the Department of Radiologic Technology. To become full-fledged Radiological Technicians they must complete the two-year curriculum followed by eight months of internship and a state examination to obtain their license. Prerequisites for the program include Chemistry, Physics, Algebra and Geometry.

Potential "X-Ray Techs" must also have letters of recommendation and be interviewed by the Department Chairman, William Hoskins, prior to acceptance. April 15 is the registration deadline for the Fall '72 semester.

"It's a very interesting field. You get to know the other students well — everyone is serious about what they're studying. Almost everyone who graduates goes on to get their license," stated Ron Fitzgerald, Radiology Club President.

There are two types of technicians, Diagnostic and Therapeutic. For those considering Radiology as a career, Fitzgerald advised, "There are plenty of techs in the Bay area, but a great demand exists in other areas. If you enter the field you should plan on relocating eventually."

The club plans to rent boat for a fund-raising dance out in the Bay, sometime in May. This will be open to all students. Those wishing more information about the club, its activities, or the field in general can call Vice President David Blair at 282-8290.

Blair commented, "Our club provides an outlet for student's opinions on the program. We and the Advisory Committee recommend any changes needed. It also helps us all get together."

Graduation Nixed

something, some a day a week. It varies."

Kirk said there is no record of general ages of graduates but added he may propose that birthdates be on petitions for graduation if it seems valuable for future reference.

Kirk had some particularly interesting words of his own for those graduates interested in some degree of success in the business world. "Read the business section of the newspapers and find out what's available. People have to be informed to where the thrust is. The job market is changing rapidly and it could also be moving towards vocations such as health fields."

According to the registrar's office, an estimated 1,055 students are expected to graduate, this Spring.

FRENCH WINNER — Rosemarie Pressler reflects on her recent honor.

Bronze Medal Won by French Student Takes Second Place in Essay Contest

A long-time interest in ancient ruins has brought a bronze medal and national recognition to City College student Rosemarie Pressler.

Pressler, who plans to major in French at San Francisco State College next Fall, finished in second place in the Alliance Francaise, a contest sponsored by the French government.

Participants, coming from major cities throughout the world, were required to write a 500 word essay on the aspect of French culture that they enjoyed the most. Presseler's essay was entitled "The Stones of France" and was an analysis of French Architecture from ancient times to the present.

"My family," stated Pressler, "enjoyed studying ruins and I had a great opportunity to explore French ruins during the eight years we spent in France. I've studied ruins in Central America as well."

At present, Pressler is enrolled in Dr. Doris Hernied's French 41 class, which Pressler said gave her a great deal of background information on French culture.

Voter Registration Deadline Nears

Time is running out for those who want to vote in the upcoming primaries but haven't registered yet.

The deadline for votes registration for the June 6 primary is April 13.

The registration proceedure is simple. Name, address and birth date are the only questions asked. Eligibility to vote includes 90 days residency in state and county and 54 days in precinct. Recent laws enable the young voter to register and vote at his own address.

According to FRONTLASH, a nationwide organization dedicated to registering people to vote, only about 45% of the eligible new voters (18-24) have registered.

These figures are notable because the youth vote is expected to be the big factor in the upcoming election. There are approximately 2.4 million possible first time voters in California, more than enough to change the outcome of any election. But if the present trend of non-involvement should continue, that so-called youth vote would go up in smoke.

There is a sign on the front door of one campaign headquarters: "Make the Democratic System Work. Register to Vote".

If you give a damn, do.

Award Presented to Hero for Saving Life of Small Child

On March 23 Atiliai Malepeai, a Criminology student at City College was cited for heroism by the American Red Cross

The award, presented by Dr. Harry Buttimer, Assistent Superintendant of City College, and R. D. (Lefty) Sproull of the Red Cross, was given for his quick, lifesaving actions on October 6, 1971 when he gave mouth-to-mouth resuscitation to a choking, 18-month-old child.

"I was walking down Ocean avenue," said Malepeai, "when I saw a man with a baby. The mother was calling for help which led me to believe that the man was trying to kill the baby."

Malepeai went to investigate the disturbance and found out that the baby's grandmother tried to give the child an aspirin tablet that lodged in the infant's throat, causing the baby to choke.

Because of Malepeai's quick action the baby was once again crying its head off when the fire department arrived to take it to San Francisco General Hospital. Doctors there stated that the baby would have died had it not been for the action on the part of Malepeai.

The reason for the time lag between the event and the presentation of the award was that all the particulars of the event were thoroughly investigated by the Red Cross.

The investigation revealed that in 1968, in his native Samoa, Malepeai saved a 60-year-old, drowning fisherman by mouth-to-mouth resuscitation as well.

Malepeai came to the United States in 1970 and has been a student at City College for the last three semesters.

Allan Temko Speaks at CCSF About Environment of Cities

The cities of Detroit, New Orleans, Miami, and many others like them throughout the world are examples of man's defiance of nature. Their physical form has gone beyond their limited scale of operation. They have become ungovernable. They have become filthy. They have become devouring organisms. They are ungovernable.

This idea is one of Allan Temko's, noted enviornmental scholar and teacher and a recent guest lecturer at City College.

Temko began his College Hour presentation by noting that the cities are already all too human. "The cities," he said, "show clear signs of peoples stupidity, foolishness, lack of perserverence and lack of courage."

Temko went on to say that, as with many things, the core of the problem lies in politics: "There is no humanness, no concern for the environment." He termed this needed new concern "environmental politics".

Oddly enough, it is the ancient master Aristotle, who according to Temko, provides the best introduction to man's present environmental problems.

Aristotle noted that men formed cities in search of the "good life". In an urban culture many more things were accessible to the individual than in the once familiar and simple rural life style.

But when man formed cities, Temko continued, the role of nature as a supreme designer was lost. Man now took charge and soon, the scientific concept of form in relation to role was lost. As a result, sprawling cities were created and they became unlivable.

Today a new awareness of life has developed in man and now the environment must not only be livable in body but also in soul. "In a sense, we must spiritualize our surroundings."

To rebuild our cities and make them once again human, Temko stressed the need for coherent government.

From nation, to state, to city, to the very neighborhood level, urban man must define his real needs and set in motion the machinery of concerned enviromental politics. "This task can only be left to the young; They will rebuild our cities."

The Warmth of Spring Awakens the Inner Soul of City College

BALD EAGLE — our national bird, is an endangered species.

$500 Reward for Exposed Eagle Killer

A $500 reward for information leading to the conviction of a person for shooting a bald eagle has been awarded by the National Wildlife Federation.

The reward was the first given under a nationwide bounty program started by the NWF in 1971.

Authorities asked that the names of those involved in the case be withheld as it could possibly endanger the safety of the informant.

"We abhor the atmosphere in which this type of information cannot be given public credit. Both the man who exposed the shooting of this magnificent bird and the shooter should be clearly recognized," said Thoms Kimball, executive director of the NWF.

Although it has been against federal law to shoot bald eagles since 1940, the National Wildlife Federation's reward program was started in 1971 as a result of the mass slaughter of eagles in Wyoming last year.

The outlook for the national bald eagle population is considered bleak. The continued use of hard pesticides and diminishing habitat continue to take their toll. The species of the bald eagle that is found in the eastern part of the U. S. is already classified as an endangered species by the U.S. Department of the Interior.

The NWF continues to offer a $500 reward which may be requested by writing to the National Wildlife Federation, 1412 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, upon verification that the claimant's information was substantial assistance in obtaining a conviction for shooting a bald eagle. The request must be made within six months of the conviction. If more than one bald eagle was shot by the convicted person, $500 will be awarded for the total number shot.

Sports for Profit, Not Fun

The major league baseball strike is delaying the opening of the season but the real story lies in the myth that it is destroying.

For some time, professional baseball, like all other professional sports, has been seen as a pastime, a game played for pleasure rather than financial gain.

When the baseball strike came about, sports fans of all ages became incensed at the destruction of their little dreamworld. The boyhood idols that they had worshipped since childhood simply became workers looking for a raise in their pension while the owners simply became hard-headed businessmen worrying about losing money.

At this time, we have no idea about the outcome of the strike or about what effect it will have on baseball and other professional sports. But we do feel that it is time to say a few words about professional sports in America.

It should be obvious to anyone who is not hopelessly naive that professional sports are businesses that enjoy privileges no other business enjoys. For example, what business can build an office or factory at public expense with the understanding that it can abondon that city whenever it wants to go on to greener pastures.

If we look at professional sports in this light we can see that the players are not the greedy beasts that the owners and many sport fans have pictured them. The players are simply working men worrying about their future.

Perhaps it is time that we look at professional sports as a business and not a pleasant pastime run and played by men who couldn't care less about financial gain.

Shall We Jape or Swive?

Thanks to The New Yorker and Charles McCabe of The San Francisco Chronicle for reviving two pre-Reformation verbs — to jape, and to swive. English teachers should now be alerted that these two words may appear in their next set of term papers.

For unsuspecting folks, jape and swive are explicit synonyms for sexual intercourse. They were popular in England when it was a very Catholic country. However, good old Henry VIII came along and rejected the Papacy and thus jape and swive. The Puritans made quite sure they vanished from the English language completely.

Charles McCabe draws the conclusions that as brainwashers, the Puritans were right up there with the Jesuits and Josef Goebbels. The job they did on poor old sex was beautiful. Never has the apparatus of propaganda been more effectively leveled at a more harmless target.

Sex, qua sex, is about as harmful as breathing. But who among us is to say that there might not arise a new Martin Luther or John Calvin, who will found a faith on the proposition that breathing is INDEED harmful, and that the most obscene sound in the world is a snort? The population explosionists have, indeed, come close to this sort of reasoning.

Meantime, thanks for the blessings of verbal obsolescence. The next time you meet a truly attractive number, you know perfectly well that you can say to her, without the slightest fear of a slap in the face: "Shall we swive?"

Dear Sir:

As an Evening Division student, I don't expect all the benefits and services that a full-time day student might receive at City. However, when something is offered for my use, I take advantage of it.

The beautiful Student Union finished just a year ago is open to all students, and is available as a peaceful, comfortable study atmosphere. Last year I found the Union useful and enjoyable in the early evening hours before classes at 7:00 p.m.

On March 23, for the first time this semester, I came to the Union to review for an exam and found an appalling situation. The furniture was moved around, mostly into one corner. In that corner was a group of young people (some about 13 years old, obviously not City College students) playing cards, listening and singing to a very loud radio, calling to their friends across the room, eating, and smoking pot. The entire room was strewn with debris—leftover lunches, empty paper cups, candy papers, etc. There was even a dried-out cafeteria tray, dishes and all, on the floor under one chair. It was nearly impossible to study under these conditions.

When the Union first opened, there were strict rules about eating, radios, loud talking, etc. in the upstairs lounge. Aren't these rules still in effect? Doesn't anyone ever clean the lounge? It seems to me the students should take pride in such a beautiful building and not treat it like a garbage dump.

Concerned,
Donna Ahlstrand

Veterans

Here Are Q's and A's and Job Opportunities

Q—I am a veteran with an ordinary life National Service Life Insurance policy. May I surrender it for paid-up insurance and still draw dividends?

A—Yes, but your dividends will be smaller.

Q—I am 100 percent disabled from service-connected injuries, and wonder if the Veterans Administration will treat me for a disability I suffered after leaving the service.

A—Yes, Veterans permanently and totally disabled from service-connected causes can be treated at VA outpatient clinics for nonservice-connected disabilities. You should apply for treatment at the nearest VA office.

Q—Several years ago I elected to receive benefits under the new pension law when I exceeded the $1,600 annual income limitation, resulting in termination of benefits under the old pension law. Now that income limitations under the old law have been increased, can I go back to drawing pension under the old law?

A—No. Once a pensioner has chosen benefits under the new law, he cannot go back to the old law.

The Veterans Administration announced newly adopted guidelines which give Viet Nam veterans "absolute preference" for training slots in most programs funded by the Department of Labor.

The new guidelines' aim is to increase veteran participation in programs authorized by the Manpower Development and Training Act (MDTA) and by the Economic Opportunity Act (EOA).

To ease entry of veterans into the different components of MDTA programs, the Labor Department has waived some of the personal and income requirements for veteran enrollment.

For the EOA programs, however, veterans must meet the low-income family requirements. They will then be first in line for such programs as the Concentrated Employment Program, Operation Mainstream, public service careers and the Job Corps.

Nationally, about 74,000 veterans were recruited into these programs from July 1971 through January 1972.

The February drop in veterans' unemployment was attributed to the close cooperation between federal and state government, local agencies, business groups and the National Jobs for Veterans Committee. These same groups will be cooperating in carrying out the Labor Department changes in MDTA and EOA.

State employment agencies will be advised of existing training slots. They will then be given 48 hours to refer a veteran to the vacancies. If veterans are not available, the jobs will be filled with others.

Sports Round-Up

Baseball, Track and Swimming

The City College baseball team has problems, but pitching is not one of them. Neither is hitting. Consistency is the Rams' problem, as they decimated Merritt College, 8-0, but lost to Diablo Valley College, 3-2.

Steve Pointer, the southpaw transfer from Skyline College, pitched great ball. He completed both games, struck out 24 and allowed only one earned run. He even drove in one of the runs against DVC. Yet, shoddy defense cost him the victory.

Pointer has had a frustrating season, posting a fine 1.00 earned run average, but winning only one of four games.

The culprits against DVC were Dave Giorgi and Craig Cohen, whose sixth-inning errors led to the deciding runs. Ironically, these two had led the attack against Merritt, Cohen cracking five hits and Giorgi belting the Rams' first homer of the year.

The Rams' lineup now boasts five .300 hitters. Cohen leads at .370 (he also is the top RBI man), followed by Tharlo Johnson at .354, and Randy Karp, John Trent and Rich Zerga. Giorgi has raised his average 132 points and slammed two homers in the last two games.

Despite these positive factors, the Rams' season record is only 2-6. Poor fielding is one cause. Lack of consistency is another. But the rest are intangible.

The Rams' next home action will be Tuesday, April 18, vs. Laney College. Game time is 3 p.m. at Balboa Park.

One of the nicest things about track and field is that you may lose the meet, but you can't lose everything. This has been Coach Lou Vasquez's solace as his trackmen plod through a winless year.

On March 23, the Rams chocked up their highest point total of the year in a loss to Chabot College. Ron Ruffin and William Wilder finished a customary one-two in the 100-yd. dash, and Fielder and Daigle did the same in the 220. Fields became the first Ram to win the 440 Intermediate Hurdles, and the 440-Relay team kept rolling along.

At the DVC Easter Relays, April 1, there were further bright spots. Wilder, Ruffin, Gary Francis and Cirlo Morgan teamed to take the sprint medley, while the famous 440-Relay team, with Melvin Washington and Willie Daigle joining Ruffin and Wilder, won with 41.7, the best time by the Rams this year.

Come watch the Ram trackmen on Friday, April 14, as they take on the College of San Mateo at 2 p.m. on the football field.

For a man who should be dead, Dennis Glass swims very well.

Dennis sustained a near-fatal spinal injury during the summer, but survived to become the backbone of the CCSF swim team. Glass broke his seventh vertebrae while body-surfing, and spent most of last semester in a back brace. Doctors were doubtful that he could swim competitively again, but he has proven this semester that he can.

Dennis swam for the Rams last year, and, in the peak of health, earned six school records. This year, he has already qualified for the State Meets in Pasedena in two events.

Caesar, Cleopatra and The Godfather Are Visiting San Francisco

George Bernard Shaw's satirical play, Caesar And Cleopatra, presented at the Geary theatre, is a refreshing but only moderately amusing look at Rome's great ruler and Egypt's most lovely monarch.

This battle between the sexes brings us the mighty Caesar, splendidly played by William Paterson, and the vivacious Cleopatra, brilliantly played by the talented Deborah Sussel, for what is to make a relationship of charm and mysterious romance.

But the play lacks believability and fails to maintain what might have been a very funny production.

Cleopatra is introduced as a puerile and quite innocent girl of vigor and ambition. Caesar is shown as a forceful, sophisticated man, growing old gracefully as he realizes his glorious career will soon be coming to an end.

We are shown how life between the Romans and Egyptians is as a serious matter but made into a madcap adventure.

Director William Ball has projected many comic portrayals in his actors but the cause for laughter grows slow and uneven, and the rythym of the show loses interest throughout.

The staging, however, is imaginative and delightful and supporting actors contribute fine performances, such as Paul Shenar, Howard Sherman, and Scott Thomas. Particularly, Marc Singer as the mistress to the queen, the homely, virile Ftatateeta, is to be commended for his witty acting job.

There are only two performances of Caesar and Cleopatra left, on April 17 and May 6.

The long awaited film of "The Godfather" opened its doors despite dissension from certain protest groups.

Many find the film degrading to the Italian people while some dislike the amount of violence. Others merely do not relish the idea of the Mafia and its defamation of the Italian name and character. However, the show must go on.

The film focuses on an Italian family in the New York-New Jersey area who control gambling and prostitution. The head, Don Vito Corleone, played by Marlon Brando, is the "Godfather" later to be succeeded by his youngest son, Michael.

Marlon Brando's portrayal of Vito Corleone is one to be applauded. He gives a convincing performance as the stalwart of the Corleone family. His raspy voice at the opening seems a bit rough but later adds to his role when he becomes ill. Playing in the garden with his grandson he falls over and dies leaving his title to one of his two remaining sons.

Al Pacino, who plays the youngest son and eventual Don, is also well cast and will soon be seen in "The Son of Godfather". His cogent portrayal of the only capable son for the role of Don couldn't have been better. He evokes a type of charisma which holds the attention of his viewers throughout the movie.

The plot is certainly simple. One which may be taken merely as a Mafia gang fighting, killing and conspiring against one another. The important element is the interweaving of characters. The personalities are very believable, not always exhibiting revenge and hate, but compassion and loyalty as well. They're not exemplified imperceptibly as ruthless killers as many may expect. But rather all facets of their lives are shown, including their tightly-knit family.

In comparing the movie to the book one's natural reaction is that the director left out a lot if important parts. This is only to be expected und given the allotted amount of time, Francis Coppola handles the film very well. Most of the necessary situations were included with the typecasting amazingly close. The way in which Coppola deals with the violence is superb. His realistic approach is somewhat startling to the more squeamish members of the audience.

Commercial Term Papers Can Hurt

The leaflets that were to be found on almost all cars on the campus advertising term papers for sale may have sounded tempting, but there are certain dangers that go along with them.

Two University of Michigan students are facing expulsion for using a commercial term paper writing service.

The service sold both students identical papers, who, unknowingly, turned them in to the same English professor.

The company told each student that he received an original term paper which would be the only one at the university.

In addition, two Harvard students were found to have used this service. One was expelled and the other suspended for one year.

Sanford Dean, Psychology Department chairman of the University of Michigan stated that if students can buy term papers, "Why don't we sell them course credits or degrees?"

QUESTION: What is Your Reaction to Cosmopolitan's Nude Centerfold of Burt Reynolds?

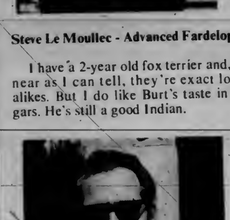
Desiree Keate — Sociology



I didn't think it was very exciting at all. If I had wanted to see a gorilla, I would have gone to the zoo!

Gunther Reinhardt - Chemistry

From a chick's point of view it's great. It makes things more equal now, since Playboy's been doing it to chicks for years.

Steve Le Moullec - Advanced Fardelopy

I have a 2-year old fox terrier and, as near as I can tell, they're exact look alikes. But I do like Burt's taste in cigars. He's still a good Indian.

Fred Hirschfelder - Journalism

Fantastic! This should help get women out of the "sex object" spotlight and put the men into it. I'd like to see more of it.

Diane Merlino - Theology

The "Reynolds reveal" is a pretty fair response to the well established centerfold in the other mag, which is a fair response to an established attitude concerning ethics. Burt Reynolds in the nude is funny in his complete uselessness.

Pianist Grooves With Beethoven Leonne Lewis Wows Music Buffs

She appeared shy and somewhat awkward as she walked on stage and seated herself at the piano in the Little Theatre here at City College.

There were a few moments of silence as she readied herself at the keyboard. But then when Leonne Lewis played, the entire auditorium was filled with the dynamic contrasts of Beethoven and the passionate intensity of Schumann.

Leonne Lewis was the guest of the City College Music Concert Series and performed Beethoven's Sonata No. 26 in E flat Major and Schumann's Etudes, Opus 13. She played with near perfection and ended her concert to the loud applause and bravoes of the large College Hour audience.

Leonne Lewis is a local prodigy who has an impressive record both as pianist and performer.

At the age of ten, she appeared as soloist with the San Francisco Symphone Orchestra in seven Youth Concerts.

At 13 she performed with Arthur Fiedler and the San Francisco Pops Orchestra.

She has been performer and audition winner several times with the Junior Bach Festival at Berkeley and has given numerous solo recitals in music centers and colleges.

She is presently a music major at the University of Southern California School of Performing Arts studying piano with Bernardo Segall.

New Doctor at Campus Health Center

Ronald Caldwell, M.D., will be available on campus at the Student Health Center until June 16, 1972 to provide limited medical care to students.

Dr. Caldwell is a graduate of Tulane Medical School and has recently completed his residency at Mount Zion Medical Center.

Intake procedures at Student Health (S-190) will remain the same. Any student requesting medical care will first be interviewed and screened by a nurse, and then, if necessary, given an appointment with Dr. Caldwell. Emergencies will be treated as usual. No student will have to wait more than two days for an appointment.

Seven Come Eleven, Dice Roll in Statler Wing

Gambling, that tempting little game of chance for those who've the money to play, has laid its stakes at CCSF.

According to Chief of police Nelson Lum "students of all types plus outsiders participate but the situation doesn't justify the cause."

The stakes vary from nothing to pennies to dollars and although it's not organized gambling it does seem to be difficult to get rid of.

Lum said there are no raids because "when we get a report of four or five gamblers at Statler Wing and start sending in police it may cause a riot."

"It's not a casino," Lum said. "The Penal Code prohibits gambling in the state of California and yet this has been going on here as long as I've been Chief."

"Most students who walk into Statler Wing can't help but become aware of what's going on," said Lum.

Lum felt no steps would be taken against gambling "in the immediate future" unless, he said, "the administration decides to take action."

Asked if there's any indication of these activities in other colleges, Lum said "yes, I know of a few through conferences with student law enforcement groups where there are similar situations."

Lum is quick to add that he doesn't want to encourage gambling "in any way". But he said if the students want to do it they just go ahead.

"My personal feeling," Lum said, "is that if a person really wants to gamble there is always Las Vegas. On campus is a big risk because the policy here may be changed at any given time. It may be decided to enforce the penal code. It's just not worth it."

Whats Happening on Campus?

Bungalow 1, on the east side of the campus houses the Chinese Culture Club. Among their activities are films from the People's Republic of China, with subtitles for students who don't speak Chinese, which are shown every two weeks and discussion groups every month.

The main purpose of the club is to align Chinese students, to promote the Chinese culture, and to inform them about and help them understand the Chinese community.

The doors are open daily from 11 am to 1 pm for students who wish to go in and browse around.

The 14th Annual Retail Floristry Open House is scheduled for Thursday April 13, from 1 to 2 pm.

This year's theme is Styles of Flower Arrangement.

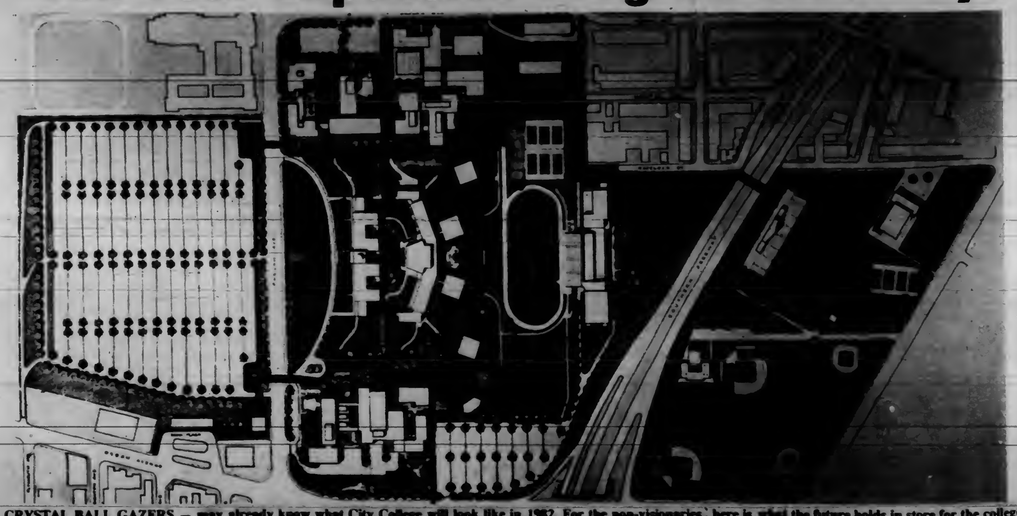
Students will set up floral displays exemplifying the old Flemish, French and Victorian styles, as well as the Contemporary American style of today.

A 7 pm dinner will be prepared and served by the Hotel and Restaurant Department to highlight the Open House.

Speaker Says New Palestine is the Key

The key to peace in the Arab-Israel world is the formation of a new Palestine.

Dr. Ibrahim Tawasha, former member of the United Nations diplomatic mission, presented this idea at a Wednesday meeting of the International Relations class of Virginia MaClam.



Dr. Tawasha began his presentation by outlining the key points that have divided the political and philosophical ideals of both Arabs and Jews in their struggle of land and home.

After carefully presenting and examining each point of conflict, Tawasha went one step further in stating that we must accept the situation and create with what is.

Dr. Tawasha saw the solution in the rebirth of Palestine, with Jews accepting an Arab minority and Arabs accepting a Jewish majority. Her termed the new nation a marriage of necessity and opportunity. He noted that Palestine is already geographically united but economically and politically far apart.

Unification, he admitted, will be extremely difficult but stated that the present situation offered the best chance of a just and honorable peace and possibly the last.

Ten Year Expansion Program Underway

CRYSTAL BALL GAZERS — may already know what City College will look like in 1982. For the non-visionaries, here is what the future holds in store for the college.

Dentistry Department: No Holes in Quality Lab

The Department of Dental Technicians is holding its 14th annual graduation dinner in Statler Wing, May 11, at 6:30 p.m.

Invitations have been extended to dental laboratory owners in San Francisco, in appreciation for their assistance in the work-studies program and City College dental alumni. Dr. Johnson, Dean at the University of the Pacific, will be the guest speaker.

This will be the first graduating class to receive an associated science degree from the two year program.

Catering will be done by the City College food service department.

Some of the most cooperative people at City College are in the little known dental department. After interviewing Frank Szhner, the department head, Dr. Curtiss Klein, a practicing dentist and part-time instructor, and Barbara Steward, Szhner's secretary, the following account was made of the dental department.

The remainder of Szhner's staff include William A. Valiente, full time instructor and Jacquelin Pessan and Thomas Davidson, the two student laboratory assistants who, besides working through City College, are also in the work study program funded by the federal government.

Szhner started the dental program here in 1959 in an effort to help supply industry with young well qualified laboratory technicians to keep pace with the ever expanding population explosion.

Dental laboratory technology is divided into five basic areas at CCSF: complete dentures, partial dentures with gold alloy, chromium cobalt alloy or wrought gold wire frameworks, crown and fixed-bridge fabrication, porcelain jacket crowns, porcelain-to-gold and acrylic restorations, and orthodontic appliances. In the near future cavity-filling may also become part of the assistant technician's field.

Anyone interested in going into dental technology should be aware that of 120 to 130 applicants each semester, only 25 are accepted. These statistics only reflect the high quality of instruction available at CCSF. Remember, it is no disgrace not to be accepted on the first try and any individual may retake the test as often as he desires.

Testing for the February 1973 applicants will be in May, 1972.

Hillel Proposes Jewish Studies

The City College Hillel club, a campus group of 50 Jewish students and faculty, is currently soliciting support from the Community College District for a transfer-credit Jewish Studies course.

It is proposed that the course would be taught next semester by Dr. Roger Herst, instructor in Jewish history at San Francisco State College and director of the main San Francisco branch of the Hillel club.

Rabbi Herst stated that the purpose of Hillel is "not to dictate a formal Jewish life, nor is it to have the traditional tightly knit membership organization that offers services and activities to a rather restricted group of people within a club structure."

"Rather," he continued, "Hillel attempts to activate and encourage Jewish students and faculty to keep in touch with Jewish life and to promote knowledge and appreciation of Judaism."

MARIA ALESSI - Singing one of Puccini's works.

Met Opera Star Delights Audience

Maria Leone Alessi, a soprano, captivated the audience in the Little Theatre with selected strains from popular arias.

Diva Alessi was once a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In an abridged program Alessi offered an English and Spanish medley of works from the composers Handel, Cilia, Puccini, and Granados.

A scanty but delighted audience responded with markedly enthusiastic applause to the mellow voice that had gained first prize in the latest Metropolitan Auditions of the Air.

As the applause persisted, Alessi presented her only prepared encore - an Italian love song which moved the opera fans to beg for more.

Unfortunately, Alessi was compelled to hasten to another public concert and graciously declined.

Latino Woman Files for Position On College Board of Governors

In a Hampshire street garage hung with pinatas, the pulsebeat of a first for San Francisco politics is picking up speed. The converted basement comprises the campaign headquarters for Mrs. Elba Montes Tuttle, a 23 year resident of the City's Mission District and the first woman of Latin American ancestry to run for public office in San Francisco.

Elba Montes Tuttle

Mrs. Tuttle is part of the race to secure one of the seven seats on the Community College Board of Governors. Under recent legislation, this directive board will supervise operations at CCSF and at all adult education programs in San Francisco.

Mrs. Tuttle has raised over $2,200 in campaign funds ("I'm calling the bluff that without money you can't win an election") through small contributions and benefit picnics and dances.

The Puerto Rican born candidate's major concerns are the expansion of academic and vocational extensions (school-plants) to all neighborhoods of San Francisco, and an increase of qualified, full time minority staff on campus to reach a proportionate student-administration balance.

At the present time there are 23 full time minority teachers on campus out of a faculty of about 500, while 51 % of the student body have minority backgrounds.

Mrs Tuttle was chosen to represent the San Francisco Latino Community for the Board of Governors race, in a type of primary election held within the Latino Community itself. She has served as the first vice-president of the Mission Coalition Organization and is

14th Floral Design Show Here Displays Beauty and Quality

The ages and cultures of man, from 16th Century France to China to contemporary America were revealed through the beauty of flowers in the 14th Annual Retail Florestry Show here at City College.

"This year the students outdid themselves. It was a very big success," said Miss Carol Motozaki Retail Florestry Department Chairman.

DISPLAYS

In all, a total of 12 displays, centered around a theme entitled Styles of Arrangements, were designed and presented by advanced florestry students and viewed by representatives from all facets of the floral industry.

The April 14th Show was completely organized, from choice of theme to cleanup procedures, by Florestry Department students.

Miss Motozaki pointed out that the displays are designed and constructed in class and give students the learning experience of working under pressure.

This year's floral show, held from 1 to 7 p.m., was viewed by some 500 interested growers, retailers and wholesalers from the floral industry.

Five members from the industry judged the displays and based their presentation of awards on originality, design, sales appeal, artistry and quality.

Miss Yumiko Torii, received a first place award for her display highlighting the Flemish 16th and 17th century. Don Sullivant received second place for his display of Victorian 18th Century and Grace Komake ceceived a third place for her French 16th and 17th Century display.

The Floral Show was concluded by dinner prepared and served by Hotel and restaurant students.

Eric Moeller, CCSF Professor, Dies

Eric Moeller, a Professor Emeritus in German at City College for 33 years, passed away on Thursday morning, March 16.

Moeller came to the United States from his native Germany in the late 20's. After receiving his Masters in Classics and his Doctorate in German at the University of California at Berkeley, Moeller began teaching at City College in 1936. In 1969 Moeller retired and occasionally substituted at CCSF afterward. In fact, Moeller was teaching the day before his unexpected demise.

Moeller's outside interests include a collection of classical music tapes and a summer home in Mendocino County which he built himself.

Always an active, outgoing type, Moeller loved hiking and swimming and was a member in good standing with the Sierra Club.

Moeller is survived by his widow, Nora, a son, Dirk, two daughters, Sigrid and Carol, and two grandchildren.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

VIEW FROM THE TOP — City College students hit high point as they view San Francisco's fabulous Bay.

Prop. 9 - Yes or No?

The power of the American voter has whown itself once again in the form of the Clean Environment Act, better known as Proposition 9.

Whether or not it becomes law will be decided by the California Primary Ballot on June 6, when voters will pull the lever for yes or no.

On what facts the voter will base his choice depends on where he gets his information. One thing is certain, he cannot make a valid decision by hearing only one side of the argument, be it for or against.

Without a doubt, Proposition 9 has its weak and strong points. For that reason we shall try to summarize the arguments for and against the proposition.

The Clean Environment Act consists of 23 sections, seven of which cover air pollution, three on water pollution, five treat the area of "Conflict of Interest", seven others describe the citizens rights in relation to the Act and three are to protect the Act against possible overruling legislation by the state legislature.

To be more precise, the clean air section would phase out all leaded gasolines by July, 1976.

The opposition to the Act states that at present, refineries are "simply not designed for that kind of gasoline."

We suggest that with the present technology, refineries could easily adapt to the specified requirements stated in the Act.

Another part of the clean air section goes after the polluting industries. The Act would set up controls for minimizing and checking the amounts of air pollutants emitted into the atmosphere. Violators of the act would be fined 4 % of their annual income. After the violation is corrected, 75 % of the fine would be refunded.

Those who oppose the Act feel that different violators would be fined differently depending on income status. The criteria should be the degree of pollution.

We think that the degree of pollution does not warrant differentation. All pollutors, big or small, should be fined on the same scale.

As part of the clean water section, the Act calls for an end to all on-shore oil drilling and limiting the off-shore drilling to no closer than one mile from the shore.

Opponents put a price tag of $17.7 million on our coast line. That is the revenue received by the state for drilling rights.

We feel that the value of our coast line is worth considerably more than $17.7 million.

Another section of the act would tighten control over pesticides such as DDT and DDD.

The people against the act claim that 70 % of these pesticides are exported.

All we can ask is, how many gallons are 30 % of all the pesticides produced in U.S.?

We can safely say that the Clean Environment Act covers the air and water thoroughly, with fines and punishments for violations somewhat severe at times, but it has forgotten noise pollution altogether.

It may come as a surprise that not all the opposition to the act comes from big business. One source on the City College campus is a group called Students against the Pollution Initiative.

One critic of the Act stated that, perhaps, the Act was trying to do too much all at once and that it should be broken up into two or three separate acts.

Whatever may be wrong with the Clean Environment Act, it is a step in the right direction. A step forward, no matter how small, is a step to cleaning up our environment.

The Academy Awards: A Way To Ease Guilty Consciences

The brightest note about the Academy Awards was the Oscar won by Jane Fonda for her performance in Klute. By judging Fonda on professional merits rather than political bias, the members of the Motion Picture Academy of Arts and Sciences acted in the tradition of true artists.

The saddest aspect of the affair was the hypocrisy surrounding the Special Oscar awarded to Charlie Chaplin. It resembled the eulogies a man receives from his enemies.

Undoubtedly, Chaplin deserves the highest honors for his acting ability. A genius in the practice of comedy, he was one of the mainstays of the early movies. The Great Dictator, in which he portrayed Adolph Hitler, is considered one of the greatest political satires of modern times.

But this Oscar is little repayment for the persecution that Chaplin suffered at the hands of Joe McCarthy and his followers, or for the years he spent in exile after the State Department denied him a visa in 1954 because of his political views.

How nice it would have been if the movie industry had defended Chaplin by forcing the government to recognize his right to personal convictions. Hollywood, however, was in the midst of its own witch hunt and Chaplin, like Paul Robeson and the Hollywood Ten, was a victim of the times.

Our objection is not to the award, but to the spirit in which it was given. What under different circumstances would have been a high honor to a great entertainer, came out as a smug exercise in eliminating guilt feelings.

Washington journalist I. F. Stone, writing in 1954 about the Chaplin case, commented that "There must be something wrong with our America if Chaplin could no longer live in it." In reality, things are not much different today.

On the Field and in the Water

Just as it appeared that the Rams' baseball team was on its way up, the rains came and washed away its momentum. Following a loss to league-leading San Jose City College, lanky Mike Howard, the fluid left-hander, went the distance for his first win of the season, a come-from-behind decision against Foothill College.

In trouble early, Howard settled down to hold on for a 6-3 win. The strong effort gave the Rams a psychological lift as they prepared to face College of San Mateo, the second-place team in the Golden Gate Conference. But that April 11 game was rained out and will be rescheduled. At press time, CCSF had a 3-7 won-lost record good for sixth place in the GGC, six games behind San Jose.

On April 8, the City College track team could have won a meet, if anyone had kept score. The event was the second annual Sacramento Relays, and City College turned in several fine performances in the junior college division.

Joe Jones, William Wilder, Ron Ruffin, Willie Daigle, Willie Francis and Cirilo Morgan teamed for wins in the 880-Relay and the sprint medley, with Wilder and Ruffin running in both heats. Add a couple of second place finishes by City College athletes, and the Big Red had the most team points on the field.

— Coach Lou Vasquez has said all year that his team could do well in the conference relays, where several schools divide the points, but that he did not have the depth to prevail in the dual meets. This was proven on April 7 when CCSF lost to Merritt College, 81-55. In that meet, Morgan came within .2 of a second of setting a new meet record in the 880.

Coach Decker's varsity swimmers also have fine individual talent, but not enough talented individuals to win dual meets. The swim team finished the regular season April 7 with a loss to San JOSE City College.

The Rams' major problem has nothing to do with talent: they don't have their own pool. City College shares the use of Balboa Pool, but the only available hours begin at 7 am. Although the morning workouts are important, an afternoon training program is necessary, but the team cannot meet for this. In the afternoon, Balboa Pool is used by the general public, two junior high schools and Balboa High. Thus, a proper training schedule cannot be maintained.

Still, the team will compete in the Golden Gate Conference Meets at Diablo Valley College on April 14 and 15. Then, the best swimmers will go on to the Northern California Championships in Monterey on April 21 and 22.

SPORT-DATES

Thursday, April 20 - Baseball vs. MERRITT COLLEGE at BALBOA PARK - 3 p.m.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21 - TRACK MEET vs. LANEY COLLEGE at CCSF FOOTBALL FIELD - 2 p.m.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22 - BASEBALL vs. DIABLO VALLEY COLLEGE at BALBOA PARK - 11 a.m.

TUESDAY, APRIL 25 - BASEBALL vs. SAN JOSE CITY COLLEGE at BALBOA PARK - 3 p.m.

EN GARDE! — The age-old sport of fencing is alive and well under the auspices of the Athletic Dept.

City Fencers Grab Second Place Honors in Collegiate Tourney

The Western Intercollegiate fencing tournament was held in San Diego in March. Of the 21 universities and colleges at the tournament only two junior colleges were present.

The officials did not want City College in the tournament because only Ramon Chiu, Tom Marki, Albert Ng, and Robert Quan where there to fight in three four-man team events and three individual events. The four stalwarts soon proved to all that quality beats quantity any day as their team efforts won fifth place in Sabre and seventh place in 'Epee competition.

Add to that Ramon Chiu's third place in Sabre, fifth place in Foil, and Albert Ng's seventh place in Foil in individual competition and our valiant gentlemen rolled enough points to win second place in overall competition. Only the Air Force Academy managed to edge our men by five points.

There are three weapons used in fencing, which came about originally as an offspring of swordfighting. They are the Sabre, the 'Epee and the Foil.

The Sabre, dating back to the thirteenth century was at that time the combat sword used by horsemen. The sharp-cutting edge, running the length of the Sabre, made it a formidable weapon.

The Foil began as a practice weapon for the duelers of old, who used the infamous 'Epee in actual fights. The Foil was also used by women for fighting because the lighter weight made it easier to handle than the heavier 'Epee. Both the 'Epee and the Foil are thrusting weapons as contrasted to the cutting Sabre. Today all three weapons are used for fencing.

In collegiate competition, the fall semester is used for practice competition in preparation for the actual tournaments held in the spring.

Upcoming events include 'Epee competition at the University of San Francisco on April 29 and Sabre competition at the University of California at Santa Cruz on May 13. CCSF is the three year defending champion in the Sabre event.

To Russia With Love: Coach Phelan Visits U.S.S.R.

Anyone looking for Sid Phelan on campus won't be able to find him. The City College basketball coach is taking an Amateur Athletic Union all-star team to Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union for a 20-day exhibition. Phelan's squad is made up of the best players from the AAU Olympic Trials Tournament in Kentucky.

Coach Phelan's credentials are impressive: his junior college teams have won 13 titles in the last 15 seasons. He came to the AAU's attention during the Kentucky tournament, when his California Junior College team knocked off the tournament favorite before succumbing in the semifinals.

Phelan left San Francisco on April 11 for Washington, D.C. where his team ran practices at Georgetown University. The first scheduled stop on the tour was Praque on April 19, and from there to the Soviet Union for nine games.

Coach Phelan is expected back at City College by May 20.

"Recycle Now for Survival!"

Mounds of shining glass and metal mark the site of the City College Recycling Center.

The unique project was begun several semesters ago by Randy Siebert. His efforts not only established the project, but fostered donations from Coca-Cola and Sears.

The Center is now run by Al Snakenberg and Tod Schlessenger.

Snakenberg described the type of materials the re-cycling center is particularly interested in: "We need aluminum and tin cans without paper labels. The glass bottles or jars should have no metal caps or rings on the neck of the bottle. All items should be cleaned."

Donations are accepted from 8 am to 4 pm in an area behind the greenhouses on Horticulture Department grounds.

Snakenberg stressed that no pyrex or window glass can be accepted.

The glass items are processed at the recycling center according to color. The metal containers are crushed. The processed items are then loaded onto the Ecology truck and shipped to the industrial recycling centers in Oakland and San Francisco.

What nationality do you think Archie Bunker (All in the Family) is?

John Kellenbenz - Pre-Med.
He is probably Anglo-Saxon and Protestant because he hasn't put down the Queen yet; some queens but not the Queen.

David Block - Electronics Technology
I don't think his nationality is important. He is representing a certain section of the American people. I think he is an angry and frustrated man who is a typlical victim of the contradictions of American society.

Tina Walters - Teachers Aid
He's American as apple pie. He'd be able to belong to the Daughters of the American Revolution. Way back there I think he had German ancestry.

Richard Coffman - Ornamental Horticulture.
I enjoy the TV show when I watch it. I think he is Polish but that is kind of a frivolous question to ask.

Jean Aro - General Education
Probably Anglo-Saxon. Seems like he puts down every other nationality except Anglo-Saxons so he must be Anglo-Saxon.

Dennis Rax - Inhalation Therapy.
Who is Archie Bunker? I definitely don't know. What channel is it on?

SPEAKERS - Elliot Blackstone and Rev. James Sandmire speakers to class.

Church and Police Discuss Homosexual Problems Here

Elliot Blackstone, liaison officer with the homophile community for the San Francisco Police Department Community Relations Unit and the Reverend James Sandmire of the Metropolitan Community Church spoke on homosexual oppression to a class of fifty Psychology of the Minority Groups students on Monday, April 10.

The evening class, held at Samuel Gompers High School, is a section of the evening division classes for City College.

Blackstone opened the discussion by stressing that homosexuality in itself is not a crime. He did say that all sex acts committed by homosexuals are illegal.

"The only legal sex act in California is the missionary position with the man on top of the woman. Every other sex act is illegal."

A sharp murmuring about the class was stirred up when Blackstone added, "Now that we know we are all criminals, we can begin . . ."

His discussion was spotted with his own personal views.

"Homosexuals are not sick or sinful. The straight that picks up a so-called fruit and checks into a room and stomps the hell out of him is the one who's sick, not the homosexual."

The question as to what causes a person to be homosexual was raised.

"There are as many theories as there are psychiatrists making these theories."

Reverend Sandmire was next to speak and opened with "Mr. Blackstone is quite an authority on gays but he's not gay and I am".

"The gay community is the second largest minority in the United States. Minority not in the sense of numbers but in the sense of oppression."

Sandmire went on to add, "Gay is not sick, gay is not sinful, gay is simply gay and nothing else and no one has the right to oppress us for what we are."

Sandmire then went on with a brief history of the gay movement.

"Gay consciousness began in June of 1969 with the Stonewall incident". Stonewall was a sleazy gay bar in New York. At the time the New York City Police Department made a habit of raiding gay bars and arresting gays simply for being gay. "These were simply gays having a drink in a gay establishment".

Many homosexuals were threatened with exposure and occupational dismissal from such exposure. "But for the first time we fought back. We weren't the limp-wristed half-man faggots they thought we were."

"Politicians began to notice our voting power. Feinstein came to us for votes and came very close to winning".

"The gay community raised the first monies for Hongisto's campaign".

Next Sandmire went into gay oppression. "In the past there were three things a person could do when he found he was gay. He could marry to prove he's straight, leave the town and become what he thinks a homosexual to be - a drag queen, or hide."

"We cannot work for the government, and for the more patriotic gays, serve in the army, or work for such companies as the Bank of America."

"If a divorced father is found to be gay, he cannot see his children and gays cannot adopt children."

"Some parents send their children through shock treatment when they suspect them: A little boy will get an electric shock if he looks at the picture of a man and a massage for looking at a girl. This is what we consider most perverted and against nature because gay is natural to us."

The discussion went on to talks of transvestites, transexuals, alcoholism among gays, and role playing.

Sandmire closed the discussion with a talk of gay counsellors and a clinic "where gays can help gays".

The class is taught by Leonardo M. Marmol, M.A., staff Psychologist at the Community Mental Health Center at Marin General Hospital in San Rafael.

Blacks Plan Science Meeting In Georgia During October

The Black Science Students Organization has announced plans for its national convention, to be held in Atlanta, Georgia in mid-October. The primary objective of the organization is the encouragement of minority participation in the medical sciences.

The local chapter at U.C. Berkeley is now scanning the bay area campuses for potential members who would attend the convention in representation of as many schools as possible.

The responsibility for attracting City College students is held by pre-med student Joseph W. Thomas who currently sits on the student health committee.

Last November, Thomas led a delegation of two City College students at the convention in New York. This year, he says, "We would like better representation from the juior colleges in the country."

The principal aim of the convention is to better effect the organization's aims. One specific goal, according to Thomas, would be to create interest among kids as early as junior high school in the science courses available to them.

"We also want to educate counselors to the capabilities of minority students who are often tracked around science departments."

Another concern will be the establishment of more BSSO chapters and creative community workshops, as conceived in last year's meeting. Within the next year, the organization will expand to include all Third World students interested in medicine.

As things stand for this year's convention Thomas says that plane fare spent from Los Angeles to Atlanta would be reimbursed to the student who attended; the only problem is getting transportation to Southern California.

Summer Session Response Grows, Course Sections Increased to 289

Maybe free time during a lazy summer's span is becoming less appealing. Or maybe 'summer school' is becoming more appealing. Wherever the appeal lies, the number of students attending City College Summer Session has been growing.

In response to the upward swing of applicants, this years summer session is increasing the number of course sections offered to 289. The bulk of the offerings are concentrated in the humanities, liberal arts, and in general education, a strategy designed to ease the overcrowding synddrome during fall and spring semesters.

The summer student will have access to three distinct sessions: a six week long span and two concentrated three-and-one-half week series. Four time blocks with a one-and-one-half hour duration each, will roughly comprise the 8 am to 3:30 pm summer school day. The majority of courses have been symetrically timed so classes will not conflict with each other, running into an adjacent time block.

Registration for any of the summer sessions will occur during final examinations for currently enrolled students. The order of registration is based on a priority number received from the counselling department, and all applicants are limited to taking a maximum of two courses or seven units unless special consent from a counsellor is secured.

Dean Warren White, director of CCSF summer and night sessions, sees the possibility of expanding the summer program into a comprehensive series that will eventually be equivalent to a third semester. A film series and possibly a small concert program and special symposiums have been planned for the summer of '72, marking the new direction and expansion of City College's summer program.

Relax, Read, Enjoy Life With City College Gourmets

The Alice Statler Library, operated by the Hotel and Restaurant Department, is the most comprehensive source of reference material concerning the "Public Hospitality" Industries to be found anywhere in the West.

The library maintains a collection of some 5,900 books, 6,932 pamphlets, 600 bound magazines and 155 current periodicals, in addition to menus, house organs, and other materials.

Opened in 1964, the library was named in honor of the widow of E. M. Statler, who established the Statler Foundation from which the library is funded. Only a few periodicals are purchased with school funds. In addition to the Foundation's support, the library has received numerous gifts from the collections of individuals and companies in the Hotel and Restaurant field.

The concept of creating a separate, specialized reference library within the H & R Dept. was pioneered by Winthrop W. Williams. Williams and Mrs. Dalton Howatt continue to administer the library on a strictly volunteer basis.

Since its inception the facility has proved not only an invaluable resource for the H & R Department, but functions as a unique professional library for all "Public Hospitality" industries and schools in the Western U.S. Practically everything published in the last 50 years which is of concern to the profession is represented on its shelves. Many rare items, such as Hotel Monthly, 1897 through 1940, were received as gifts.

The library is open to everyone: students, teachers, business and industry. It receives queries from H & R people all over the world. It constitutes a unique source of reference for these rapidly expanding fields.

Librarian Loretta Rutherford currently operates the library five days a week, twelve months a year, from 8 am to 4 pm. The library is located in the H & R Dept. on the lower level of Statler Wing.

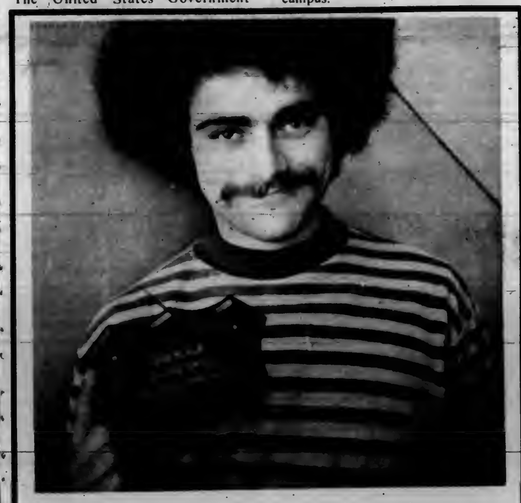
Federal and State Financial Aids Available to CCSF Students

The Financial Aids office at City College offers a variety of programs in an effort to give all residents of San Francisco an equal opportunity for higher education.

Federally Insured Student Loans up to $1500 a year are available through the Financial Aids Office and the bank where the student or his family has an account.

National Defense Student Loans are also available through the Financial Aids Office. These loans are similar to the FISL loans except that the loan is made, not by a bank, but by the college itself from a fund set up and supervised by the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare.



The College Work-Study Program offers a limited number of jobs to full-time students who wish to earn part of the cost of attending college. Check with the College Placement Office, Room S132 after establishing eligibility with the Financial Aids Office.

Educational Opportunity Grants, which differ from loans in that they need not be repaid, are available to full-time students from very low income families. The United States Government provides the limited funds for this program.

State Educational Opportunity Grants for full-time, low income students is provided by the state of California to City College on an annual basis as long as the program is re-funded each year.

Students who wish to apply for any of the aforementioned programs must file a Parents' Confidential Statement. If the student is over 25 or an ex-GI, he must file a Student's Confidential Statement instead. Both the PCS and the SCS should be mailed with a check or money order for $3.00 to the College Scholarship Service, Box 1501, Berkeley, California, 94701, and not to City College.

To be eligible for any of the programs available throuth the Financial Aids Office, a student must carry at least 11 1/2 units to be considered full-time. There is also a form for City College that must be filled out by Friday, May 5, 1972 by all students desiring financial aid for the Fall 1972 semester. For details concerning any and all programs, interested students should go to E-109, the Financial Aids Office on campus.

"You ain't seen nothin' till you've been in a motel, baby, like the Holiday Inn..." (from the song, Holiday Inn by Elton John.)

This time the Holiday Inn was in the Santa Cruz convention center, the site of the annual conference of the Journalism Association of Community Colleges. Some 540 Junior College newmen (and women), including four Guardsman staff members, showed up for the weekend of April 14-16 in sunny Santa Cruz.

The opening event was a press conference with Lieutenant Governor Ed Reinecke in the local movie theater; (an appropriate setting, perhaps, for Ronald Reagan's "sidekick") Predictably, Reinecke's theme was "The Student Press and the 1972 Elections". Ironically enough, a booth outside the theatre was busily handing out "McGovern" bumper stickers.

Anti-War Rally Here Brings A Peaceful Crowd

While B-52 fighters were bombing North Vietnam's largest cities, CCSF students staged a protest rally on April 19 condemning the actions of the U.S. government.

The noon rally which lasted an hour drew at its height 1,000 persons in the Ram area.

In contrast to the violent and bloody demonstrations that occured a few days earlier in downtown San Francisco, no trouble was reported on campus. San Francisco Police and Campus Police stayed clear of the demonstrators.

Scheduled speakers included Hanna Takashige of the SMC; Paul Hewitt, CCSF faculty; Jim Birdsall, a representative from the George McGovern camp; Dean Reed, a Socialist Workers Party candidate for the 17th Congressional District; Cecilia Lighthill, CCSF faculty; Jocelyn Won of the Bay Area Coalition; Mike Burke from the CCSF Veterans; Jack McCloskey from the Vietnam Veterans Against the War; Laura Dertz of the NPAC; Bruce Bosso, CCSF Student Body President; Regina Marquez, an organizer for the UFU and Peter De Groot of the CCSF faculty. But various unscheduled speakers also had their say on the platform.

Student Council had voted unanimously a few days before to support both the anti-bombing rally and the student strike planned for April 21.

The rally started on schedule with students sparsely assembled on the Ram hill. Tables were set up near the speakers platform gathering signatures for various petitions and distributing anti-war leaflets and newspapers.

Speaker after speaker pounded the same themes heard a thousand times before ... "The Geneva Convention ... Nixon... Agnew ... end the war now ...", but perhaps in their voices sounded a more angry and discouraged tone than ever before. It's been almost a year since the last major anti-war demonstrations took place, that in protest of the U.S. invasion of Laos and Cambodia and before that the numerous anti-

Budgetary Outlook Good Money Is No Problem Yet

Many of the 93 California Community Colleges are running out of money, but City College is not one of them. "Our financial situation is better than some of the other community colleges in the state," said Dr. Harry Buttimer, Assistant Superintendent of the San Francisco Community College District.

The primary reasons for the financial distress are an annual enrollment increase of eight to ten percent and a lack of a substantial increase in operating funds.

This spring at City there was a decrease in registration from last fall of 800 students. The reason for the decrease is that high schools do not graduate students in the spring, as colleges do, but in June. This factor alone tends to give City College a bit of financial breathing room. Along with that, the rate of enrollment seems to have plateaued, giving administrators a firm guide from which they can plan future money needs.

"Los Angeles Community Colleges can't meet their payrolls, Foothill College is sitting pat but we aren't there yet," stated Dr. Buttimer in reference to the money shortage. "If the colleges were forced to close admission one by one, we would be one of the last to go," he continued.

With the 16,000 expected students for next semester, an increase of 2,000 from this semester, the need for money will increase as well.

Where does the money come from?

At present, City College is subsidized in the following manner: the federal government provides four percent; the state 27 percent; local government 69 percent of the annually required funds.

There is a bill in the U.S. legislature, called Aid to Colleges, which would provide a dollar-per-student amount instead of the flat amount now paid regardless of the number of students in attendance. But that takes care of only the federal funds which make up the smallest part of the entire subsidy.

What about state and local increase? There are two possible answers. Either the state provides more financial support in addition to the present allotment or the voters approve a tax override which would result in higher property and sales taxes. "We may have one or two years to go before we get into that situation," is the way Dr. Buttimer explained the problem.

If and when City College does reach the point where it has to limit enrollment it would handle the problem as most state colleges do now. A closing date for enrollment would be set and all eligible applicants would be accepted up to that date. Dr. Buttimer concluded that "It would be a hard pill to swallow if we had to do that."

Vietnam: When You Can't Beat Them, Bomb Them

America's renewed bombing of North Vietnam is destined to become the straw that breaks the back of Nixon's Vietnamization program.

At no time was this made more perfectly clear than during Secretary of State William Roger's testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "We have been told," stated Senator Jacob Javits (Rep-NY), "that we were through with Vietnam. We were told that we had done all that we could for it."

Javits' statement is a microcosm of the anguish that is being experienced by the American people. Basically, we have become opposed to the war because we have not been able to end it. During the early days of the Johnson administration, when we were promised a quick and easy victory, only a handful of Americans opposed our intervention in Southeast Asia. As the war continued, with no end in sight, support for our Vietnam policy decreased steadily.

It was the war-weariness of the American people that enabled Nixon to sell us his Vietnamization program in the first place. The average American saw it as an escape from the quagmire of Southeast Asia. But our actions in Cambodia and Laos, as well as our recent bombing of North Vietnam has shown Vietnamization to be a formula for continued war, a substitution of American ground forces for American air power.

If the South Vietnamese army encounters future difficulty, it is safe to assume that American air power will be used once again. Coming on the heels of all the peace promises, such an escalation would destroy the fabric of our country.

Our renewal of the bombing of North Vietnam is the latest development in a policy that came close to destroying the United States. During the 1964 Senate debate on the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, Senator Wayne Morse (Demo-Ore) commented that "those who support this resolution will live to regret it." Time, as well as the lies, the killings, and the riots, has proven the validity of Morse's statement.

Two one-man exhibitions, "The Farmworkers," a photo essay by Morrie Camhi, Instructor in Photography, City College of San Francisco, and "The Tiger's Tail," photographs of social change by Howard Harrison, local free-lance photographer, will open at the Focus Gallery on May 2.

Camhi in documenting the farmworkers of California expresses his concern not with the great figures or news events associated with their struggles not with their poverty but with the people themselves but not as objects of pathos or as statistics. In explaining why he wanted to photograph the farmworkers he states, "Their day to day activities reflect strong parallels to our own, but often with a special quality of dignity and commitment that is unique to aspiring peoples."

His photographs include a selection of 40 taken over the past year and a half in San Jose, Bakersfield, Salinas and other agricultural areas in the eastern part of the state.

A free-lance professional photographer for the past 15 years, Camhi's work has been published in "Fortune," "Forbes," "Look," and in numerous other magazines and in books and he has won top awards in Professional Photographers West group exhibitions. He is a staff photographer for the black magazine "Breakthrough" and is also currently working on as assignment for Rampart Books. He has had three small one man shows and his work is represented in the permanent collection of the Oakland Museum.

Both exhibitions, "The Farmworkers" by Morrie Camhi and "The Tiger's Tail" by Howard Harrison will remain on view at the Focus Gallery through May 27.

Free Japanese Flick Today!

IKIRU (To Live) — Japanese, 1952. Today, noon and 8 p.m., V-115. Free.

This is a film rooted in the most universal of truths, the one that cuts across all cultural barriers, all concepts of love, success, God: the fact of morality.

It confronts that fact with honesty and a touching eagerness. Takashi Shimura, who was the woodcutter in Rashomon and the leader in The Seven Samurai, is magnificent as Watanabe: an actor who creates fiercely the indignity and helplessness and groveling fear of the man newly sentenced, along with the ravening hunger for sensual pleasure, then for spiritual refreshment, then for a crumb of achievement to be his immortality.

Excepting the slack editorial hand toward the end, it would be hard to overpraise Akira Kurosawa's direction. He clearly has all the resources of film technique at his command, and, confident of his knowledge, is not constrained to display them.

Fancy montages, whirling effects, bizarre angles are not for him. It is his purpose to make life seem to occur and, like a true artist, he does this by showing less than would occur in life.

He selects his elements perfectly, never lets the emotional scenes stray past sentiment to sentimentality, and with unmelodramatic juxtaposition weaves the elements in his story, letting the rhythm as well as the content flick away at our sensibilities with gentle, telling strokes.

Racial Percentages at CCSF Conflict with 1970 Census

More than ever, the racial percentages of the city are playing an important part in our lives. The biggest area in which racial percentages are brought up as a guideline that must be followed is in employment. At times, lawsuits are filed for racial discrimination when the employer does not have an equal percentage of minorities in his employ, as compared to the minority percentage of the city.

For the city of San Francisco, according to the 1970 census, the whites were found to be 71.4 percent of the population and all other minorities totaled 28.6 percent. These figures do not mean anything unless they are compared to something. Staying with the overall classifications of white and non-whites we shall look at City College.

Using the racial percentages from the Fall 1971 semester, assuming the white and non-white percentages have remained about the same with the increased enrollment, the white percentage (which in this and most other census studies includes Spanish and Latin Americans) is a surprisingly low 57.8 percent. Not including the Spanish and Latin Americans (8.2 percent) the whites account for only 49.6 percent of the entire day and night enrollment. The great difference between the city population and the enrollment percentages could partly be explained when the median age for San Francisco is found to be over thirty. Though most people think of San Francisco as a youth city, it is also a city that attracts all ages in the employment market and supports many retired whites.

The racial balance of the City College faculty for the Spring '72 semester is found to be the opposite of the previously compared students. Minorities teaching full time, part time and in the evening division comprise only 16.9 percent of the faculty. When these teachers were in school, it can be assumed that there was a smaller number of minorities attending school and becoming teachers.

This low percentage should increase as more minorities replace the whites who are leaving the city for the suburbs. But it should also be remembered that about 40 percent of all people working in San Francisco today live outside the city.

Though no racial percentages were available, it was stated by a City College counselor that eight out of the last nine counselors hired were of minority races.

Looking at the government of CCSF might show what may be in store for San Francisco in the future. Three of the four candidates for student body president were non-whites and they received almost 62 percent of the total vote. The student council of the college, reflecting the student racial percentages, is over 50 percent minorities.

Surveys, censuses, polls and samplings are being used more and more these days. These tell the public where they stand and try to indicate where we are heading in the future. They might not always be for the best or for each individual but it shows leadrs are concerned and trying to be democratic.

Sports Round-Up

Ferretti Saves The Rams

On Tuesday, April 18, the City College baseball team had its back to the wall. It had been beaten badly twice the week before (by Chabot College, 12-3, and by College of San Mateo, 20-2) and was losing again. Steve Pointer, the hard-throwing lefthander who hadn't thrown hard enough against Chabot, had pitched well, but the Rams' colander defense let him down.

Trailing 3-1 in the bottom of the seventh, the Rams rallied. With runners at first and second and two out, Dan Ferretti stepped in to bat for Pointer.

Ferretti, formerly the starting centerfielder, had lost favor with Coach Domecus. He hit only .130 through the first six league games, and sat out the next six. Even when the Rams were being slaughtered, Ferretti's bat, which had terrorized the AAA when he was at Lincoln High School, was not to be seen.

Ferretti made Domecus look like a very good manager, when he sent the third pitch by Laney pitcher Craig Simpson howling over the leftfielder's head for a three-run homer. Dave Weidinger pitched the last two innings for the Rams to save Pointer's 4-3 win.

The victory raised the Rams' record to 4-9, good for sixth place in the Golden Gate Conference. They were seven games behind league-leading CSM with eight games to play.

At press time, it was not known if Dan Ferretti had returned to the lineup. But he had proved that he was ready.

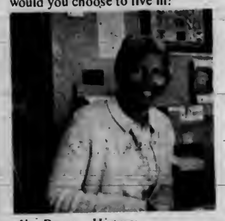
Track

On April 14, while the College of San Mateo was having unscheduled batting practice at Balboa Park, the Rams trackmen were extracting vengeance on the football field. City College won four field events, two sprints, both relays and the half-mile to take a 74-62 victory, the first dual meet the Rams have won this year.

Swimming



The Tenth Annual Golden Gate Conference Swimming and Diving Championships were held on April 14 and 15, and City College was well represented. The Ram splashers improved in almost every individual event to place sixth in the overall competition. Dennis Glass earned the most points with second-place finishes in the 200-yd. Breast stroke and 200-yd. Individual Medley and a third in the 400-yd.IM. In Glass' second-place finishes, he lost to Gregg Smith of Chabot College, who could set state records in those events next month at Huntington Beach.

At press time, Coach Decker was preparing to take Glass, Les Carr, Don Leuder, Nick DeMay, Terry Swift and Bart Ribotta to the Northern California Championships at Monterey.

QUESTION: What period in history would you choose to live in?

Jim Rousy - History

To quote Hugo Blanco, well-known Peruvian land reformer, "I would rather live now in the age of permanent revolution to help make the changes now so that others can benefit from them."

Susan Hobart - Political Science Ins.

I would prefer very much the future. Right now, so many of our problems are on the verge of being resolved. It seems to me that people are getting "tuned in" and more sensitized politically, and this gives me hope for the future.

Romin Sumera - Engineering

I'd like to go back to the days of King Arthur and the knights of the Round Table. Things were different then; it was the age of chivalry, when men could compete for the lovely ladies.

Catherine Wisniewski - Anthropology

The forties. The depression was over and there was a kind of national feeling in the country, although people care more about the individual today. But there was a unique kind of optimism in the forties.

Roy Swanson - "mediocre grades" major

I don't think there is one. I have this thing about living in the present. Things are going faster now than ever before. The accelerated rate of change in America today is pushing us toward the unknown. It's exciting!

Bill Funke - Math/Accounting Teacher

I'm fairly well satisfied with right now. I'm a product of the last 50 years, and I've been conditioned for the present. I'm fairly well adjusted to it.

Convention Draws College Press

Under questioning by the journalists, Reinecke conceded, "The 18-year old vote won't help the Republican Party, that's for sure!"

After the press conference student delegates were allotted an hour to file an on-the-spot editorial or news story on the event. Each school then submitted one story in each category, to be judged in a contest. Second place for "On-the-Spot Editorial Writing" was awarded Paul Snodgrass, reporter for the Guardsman.

Saturday's activities included various journalistic workshops, held in the chambers of Santa Cruz's gleaming new courthouse building. The most colorful—and popular—of these was conducted by Realist editor and radical satirist Paul Krassner.

Krassner's court was jam-packed as he slouched in the judge's chair, toyed with a gavel, and joked about his role in the Chicao Seven Trial. Other topics of Krassner were Mad Mugazine, Lenny Bruce, The CIA, the Kennedy murders, Charles Manson, the Establishment, revolution, "astral humor", Ken Kesey, Malcolm X, Playboy, lawsuits drugs, etc.

Defending the publication of his often-controversial satires, Krassner stated, "There is no such thing as 'bad taste'!", and contended that censorship by either government or publisher was dangerous to society's freedoms.

Krassner's quick wit and disarming candor (even admitting to perjury in the Chicago trial) dazzled the inquiring—but receptive—journalists for more than hours. By the time he rose to leave, everyone (except him) was either intellectually exhausted or sore from laughinv at his endless jokes and anecdotes about life in the underground press.

Nightfall at the Holiday Inn proved colorful as many large noisy parties shifted constantly from room to room, occassionally throwing ice-cubes at each other.

war moratoriums that took place around the country.

But, as CCSF Student Body President Bruce Bosso put it "...It's been ten years and a long struggle, but we must not give up. The only way to change things is through the power of the vote." Jim Birdsall, a McGovern campaign worker urged a vote for McGovern who has promised to end the war in 90 days if elected President in November. Other speakers attacked President Nixon for not living up to his promises of four years ago and re-escalating the war with the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong.

But it was only one of the many other demonstrations that were planned for various campuses and cities around the Bay Area. Perhaps Hanna Takashige of the SMC summed up the CCSF rally as to "express the anti-war sentiment on campus."

City Signatures Mount for Tough War and Weed Votes

An initiative to stop the bombing in Vietnam has recently been introduced in California.

Officially called the Air War Vote, the petitions have been circulated around the state since March 1.

The statement calls for an immediate end to the bombing, an immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Vietnam and binds state representatives to do everything in their power to block funds from going to the war.

Already 50,000 signatures have been obtained of the nearly half million needed. Northern California coordinator Terry Kirchhoff says that "It's only a matter of reaching the people to obtain the number of needed signatures."

Locally located at 1380 Howard Street, the initiative has regional offices around various counties throughout the State.

Another petition circulating around California is the California Marijuana Initiative, which would allow persons 18 or over to use and cultivate Marijuana for personal use.

Headquartered at 2221 Filbert Street, the petition has gained the support of 200,000 signatures of the nearly half million needed.

Starting April 22 KSAN and various sponsors will celebrate Marijuana Initiative Week (or Weed Week as nicknamed by the sponsors) on a week long telethon to gain the signatures needed for the November ballot.

Hayden and Harris Speak Here

The recent escalation of the bombing in Vietnam brought radical organizers Tom Hayden and David Harris to City College to denounce Nixon's war policy.

Hayden, one of the founders of the Students for a Democratic Society, used slides to depict what he called the "cultural rape of Vietnam." The most dramatic slides concerned the effect that American bombing had on the people and the countryside of Vietnam.

"The Vietnamese women," said Hayden, "are perhaps the greatest casualties of the war." Hayden cited prostitution as the major reason for the dramatic increase in heroin addiction and suicide.

"By my own figures," Hayden commented, "more than 30,000 Vietnamese women have received plastic surgery on the eyes and breasts in order to make themselves more appealing to Americans. We have not only altered the cultural attributes and identity, we are also responsible for changing the physical appearance of the people.

David Harris, ex-husband of folk singer Joan Baez, also lashed out at the recent escalation.

"This is not a war, it's a massacre," said Harris. "As a result of this bombing, one-quarter of the land is unusuable, 60% of the people are refugees, and 60% of the bombing casualties are women and children."

"To ignore brutality," said Harris, "is to become non-human. And I see no difference between a government that uses gas ovens and one that uses bombs."

More Volunteers Needed for Tutorial Center at S347

The Tutorial Center, under the direction of Dr. Lance E Rogers, is in need of volunteer tutors.

The center, located in room S347, is currently being run on $15,000 in student funds which pays the 115 tutors, half of whom work the full nine hours (8am-5pm) that the center is open.

"What we really need is more funds," said Dr. Rogers, "but even if we had them we'd always have more people than money".

"We'd like to have the center open for the evening division but lack of funds and people keep this from happening."

"There is both a need and a demand for the center. Students that tutor need the money to stay in school and those tutored need the academic help."

"We encourgae any student, especially minorities having problems with English as a second language, to come to the center for help. All services are free."

If anyone is interested in becoming a tutor to help fellow students with problems, contact Dr. Rogers at the Tutorial Center in room S347.

Foreign Language Dept. Chairman Lauds Program, Courses and People

The Foreign Language Department is headed by Dr. Doris Hernried, a dedicated and impressive lady, who indeed has her work cut out for her.

She teaches, counsels those who ask her advice, makes proposals for courses, faculty, budget, requisitions for equipment and approvals for innovations within classrooms and curriculum, and a good deal more.

Herself a French teacher, Dr. Hernried stressed the importance of learning a foreign language.

"It is absolutely essential. People are traveling more and more. The world is getting smaller and the United States is no longer an island."

She went on to say "This broadens one's personal horizons because no one personal horizon is ever full. Sign language is fine, but it's not the same thing."

There are approximately forty-nine language sections at C.C.S.F. and about one thousand students. Some students major and then stop while others take it because they have to. "Quite a few are interested professionally," Dr. Hernried said.

She added that this semester Russian and French are being taught and that new courses such as Chinese should be also. "We'll be trying other courses in the summer and fall."

Asked if she felt a language should be mandatory for those in grade schools, Dr. Hernried emphasized "It would be of tremendous advantage. The sooner you start, the better off you are."

There are about eighteen people teaching a language at this school. Dr. Hernried said there is only one teacher to a language course because, as she put it, "There is no cross-switching. We want experts in the field."

Dr. Hernried had these words for those students who may be having a difficult time learning a foreign language, but who would like to be able to learn it fluently. "It takes time, patience and lots of practice. One must definitely overcome shyness. A student must have the willingness to speak even before he speaks well."

She mentioned that "We have asked for real distributions of language and Film Festivals" through her department. Entrance is free and students may bring guests.

A final comment of Dr. Hernried's was on those with whom she works. "I'm proud of my department and staff," she said. "I think they're great."

CCSF Fire Department Captain Potter Wants "Damn Good Physical Condition"

Captain Alexander Porter of the campus fire department knows his business well and is a professional in every sense of the word.

"One must be in damn good physical condition for this line of work," he said. "This includes most anything from warts to adenoids. Vision is tested along with mental potential. It is based on the needs of the department and is closely related to military exams".

"Fire fighting is a carrer opportunity job, governed by rules and regulations and one must keep training and it's best to have a clean record. A person is limited only by his own ability and desire".

Potters job as captain is in saving lives and in the protection of property.

The department here functions under the community college and there is no outside assistance. Potter said "We have the day school program, oriented toward pre-employment, sales, fire alarms and other apparatus. The evening divisions are mostly for courses suited to the needs for particular groups."

Potter felt that the immediate dangers a fireman faces are serious injuries when responding to alarms, such as burns and mixtures of gasses being inhaled that are often deadly poisons.

Precautions such as asbestos suits are not all they're cracked up to be during fires. Potter said the proximity suit is better because it is highly reflective. "But there is no perfect suit," he said.

Most students, according to the captain, who major in Fire Science will pursue it as a career. As he put it, "It is an exciting challenge. A lot of veterans also come into it. It keeps men in good mental and physical condition".

Potter emphasized, "Such work is being professionalized every day. There is a good future financially and it takes care of pension and hospitalization."

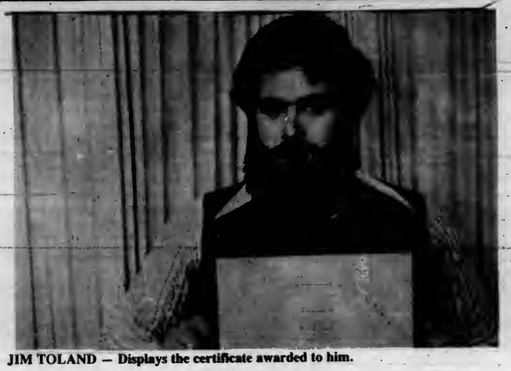
Promotions, Potter stated, depend on the individual department. Four hundred and fifty-eight students presently attend day and night sessions. One must be a high school graduate, but there are no other prerequisites for the course.

Martin Kilgariff, a member of the board of education, is also a full time teacher of fire science. "My right hand man," grinned Potter.

In San Francisco one must qualify for the department through the civil service.

"We are rendering the public a service and are out to help them", Potter said.

Meditation Week Begins Here



Monday marked the beginning of Transcendental Meditation week at City College. A lecture on TM, a natural and spontaneous technique of meditation to aid development of man's potential, will be given on May 9 at 11 am in V-115.

Walter Bellin will conduct the lecture. A philosophy major, from the University of Minnesota, he now instructs a course in the Science of Creative Intelligence at UC Berkeley. After studying with TM's main exponent, Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, he returned to the United States as a qualified instructor of the technique.

Among topics Bellin will cover will be the psychological aspect of TM as a means of expanding the mind to its fullest capacity, not only bringing about an energetic, clear, alert thought process but enabling the practitioner to relieve the simple tension that is built up during the day.

"With this increase in mental awareness comes, naturally, a change in the physical being," Bellin says. The physiological state is affected at this

Guardsman Editor Honored At Catholic Newsmen's Banquet

Jim Toland, news editor of The Guardsman, was one of three northern California community college students honored at the Association of Catholic Newspapermen's 23rd annual McQuade Awards Dinner.

Toland received the 1971 Quinn Award, honorable mention, for his editorials New Slant On Prison Reform (The Guardsman, September 30, 1971), Get Off Your Butt and Register to Vote (The Guardsman, October 21, 1971) and A Break for Prison Reform (The Guardsman, November 11, 1971).

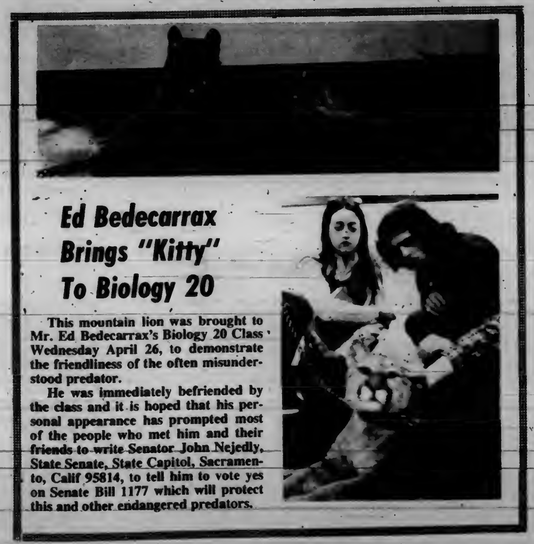
The first annual Quinn Award, for excellence in community college newspapers, was named for Monsignor Francis Quinn, former moderator of the Association of Catholic Newsmen.

Quinn, who was present ut the awards banquet held ut the San Francisco Press Club, presented Toland with the first award of the evening.

Following Toland, the other two Quinn Awards were presented to Mark Barker of the Contra Costa College Advocate and to Peter Moyan of the San Jose City College Times.

McQuade Awards were given to professionul newsmen in three different divisions: newspaper, radio and television.

Steve Hart of the University of California Daily Californian, won the Tappe award for excellence in a four year college newspaper.



The featured speaker at the awards dinner was Wilson Riles, state superintendent of public instruction. He spoke on a variety of problems facing the state's educational system.

Following the presentation of awards, Jim Toland stated, "I chose to enter those particular editorials for several reasons. The requirements for entering the ACN's community college press competition were specific. The story had to be published in the official college newspaper and had to be an example of the most significant contribution in the field of student journalism toward strengthening the principles of democracy or in promoting understanding among all men. I felt that only three of my 1971 editorials really met the requirements."

Toland wrote his award winning editorials on voter registration and prison reform while he was serving his second semester as Guardsman Editor-inChief.

"I decided to write an editorial on voter registration because it angered me to see so many apathetic young people who wouldn't be bothering to vote after so many of us broke our butts to win voting rights for 18 year olds."

Ed Bedecarrax Brings "Kitty" To Biology 20

This mountain lion was brought to Mr. Ed Bedecarrax's Biology 20 Class Wednesday April 26, to demonstrate the friendliness of the often misunderstood predator.

He was immediately befriended by the class and it is hoped that his personal appearance has prompted most of the people who met him and their friends to write Senator John Nejedly, State Senate, State Capitol, Sacramento, Calif 95814, to tell him to vote yes on Senate Bill 1177 which will protect this and other endangered predators.

Nutrition Group Open To Students

Tom Brewer, M.D., is appalled over the lack of knowledge or concern over correct diet. For 15 years Brewer has been trying to correct common misconceptions concerning proper diet.

Nutrition Action Group in San Francisco, Brewer's current endeavor, has pregnancy as its focal point, because a person responsible for feeding two people is more receptive than others when a new type diet is being discussed.

We know quite well how to feed pregnant cattle, hogs, sheep, goats, horses, dogs, and cats with great scientific care. Most obstetricians still deny that such knowledge should be applied to human pregnancy.

Deficiencies in high biological quality proteins and related deficiencies of essential nutrients and calories have been directly related to metabolic toxemia of late pregnancy, neurologically damaged infants, abruptio placintae, molar pregnancy, congenital anomalies and stillborn infants.

American obstetricians have attacked these problems with low salts, low calorie, low protein diets. This diet for pregnant women is based on a study done in 1954 in Tennessee. Since then the "findings" have been retracted. The real problem is that people, including doctors, are just not concerned enough to find out the facts on good nutrition.

Dr. Brewer and his group have been working for six months in San Francisco trying to correct the current conditioning concerning proper diet.

For information on what is a good diet and the importance of same, contact the people whose motto is 'Help stop the war on children...that begins before their birth.'

Nutrition Action Group is located at 3414 22nd St. and is operated by volunteers on Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday afternoons for information and referral. Organization and information meetings are on Wednesdays at 7:30 p.m. The telephone number is 285-6479.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

In Defense of Apathy

In the past, school spirit was exemplified by attendance at football games and school dances. Those who wished to remain apart from such activities were denounced as apathetic students.

Although the emphasis has shifted from games and dances to Vietnam and student rights, the cry that "nobody gives a damn" still echoes throughout American campuses, City College being no exception.

A student body united in an effort of solving the problems of war, race and poverty would be a great benefit to our society. But just as our elected representatives must contend with constituents who do little else but vote every four years, perhaps City College must accept student apathy as an unavoidable feature of campus life.

Located in a large urban area, City College attracts a large number of people from lower or middleclass families. Students coming from such an environment face financial problems much more difficult than those encountered by students from high income areas.

With the recent cutbacks in financial aid and employment opportunities, a large number of City College students spend the majority of their time either looking for work or working at whatever kind of job that they can find. This is particularly true of veterans trying to supplement their $175 per month educational benefit check and of older students, who may be supporting a family as well as going to school.

Outside responsibilities severely limit many students' ability to participate in campus activities. In the case of these students, it is necessity rather than indifference that is the mother of apathy.

Students active in campus activities are naturally hostile toward students who prefer to remain uninvolved. We sympathize with the active person, but we wish to remind them that the seemingly disinterested student may actually have too many responsibilities as it is.

-Ed Hartzler

INDIVIDUALITY "Each man is justified in his individuality, as his nature is found to be immense."

Ralh Waldo Emerson

EDITOR'S NOTE: This award winning editorial is presented for the second time after it first appeared in the September 30, 1971 edition of the GUARDSMAN. This editorial, along with two others, won Jim Toland the 1971 Association of Catholic Newsmen's Quinn Award.

New Slant On Prison Reform

After all the terror and bloodshed reported during the last few months in the nation's prisons, it is time to take some form of decisive action to make institutional living more humanly tolerable.

It is true, of course, that most of the men in prison have done something to make themselves a threat or a danger to society. Some people have argued that prison conditions are too soft as they are now, and that prisoners should be treated harsher and given more severe sentences.

Prison conditions are not soft. Brutality and homosexual rape run rampant in America's prisons. Murders and beatings are almost a daily occurance, and now even riots are not rare.

Two years ago, on a prison farm in Alabama, several bodies were dug up all of whom were listed as "escaped" prisoners.

In Louisiana's Angola Prison, men have had to eat rats and other rodents to keep from starving, because prisoners there are punished by not being fed.

Experimentation at a Southern California prison with conjugal or family visits has proved to be a complete success. Yet when a bill to allow conjugal visits was brought up before the assembly floor, it was actually laughed off by members of the assembly in what witnesses say was one of the most disgusting displays ever seen in the capitol chambers.

While the California Assembly denied visits to its prisoners, Mississippi has allowed wives to make these visits for years.

When 40 people were slain in Attica Prison in New York in mid September by anxious state troopers and National Guard troops ordered out by Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller, a point was proved.

State and local governments are incapable of caring for and rehabilitating the people they incarcerate.

Their prison systems have proved to be inefficient, corrupt, and subject to the influence of local politics and politicians.

Some of the employees of these prisons appear to be barbaric sadists or incompetent idiots. In some prisons such as Angola, convicts are allowed to guard other prisoners with shotguns (regular prison guards are out of range in prison towers with machine guns aimed at the convict guards) sometimes finding a "necessary" reason to shoot fellow convicts.

The only answer to the prison problem in the United States today is to put all penal institutions under Federal Government control.

In the Federal prisons there is no capital punishment, and conditions are uniform and decent. Convicts with outside assistance may often have a television in their cells along with all the books and reading matter that they desire.

When asked his preference, an ex-convict answered, "I'd take a federal rap anytime. I had a partner once, who was wanted in Georgia for gunning a state trooper. The law was on him; he knew he'd get caught eventually, so he went into a post office and killed a postal clerk."

Since federal crimes have priority over local and state, the murderer was sentenced to life in a federal prison rather than a cell on death row in Georgia.

Federal control of prisons would solve many, if not most, of the problems in America's prisons.

School Board

Sanchez Wants to Run

Dr. David Sanchez, 32, has announced his candidacy for the San Francisco Board of Education in the June 6 election.

Sanchez said he was running because there were many important developments already begun on the board which he wanted to see through. Among these, he noted, were expansion of school district counseling, formulation of a master plan, and the use of alternative financing to help relieve the load on local property owners.

Firsts

Sanchez was the first board member to announce his intent to stand for election to the post that had previously been appointative. He also became the first Latino and youngest member ever to serve on the Board of Education. Sanchez became president of the board this year.

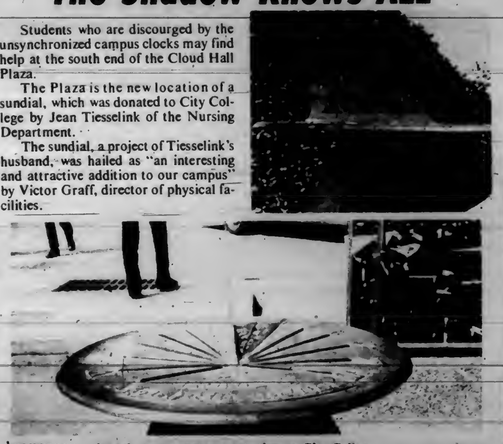
City College Ties

Sanchez has special ties with City College. He has served as vice president of the San Francisco Community College district for several years and has frequently visited campus both as guest lecturer and to seek student views on issues pertaining to the college.

Now assistant Professor of ambulatory and community medicine at the University of California Medical Center, Sanchez began his professional career as a teacher and community relations counselor in the San Francisco schools.

In 1966, he was educational director of the EOC Summer Youth Program and a Regents Fellow at the University of California. Sanchez has served as a member of the Board of Directors of the Department of Youth Activities for the Archdiosces of San Francisco. Currently he is a member of the American Sociological Association, American Academy of Political and Social Scientists and American Association of Public Health. He has also served as consultant to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Background



Dr. Sanchez was born and raised in San Francisco and graduated from San Francisco and graduated from San Francisco public schools. He attended the University of San Francisco for two years and subsequently served with the U.S. Naval Reserve in the South Pacific. He obtained his BA and MA degrees from San Jose State College and his doctorate in Sociology from the University of California. He is married and has two sons.

The Shadow Knows ALL

Students who are discourged by the unsynchronized campus clocks may find help at the south end of the Cloud Hall Plaza.

The Plaza is the new location of a sundial, which was donated to City College by Jean Tiesselink of the Nursing Department.

The sundial, a project of Tiesselink's husband, was hailed as "an interesting and attractive addition to our campus" by Victor Graff, director of physical facilities.

SUNDIAL - the only way to get accurate time at City College.

MOTHERHOOD - had its rewards in the past, but there's a limit to everything.

Three Cheers for the Mothers

May 14 marks the 59th official observance of Mother's Day in the United States. However, the custom of holding a festival in honor of motherhood is much older. It dates back to the times of the ancient Greeks who worshipped Cybele, mother of the gods, and honored her with rites that transpired in wood and caves.

The observance of Mother's Day was the inspiration of Anna M. Jarvis of Philadelphia in May 1907, who arranged for special services in tribute to mothers. It was her intention for sons and daughters to pay tribute once a year to their mothers.

In 1913, the second Sunday of May was officially declared Mother's Day. At this time, printed leaflets distributed in ten different languages to many different countries expressed these sentiments: "The common possession of the living world is a Mother. Everyone has, or has had a Mother."

A resolution was adopted whereby all the members of the Government of the United States would wear a white carnation on the second Sunday of May in observance of the day. This was later modified to make a distinction between those whose mothers were still living and whose mothers were dead. White flowers were worn by those who were motherless and red by those whose mothers were living. It followed that sons and daughters soon adopted the custom of making little gifts for their mothers on this day.

In 1934 a three-cent stamp was issued showing a reproduction of Whistler's portrait of his mother. This painting has probably been for many years the most popular portrait-painting of any mother.

Film Series Presents:

The L-Shaped Room - Today, noon and 8 pm, V-115. Warren Beatty and Leslie Caron began their well-known love affair with this melodrama.

La Symphonie Pastorale - Tuesday, 11 am and 8 pm, E-101. Michele Morgan won the Cannes Film Festival award for her fine portrayal of a blind girl in this film adapted from the novel by Andre Gide and filmed under Gide's supervision.

Sports Round-Up

Rams Back in the Red

City College nine threw away a three-game winning streak. After edging Laney College, the Rams pounced on Merritt College, 11-3. Dave Giorgi, Dan Ferretti and Frank O'Leary combined for eight RBI's. Ferretti had returned to the lineup after delivering the game-winning hit against Laney. To make room for him, leftfielder Tharlo Johnson was moved to first base to replace the slumping Pat Sabia. In the next game, Sabia socked a pinch-hit triple to beat Diablo Valley College, 6-4.

With an excess of hitting heroes and southpaw ace Steve Pointer on the mound, the Rams were full of confidence for their contest with San Jose City College. Trailing 22-0 in the bottom of the fourth, Giorgi and Dan Ferretti hit back-to-back triples, and Craig Cohen singled to tie the score. It was the last semblance of offense the Rams displayed.

San Jose scored once in the sixth on a home run that was lost in the left field sun, and three times in the seventh on four Ram errors and a 300-foot triple. In all, San Jose scored an 11-2 victory on 14 hits and eight CCSF errors. Pointer picked five San Jose runners off base, but his infield could only tag one of them out. Tired and disgusted, Pointer pitched a complete game.

Sometimes the Rams looked like the City College nine minus eight.

The last home game of the season will be May 4, at Balboa Park. Game time is 3 pm.

Track

On April 20, the City College track team streaked past Laney College, 101-35, in the final dual meet of the year. Coach Lou Vasquez has bemoaned his lack of team depth this year, but his problems are nothing compared to Laney's. The East Bay school fields a 16-man team. The unequal meet became little more than a practice session to prepare the Rams for post-season relays in Fresno, Diablo Valley and Modesto.

Thought For The Week

"For the history of the human race, as well as each individual's experience is thick with evidence that a truth is not hard to kill, but that a lie well told is immortal."

Mark Twain

Se Battre Contre des Moulins

Editor:

Yesterday I was walking up the path from the Muni station toward Phelan Avenue on my way to school. I saw two students, two males and a female, standing around a spot where I had often watched a gopher (or some other, similar burrowing animal) pop up its head, look around and pull down a weed.

Months ago, when I first noticed it, it was still very careful and wouldn't come up if it saw anybody too close. As time passed by, presumably because I and other people had watched without harming it, the gopher became more adventurous.

If it had been human, it might have reasoned that no one would want to hurt it, since it only worked a field of mud and a few weeds. But it couldn't reason. It only knew that it was able to come up, pull down weeds, and nothing would happen, even though much larger animals were nearby. It had learned that these animals were no danger. In fact, its instinct to hide for self-preservation was overcome by the knowledge that these people had not harmed it, and therefore would not harm it.

The next thing I saw was the gopher coming up to grab a weed and have the kid standing behind it step on the gopher's backbone. A girl who was walking near me saw this happen and ran crying to the spot. She asked someone to help dig up the gopher. No one moved. They just stood listening to the gopher's screams. I didn't go either. I was scared that the big kid would step on my neck as well. I didn't have the guts that the girl did and neither did anyone else—and by this time there was a crowd.

The girl asked the students why they had done it, and one said "it eats plants." She screamed at them to leave and they did. Meanwhile, she had dug up the gopher—its body was filling with blood and its eyes were beginning to close—as the three giggling friends walked away. Its backbone was broken, and after a few minutes it died.

The crowd was still hanging around, watching the girl and the gopher, wondering if there was anything else to see. Maybe they thought that they were watching television. They turned off the program and continued on their way, in the footsteps of the cowards who killed the gopher.

Would You Take a Sex Education Course?

John Ward - English
Yes. Perhaps I could learn something new. Lately I find many of my preconceptions have been altered.

Keiko Torakawa - General Education
I wouldn't take one. It wouldn't teach me anything new. I guess it depends on what kind of course it would be.

Mary Lucey - General Education
Yeah I would. It would depend on the teacher. You can always learn some more. It would be fun.

Lawrence Lamb - Engineering
I would take it if the teacher looked good enough. That way I would have some incentive.

Duane Louma - Creative Writing
Yes. I might be able to learn some new techniques. Is there a lab?

Pat Sullivan - General Education
I don't know. Yeah, maybe. It all depends on how much the book costs.

"My prison reform editorials covered a lot of information I had gathered while traveling around the country. During my adventures, I met a lot of criminals and ex-convicts who stimulated my interest in the brutal conditions that exist inside our correctional institutions. There were too many similarities in each of the stories that I heard for them all to have been fabcicated. I decided to investigate further."

Toland has registered for San Francisco State College next semester where he will major in journalism. He plans to attend the University of California at Berkeley to work on his masters degree in joucnalism.

OUTSTANDING STUDENT—Honored as a winner and receiving a cash award as a finalist in Bank of America's Community College Award program is Debra Smith, City Collete of San Francisco, third place winner in the field of Business and recipient of $500.

18 Year Olds Largest Group Here Men Outnumber Women By 285 Count

Examination of City College registration records grouped according to age and sex provides a basis for some measure of speculation concerning prominent student-body trends.

Total day-enrollment at City numbered 14,703 for the Fall '71 semester. From this total, over 50 percent (7,418) of the students fall into the group between 17 through 19, with the largest group on campus (2795) at 18 years of age. Assuming high school graduation at ages 17 or 18, this may be considered typical in a junior college with a twoear curriculum.

Within this category, the male/female ratio is maintained on a relatively equal basis until the nineteenth year, when men outnumber women by almost 300 (1211/926). This trend continues and expands as female registration progressively declines both numerically and proportionally up to and including the 35-40 year age group. The numerical decline is both predictable and insignificant, but the transformation in the male/female ratio bears closer review.

Throughout the age range from 20 through 22, male students outnumber their female counterparts almost two to one (1902/1159). This situation, in part, is quite probably a by-product of marriages in which the wife will voluntarily or (regrettably) involuntarily terminate her education while the husband, in many cases, continues.

Although obviously unrepresentative, it is interesting to note that interviews conducted with female students between the ages of 20 and 25, produced 12 of 12 single women, seven of whom professed a desire to retain that status indefinitely.

Inspection of the 22 through 24 year age stratification (overlap intended), yields an even more profound expanse between male and female census. Male enrollment almost triples that of females (1668/648), and instead of declining numerically with respect to increased age, actually remains on a near par with previous figures.

The obvious explanation lies with the United States military and the returning veterans. Unfortunately, exact statistics on veteran attendance by age are unavailable, and no positive conclusion can be drawn from limited interviews on campus.

The male population on campus remains predominant throughout the ten-year age span to 35 years. Here, the trend halts and the male/female ratio again achieves a near balance. Then, advancing onward from age 40, the previous tendency experiences a complete reversal with women outnumbering men by nearly 100 percent (205/95).

Available evidence supports an assumption that this phenomenon can be attributed to a married woman's increased ability to continue her education once her children are grown and her family's position is stable.

One 42 year old student explained that both she and her husband had planned on returning to college, but that when her family obligations were such that she could attend classes on a part-time basis her husband was unable to accommodate both work and school.

City College enrollment includes 278 accelerated students below the age of 17 as well (predominently women, by the way). The breakdown by age and number is as follows: Two, age 14; four, age 15; and 272, age 17.

The City College Newman Center is sponsoring the Second Annual Tom Dooley Drive from May 1 through 14 and is calling upon all private citizens and members of the business community to participate actively.

The Newman Center works in conjunction with the Thomas A. Dooley Foundation, headquartered in San Francisco by gathering toys, blankets, children's clothing and "Dooley Bags." The collected items are then donated to the Foundation and sent to its refugee and hospital programs in Laos and a nursery in the Tibetan settlement of Khatmandu, Nepal.

The Foundation has requested that the toys and clothing be durable.

Items like toothpaste, tooth brushes, soap, washcloths and combs are of particular value to the Foundation. They are placed in small cloth bags secured by a pull string and distributed as basic hygiene kits called Dooley Bags.

The City College Newman House at 210 Phelan Avenue in San Francisco will serve as the donation center. People who have items to contribute may do so at the Center between the hours of 9 am and 4 pm, Monday through Friday.

The Foundation bears the name of Thomas A Dooley, a young American doctor who dedicated his life to the difficult medical task in Asia.

World Affairs Scholarships Awarded

Four City College students were awarded scholarships by the World Affairs Council to participate in the Asilomar Conference to be held May 5-7.

Terence Gates, Seyoum Kebede, Khanh LeCong and Tajudeen Ogunyoku will be attending the three-day meeting to discuss United States foreign policy with representatives of the news media, leading scholars, national and international government officials.

The four students will be the first representatives from City College to attend the annual conference which will host several hundred delegates.

level of consciousness. As Bellin puts it, a "hypo-metabolic state" occurs in which the blood chemistry, brain wave and metabolic rates are altered.

Examples will be cited from studies made on meditators, such as that done by Scientific American concerning their oxygen consumption, heart rate, skin resistance and such.

Bellin will give an explanation of how to begin meditating and the simplicity with which the technique is practiced. After the lecture, there will be a question-and-answer session.

"My Fair City" Columnist Visits Guardsman Staff

MERLA ZELLERBACH — "One of the biggest problems in this city is loneliness." She has helped single people to find one another.

Merla Zellerbach, columnist for the San Francisco Chronicle visited the Journalism classes at City College last week. A modestly beautiful woman with frosted black hair, she seemed a bit nervous at first, but became more lively as her address and interview continued.

She began with a lecture on journalism and what the young, beginning journalist should expect. "Anyone in the public eye cannot expect to be loved by all. A person in this position will get criticism, and it hurts, but one must bear it to survive in this job. I'm a good example of that."

There is a great deal of discrimination against women in journalism, she admitted. "For a woman on a newspaper," she said, "the motto is 'Look like a girl, act like a woman, think like a man and work like a dog."

When first hired by the Chronicle, ten years ago, she was free to write what she wanted. Now, however, her "My Fair City" column is yielding to the Chronicle policy of providing "pleasant and fun reading" with a ban on anything serious or political.

In 1961 her first novel, Love In A Dark House, was published and became an instant best-seller Since the book was set in a mental hospital Merla felt that she should know what it was like to be schizophrenic. Under medical supervision she took LSD in an effort to experience schizophrenia. She did not repeat the experiment and stated regarding acid, "As long as a person knows the consequences, then he should do his own thing."

Marijuana? "I'm in favor of legalizing it," she said.

She believes in marriage, as well, and is currently married to Fred Goerner, author of The Search for Amelia Earhart and a producer of documentary films. She feels, however, that the institution of marriage will eventually end and would condone her son and daughter living with someone for a while before marrying.

During her own unmarried period she founded several organizations to help single people get together. "One of the biggest problems in this city is loneliness," she stated. In addition to her social life, she is an active worker with the American Friends Committee and the American Red Ccoss.

She has written for Cosmopolitan, The Saturday Evening Post, and This Week magazines and has been a regular columnist for the Chronicle since 1962.

Legislature Approves New Bill; Colleges Become Universities

The California State Legislature approved a bill last week to designate 13 of the 19 California state colleges as state universities.

By state law the measure needed endorsement by the Council for Higher Education and state college trustees.

All ten council members have given their approval by a mail ballot and formal approval will come at the council's May 31 meeting, said council spokesman Don Ridenour.

The colleges will officially become universities June 1, in time to allow 1972 graduates to have "university" on their sheepskins rather than "college," Riedenour said in a news release.

The 13 universities, and their new names, are:

California State University, San Jose.

California State University, Long Beach

California State University, Los Angeles.

California State University, San Diego.

California State University, San Francisco.

California State University, Fullerton.

California State University, Hayward.

California State University, Chico.

California State University, Fresno.

California State University, San Fernando.

California State Polytechnic University, San Luis Obispo.

California State Polyteehnic University, Pomona.

Those remaining as state colleges, at least for the present, are Humboldt State College; Sonoma State College; Stanislaus State College; California State College, Bakersfield; California State College, Dominguez Hills; and California State College, San Bernardino.

Petris Urges Student Lobby "Grab a Piece of the Power"

State Senator Nicholas Petris (D-Oakland) described as a flashy and intriguing legislator appeared at City College and proved to a sparse College Hour audience that he was indeed flashy and very intriguing.

For the past year, Petris has been urging college students to create their own fulltime lobby in Sacramento to work within the system.

With the hiring of professional lobbying talent through the use of student funds, and the awarding of 50 to 100 fellowships to students for work in state government, the student lobby would produce one of the most powerful and effective voices in California government.

With the student machinery set in motion the complex watchdog lobby would keep close tabs on all legislators and present to the California community the relevant issues in state and local politics.

After outlining his concise plan, Petris explained the reasons that prompted him to act for the formation of this specialized lobby.

"I'm disappointed," he said, "the students of the 60's are gone. The decade of the 70's has produced a student whose concern really centers around the war. Once he is safe from the war his interest wanes."

"There are more issues," Petris stated in a voice that could not betray his anger, "Students should grab a piece of the power and turn the world around."

Petris concluded that the lobby would be the weapon necessary to implement this change.

DIOGENES UPDATED- Although he could have used the money, Johnnie Dickinson turned $100 he found in a classroom at City College.

Custodian Johnnie Dickinson is This Year's Most Honest Man

If anybody ever felt that a man's best friend is his money, he hasn't had the opportunity to meet Johnnie Dickinson.

Dickinson, a member of the custodial staff at City College, discovered the purse of Sandra Fulmer which contained $100.00 in cold cash. He returned it.

"I usually take whatever's left behind in the classrooms to the lost and found office," Dickinson said. "This is the third time I've found money, $23 last week and $27 two years ago."

Asked why he returned the money, Dickinson said "I wouldn't feel happy taking something not belonging to me."

Dickinson is also a teacher's aide in Math for a remedial group of eithth graders at Fairmont in Pacifica. He is presently attending San Francisco State part time.

"Obviously such an act of integrity on Dickinson's part is a rarity. He received a letter of commendation from the Assistant Superintendent, Dr. Harry Buttimer, congratulating him and thanking him for the deed, and a separate letter from the appreciative owner of the billfold. In addition, he was invited by Superintendent Louis F. Batmle to meet with his staff and receive further commendation and a picture-taking session.

But then Dickinson himself is a rare and exceptional individual. He is well liked by his peers and by most who are acquainted with him. Fourteen years out of high school, Dickinson's incentive to get ahead in the world is continual and he tries to discourage drop-outs in school education.

Whether $100 or $1.00, most believe Dickinson would return it. "Hopesty pays off in the long run," he said.

ESL Helps People Function

Help for students who have difficulties with reading, writing, or understanding English is available at City College through English as a Second Language.

This program, started in 1968 and headed by Sophia Vlamis of the English Department, strives to teach students English as quickly as possible.

Originally ESL was set up as an aid to those people who weren't able to function in the native English classes. The recognition of the language barrier and the frustrations suffered by people of a non'English background spurred the English Department to create ESL.

Testing measures are used to determine in which section an individual belongs. Some need emphasis on grammar while others need composition training. Many people take English as a Second Language to familiarize themselves with the more difficult concepts of the language, and to gain admittance to other classes. Jumping from one section to another is allowed if the requirements are met.

There are eight or nine sections for each level with 22 qualified teachers to assist. Vlamis has a bi-lingual background and came to City College at the time ESL was being formed.

Sizes of the classes are large and overcrowded conditions do prevail most areas of learning. But [illegible] states that the instructors are trying reduce the size where we can meet needs of the students'.

Slow Start, But Recycle Center Shines

"Well, I guess the guy who started this thing never looked to the future too much."

With this concise summary, Tod Schlesinger, a member of the CCSF Ecology Committee and a lonely but stalwart flagbearer for the recycling project on campus, gave one of the primary causes for the impressive mess before him.

Tattered cardboard boxes and a unique, barely-organized array of cans and bottles resting behind the horticultural greenhouses, constitute what can loosely be referred to as the City College recycling project.

The project was organized two semesters ago and is still undergoing unsuccessful organizational processes. At first, a lack of insurance on the Coca-Cola Company's donated truck, used to transport the recyclable items from City College to an ecology plant, caused a disordered mass of cans and bottles to accumulate in a limited space.

And when last semester passed into this semester, almost all of the volunteer workers passed right along with it, out of the recycling project, for one reason or another. Then there are a few more general problems that complicate matters.

The campus response to recycling has been overwhelming, and the present area by the greenhouses that hosts the project can no longer accomodate all the business. Another area on campus grounds is being sought (with the enthusiastic support of the Horticulture Department) but little success has rewarded efforts so far.

Items that are brought in must be aluminum or clean glass without caps and rings, but contributers have been enlarging problems by bringing in almost every kind of container-garbage.

The recycling project is the CCSF Ecology Club's major activity, closely followed by educating people about recycling in particular and environmental ecology in general.

The club has leaflets and flyers ready to be handed out, but Schlesinger says they are holding back on the green light for fear of a more concentrated response with recyclable items: "We don't want anything else until next semester, at the earliest. It's a matter of cleaning up the mess we have.

Key Education Bill Passes Tough State Assembly Committee Review

Assemblyill 834 passed through its initial hearing without one dissenting vote and was sent to the full Assembly Education Committee. The bill was introduced under the sponsorship of the Board of Governors of the California Community Colleges.

Community College Chancellor Sidney W. Brossman said, "This bill will provide relief for local taxpayers and at the same time bring the State closer to the financing design of the existing Master Plan for higher education."

He pointed out that the Master Plan specifies that the State should pay 45 percent of program costs of two-year colleges. Currently the State is paying only about 31 percent.

The $25.6 million called for in AB 834 would increase the amoutn the State guarantees in the foundation support program for each full-time student from $643 per year to $706. While this does not reach the current estimated cost per pupil each year, it would raise the State's share to almost 35 percent.

The other major feature of the bill would raise the amount in support of part-time students from $520 to $583 for each 12 units (full time equivalent being taught.

California's 95 Community Colleges currently educate some 840,000 students, with about 350,000 of them attending full-time.

"The growth of Community Colleges has been phenomenal, showing their acceptance and need by the citizens of the state," Brossman said. "In 1950, Community Colleges enrolled 134,000 students. Today there are more than six times as many students in these institutions."

"By 1975 we expect about one million students, an increase of 700 percent," the Chancellor added. "Today, 85 percent of all students in the first two years of higher education in California, private as well as public, are in the Community Colleges."

"We believe," said Brossman "That local support is necessary in order to insure that Community Colleges will be, for the most, locally-controlled and to insure that they will be responsive to local needs."

"However, when we get to the point where local property taxpayers are providing an average of 64 percent of support and the state only 31 percent, then I think we would all agree that the state should begin taking steps to assume a fair share of the burden. Assembly Bill 834 will do this."

Second Semester "Change in American Society" Stirs Praise Here

Must America be radically changed or have things been changing too fast? In what direction is society changing? Is change itself the only constant in an ever-changing world? How do we as individuals go about changing society? Is mankind doomed to self-destruction or is Utopia at last within sight?

A nuew course at City College is based on asking and analyzing just such complex questions as these. "Change In American Society" (Interdepartmental Studies 30) offers students an opportunity to explore past, present, and future changes in politics, economics, technology, human relationshhips, the environment and the world in general.

The five-unit course utilizes some unusual — and promising — learning methods. The "interdisciplinary" approach involves studying these and concepts rather than a "subject". Team-teachers and innovators of the course are Susan Hobart (Political Science), Frank Holden (Computer Science), Alexa Nickliss (History), and Bob Dunbar (Sociology).

Nickeliss commented, "We feel it's more valuable to explore a theme or an idea than to just assimilate many disjointed facts."

"We are trying to really integrate the various disciplines into the course and have lots of interaction between them. Some previous IDST (Interdepartmental Studies) courses were — in effect — three or four mini-courses under one title," added Susan Hobart.

In the course's "student-centered" learning format, class members play a major role in determining and executing the content and direction of their studies. In this system, faculty members become participants, or occasionally leaders, rather than "instructors" in the conventional sense. During the first week students recommend and elect reading and topics for discussion.

Student reaction to the course (now in its second semester) has been generally enthusiastic. Class member Joel Bierbaum asserted, "This course has restored my faith in Academia!"

Use of such experimental techniques make the class different in approach from the average college curriculum, but do not necessarily make it "easier". Drop-out rates remain about average for the school.

Susan Hobart explained, "Some students are confused by the lack of conventional, formal structure in the classroom. More individual responsibility for learning is placed upon the student."

This semester the course is being held MWF 12-2, in Room S-200. Students voted to allot Mondays for panel discussions, films, guest speakers, etc. On Wednesdays the class meets in four smaller discussion groups. Fridays are devoted to planning panels, guest speakers, and required or recommended reading. Required this semester were The Greening of America by Charles Reich, and Future Shock by Alvin Toffler.

"This course is representative of the future of education. This is the direction learning must inevitably take in public schools," summarized Hobart enthusiastically.

Folksinger to Be Concert Guest

Man For All Seasons — Sam Hinton

Sam Hinton, an artist who has performed in every state of the union and made over 100 commercial records, sees folk music as "one segment of the great continuum of musical art; as a valid expression of a people's customs and judgments; and as a direct line of understanding between modern man and his ancestors." He thinks of it "not only as an artistic medium of expression, but as a subject for disciplined scholarly study."

Acquiring an early interest in folklore during a boyhood in the pine and swamp country of East Texas, he supported himself for two years at Texas A and College by his music and by selling to a pharmaceutical firm, the venom he extracted from a stable of 60 water moccasins.

In 1936, he temporarily forsook formal education to go on the road with a Major Bowes vaudeville troupe. Billed as a "folksinger" — one of the first performers to be so designated — he toured 46 states and Canada. He then entered UCLA as a zoology major, working part time as a folksinger and scientific illustrator. In his senioc year, he became a member of the cast of the long-running musical comedy "Meet the People".

For more than 20 years he was director of the aquarium and museum at Scripps Institution of Oceanography, LA Jolla, and since 1964 has been associate director of the University of California's Office of Relations with Schools.

He has given lecturers and concerts all over the world; has appeared at all major folk festivals; has been host artist at every Berkeley Folk Festival since 1957; has published articles on folklore in most of the journals on the subject. Among his long playing records are "Buffalo Boy and the Barnyard Song," "How the West Was Won", "Swinging Across the Land", "The Newport Festival, 1963" and "The Song of Men". He now records exclusively for Folkways.

The Concert and Lecture Series will present Sam Hinton on May 18 at 11 a.m. Hinton will speak in the Little Theater.

Students Work to "Blockade" Nixon

About 50 students of San Francisco City College gathered in the lower level of the Student Union Building to determine what they could do to protest President Nixon's latest action in Vietnam.

The floor was open for proposals. Jane Sica, of the Student Mobilization Committee was first to speak. She proposed that they distrihute leaflets and organize as many people as possible to participate in a rally on Thursday, a moratorium on Friday, and a demonstration at the Civic Center on Saturday.

Robert Wood, a Hotel and Restaurant student, proposed that every registered voter should write to his congressman urging Congress to stop Nixon. He stated, "Nixon did not get the permission from Congress to take this drastic military action. I believe it is unconstitutional and it is up to Congress to rectify the situation."

Arlton Thomas Jr. said, "It is a crucial situation and we must take a crucial stand or everyone on this planet will be blown up!!

Thomas suggested that in order to show their sincerity they strike school until the war is over. "We can't play games anymore," he shouted as some students played ping pong and cards in the back of the room.

It was urged that everyone join in the anti-war movement and show the people of the world that the American people do not have an imperialistic Nazi regime mentality but the present executive administration does.

U.S. Foreign Service Officer Discusses Policy and Direction

"I find myself agreeing more than disagreeing with my student who are critical about United States foreign policy." With this statement, Harrison Holland set the tone for a discussion focused on the State Department's activities from an inside viewing point.

Holland is a senior career Foreign Service Officer, assigned to S.F. State College for the 1971-72 academic year, under the State Department's "Diplomat in Residence" program. Well versed in the functional organization of the Department, Holland is a specialist on Asian Affairs with an impressive ten-year record of background experience in American-Japanese relations.

The 50-year old diplomat faced a minimal student reception when he related his opinions and experiences concerning the controversial State Department to a political science class at City College. Holland seated himself behind a small table facing a semi-circle of students, folded his hands across the table's surface, and initiated his presentation with a general discussion of the State Department's organization, in theory and practice.

The Department basically operates around five geographical bureaus that cover activity around the globe, although there is a variety of departments within the overall network of command. In explaining who handles particular issues that arise in the scheme of international negotiations, Holland remarked that generally staff members only handled routine matters and had to "leave the hot issues for Kissinger."

From a light touchdown on general organization, made tangible through anecdotes and dialogue he had personally experienced, Holland described the actual process the State Department followed in deciding the issue of reverting Okinawa to the Japanese. The decision, Holland explained, went through a lot of governmental friction before it reached the President and official negotiations.

The Pentagon fought the State Department's recommendation to return Okinawa to the Japanese, on the basis that it is a valuable U.S. political base in the Pacific. State Department officials fought back on the basis that Japanese sentiment over the issue was the decisive factor, as it affects enduring relations between the two countries. Bureaucratic battles over policy are a matter of course, Holland explained, with the Pentagon, Justice Department and the State Department all fighting for their own view of an issue.

Holland ended his presentation by answering general questions posed by the students, spending the majority of time talking about the evils within the U.S. ambassador system.

Bennett Stresses Economics

"Economics is where it all begins." Who should know better than an economist, one like William Bennett, who has worked for many years in behalf of low gas, electricity and telephone rates?

Bennett spoke at the Little Theatre on such subjects as taxing, Proposition 9, U.S. government and Public Utilities.

Bennett told students "If you only knew your power you could run this country, because students are the last chance."

The "last chance" refers to the political gains made by those in high offices. "94 % of the wealth is owned by 6 % of the people. Nuclear energy, it is said must be regulated to make a profit. A view of many political economists is that gas is used to discover the conjunction of oil. But they know where every drop of oil is through charts."

Bennett added that, according to the American Gas Association, "Enough natural resources are at hand for 300 years in this country." Bennett said a crisis does exist but that there is no energy shortage.

Bennett is a consistent fighter for consumer interests and is a former criminal prosecutor.

Bennett said "Economic justice in America is a myth. Some say that Proposition 9 has bugs and that it's unconstitutional. But really it's aimed to supply a clean environment."

"The money you buy Wonderbread with goes to ITT, or when you see movies it may go to Gulf."

Bennett felt that Democrats and Republicans have too much in common, and as he put it, "they perpetuate themselves in offices."

"I don't have any supoena authority and I am not government. You students have to vote on our common interests," Benpett said. "I've been in public life and have been very fortunate. I'm not going to be re-elected but it doesn't bother me."

Bennett's most interesting plea came at the close of his speech when he said "I care not only about the economics in books, but about the way that the economic system really is."

Lots of Children Anticipated Day Care Center Gets Ready

Childrens Day Care-Center director, Barbara Norrise, enthusiastically anticipates having her hands full accepting applications for enrollment in the Day-Care program during the 1972 summer and fall semesters.

Applications will be available May 15 in Bungalow B-7. The deadline for filing is May 30. Priority is given students nearest completion of 60 units and also those with low income. Student status is the only requirement for eligibility. Children must be toilet trained and between the age of 24 and 69 months.

The center operates in conjunction with the regular school schedule. The Center is open from 8 am to 5 pm and closed for lunch.

The ratio of workers in direct supervisory capacities to the proportion of children is one-to-five. The Student Leadership program offers one unit for three hours involvement per week in the functions of the center operations and two units for six hours.

Among a wide variety of recreational facilities and various art projects is a kitchen and a television set. When the weather permits, frequent tours of the nearby surrounding area on school premises are conducted to introduce the kids to nature's wonderful works and enable them to take full advantage of warm sunny days. Two snacks are served daily. Heavy eaters are allowed to bring a lunch.

The major objective of the center is to enable parents with low or no income to attend college in spite of their inability to afford costly baby sitters.

Jorg Demus Fills CCSF Theatre

After presenting a somewhat extended introduction to his concert, Jorg Demus performed 12 of Claude Debussy's 24 preludes before an overflow Little Theatre audience here at City College.

The neatly dressed Demus, speaking with a thick and rich Viennese accent, spent some 25 minutes highlighting Debussy's life and times and analyzing each of the 12 preludes before he actually performed the works. But when he concluded, the audience that remained rose to its feet and loudly applauded the pianist. He graciously played another Debussy work as an encore.

Demus was born in Austria and made his debut at the age of 14 in a piano recital in Vienna. Since then he has played in nearly all the musical centers of the world. He has performed under the most renowned conductors and has made more than 150 recordings including many works of chamber music as well as the entire piano music of Robert Schumann and Claude Debussy.

In addition, he and his associate, Paul Badura-Skoda, have recorded most of the music for four-hands of Mozart, Schubert, Debussy, and Hindemith. Demus has been associated for many years with Lieder singer, Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau.

City College Enrollment Hits 15,000 Almost 14 Per Cent Drop Out

This semester 15,000 day students are registered at City College. If past rates remain consistent, about 11-14 per cent of that number will take official leaves-of-absence.

That figure roughly represents the well known category of "drop-out" — a major concern to professors and counselors, but for many administrators, it is a dependable factor in balancing overcrowded enrollments.

At CCSF, a number of faculty members have undertaken projects to report and make recommendations on what they recognize as a "drop-out problem."

Many acknowledge that such a problem is unavoidable in a community college where almost anyone can enroll and so few can receive the needed help.

One faculty member, Dr. Lance Rodgers, is partly responsible for the most active student assistance programs on campus. He encouraged the opening of the Tutorial Center and reading labs after his research in 1969 of students from 22 junior colleges.

Rodgers surveyed over 100,000 freshmen and concluded that the average potential drop-out is Black, was or is married, works part-time, and "considers college unimportant, expressing discord with parents, and has low expectations."

At present, Rodgers is managing the Tutorial Center which is experiencing financial trouble as it relies on volunteers.

However, Rodgers claims that "those who come to the center don't drop out as often as others."

The specific problem of Black students was explored in 1970 when Dr. Joseph Jacobsen, now head of the counseling department, traced the two-year progress of a class of 221 Blacks - the group with the highest drop rate.

Of the class's 133 drop-outs, Jacobsen was able to contact 49. He found that most of them had entered CCSF to prepare inexpensively for a four-year college education.

Hoping to explain the causes, Jacobsen says, "Twenty-eight reported they did not do as well at CCSF as they had done in high school . . . lack of academic preparation was also a factor."

Probing further, he reports that most of the 49 drop-outs said classes were not what they expected and had taken too much of their time.

When the former students were asked to pick from a list a specific reason for quitting school, academic, financial, and motivation problems ranked highest.

It could be said that these students didn't really care about getting an education, and were just looking for alibis.

However, Jacobsen also asked for opinions of faculty and other students. Their response indicated a favorable environment.

Finally, the Black drop-outs were asked to give recommendations on the system they gave up on.

Among the responses were suggestions for more two-year majors, fewer prerequisites, less emphasis on attendance and grades, more time with better counselors, part-time jobs related to majors, and more student loan information.

Jacobsen's own recommendations include "helping in establishing realistic and acceptable goals."

He calls for some kind of "reinforced learning" for using short-term goals in the form of assignments and tests to encourage the student who gets little reinforcement at home or from peers.

Much of the City College faculty has expressed strong sympathy toward drop-outs. But at least one member emphasizes the responsibility of the student.

Dr. Lee Dolson, president of the Classroom Teachers Association and history instructor at CCSF, reported four years ago on 4,000 students here. He describes the great majority of those who dropped out:

"They appear," Dolson says, "to be a more passive group . . . They have much less expectation of themselves, from education or other people and are generally more defeatist in approach."

Dolson makes the point that the drop-out is the "failure-prone student."

However, Dolson's report was addressed to fellow educators; and in it, he recommended that they help create a sense of belonging and develop confidence among their students.

Regardless of the efforts of the faculty at City College, the big snag in solving the drop-out problem appears to be the administration.

Student centered programs have had to operate with severe budget cuts; very little has been done for complaints of the emphasis on attendance and grades, or the priority system which discriminates against new and weak students.

Consistently, students and faculties have pleaded with administrations for more than token support in the effort to prevent drop-outs.

It is conceded that without a strongly concerned administration, no student problems can be effectively eliminated.

Five Pictures Are Worth 5,000 words

"The grass is always greener on the other side of the hill," goes the old saying. Perhaps this accounts for our vacation travel habits. We spend time and money seeking novel sights; often without first exploring our own environment.

Just as many Londoners have never visited the Tower of London; and few New Yorkers have been to the top of the Empire State Building; so we in San Francisco often overlook local attractions which tourists from all over the world travel thousands of miles to see.

Why travel all over the world until you've exhausted the possibilities available for 25 cents bus fare? If you're stuck for something to do this summer, why not play tourist right here in the City?

San Francisco covers 46.6 square miles on the tip of our 32-mile long peninsula. Within that area are infinite visual, educational, and entertainment discoveries for people of every persuasion.

If you want to play "counterfeit tourist", then you'll want to start off right: armed with maps, brochures and information. Do what the real tourists do and stop by the San Francisco Visitors Bureau at Fox Plaza, (on Market, near Van Ness). Their phone number is 626-5500. Or you can dial 391-2000 for a daily run-down on local events.

Here are a few facts about "Baghdad by the Bay" you might not know.

Despite the morning and evening fog, did you know that you live in one of the four sunniest major cities in the U.S. (after L.A., Denver, and Phoenix)? We average 66 per cent of all possible sunshine during the year.

Of San Francisco's 715,674 people 150,000 are Italian, 65,000 are Chinese, 29,073 are German, 22,948 are Irish, 22,108 are British, and 12,000 are Japanese. Afro-Americans number 96,078. (Source: 1970 census).

There are more than 50 cinemas in The City screening motion pictures from every nation in the world.

San Francisco has some 2,600 restaurants in which to gorge yourself. These range all the way from Doggie Diners to the Fairmont Hotel.

The Golden Gate Bridge is 1.7 miles long, no less. The center span is a mere 4200 feet. Towers are 746 feet tall (that's at high tide, for you hair-splitters out there). The famous structure was finished May 1937 at a cost of 35 million dollars. That seems a lot till you consider that 33,298,572 vehicles crossed the Gate in 1970 alone, (at 50 cents a shot,

In 1970 again, 1,561,000 tourists visited our city and spent 267.5 million dollars here. (That's not counting "spare change" donated on the streets, of course.)

Our community has a total of 40 hills. The tallest is Mount Davidson, (925 feet, compared to 910 for Twin Peaks), topped by the 103-foot cross.

Despite its relatively small size, our city is indeed a unique, colorful place to live. Probably Will Rogers summed it up best when he said, "Cities are like gentlemen; they are born, not made. Size has nothing to do with it . . . San Francisco is a 'city' at heart."

GOLDEN GATEWAY - the beginning or end of a long journey.

FORTUNE - You are now reading the inside of this cookie at the Oriental Tea Garden.

LITTLE CABLE CARS - Climbing halfway to the stars and slipping back down to the bottom of the hill.

FLOWER CONSERVATORY - an oasis of serenity.

SAN FRANCISCO AT NIGHT - dazzles tourists and natives alike.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

The Political Comedians: We Love Your Style Richard Nixon

With the American political scene becoming a graveyard for aging, outdated and overrated Hollywood personalities, it is refreshing to note that one individual had reversed this trend.

Until his performance on national television last week, Richard Nixon was known only as a dull, plastic novice comedian and the husband of a former Hollywood bit player. His latest satirical exercise, "How I Ended the War", revealed to the mass public what a minority of artists and intellectuals have known all along: Dick Nixon is the brightest, most innovative comedian to come along since Lyndon Johnson.

With the aid of first-rate humor as well as creative facial and hand movements, Nixon takes a joke as old as Vietnam and surrounds it with an aura of freshness.

If there is a high point in this splendid evening, it would have to be Nixon's brilliant impersonation of Kaiser Wilhelm. Unlike other performers, Nixon forgoes the traditional monocle and spiked helmet and depends on monologue to make his point.

"Countries with ships presently in North Vietnamese ports have been notified that they have three daylight periods in which to leave in safety," quipped Nixon. "After that time, the mines will become active and any ships attempting to enter or leave these ports will do so at their own risk."

The only complaint here is Nixon's ignorance of basic historical facts. He consistently confuses the Tonkin Gulf with the Atlantic Ocean, North Vietnam with France and England and, while it was considerate of Nixon to honor modern man's technological achievements, he should remember that submarine warfare, not mine-carrying planes, is the proper technique for cutting off supply lines.

Other examples of Nixon's acid wit include:

-Differences between the United States and the Soviet Union-"No Soviet soldiers are threatened in Vietnam. 60,000 Americans are threatened."

-THE Credibility Gap- "I want peace."

Nixon hopes to continue his act for another four years, although many critics feel that five months is a more likely period. Particular attention should be paid to his upcoming command performance scheduled for August in Miami Beach, the site of Nixon's triumphant return to show business in 1968.

One final note on the affair. Richard Nixon is living proof that a true artist is not appreciated by the masses. Despite the genius of his routine, the unaware, insensitive public still refuses to find him funny.

It's All In The Name

Science Building, Arts Building, Educational Services Building; all are functional, straightforward names for buildings on this campus.

However, names like this do not contribute to a college atmosphere at City College.

When one journeys to another college, he finds the buildings named after great men and women in the history of the college or the area.

On this campus, only three of the many buildings are named for anthing other than their functions.

The three are:Smith Hall, named in honor of the late chairman of the Hotel and Restaurant Department; Cloud Hall, named in honor of the late Archibald Hall, Restaurant Department; named in honor of the late Archibald Cloud, first president of this college; and Statler Wing, named in honor of Alice Statler.

Adding to the disgrace of the functional naming system is the confusion that it can cause. The Arts Building, Visual Arts Building, and Creative Arts Building all sound alike. To the new student, the similar names of these buildings can only add to the confusion of telling one from the other.

Finally, there is the disrespect for some of the great people who have attended, taught, and administrated this school. The honor of having a building or hall named after them has been denied both to themselves and their kin.

City College would seem so much less of an educational factory if our buildings could be renamed in honor of people, not functions.

BACKDROP- Drama students put the final touches on the set for Phormio, the updated Roman farce now playing at the Little Theater.

"Phormio" Opens at Little Theater

The drama department opened a four-night run last night of a lively new adaptation of Terence's Phormio. This updated Roman farce, adapated by Alex Hnah, features an all-black cast under the direction of Gloria Weinstock.

The play is a comedy spoof that has much to say about the social values of today.

The Phormio of the title is a patron of the harmless, a confident soul-brother who recognizes social concepts and utilizes his understanding for his own personal gain as well as helping the confused people who seek him out. As an adventurer he delights in the confusion surrounding him.

The set, designed by Jim Orin, is a coloring book fantasy done in psychedelic colors. The design was drawn from Pompeian wall paintings and provides a most interesting backdrop for the chaotic antics of the actors.

The play runs through Saturday night. Curtain time is 8 pm and all seats are $1.00.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Editor,

In the past week there has been a rebirth of student protests against the latest Nixon decree. The protests are based on extremely valid reasons, but I think the violence that stems from them is as obscene as the war itself.

I don't understand how people can say they want peace as they break windows and overthrow cars that have nothing to do with bombing and the war, but happen to be in the way.

Marches and petitions are pretty ineffective, but rocks and fires do nothing but alienate people who will then turn to Nixon's side out of disgust and fear of the students.

Newspapers are giving biased reporting, every other word is either rocks or tear gas, clubs or bricks. I am frustrated by the lack of action that comes from nonviolent protests, but I am sickened to see demonstrators sink to the same low level as Nixon. Bombs are as violent as the rocks thrown at fellow human beings in the name of peace.

If this senselessness continues, the eventual outcome will not be peace, but oppression. The winner will not be the side that is the most sincere, but the side that is the strongest.

Peace will not come from violence in any situation. A real show for peace would be the total lack of violence from all of the campuses. If it were possible to show the war jackasses and skeptics that it is possible and necessary to control ourselves from the violence they condone, then perhaps they would listen.

Protest the war, but do it peacefully. Don't be like Nixon, show your natural superiority. Violence is useless.

Warren Widner, Mayor of Berkeley, was on the right track when he addressed the Berkeley campus, "Don't fall into the trap Richard Nixon is trying to set: 'Violence in the U.S.'."

I just don't understand why no one paid attention.

Sports Round-Up

The Old Records Shatter at Meets

Cirilo Morgan broke two half mile records on one run at the Golden Gate Conference Trials in Pleasant Hill, two weeks ago.

Morgan's time of 1:51:6 snapped both the Cnference mark of 1:52:4 (set by Ken Noel of San Jose City College in 1963) and the City College record held by Hoy Henderson since 1966.

Morgan's best 880 time this year was 1:50:7, run as the anchor man for the sprint medley at Bakersfield. The sprint medley is a mile run divided into four heats: two 220, one 440 and one 880. Running on an artificial Tartan Track, City College streaked 3:24.3, the best JC time in the state.

In all, CCSF had 11 men qualify for the Conference Finals and placed fourth overall. Curtis Dyis, the "Instant Superstar", won the long jump with 23'7-1/2". He was aided by a 20-mile-and hour wind. At Bakersfield, Davis soared 23'9-1/2", for his best leap of the year. City College also won both relays, with Joe Jones, William Wilder, Ron Ruffin and Willie Daigle blazing for 41.6 in the 440, and Willie Fields, Don Hatley, Daigle and Morgan Flashing 3:16.5 in the mile.

Morgan ran second in the 880, Ruffin and Wilder finished strong in both the 100 and 220, and Tavao Falo, Dave Muela, Fields and Jones all scored to add to City College's 73-point total.

Still to come are the Northern California Meet on May 20 and the State Championships on May 27, both at Modesto.

An added track note: Merritt College forfeited all six of its dual meet victories this year because sprinter Ralph Walker was ineligible. Coach Roy Caldwell said nine of his players had been challenged by Conference officials, but all were cleared except Walker, who did not register for classes this quarter. Walker was withheld from competition in the Conference Meet, so the T-Birds do not forfeit their second-place finish.

The JC baseball season is finally over, and the Rams finished on a victorious note. City College won three of its last five games to post a 9-12 won-lost mark for the year. The two losses were to league-leading College of San Mateo (6-3) and runner-up Chabot College (4-2). CSM and Chabot blitzed the Golden Gate Conference this year, finishing 18-3 and 17-4, respectively.

The Ram victories were against Foothill College (featuring Dave Weidinger's 4-0 shutout), Laney College and Merritt College. The Rams exploded for 20 runs in the last two games, displaying the power that had been somewhat dormant during the rest of the season.

At press time, no final statistics were available, but will appear in the next issue.

Water Sports

Dennis Glass is literally a one-man team.

The only City College representative at the State Swimming and Diving Championships in Pasadena, Glass shattered three of his own school marks to qualify in the 200 Intermediate, the 200 Fly and the 100 Fly. In the finals, Glass (City College) finished ahead of 19 of the 39 schools that entered, including San Jose City College and Laney College of the Golden Gate Conference.

The State Meet was replete with records this year. Of the 16 events, eight new national marks were set. Although none were set by Dennis Glass, he proved that he is the finest swimmer in City College history.

As an afterspalsh, congratulations should be given to Nick DeMay, who set a new school mark in the 1650 Freestyle this year: 21:23.5.

SPEEDSTER — Cirilo Morgan, record breaker in the conference half-mile run.

Bye Bye Baby

San Francisco has lost a monument . . . named Willie Mays.

During the past two weeks, rumors flared indicating that the Giant Superstar might be traded. Many hoped that such a transaction would only remain a rumor but now it is a fact.

New York City, where he broke into his fabulous career, is waiting with a palpitating heart. The New York Mets, the Cinderella team of 1969, are now assured a "return bout" from the man who is now only second to Babe Ruth on the All-Time home run list.

Horace Stoneham, Giants' owner spoke quietly of it at first but later, readily validated the possibility. In doing so, he has caused more harm than good, especially in the case of Willie Mays.

Included in the balance for the one-time MVP (Most Valuable Player) in 1954, there was to be Giants acquisition of sorely needed pitchers in a season that has relegated the team to the cellar standings.

Thrown into the conversation popped up names of Jim McAndrews, Jerry Koosman and others. In exchange, there was stipulated that Mays would be comfortably retained after his playing days are over.

Everything seems set and both teams will benefit. But as in life, nothing is perfect.

There consequently followed friction that brought out hurt as well as anger from a disillusioned Mays. Certainly he thought, as did the most avid Giants fan, that his decade of spectacular play warranted a better fate.

He instead was traded in the same manner as a young child being led to his first day of school, with a smiling mother and suddenly, left. Horace Stoneham didn't even "spend the time of day" to discuss at that time, a possibility that involved trading Mays. Ironically Mays regarded him as a real friend.

As Mays puts it, "After 20 years with a team, a man would expect the right to be consulted and have the reasons explained to him.

To add further insult he wasn't even to be traded with the same caliber ball-player as himself. Instead the Giants traded him away for a green-horned rookie known to his mother as Charlie Williams, and an undisclosed amount of some denomination.

Williams is a minor league pitcher who, although he gave a stunning five-inning performance against the Giants, amassed only a 5-6 record. The Giants at the time evidently thought there was talent here!

Mays, on the other hand, is a landmark that is as expendable as Golden Gate Park. He is in many minds the symbol of baseball. And it is not without reason. In his 22 years with the Giants he has compiled many accomplishments, including the MVP Award in 1954 as well as in 1965, a career high of 52 homers and is presently sporting 646 home runs, second only to the man, Babe Ruth. He was also on some 18 consecutive all star teams.

His name means all of baseball accomplishments.

Mays also is as he was then, a top money drawer. In those early days in the Polo Grounds as well as at Candlestick Park, when business wasn't there, he brought them in and certainly gave them their money's worth. It is highly doubtful and improbable that Williams will do the same in 1972.

Baseball, although many will argue with you, "till the bitter end", is just that. It is a dying sport where the public would rather spend their well earned cash for something like basketball or football.

The Giants' loss of Mays would only aggravate the declining situation of baseball.

One thing is for sure, Willie Mays' departure from San Francisco will make itself evident and it will tell in the fans' attendance.

FAMILIAR FACE — Louis G. Conlan, retired president of City College, will run for election in June to newly created Board of Governors.

Conlan Joins Election Slate; Files For CCSF College Board

After spending two years on the "outside", Dr. Louis G. Conlan, retired past president of City College is attempting a "comeback", through the medium of the elecoral process.

Conlan heads a slate of seven individuals, backed by the Friends of the Community Colleges Ad Hoc Committee, attempting to win election to the new Community College Board in the June 6 election.

The new board is the result of Proposition L, which was passed by the voters last November and gave the Community College District the right to have its own governing board. Prior to that time, the San Francisco Board of Education doubled as the City College Board of Governors.

Besides Conlan, the group includes:

Pierre Brigaerts of the Electrical Workers Union

Jolu Yedall Chin, principal of the Chinese Language School

Reynold Colvin, attorney for the Board of Education

Peter Finnegan

Lynn Giubbini, CCSF graduate and department store executive

Doris Ward, coördinator of intergroup education and administrator for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

"This is a group of individuals," said Conlan, "who are sponsored by individuals and will act as individuals."

"These people are interested in doing the best possible for City College, and in maintaining the highest standards for City College."

Stanford Professor Speaks Here Criticizes Pro-Israeli Feelings

The majority of American news coverage in the Middle East has repeatedly been criticized as pro-Israeli.

One dissatisfied observer, Stanford Professor Michel Nabti, recently appeared at CCSF at the request of the Arab-American Students Club to voice the "other side" of the question.

Nabti's first declamation was directed at the early Zionist cry that Palestine was "a land without a people for a people without a lnd."

The professor called this "a moral error," becase Palestine was never empty. The Jewish people, he pointed out, are scattered throughout the word.

"The 1948 decision of the U. N. to create in Palestinian territory a Jewish state called Israel was also immoral. No legal organizationcan write a deed for a group's country: especially when that group is disunited and exploited by its leaders."

As for the early Jewish settlers in Palestine, "They had no plans at all to improve conditions for the Palestinian peasant. They now have plans for him to be out of his land."

Further in the discussion the Egyptian position, with its wars against Israel, was defended as an effort to create and nationalize a company for running the canal that many believe Egypt has a right to.

Regarding a possible spread of Communism through Russia's military aid to Egypt, Nabti stated,

"The Arab community is not good Communist material. It wants Russia's technological and economic aid but tells it to keep its ideology."

The Arab states' support of the Palestinians is explained with the belief that Isreal plans to reclaim the lands it lost to its neighbors in wars between 1948 and 1967.

Of all the hostile forces in the Middle East the most frustrated people are the Palestinians, many of whom have resorted to guerilla tactics. "They," said Nabti, "have been damaged and are not about to accept their situation."

Although the Palestinians and Arabs virulently oppose what they recognize as Zionist arrogance, there have been no real attempts at full-scale revolution.

It is this fact that, according to the professor, makes the Palestinian-Arab cause the "just cause."

"If the Arab governments were interested in eliminating Israel, they would have done something about it in 25 years."

Professor Nabti is clearly on the side of the Palestinians who "are simply asking to be allowed to go back to their own country; and once they are there, they want to share the community's responsibilities."

Booze May Be OK for 18-Year Olds

A bill to lower the constitutional age limit to 18 for buying and drinking alcoholic beverages has cleared assembly committees and is now ready for debate and action on the floor in Sacramento.

The author of the bill, Assemblyman John Knox of Richmond, hopes to gain the necessary, approval of twb-thirds of both houses to get the amendment on the November ballot.

"Eighteen year olds," Knox argues, "have been given the right to vote and all the other responsibilities and duties of adults and I believe they should be provided all the privileges of citizenship."

Opposition to the amendment has been largely confined to members of the church, notably Protestants.

So far, Knox says, support in the assembly has been encouragingly bi-partisan.

Louis S. Simon Raps With City College Journalists

MEET THE PRESS — Louis S. Simon, Area Vice-President of Westinghouse, is questioned by students Pat Sullivan, Bill Stephens, Lloyd Ackerman, and Gary Okano.

By Marguerite Zipse

Thirty years' experience in broadcasting management was evident in the presentation given recently by Louis S. Simon, Group W, KPIX (Westinghouse Broadcasting Company), Area Vice President, to a City College Journalism class.

Self-confidence and executive leadership, plus an impressive background of radio-TV knowledge from his long years of association with the broadcasting field, "Lou" Simon came prepared with a wealth of technical and statistical ammunition for the edification of aspiring students of the communications media.

Because of the committment of KPIX not only to serve the public, which is the reason for its existence, but also to fulfill a need to uncover the problems and needs of the community it serves, Mr. Simon is involved in numerous community projects. His most recent involvement is his appointment to the chairmanship of Junior Achievement of San Francisco, for 1972-73. A few of his other involvements are as a member of the Board of Directors of the S. F. Chamber of Commerce, Big Brothers, member of Council of Bay Area Scouting, Director of Columbia Park Boys Club, and a commissioner of the San Francisco Human Rights Commission.

Simon believes that the power of TV is awesome. It is a marvelous instrument but one that can be very dangerous. As a crusader and pioneer in TV, he sees this medium as the dissemination of news, documentaries, truth, facts, and the portrayal as accurately as possible of what you see and hear.

According to a survey, one quarter of the waking hours of the American population is spent viewing TV - 11/2 billion hours of watching the screen - in an aggregate workweek of two-point billion hours.

Broadcasting is a highly competent business, according to Simon, but subject to constant change. It is bound by the rules of freedom of speech as well as all the regulations compiled by the fcc.

As to equal opportunity in employment in TV today, it is of paramount importance, whether it be in entertainment, news, political issues, children's entertainment, products, sales, promotion, or any other area of the TV industry.

KPIX only hires topnotch professional reporters. A truly professional journalist, according to Mr. Simon, will cover a story without personal bias, or interferenace from government, managers, or viewers.

The last survey taken in 1970 regarding political campaign TV time indicated there has been an 85 % increase in expenditures since 1966. The trend continues to be on purchasing "spot announcements."

In summarizing the wide variety of services rendered by station KPIX, Simon gave an outline of the programs which have been started for such groups as minorities (Belva Davis News), for women (The Bentley Affair), and children's shows (Whatchamacallit) directed entirely by the children from 7-12 years of age, as well as a spiritual program, not necessarily religious, moderated by Rev. Cecil Williams of Glide Memorial Church.

"The role of an urban TV station is changing," says Simon, "Now it is directed more towards racial and cultural groups."

For example, KPIX recently has instituted a Chinese program in the English language to serve the more than 60,000 Chinese in Northern California who do not speak English. It is a series of 65 half-hour programs called "Sut Yun, Ying, Ye," moderated by Larry Loo. In order to help the homeviewers participating in the program, KPIX has published 10,000 copies of the program in 4 volumes.

A similar program is in the making for the Spanish-speaking community of this area.

Young people were subjected to conflict and violence in the programs they were viewing. Two years ago a special committee was organized to work on special programs for children. As a result, today new methods have been presented to better serve the needs of the young. Programs to help the children understand the world they live in have been introduced in the form of documentaries, news to make current events more understandable, and other programs of educational value.

Simon believes that, while we must be selective not only for news but for all TV, too many people have doubts of what they see and hear. It is their privilege and responsibility to complain. However, too many viewers often don't like what they see happening in the area of social change and cannot accept being exposed to these stories. "It is important that we be informed about these things," he asserts, "if we are to deal with them. Generally people get fed up with radicals and their causes, leaving them to fail eventually."

As to editorials, Mr. Simon stated that TV can be of useful public service by not only providing information but well thought-out views on topics affecting the community. It is the policy of KPIX to send its personnel out to the community to uncover problems and needs which may not be important as news, but which may be of significance to the particular community to help bring about change.

Responding to a question posed by one of the students "If you were to make any change in present-day TV, what would it be?" - Simon replied after some careful thought, "Less violence."

Financial Relief in Sight Now For Calif. Community Colleges

Major financial relief for California's 95 Community Colleges received the endorsement of the Assembly Education Finance Subcommittee last week.

Assembly Bill 834 passed through its initial hearing without one dissenting vote and was sent to the full Assembly Education Committee. The bill was introduced under the sponsorship of the Board of Governors of the California Community Colleges.

Community College Chancellor Sidney W. Brossman said, "This bill will provide relief for local taxpayers and at the same time bring the State closer to the financing design of the existing Master Plan for Higher Education."

He pointed out that the Master Plan specifies that the State should pay 45 percent of program costs of two-year colleges. Currently the State is paying only about 31 percent.

The 25.6 million called for in AB 834 would increase the amount the State guarantees in the foundation support program for each full-time student from 643 per year to 706. While this does not reach the current estimated cost per pupil each year, it would raise the State's share to almost 35 percent.

The other major feature of the bill would raise the amount in support of part-time students from 520 to 583 for each 12 units (full time equivalent) being taught.

California's 95 Community Colleges currently educate some 840,000 students, with about 350,000 of them attending full-time.

"The growth of Community Colleges has been phenomenal, showing their acceptance and need by the citizens of the state," Brossman said. "In 1950, Community Colleges enrolled 134,000 students. Today there are more than six times as many students in these institutions."

"By 1975 we expect about one million students, an increase of 700 percent," the Chancellor added. "Today, 85 percent of all students in the first two years of higher education in California, private as well as public, are in the Community Colleges."

"We believe," said Brossman, "that local support is necessary in order to insure that Community Colleges will be, for the most, locally-controlled and to insure that they will be responsive to local needs."

"However, when we get to the point where local property taxpayers are providing an average of 64 percent of support and the stat only 32 percent, then I think we would all agree that the state should bein taking steps to assume a fair share of the burden. Assembly Bill 834 will do this."

What the Draft is all About

The recent developments in the Indochina war serve to emphasize the importance of knowing where and what the draft board is all about.

Free counselling is available at City College to aid any person who wants to know the rights and alternatives concerning the selective service system.

Many recent changes in the conscription system are known to Michael Mitroff and Jerry Ward, the draft counsellors. Entering freshmen, for instance, are not entitled to a student deferment. The classification 1Y has been abolished. These and many other changes will be explained to interested persons.

The time for looking into the many avenues available for avoiding or postponing the draft is before the induction papers arrive. There is little if anything that can be done once a draft notice arrives.

Draft counsellors at CCSF know how to appeal for a personal appearance, how to file for a student deferment, physical deferment, conscientious objector deferment and many others. Counsellors are also able to represent individuals in dealing with the selective service system.

It is important do be aware that draft counselling is not a way to beat the government. It is insurance that everyone has the chance to be informed of his rights and alternatives concerning the draft. Anyone male who is over 18 should take the time to see a counsellor as soon as possible. Hours are 9-2 Monday, Wednesday and Friday, and 11-1:30 Tuesday and Thursday at E109B. The phone number is Extension 535.

Bruce Bosso - wins his second bid for the AS presidency.

Bosso Wins in Dull Election — Thatcher Vice-President

Incumbent president Bruce Bosso won re-election as Student-Body President by a margin of almost three to one in the elections held here on May 17 and 18.

Prior to his election, Bosso had stated that he would resign from office next semester in order to attend the University of California. He retracted this statement after his election.

"Rumors that I plan to resign," said Bosso, "are totally false. They were started by my enemies to make me look bad."

The two day election which gave Bosso his victory attracted 418 voters, more than 100 per cent drop from the 838 that voted in the Fall of 1971.

Bosso a candidate on the Concerned Candidates Coalition slate, which swept the election, tallied 230 votes in a low key campaign. His presidental opponent, Charles Chickadel, received 82 votes.

Frank Thatcher won the vice-presidency with 167 votes.

The election also defeated three propositions, A, B, and C, which would have amended the Associated Student Constitution.

Proposition A, defeated by 60 votes would have changed the requirement for student office from a GPA of 2.0 with 12 units to a GPA of 2.0 with eight units.

Proposition B defeated 191 to 95, would have made a proposed amendment effective if it were ratified by 2/3 majority of the votes cast concerning the proposed amendment. As the article reads now and will continue to read with the defeat of B, a proposed amendment will become effective if ratified by a 2/3 majority of the votes cast in the general election.

Finally Proposition C, defeated 156 to 95, would have reduced the price of the Associated Student Card from its present $7.50 to a price not to exceed $3.00.

The local CCSF election also carried over into the national and international scene. The ballot included a list of presidental hopefuls, and a series of referendums on the Viet Nam war, a portion, homosexuality, marijuana penalities, Angela Davis, ecology and the Middle East.

Tactics rather than tenets formed the battle ground for a clash between two City College students, who stand in direct opposition over the Vietnam issue.

The disagreement was a sideline occurence of the May 12 National Students Strike, sponsored by the City College Student Mobilization Committee. The issue was purportedly concerned with the violation of free speech on campus.

Bill Turnbull requested permission to speak at the Friday rally, against turning classes into "discussions on the war" or making City College an anti-war "organizing center." These two purposes were listed on the SMC's leaflet for rally publicity.

"I was told by Jane Sica that unless I agreed to what they were trying to do, I couldn't speak." Turnbull then sent a letter to Sica, with a copy of the leaflet, again requesting speaking rights at the May 12 rally.

His letter reads in part: "The purpose of my speaking will be to urge students here not to interfere with the 22,000 students here who came here to study the courses which are being offered. Rally and speaking arrangements should be made in such a way as not to disrupt classes.

I feel that this view should be expressed and to refuse to permit the presentation of opposing points of view it is a gross violation of the very principle which lies at the foundation of student free speech."

Turnbull delivered this letter to Jane Sica, the SMC continued their refusal to allow him speaking time, and the Student Council's subsequent endorsement of Turnbull's right to present his view at the rally went unheeded.

Turnbull, who is also a candidate for the Community College Board of Governors, sent the letter and SMC leaflet to a variety of political figures and new publications, including Mayor Alioto, Dr. David Sanchez, the Examiner, the Chronicle, and the Bay Guardian.

Jane Sica's explanation of the SMC's denial of Turnbull's request began with the statement, "Bill is pro-war." She continued to say that the SMC called open planning meetings prior to the rally, and Turnbull attended a few of the gatherings.

He was allowed to speak there and voice his requests, but the other attendants repeatedly voted down his demands in unanimous decisions.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Bitterness Can Be Justified

As George Wallace was being taken to the hospital, a woman who had attended the ill-fated rally walked up to a lone McGovern supporter and asked: "Well, is this what you wanted to happen?"

Although the average person would consider this cruel and bitter, we feel that we can offer a defense for the woman. Perhaps the best method would be an address to an imaginary jury.

"Ladies and gentlemen of the jury. While we feel deep personal shock at this horrible statement, we ask you to show mercy for this poor, unfortunate woman. She is an innocent victim of a cruel and heartless environment."

"When she was but a small child, she read and heard countless stories about the lynching of black men and other minorities. After hearing her parents and other adults praise or remain silent about these occurences, she concluded that we care little about victims who are not of our own race."

"She was taught as a little girl that killing was wrong and that mankind should live in peace. Then came the war, with the gas chambers and terror bombings, and, once again, nobody cared about the other side. In war, the enemy was a faceless thing to be shot down without a qualm."

"As she grew older, she found other instances of inhumanity to reinforce her views. People cheered when civil rights workers were killed, when people trying to become equal were brutalized and murdered. Those who didn't cheer said that they didn't care."

"When students were killed on college campuses, the public insulted their memory and claimed that the students had "got what they deserved." The students' killers were exonerated and, when the Mayor of New York attended the funeral of one of the students, a group of construction workers called him a 'bleeding heart' and a 'Red.'

"Everywhere that the woman looked she saw cruelty and hatred. Whether it was in the United States, Vietnam, the Middle East, Biafra, Pakistan, violence and hatred seemed to be the proper method of dealing with groups or individuals that other people didn't like."

"So when this unfortunate woman saw one of George Wallaces' 'enemies,' she naturally assumed that he had approved of the assassination attempt. Having lived in the world as long as she had, how could she have thought any other way?"

Veterans should Act Now to Secure Finance

As the Spring '72 semester comes to a close, veterans are reminded that they have to send in their certification of attendance cards as soon as they receive them. Without them the Veterans Administration cannot pay the veteran on the G. I. Bill for the final month of education.

Specifically, the VA cannot prepare the final check for the Spring 1971fi1972 school year until it receives the "cert" card.

If the card is not returned at the end of the current semester, the veteran cannot automatically be enrolled under the G.I. Bill for the upcoming summer or fall semester.

By returning the certification card promptly payments will start automatically when study is resumed.

For further information contact the VA advisor in E-203.

For the veteran who was discharged between January 31, 1955 and June 1, 1966, eligibility for VA educational assistance payments under the G.I. Bill for schooling will expire on May 31, 1974, whether they are enrolled at that time or not.

Millions of veterans could lose part or all of their benefits if they do not act promptly.

The expiration date is fixed by a 1966 law which extended eligibility for education benefits to Post Korean veterans with service after January 31, 1955.

Each veteran has eight years in which to use his benefits.

Each veteran has eight years in which to use his benefits. Normally, the eight years are computed from the date of his release from the military service. But because the benefits were not available until June 1, 1966, when the law became effective, the eight years start from the date the benefits became available for those discharged before that date.

About 3 million veterans have not used their benefits or have used only part of them.

Veterans must have served at least 181 days of service to be eligible for educational assistance. They then earn one-and-one-half months of educational benefits for each month of military service, up to a maximum of 36 months. Those who served 18 months or more are entitled to the full 36 months.

Veterans separated for service-connected disabilities are eligible for payments as well, regardless of length of service.

IMMATURITY? — Could it be that children are sometimes more "grown-up" than the grown-ups?

Sports Round-Up

Today's Rams, Tomorrow's Giants

This year the Rams played baseball as well as the local pros, but considering the Giants' record, that's no compliment. There were some flashes of achievement in the midst of mediocrity, however.

Tharlo Johnson led the team in batting at .320, and stole 12 bases. Craig Cohen hit .291 with 16 runs-batted-in. Dave Giorgi was tops in runs scored with 20, and slugged six home runs. Randy Karp always seemed to be on base.

Still, these were not enough to generate runs for the Rams' fine pitching staff. As a team, City College barely hit .210. Even when they did score some runs, they gave away more with errors.

Consider Cohen, the team RBI leader, who also led with 15 errors. In all, the Rams allowed almost 40 unearned runs on more than 50 errors. That is enough to unnerve the best of pitchers. And on those rare occasions when the hitting and fielding were adequate, the pitching would collapse.

This type of inconsistency and lack of inspired leadership made it a long season for the Rams.

SPORTS NIGHT

Sports night is being held this evening in the men's gymnasium from 5—11 pm. The agenda will include non-varsity competition in boxing, basketball, volleyball, weight competition, gymnastics, Polynesian dancing, tai-boxing, and the finals in the current table tennis tournament.

Sports night is the brainchild of Christopher Davis, the activities aide to Dean Vester Flanagan. "The idea," says Davis, "is to promote interest among the students in the recreation facilities available on campus. You don't have to be a natural athlete to join in the fun."

In the past, Davis has experienced some difficulty getting funds allocated for recreational endeavors. Two semesters ago, for instance, there was no table tennis tournament due to frozen funds.

Davis intends to circumvent the possibility of a recurrence of the past by using the proceeds from Sports Night as proof to the Associated Students that students on campus are interested in recreation.

Tickets are on sale at the Student Union Building. The price is 75 cents for advance tickets and $1.50 for general admission at the door. There will be a free hotdog and drink for everyone with a ticket. All proceeds from Sorts Night will be turned over to the Associated Students Union.

GETTYSBURG — One of the sites that is part of our Memorial Day history

Memorial Day is a Holiday With a Conflicting Origin

Soldier, rest they warfare o'er
Dream of fighting fields no more.
Sleep that knows not breaking,
Morn of toil, nor night of waking.

How many of us have driven south on Highway 280 on May 30, and noticed the small flags waving alongside graves of the dead? Most of us know that Memorial Day is to honor the soldiers who died in wars, but how many of us know how this holiday originated?

The Greeks and Romans honored their dead by decorating their graves. The Druid's Memorial Day was on the first day of November. In Japan, the day for honoring their war heros is called the "Feast of Lanterns."

In the United States, Memorial Day has been attributed to different states. Some claim that Emma Hunter and a Mrs. Meyer started Memorial Day in Boalsburg, Pennsylvania in 1864. Others say that the custom started in Mississippi in April of 1866. Still others say it began in the State of Virginia on May 30, 1866.

In Pennsylvania, Emma Hunter carried flowers to the tomb of her father, James Hunter, who commanded a regiment at the Battle of Gettysburg. Emma met Mrs. Meyer in the cemetery, whose son was killed in the same war.

The following year the two women decided to decorate the graves again. The townspeople follwed the idea. There is now a sign on Route 322 which reads: "BOALSBURG, AN AMERICAN VILLAGE. BIRTHPLACE OF MEMORIAL DAY."

On April 26, 1866, some women in Columbus, Mississippi went to what is now known as Friendship Cemetery, where men from both the South and the North are buried. The women showed no prejudice because after placing garlands on the graves of the soldiers who fought in Gray, they put blossoms on the graves of the soldiers in Blue.

In Virginia, Miss Gibson, a nurse, sang a hymn and placed a cross in front of graves of Union men who died in a Confederate prison camp. It is said that the clouds parted, and sun shone on the cross.

On May 30, 1868 the National Cemetery at Arlington, Virginia set aside a day when flowers decorated the graves. In 1873, New York was the first state to make the day, which was first called Decoration Day but later changed to Memorial Day, a legal holiday. By Presidential Proclamation, Memorial Day is a holiday in every statein the union and U.S. posessions. It is now celebrated on the Monday of the week of May 30, except in the nine former Confederate states. These states celebrate the day on April 26, which was the last ditch surrender of a general, 17 days after Appomattox.

In tribute to all unidentified soldiers killed in action, the President of the United States annually places flowers on the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Arlington National Cemetery. Cannons boom as the wreaths are placed on the graves of unknown soldiers of all wars.

If you drive by the cemetery on 280 and look at the flags and flowers, think of this: "What is the truth mankind must learn before all wars shall cease?"

Female Vets Need More Attention

There are an estimated 2500 to 2700 veterans receiving benefits on campus, about fifteen of whom are women. Their number is small. Their needs are somewhat bigger.

Bob Hughes, president of the Veterans Fraternity here on campus, feels that women veterans are getting the shorter end of the stick.

"A lot of males look down on women because they've been in the service.

They seem to think they're different. But they have feelings and needs just as anyone else. They are discriminated against more than males", Hughes said.

Hughes stressed "I really don't feel comfortable talking for women veterans, but a lot of people against the war may object to them."

Women are welcome to the fraternity and Hughes said that a few expressed interest in joining.

The real problem is that not much attention from collegiate veteran organizations is given to these women. As Hughes put it, "They don't get the attention when they walk into an office. They should be allowed to present their views, too."

Brend Blyther, a Business Administration major, presently on a leave of absence from City College, is one veteran who doesn't see much unbalance in the scale of equality. "I've not come up against much difficulty", she said. "The Veterans Fraternity seems like it will be a big help. A person gets all the benefits as males, and there are those you wouldn't want anyhow."

Can a Maniac Pose as Christ to Serve His Purpose?

By Kathy Rinetti

Pieta, Michelangelo's world famous Madonna and Son statue, was attacked Sunday by a man claiming to be Jesus Christ.

Would Jesus Christ do such harm to a figuration of Him and His Mother?

The attacker, Laszlo Toth, had no apparent reason for his action.

The statue has been in St. Peter's Basilica for nearly 500 years. Since that time, "Pieta" has seen the outside world only once. That was at the New York World's Fair where special precautions were taken to protect this work of art from vandals. These precautions should have been an everyday thing at St. Peter's, for the world is full of sick people.

The Pieta

The Pieta will never look the same. An arm was broken off, and the nose and eye was heavily marred. Security will be doubled and the enjoyment will be less.

If Jesus Christ were to do such a thing, what would be have to live for? In days of old, when Christ was struggling to become recognized as the "Messiah," He did not commit acts of destruction to gain attention. How dare this Laszlo Toth destroy such a masterpiece in the name of God?

Toth will undoubtably spend a good portion of the remainder of his life in a sanitarium. This is to be his punishment for depriving others of total beauty.

Yes, there are millions of sick people in the world. These people bring violence and destruction upon others simply to say, "Look at me, I'm a human being too."

• Campus Views • How Do You Relate to the Campus Anti-war Activities?

By Spencer Nutting

Dennis Staker — Political Science

Personally, I support campus efforts against the Vietnam war, but I feel that its socialist direction may be partially responsible for the ever-increasing apathy at C.C.S.F.

Joan McCarthy — General Education

No one has dropped any bombs yet, so I guess they are harmless.

Lester Chang — Journalism

Regretably I don't, because I'm a typical junior college student. I worry about the future. But that will probably change when I go to State.

Ellen Nettelbeck — General Education

What activities? This is one of the ost apathetic campuses I have ever seen.

Kathy Rinetti — Psychology

When walking to class I take the leaflets but never go to the activities because of work. C.C.S.F. doesn't seem to be involved as much as other colleges in the bay area.

University to Improve Ideas Rigid Restrictions May, Go

The Reverend Mr. Albert Jonsen has retired after three years as president of the University of San Francisco. In a farewell address he presented several recommendations for the development of USF.

Referring to the policy of the University of Detroit, Jonsen advocated a kind of two-president administration where one would handle the university's public life while the other would guide the educational progress.

Speaking to 450 students, faculty, and staff, he described USF's problem as one which comes from the attainment of so much academic excellence that the result is, like other campuses, a loss in its distinguishing features.

fifiWe shall be submerged," he said, "in a sea of similar colleges unless we in fact find a distinguishable identity."

Jonsen defined distinction in terms of uniqueness, quality and notability, implying that the first two elements would automatically bring about the third.

To do this, he suggests his successor, as yet unnamed, should improve the quality of imagination at the university.

By imagination, Jonsen means "the development to imagine alternative futures, alternative ways of approach.

"While there have been outstanding examples of this kind of imagination displayed by members of the faculty and by the students, I feel the general tone of the university needs an improvement in the quality of imagination."

Acknowledging the environmental and humanistic courses already at USF, Jonsen emphasized a need for more combined efforts to "deal with the common interests in human problems, to use the departmental resources without the departmental restrictions."

He also recommended more flexibility in the rigid study formula of four years so as to allow students to make their own contracts.

Freedom of Speech ... Sometimes

"When you hold a rally it's not the same thing as an open meeting," Sica asserted. "You don't have to let a pro-war person speak at an anti-war rally."

Concerning Turnbull's major points of dissension—the denial of free speech and the disruption of classes—Jane Sica's retort was simple and concise.

She said that a basic premise of the SMC is freedom of speech, and the mobilization committee has a "gorgeous record of defending free speech."

According to Sica, the SMC has never attempted to disrupt classes, and the informational picket lines outside of rooms on May 12 were specifically directed to let all people go through.

Jane Sica felt that Turnbull not only had no right to speak at the rally, as an advocate of the Vietnam war, but that he was using the issue as a publicity channel for his current campaign.

Lawyer-Teacher Campaigns For Board

Earl Rick Stokes, candidate for the Community College District Board will speak in V-115 at 11 am today.

Stokes is a practicing San Francisco lawyer and former high school and junior high school teacher.

Active in community affairs, he chairs the program committee of the Family Services Agency board of directors and is a member of the non-victims crimes committee of the Barristers' club. Additionally he has served as a resource person for the police community relations bureau and the Mental Health Advisory Board.

Nixon's Popularity Declines

President Nixon's popularity on college campuses has fallen sharply with the renewed bombing of North Vietnam and has reached a point as low as during the Cambodian invasion, a recent College Poll published by the San Francisco Chronicle reveals.

In a poll of 341 college students across the country this past week, only 19 percent felt the president was doing a good or excellent job.

During the Cambodian invasion last year, only one of ten students felt he was doing a good or excellent job as President. It had been as high as 40 percent which was reached following the recent China trip.

The poll shows the President never had 50 percent of the students behind him at any time during his term of office.

The students reaction was evidenced by demonstrations on the campus across the country. However, as in previous years, the actual demonstrators represented a very small percentage of the students themselves.

Nevertheless, the resentment against the continued bombing, particularly in North Vietnam, has raised tempers among the students.

AT&T — "Our aim is to acquire a more racially balanced public relations staff.

Affirmative Action Program Aims for Racial Balance Here

The Affirmative Action Program of American Telephone and Telegraph Company has reached all the way across the country from New York to San Francisco.

Ronald Callvert and Frank Walsh, representatives from AT&T, are visiting campuses in an attempt to encourage members of minority groups and women to choose a career in public relations.

"We are looking at California because a large proportion of the population has Spanish or Chinese Surnames," said Walsh. "The major problem," he said "is persuading these people to leave this part of the country and come to New York."

The move would be paid for by A.T.&T.

"Our aim is to acquire a more racially balanced public relations staff. One that would be on an equal ratio with that of the entire country's population," continued.

Once a candidate is hired by AT&T he will be trained in either public relations or advertising.

Knowledge in these fields is not mandatory because the trainee is put to work under the supervision of an experienced person who will coach and train him. After the initial training is completed he will be sent into the field and train with individual telephone companies.

Salary is dependent on the part of the country in which the trainee will work after his initial training, but an average of $800 per month can be expected.

Anyone who is interested in public relations work and is of a minority group may send a resume describing experience, schooling and interests to Ronald S. Callvert, American Telephone and Telegraph Co., 195 Broadway,, New York, N.Y. 10007.

VISITOR — Andy Maker talks to honor student, Anita Billups in S-304.

Wheelchair Proves to Be No Handicap for Anita Billups in School or Life

The rolling hills of City College present a major problem to a student like Anita Billups. She operates a wheelchair on campus and encounters some steep inclines in the process. But this does not prevent her from attending her classes and graduating with honors.

Anita will be completing her studies in June with high honors and an overall average of 3.63. She has been on the Dean's List twice and hopefully will be again this semester. Her classes have been primarily in Medical Assisting for the past two years and she hopes to do medical secretarial work in the future.

Anita has been in a wheelchair "on and off" for the past 17 years as a result of rheumatoid arthritis and does admit to some mobility difficulties at City College. She drives to school but relies on her wheelchair to get to classes.

She chose medical assisting after two semesters of general studies at San Francisco State. "I've always had an interest in medicine" explains Anita. She presently is in the work experience program at Mt. Zion Hospital receiving patients in the Tumor Institute.

Previously, Anita had been in the clinical laboratory but claims that she prefers "meeting and working with people." Her work at the Tumor Institute which treats cancer victims is "rewarding" and states: "The cancer patients have more appreciation for life."

In Medical Assisting her handicap does not interfere with her skills and she plans to work at either Mt. Zion Hospital or the University of California Medical Center in the fall. The M.A. program trains its students for medical office work and light nursing duties in hospitals or clinics. Anita Billups feels this is a practical career and especially enjoys the contact with people.

Riordan, Sweeney Seek College Board Seats in June 6th Election

With over 30 candidates hoping for a seat on the new Board of Governors for the city's Community College District, the June 6 election will ask San Francisco voters to extend enough scrutiny to eliminate about 25 of them.

In such an election, it is absolutely essential to develop issues of the slightest voter interest is to be stimulated.

But at least one candidate, attorney-educator John Riordan, concedes there is no real "issue" in the race for seven board memvers.

The most important function of the board will be the approval or amending of the administration's budget.

While Riordan believes "there should be communication between the trustees and administrators, faculties, and students," he anticipates a general harmony of educational interests among the parties.

Riordan's own priorities include "developing coutses responsive to the requests of the community."

However, when asked about students' complaints concerning some compulsory aspects of college curriculum (i.e., prerequisites, classroom attendance), he replied, "it would violate the purpose of a board of trustees to meddle in such matters."

One other candidate, Dennis Sweeney, gives much of his attention to student problems. With the experience of a probation officer and social worker, Sweeney hopes to "provide parity on all committees for all those (including students) involved in the district."

Among his plans for City College are the expansion of the Work Study Program as well as the College Readiness Program.

Both these candidates are running on comparatively low budgets but with active support from community organizations.

Hongisto's Answer to Crime: Equal Distribution of Wealth

Sheriff Richard Hongisto believes he knows the answer to why we have crime. And he shared this answer with City College students when spoke to a Sociology 20 class.

Hongisto blames the distribution of wealth in our society as the cause of crime. Any society in which "the rich get richer and the poor get poorer increases crime," stated the sheriff.

Equal distribution of wealth would or will reduce crime was the idea expressed by our newly elected sheriff. Economics and the distribution of wealth influences crime and perpetuates crime.

"The classic symbolic example," he cited, "is prostitution." His arguments were:

*The girls are mostly blacks from low income backgrounds.

*The customer is usually a white middle-class businessman.

*The girl is usually arrested, the man almost never.

*A high income customer buying from a low income source.

His conclusion was: If the girl wasn't desperate and the man so wealthy that he could spend frivolously, this situation wouldn't happen.

The results of our unequal distribution of wealth is that the poor go to jail because they have no economic power, that is money for bail, and they have no political power, which is because they can't contribute large amounts of money to campaigns.

"Jails can't be changed from the inside because the powerless go there," Hongisto pointed out. "The poor only have the right to discourage." And in jail, one form this takes is the burning of their mattresses along with causing other disturbances.

The Sheriff showed that as the rate of violence is greater in a country, so is the country's idea of what the capacity of a jail should be. He believes that the "erosion of civil liberties" is related to the increase in jail-size. "The greatest freedom for its citizens is in Scandinavia," says Hongisto. "There the jail size is for 60 prisoners."

The Sheriff is in charge of 1,200 prisoners and nearly 12,000 persons are processed through the jail a year. He estimates that about 50 to 70 percent of those in jail are in for victimless crimes. Arrests for drunkeness, drugs and prostitution account for about 41 percent of this total.

Sheriff Hongisto felt that it was most important that jails or any other criminal agency can not be studied apart from society. He emphasized, "We have to understand the society we live in."

Joe Amori Retires After 42 Years of Service to the CCSF Campus

Joe Amori

"My advice to young people is just what I've always told them: 'Get yourself involved in something constructive'. To help others, and grow as a person, you have to do it yourself; no one is going to do it for you. You just have to get out there and do it!" affirmed Placement Director Joseph A. Amori, scheduled to retire this month after 42 years as a pioneer in Northern California higher education.

Probably a 500-page biography, rather than a newspaper story, would be required to do justice to the accomplishments of this gregarious and versatile man, recently incapacitated by a worn cartilage in the hip socket.

"Joe" Amori has in fact become something of a legend in Bay Area academic circles. Beginning his career in 1927 as a Physical Education Teaching Assistant at San Jose State. Amori has lent his teaching talents and administrative zeal to Oakland Public Schools, College of San Mateo, U. C. Berkeley, Golden Gate College, and San Francisco State and is largely responsible for City College as we know it today.

As an administrator here, Amori pioneered programs in Job Placement, Counseling, Work-Study, Financial Aids, Student Government, Athletics, and WWII Veterans' Groups. From 1947 to 1949 he served as advertising and business manager of The Guardsman.

Most of these activities were voluntary, without any extra pay. Among subjects he has taught are Physical Education, Mathematics, Business Education, Health, Office Management, Personnel Administration, Advertising, and even Social Dancing.

Despite this active role initiating and supervising Junior College programs and services Amori found time to devote his energies to personnel services

Guardsman Reporter Finds Writing Clinic Effective and Helpful

The Guardsman ran a story on March 16, 1972 praising the writing clinic on campus. Not content with the interview which produced the story, The Guardsman assigned a reporter to sign up for the clinic to find out if Richard Lippman and Ellen Nold would indeed "immediately offer their friendly assistance."

The results were even better than could be expected. When faced with a writing sample a grade school student would have been ashamed of Elen Nold somehow found something right about it. After pointing out the good aspects of the paper, Nold gave constructive criticism and wrote examples to illustrate what she meant. No question was too absurd to answer.

Nold then suggested another assignment along the lines she had demonstrated. Day after day the process went on. Nold was superb.

Ellen Nold, who has a Master's degree in English Literature from Stanford University, assured the reporter that Richard Lippman was her "mate counterpart."

The writing clinic started as the result of the efforts of two teachers on campus. The teacher's evaluation in the campus library described them: "Don Beike highly encourages students to speak as a person." And "Joan Wilson is highly recommended by her English 1B . . . and G5B classes."

Students at all levels of writing go to the clinic for help and corrections on their papers before turning them in. All people are met with the same enthusiastic reception and aided in their writing endeavors. This started out as an assignment. Now this reporter is taking all his writing to the clinic for evaluation.

About all that is left to be said is "write on" with Richard Lippman and Ellen Nold at S347 Monday through Friday from 9 am to 3 pm.

MOTTO — "It's never too late to learn" says Mrs. Alpha Baker, 53, who will graduate from City College in June and attend S.F. State this Fall. Mrs. Baker was honored by the Black Faculty and Staff through an awards dinner held May 23 here on campus. She received some $500 in awards including a typewriter and cassette recorded for her futher studies.

FOREIGN BOUND — City College students Rexford Swift, instructor Shirley Hoskins, Martin Gon and Jeanne Kwong. Their trip will be an educational one.

Experiment in International Living Sends Three CCSF Students Overseas

While their contemporaries are looking for employment this summer, three City College students will be taking a six seek educational tour of European countries.

Rexford Swift, Martin Gon and Jeanne Kwong received scholarships for the tour through the Experiment in International Living and the Biology 49 class.

The group will spend two weeks traveling in Germany before splitting up. During the next four weeks, each person will be living with a different family.

Except for Swift, the students will stay in Germany for the entire trip. Swift will go to Kenya where he will study Swahili and East African culture.

Three units of credit in Biology 49, will be earned by the students who make the trip.

"The goal of this program," said Shirley Hoskins, biology instructor, "is to give underpriveleged students at City College of San Francisco the opportunity to experience the lifelong benefits of foreign travel and residence while receiving academic credits which will aid them in reaching their educational goals."

Vote Tomorrow, June 6, For the Candidates of Your Choice. It is Your Right

Students Rather Switch Than Fight

Sen. George McGovern outpoints President Nixon as the presidential choice among college students, the College Poll shows.

In a remarkable switch of student preference, the South Dakota Senator has jumped to the top of the collegiate list for the Democratic nomination, largely at the expense of Senator Edmund Muskie who has faded badly on the campus since his withdrawal.

Students polled on more than 40 campuses responded as follows:

McGovern - 56 percent
Nixon - 38 percent
Undecided - 6 percent

Governor George Wallace has never been an important political factor among the nation's college students. On every poll conducted by the College Poll since 1968, the Alabama governor has received less than 3 percent of student preferences.

A political unknown among college students only a year ago, McGovern was sixth choice among the collegians for the Democratic nomination last fall.

Financial Aids Deadlines Daw Near

The deadline for current students to apply for financial aid for the summer or fall semester '72 was May 5. Late filing, however, will continue until the end of the current semester.

New students have until July 28 to file for aid in the fall. Current students have priority over new students.

Any person who is receiving financial aid now and has dropped below 11-1/2 units must come to the financial aids office for an interview with Kenneth Castellino, the financial aids officer, to [illegible] change in income, a leave of absence, in fact any change necessitates a personal interview with the financial aids officer.

The aforementioned deadlines apply to all programs handled by financial aids except Federally Insured Student Loans and work-study programs. E.I.S.L. deadlines are set by the individual banks and Work-study programs are determined by the department involved.

To receive financial aid for the summer session, a student must carry at least four units. Applications for summer [illegible] being accepted from current students of City College.

BASKETBALL COACH — Sid Phelan a winner at City College and also in Russia.

Coach Sid Phelan Returns After Successful AAU Tour of Russia

City College basketball coach Sid Phelan returned home after a "fantastic" tour of Eastern Europe with an Amateur Athletic Union All-Star team. The tour included 11 games in Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union and Finland.

The AAU team consisted of the best players from the Olympic Trials Tournament in London, Kentucky. Phelan's JC team took second place in the tourney, and he was chosen to tutor the all-stars, along with the championship coach.

Phelan said that despite the language barrier, everyone was friendly to the visiting athletes. In fact, their only problem was to minimize the activities schedule and concentrate on playing basketball.

The AAU team lost its first game in Prague, and then dropped two to the Soviet Olympic team. They finished with eight straight wins in the USSR and Finland.

Besides trinkets for the family, and some authentic potato liquor, Phelan returned with a mustache and mutton-chop sideburns.

$25 per Semester for Foreign Students

At one time there were as many as 450 foreign students at City College. There was no tuition. This meant that the approximate cost of $900 per student per school year was paid by the taxpayers of San Francisco.

The Chancellor's office made a decision to charge $14 a unit for all out-of-state students to alleviate the tax burden. The tuition applied to all who were not either American citizens or foreigners on resident visas.

In 1970 tuition went up to $30 a unit. Joseph Jacobsen, who has handled foreign students at CCSF since 1953, and some of the students went before the Board of Education for the San Francisco Unified School District and caused tuition to be lowered to $25 a unit.

The Chancellor's office set the maximum tuition for junior colleges at $25 a unit or $375 a semester in the spring of '71. Compared to State College's $37 a unit, University of San Francisco's $57 a unit and University of California's $2100 a year, foreign students still pay a relatively low tuition at junior colleges in San Francisco.

Currently City College is accepting only 40 F visa students each semester in an effort to get down to the 200 student quota. Only technical majors are accepted so that after two years trained students can go back and help in the development of their native.

Two Key Administrators Retire

Two of City College's most important administrative posts will soon be vacated, due to retirements. For Dean of Instruction Thomas D. Nesbitt and Registrar Gertrude Somerville some rest and relaxation lie ahead at the conclusion of this their last semester.

Both are 25-year veterans of CCSF's complex, hectic administrative department.

The current Instruction Office chief began his educational career in 1936 as a temporary Math teacher for the S.F. Unified School District. World War II naval service interrupted his teaching duties from July 1943 to January 1946. Nesbitt first came to City as a counselor in 1948, and was eventually appointed to the all-important Instruction position in January 1967.

Dean Nesbitt plans to retire at the end of the current semester, allowing more time with his wife and children in San Mateo.

"Trudy" Somerville began August 1, 1948 as Assistant Registrar. Her departure August 1 this year will make a total of exactly 25 years at CCSF. Describing her job as "busy", she smiled, "I've never had time to get bored, that's for sure!"

Gertrude Somerville remembered that when she began, some 5,238 students were registered for Fall '48, with no night or Summer sessions. Fall '71, however, saw 14,730 day students, some 6,000 night registrants, not to mention Summer sessions.

"It's always been one deadline after another. For my first three months away from this job I think I'll just sleep! Later I plan to do some traveling and spend time at my house in the mountains, up above Sonora" she added. "Till now I've never been able to spend more than two weeks there at a time."

Next semester's Registrar will be Kenneth [illegible].

GOURMET'S ARTWORK — Alan Brooks' Art 2B class has spent the majority of this Spring semester working on a much needed change in Smith Hall, the school cafeteria.

A mass of artistically, organized and appealing colors now draws undivided attention to the south wall.

The wall has become a canvas for a mural which is dressed with tempting oranges, strawberries, apples and grapes.

Mills Musicians Perform Bach Chopin and Schuman for CCSF

Thunderous applause reverberated through the Arts building May 18 as musicians from Mills College performed varied musical selections before a large group of City College students and faculty.

Mezzo-soprano Margaret Gorhan, currently student-teaching a piano class at City College, opened the concert by singing four Spanish fold songs by Manuel De Falla. This was followed by songs describing nature in its many forms composed by Robert Schumann.

She was accompanied by Betty Woo, a San Francisco Symphony award-winning pianist. Following these performances Betty Woo played piano music by Bach and Chopin.

The last selection was Chansons Madecasses for voice, flute, cello, and piano. The first and third songs were reserved in character, while the second song gave a warning cry against white colonialism.

Other performers were Barbara Bernhard, flute; Corrinne Antipa, cello; and Rae Imamura, piano. The group was conducted by Jean-Louis Leroux, oboist with the San Francisco Symphony and conductor at Mills College in Oakland.

Bay to Breakers — Sweat, Guts and Chaos. But I'll Be Back

By Joseph M. Tamez

Ever since I read that headline in the newspapers I've wanted to try my hand at running it. When I first suggested it to my wife she just laughed. But, she knew I meant it.

Anyway, the big day arrived before I knew it. We got up early on the day of the race so I could get an early start on working up my courage. Breakfast consisted of two large glasses of Gator-Aid mixed with a little honey for energy. By the time we got to the starting point, Embarcadero Y.M.C.A., runners were everywhere. Big ones, little ones, men, women, and children.

The building is about sixty years old and smells heavily of age and dust. Mix that with the odor of 2,585 pairs of tennis-shoes and brother, you've got some smell!

They gave us free physicals; some guy with a stethoscope lifts your shirt, listens to make sure your heart's beating, and stamps your hand with a red star - which signifys that you're alive. Then, another guy hands you a number and points out the un-dressing rooms.

You walk in to put on your running togs . . . all kinds of chatter: "Boy, I hope those ten beers I drank at the club last night don't bother me Don" . . . or . . "Yea, this is my first one too. No, I won't be trying real hard, I'm just doing it for the fun of it to see if I can go the distance.

Outside, guys are doing impressive-looking exercises, others are just talking, still others are running around. The kids begin to chase each other as their eagerness overcomes their patience. Groups of wives sit in family cars, chatting about everything and nothing, looking sleepy.

The weather is overcast, cool, and breezy as the runners begin to migrate towards the Spear Street starting line. My wife kisses me good-bye/luck then heads towards the East-Bay Terminal, the No. 38 Geary bus and the finish line at the opposite end of town. By pre-arrangement, she will fill me in on the exciting finish as I fill her in on the start.

Ten minutes to go. I do some quick laps up the block and back, just enough to raise my body temperature and get my adrenalin flowing.

The starter's gun booms out the start and a tremendous roar is echoed throughout the city. Besides the press, about 3,000 Instamatics snap their shutters. I plan on starting dead-last (for the pychological advantage of passing a few runners, I hope) so I just walk as do the others who have elected to avoid the starting jam.

Some guy in a gorilla suit comes bouncing up drinking wine out of a goat-skin and 200 cameras snap his picture simultaneously.

About three or four minutes after the gun, the crowd finally begins to thin out. Most of the tail-enders are laughing and joking freely as they, at least, are in this for fun - as am I.

The Howard Street hotels are alive with people who normally are less than that; distrubed awake by the thundrous roar of 5,170 tennis shoes, several dozen police motorcycle escorts and various cat-calls, cheers, jeers, trumpet-charges and obscenities. Yes, folks, that is burning rubber you smell.

Up Ninth Street now and I'm wondering how long it will be before my strength begins to go. We pass Market Street, turn up Hayes and for the first time are able to see the enormity of this race. As far as one can see up Hayes Street runners cover the street. Man, will they all make it?

The hill gets steeper and I'm beginning to feel pretty good. As I pass a nice-looking young lady, I grin and her glance makes me take back that last thought (we're not all male chauvinist swines, lady!) so I step on the gas a little and graciously pull away.

Surprisingly enough I'm almost over Hayes Hill (Hell) and I've got plenty of power left for the park. The black kids on Divisadero are flashing black-power salutes and peace signs at us as we turn the corner and head down Fell Street.

I spot a runner who really has class: tight levis, black cowboy shirt and black cowboy boots. He's wearing an official number so I know I'm not delirious yet. The guy I'm passing next is huffing along and at his side, at the end of a ten-foot leash - yep, his dog. A cute little black curly one. The pooch seems to be leading by about five feet.

Into the park now . . . ahh, those cool, cool Pacific breezes. I see a Red Cross unit, hope they will not be needed, but they are. One runner, at least, will be glad he went down so close to them.

Further along, another gallant gentleman is being attended to by a host of friends as they lift his legs, allowing the lungs more freedom. So intent am I on these unfortunates that I've forgotten that I, too, am beginning to tire.

Another man goes down, hard. I slow down, remembering the small plastic flask of Gator-Aid and honey in my back pocket - my emergency restorative in case I go down. I throw it to the two men who have gone to his aid, hoping it helps. Hopefully, if I fall it will be close enough to the finish line so that they can just drag me across as they administer oxygen.

We're passing the buffalo herd and that means I'm only a half-mile or so from the END. Trouble now, traffic. God! Can't those idiots at least turn off their smoky engines? And the Sunday bicycle freaks. I guess they think it's cute to zip in and out between tired, stumbling humans who are not aware of their antics.

The beach! Turn! There it is! Now I turn it on. Look, folks, watch me fall on my face! I'm barreling into a lot of runners. Whoa, Joe! Whoa! But I can't. My body is stuck at full speed ahead. Fellow runners to the rescue and I thank you, whoever you were.

My wife rushes over to my side and says something I don't understand. I bend over and barf but nothing comes out, my breakfast long since perspired out, my dinner gone to energy. So I stagger along, barking like one of the seals lounging out on that sunny rock barely a stone's throw from the finish line.

The jam of runners gives everyone time to regain their composure. My sickness past, Isabell is retelling me about Ken Moore's come-from-behind win, but I'm not really listening. Thoughts of those poor unfortunates, the dog, the effort, all the "incidents" that make up the Bay-to-Breakers. Now I know what they mean by "breakers."

As I pass along through the line, which gets progressively thinner, the official referee hands me a popsicle stick with a number on it. Mine says 1,357 and I don't know if that's my time or position.

A lady at a table hands me an "official B-B certificate," another one gives me a tiny bottle of orange stuff and my popsicle-stick gets taken away from me to record my position.

At last it's really over! So many things will be said about this year's run, journalists will write of it for days. Participants will re-live it until World Series time. Some, will never do it again while most, barring illness or death, will be back next year. I know I will.

Meeting Popular Demands — Is That Really Good Democracy?

For many Americans, the right to vote is one of the most treasured of all duties of citizenship. With this in mind, a few words of advice about today's election are in order.

Understandably, most people will vote for the candidates who will do what the people want done. While there is nothing basically wrong with this approach, it does contain a possible pitfall for our society.

Contrary to popular myth, the best interests of democracy aren't served by electing men and women who are mere puppets controlled by the strings of public opinion. For this reason, voters should elect people who will try to do what is right rather than those who will do only what is popular.

Knowledge of the issues is an important part of voting intelligently as well. Prospective voters should make use of every opportunity, whether in the media or elsewhere, to find the best decision on each issue.

Yet of all the problems that face the American electoral system, none is sadder than the number of people who don't bother to vote. Although discrimination, illiteracy and fear may prevent many people from voting, the fact remains that many Americans stay away from the polls due to laziness or apathy.

One suggestion for solving this problem is to make voting a requirement, as in the case of paying income taxes. But much resentment would be caused by this method and it may create a system where people vote out of fear of punishment rather than concern for their country.

Until each American is willing and able to participate in the electoral system, no law can make us a nation of concerned citizens.

EMPLOYMENT — Jobs for newly graduating students begin in the Placement Center in S-134. The grads are interviewed there by the prospective employers.

Jobs for Vets Available

A $500,000 grant from the Emergency Employment Act, is making it possible for some CCSF vets to get part-time jobs. The Veterans Educational Incentive Program was established last October and began placement of vets last January.

Sponsored by the Community College District, the program is designed to give vets an incentive to go to college and to keep those already enrolled in attendance.

According to program director Gary Tom, "Placement is our major problem. At the present time we have 168 vets on waiting lists and some have been waiting as long as four months."

Open to all full-time students who are veterans of the Vietnam Era, the program pays vets $2.53 per hour for a twenty-hour work week. Employment is restricted to agencies or organizations receiving city or federal funding.

One of the highlights of the program is that vets get to choose the area in which they wish to work. The only requirement placed upon the vet is that he obtain a sponsor within the agency he works. Employment will continue on through this summer into next semester.

Any instructors on campus who could use a school aide may contact Gary Tom at the Community College District Office by calling 864-3200, ext. 251.

The Next Two Weeks May Determine the Next Four Years

With the 1972 election campaign in full swing, candidates are placing importance on individual primaries. In Oregon, for example, McGovern was the only major candidate to campaign there while Humphrey stayed away calling it insignificant. But there's one primary they wouldn't miss for the world: the June 6th primary here in California.

The one outstanding comment all candidates are making is that California is "the big one", "winner take all". (The candidate who achieves plurality wins all 271 delegate votes.)

So with the primary only two weeks away, political eyes are sharpening their sights on the Golden State. This is the one they're saying that will be the deciding factor at the Democratic Convention in Miami Beach, and the campaigners aren't about to let the California voter forget it.

Three TV debates have been scheduled prior to the primary for the benefit of the voter. McGovern and company are planning to contact all registered Democrats and here on campus speakers are representing their choice for the June 6th decision.

It's becoming rather obvious that the major candidates are using some psychology on the voter. By building up the importance of the California primary, voters will hopefully be more motivated at voting time. The question arises, whom will this build-up benefit? Surely it will benefit the contenders, but what will it do for the individual voter? If it makes the voter more aware of the issues, the man who wins the election had better take extra care to see his campaign promises through to fruition.

We'll have the results of their efforts on June 6th. Only then will we find out to what degree the voter accepted the challenge. But to modify a popular phrase, what would happen if they held an election and nobody voted?

- Phil Bazell

With Hoover, the Image Outlasted the Man

J. Edgar Hoover, who became the first director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is dead.

During his 48 years of service he built quite an image. He was able to build a functional machine, which ran without difficulty.

Somehow Hoover managed to keep the F.B.I. out of politics, but he could always manage to play a political game or two. In 1968 he played the political game by reacting with asperity to Eugene McCarthy's calls for his resignation.

In the last few years, his bureaucratic sharpness grew dull; not only because of his age but by maintaining the position too long.

Hoover built a mysterious file on prominent United States citizens ranging from the film star to the president. There wasn't anything Hoover couldn't find out about any given person.

He is credited with the discovery that the atom bomb secret had been stolen and given to Russia.

His government agents captured such criminals as John Dillinger, George "Baby Face" Nelson, Charles "Pretty Boy" Floyd and "Ma" and Fred Barker.

Before the end of the 30's, Hoover was able to say that not one organized crime gang was operating.

The Warren Commission accused the F.B.I. with negligence after President Kennedy's assassination, for not informing the Secret Service that Oswald was in Dallas at the time of Kennedy's visit. Hoover contended that Oswald's presence at the time suggested no danger.

"Total security for the President of the United States is ridiculous," Hoover said in an interview in December 1964.

In 1964, he observed his 40th anniversary as director of the F.B.I. by warning of communist attempts to penetrate the civil rights movement.

After Black riots spread across the nation he spoke of them as representing "a senseless attack on all constituted authority without purpose or object."

In testimony before a House Appropriations subcommittee on February 23, 1968 Hoover said Black nationalist groups and students of the new left posed a threat to the nation's security.

He named the student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Black Muslims and the Revolutionary Action Movement as part of the threat.

There were calls for his resignation from some legislators. Republican Hale Boggs of Louisiana accused the F.B.I. head of adopting "the tactics of Hitler's Gestapo and the Soviet Union."

Boggs even charged the F.B.I. tapped the telephones of Congressmen.

Hoover's mandatory retirement at age of 70 was waived by President Johnson and waived again by President Nixon.

It was obvious that the aged F.B.I. director had grown out of touch with the needs of his country on the domestic level.

His insensitivity to the cries of our nations minority groups was proof that he had overstayed his welcome in such an important office.

Certainly the man had done his job when he was needed; but it seems he got tired with age.

Now that the office of director of the F.B.I. is vacant we are in great hopes that Congress will take its time in selecting a new director and set certain limitations on the length of time one can hold the seat.

WALTER KRUMM — I'm the head as long as everyone agrees with me.

Campus Drama Department Is Not Only for Actors

The fact that theater is such an integrated part of San Francisco gives the drama department at City College a distinct advantage over drama departments at most colleges and universities.

Many students at CCSF are actually into theater while they are still in school. Others go into Bay Area theater from CCSF.

Tim Dungan, a former drama student at City College, is now the general business manager of the San Francisco Ballet. Dennis Hudson, a current student, is designing commercially and has to his credit the sound track for the art exhibit on the Stein Collection last fall. Some students are in ACT and others are in the local black theater productions.

Drama is taught at City College from two perspectives. Teaching the arts and skills needed in acting is one aspect of the drama department. Each semester two major productions are presented by the department in addition to various minor productions. The Little Theater on campus is used for these productions and is recognized as one of the San Francisco theaters.

Another aspect of the drama department at CCSF is the teaching of courses that deal with the study of drama and the techniques used to produce plays.

The study of drama is not restricted to those students who have theatrical aspirations. It is helpful in teaching commercial dramatic techniques which are useful in any career, especially a career in teaching. An acting class is helpful in building the self-confidence and poise needed when speaking before unknown people. Performing on stage is also good for easing tensions and soothing aggressions.

The drama department is different from other departments in that there is no department head as such.

Dr. Walter Krumm described himself as the putative head and explained that as meaning "I'm the head as long as everybody agrees with my decisions." Other members of the staff include James Haran, James Orin, Glenn Nance, and the stage technician, Luree Baker.

Future May Bring Perfection—At a Price

Ecology realists, space buffs, one and all, you can now eat your pop corn in the very same theatre. Silent Running will bring you together.

The space age clock is set ahead, when the earth has found remedies for its diseases of war and poverty. The weather is pleasantly regulated to 75 degrees everywhere all year 'round. But in the process of reaching this utopia, our gentle, tiny ball has destroyed all its own plant life.

Bruce Dern, astronaut in a mammoth space station for eight years, has the sole task of keeping the final remnants of the earth's vegetation alive.

His only real assistance comes from two midget-sized robots, known as Drones, whom he ultimately names Huey and Dewey.

Told that the mission is to be scrapped, our American space man and his two lovable companions break away past Venus, unwilling to let his forest decay.

Silent Running is a bizarre and beautiful film that boggles the imagination. The director, Douglas Trumbull, who did most of those startling special effects in '2001', is a wizard for entertaining the naked eye, filling it with outstanding, breathtaking sights. Technologically speaking, Trumbull has a work of art for himself.

Dern, the star, who carries most of the film alone, was formerly the kind of actor who people could only recognize the face but couldn't place the name. That was because he was the guy who was always killing some defenseless old man or something, professionally known as the heavy.

Dern is first rate in his performance, heartwarmingly easy to like and respect, giving depth and meaning to his portrayal.

There is scarcely a dull moment because the film adds dry humor to suspense and mixes it with a strong shot of tearful sadness.

Unlike some films, this one was not edited and thrown together just to save on cost, or to get it out on time to reflect the mood of the public. It has been done with just the right grain of class.

Sports Round-Up

Track Team Places 1, 2 & 3; Rams Chosen Conference Firsts

by Emmet Barton

City College track team streaked to a respectable finish at the Nor Cal Meet on May 20. The Rams placed fifth among the 26 junior colleges in competition.

Cirilo Morgan paced the Big Red's spurt with a winning time of 1:51.9 in the 880. Both the 440- and mile-relay teams placed second, and Ron Ruffin ran third in the hundred-yard dash to close the Ram's scoring.

City College has come on strong in post/season competition bellying their depressing Conference finish. The Rams just didn't have enough team depth to win many dual meets, but had enough fine athletes, led by Morgan and Ruffin, to finish high in open competition.

Writing a baseball article this far after the season is like flogging a dead horse - a simile most appropriate considering the performance of Coach Domecus and Co. But there are some final congratulations to be made.

Tharlo Johnson was chosen for the All-Golden Gate Conference First Team. Johnson led the Rams in batting, was second in RBI's and led the league in stolen bases.

Other Ram stars were Dave Giorgi, the league's home run leader, and Steve Pointer, who was tied for second in complete games and finished fourth in strikeouts.

MASSIVE DISTRUTH! - In this column last issue, it was reported that the Rams batted only .210 as a team. It is now noted, with apologies, that the final team average was .253.

What Was the Happiest Day of Your Life?

Vince Poelma - General Education
It was the day I got out of the Army! I started a whole new trip. In the service I was expected to mimic the behavior and ideals of others.

Jim Howard - Photography
The day when I left America! Just compare what's happening here with what's happening in other countries. How many people in America are happy? Other countries are different.

Rodney Walker - General Education
When I had my first son, Terry. I had been hoping for a boy and that's what I got. It really made me happy

Jeffrey Wolfe - General Education
Probably it was the day of my first successful gig with a rock and roll group. It's really gratifying in so many different ways, when everything clicks and goes off right.

Paul Anderson - Spanish
I really hated the service. The day I got out of the Army was my happiest. The first thing I did was get really drunk, and it felt great.

Farewell, Alma Mater, Farewell

Although there are no plans for a formal graduation exercise at CCSF this year, THE GUARDSMAN thought that some students might want to have their own private sheepskin presentations.

In an effort to make the occasion ring with the true sound of the halls of ivy, we herewith offer the official CCSF Hymn with Speciql Commencement Chorus:

Alma Mater of our hearts
Blessings be thine ever
Though we travel distant parts
Alma Mater of our hearts
Blessings be thine ever
Though we travel distant parts
Lose thee we will never.
For on mem'ry's sea of years
Thou wilt ever sail
Here's a toast through shining tears
To thee Hail! Hail!
(Special Commencement Chorus)
Time has flown and we must leave
Halls that bid us stay;
Friends for whom we'll ever grieve,
Found 'long thy dear hold,
We've but wishes well.
God protect thy might soul
Farewell, Farewell!

Fairmont Hotel Owner, Benjamin Swig Visits City College

Have you ever wondered what it would be like to talk to a millionaire? Someone of the calibre of Rockefeller or Getty? Benjamin Swig can fulfill that desire, and did so in an interview with City College journalism students last week.

Perhaps it was a boyhood of picking blueberries and selling newspapers to help his family. Or perhaps it was his rise from these humble beginnings to financial greatness. Whatever the reason, Bn Swig, owner of the Fairmont Hotel, civic leader and millionaire philanthropist comes on as a one man public relations campaign for the Horatio Alger concept of success.

His biography is almost textbook in style. The son of a Russian immigrant, Ben Swig recalled working during the winter, to help pay for his older brothers' college education; his own was terminated at high school.

Fortunately, during this period of history, education was not the only force that directed men. There was something else that could help achieve prominence — ambition.

It was this ambition and the practice of a simple time-proven philosophy, "honest days work, for a good day's pay," that was responsible for netting his original fortune in real estate, in the early 40's.

In 1945, he bought the Fairmont Hotel which was then what they called "an old lady's home." He went on, joking, "You could shoot a cannon through the lobby and not hit anyone." But timing, hard work, and a bit of luck changed that. As anyone can see, today the Fairmont is one of the finest hotels in San Francisco, a landmark.

Now established in the City, a hotel magnate with interests in several major cities, Swig has put his money and genius to work for the community. His influence ranges from medical research institutes to the dilemma of the "South of Market" resident.

SURPRISE VISITOR - Before leaving, Swig paid an unannounced visit to the Hotel and Restaurant department. Seated around the table are Peter Cistaro, instructor, Brig Misra, Bill Church, Swig, and Rosalanie Ho.

MEET THE PRESS - Lloyd Ackerman, Ben Swig and Marguerite Zipse. Swig met these and many other Journalism students during an interview at the Guardsman.

One of the current results of this influence was the building of a theater at Letterman General Hospital. Insufficient funds had prevented the building of the theater. Consequently, big name performers couldn't entertain there because of the lack of facilities.

Making a deal with the government, he donated half the money ($175,000) necessary for its completion, his feelings being, "I've made a lot of money and I'm trying to spend it while I'm alive. That's the way I get my kicks."

"You young people," Swig said "should work hard at your education and take advantage of the opportunities for employment and advancement that you have in this country."

On the problems of unemployment and welfare recipients who have limited opportunities for advancement, Swig commented: "I feel that the job situation will improve. As for the welfare, I feel that it is a real problem. If people want this kind of air, they should be willing to take a job or job training. there are jobs for those who want them."

Swig first came to San Francisco in 1944 and has been a resident ever since. Being a leading civic power as well as a big booster of the city, he has some definite ideas on redevelopment.

"The South of Market," stated Swig, "is an eyesore that must rebe redeveloped. I agree with Judge Wiegin that we must find homes for the people who are presently living there, but we should clean out this area as soon as possible."

And what did he think of highrises?

"I think that they are here to stay and will help the city immensely. One way they will help is by bringing in increased property tax revenue."

"The highrises," continued Swig, "will not necessarily destroy the beauty of San Francisco. For instance, the Transamerica Pyramid was built in a way that permits people to see the view between the buildings."

Students Express Two Different Views of Fathers' Day

By Margarete Zipse

Before Father's Day officially was set apart on the third Sunday in June, special celebrations to honor fathers in various parts of this country originated independently on different days of the calendar year.

The first suggestion on record came from a lady, Mrs. John B. Dodd, of Spokane, Washington, in 1909. She wrote to the president of the Spokane Ministerial Association proposing that the third Sunday in June be set apart for honoring fathers. Her idea stemmed from her admiration of her own father who had successfully reared a family after the death of their mother.

When President Wilson pushed a button in Washington, D.C., in June of 1913, unfurling a flag on the platform at a Father's Day celebration in Spokane, Washington, Mrs. Dodd organized a Father's Dav Association.

"Honor thy Father and thy Mother" has its rewards for the writers of verse, florists, confectioners and tobacconists. On such occasions, Mothers laden with sweets and flowers, and Fathers with tobacco. cigars and bright neckties, murmur docile "thank yous" for their offspring's thoughtful gestures and loving pharases.

And, what of the sons and daughters of the mothers and fathers? Ah, but wait! There is a Children's Day as well.

Like so many American customs, the observance of Children's Day has its roots in the old world. In the Roman and Lutheran churches, May Day was the day on which children were confirmed. The children carried flowers in a procession to the churches, which is probably why Rose and Flower Sunday were first given to a celebration honoring the child. To conform to the season of flowers seems a natural reason for changing the date from May Day to June.

The earliest known observance of this special day was on the second Sunday of June, 1856, in Chelsea, Massachusetts. The Reverand Dr. Dr. Charles H. Leonard, pastor of the Universalist Church of the Redeemer, arranged a social service for the children. He called the day Rose Sunday. Later it became known as Flower Sunday. In the of a few years it was called the day Rose Sunday. Later it became known as Flower Sunday. In the course of a few years it was called Children's Day.

Children everywhere throughout this land, be ye young or old, remember to celebrate "your day" on the second Sunday in June.

Soon it will be summer. A special holiday with no special date is round the bend of the seasonal calendar. Exams are over! School is out! O' Happy Day!

by Gary Okano

On Father's Day, like every Father's Day for the past 12 years, Harould S. Barnes' two little bastards will try to remember to say "dad" to Uncle Harry. To Barnes' sons, Uncle Harry is the man they respect the most.

Unlike most illegitimate fathers, Harould Barnes treats his sons as if they were brothers. Almost every day of the week, he goes to their houses and takes them together on trips.

In Spring, when the baseball season starts, he gets his boys from school and takes them to the first Giants game of the season. When football season starts, he always makes sure he has three season tickets to the Oakland Raiders games. Unfortunately, this year he could not manage to get three Raiders tickets, so he went out and got three 49'er tickets.

By convincing their mothers to move into his apartment building, his sons were able to do things together. When one has a study problem, he makes sure that he gets the other to help him, even though the other may not know as much about the subject.

In sports, his sons play on the same basketball and baseball teams. Barnes is always at their games, rooting for the two to do well, as most devoted fathers would.

As with most good fathers, Barnes taught his sons discipline and to respect their mothers. He made sure the boys studied well by going to their rooms and helping them out. The boys were taught to finish things they start. When they joined a team, for example, they would play for the entire season.

Whenever either of his sons had problems they could not solve, they would go to Barnes' apartment and ask for his advice. To them, Barnes had all the answers, and he would give the boys reassurance and tell them not to worry so much about their problems.

Although the boys know their relationship to him, they have deep respect for him as a father.

"We are luckier than a lot of legitimate kids in our neighborhood," boasted one son. "Uncle Harry talks to us more and takes us out more than most father do. He is very understanding when we get into trouble," the boy added.

The other said, "As long as Uncle Harry loves us, I don't care if we are illegimate."

Harould Barnes is as proud to be a father to his sons as his sons are proud to have him as a father. To Barnes, legitimacy does not qualify a man to be a good father.

"Since when does love have to be legitimate?" Barnes questioned and then added, "I figured it is legitimate enough when I am devoted to my kids and to their mothers."

Dean Lesher Feels That Suburbia Papers Are "Growing and Vibrant"

By Pat Sullivan

The suburban press is "the most rapidly growing newspaper in the country," says Dean Lesher with parental pride. Being the owner of 14 surbaban papers, Lesher is positively convinced that "the surbaban field is most growing and vibrant."

A corporate lawyer who bought his first newspaper in Nebraska, Dean Lesher is now President and Publisher of Lesher Newspapers, "Progressive Hometown Papers in California's bustling East Bay and fertile San Joaquin Valley."

In a recent interview with the CCSF Journalism 21 class, Lesher announced three modern and distinct changes in newspapers.

"Today there are more papers and fewer owners; group ownershi- is growing," he said. He cited the Santa Clara County reduction from 8 dailies to its present three. "The other five didn't offec enough geographical interest to interest advertisers."

Many "small, puny, rundown" weeklies are being bought by major dailies and Lesher gives vredit to the surbaban shopping center for this. He noted that the big city downtown stores are closing because of the expansion of suburban branches, which means a cutback in the big city dailies advertising. He sees the end of the big NEW YORK TIMES within 20 years.

"Only compulsion and desperation would lead a man to invest in a big city newspaper."

Changing production techniques is the second revolution in newspapers. His company is building a "Hot Metal Production Museum" in memory of the old hot metal machines which could set a maximum 7 lines a minute. It has recently purchased a new photo composition machine which can set 100 lines a minute and Lesher says there are machines that can do 1000 lines per minute.

The picture he presented of the future is one that would make Herb Caen or Charles McCabe cry. Typewriters will be replaced by computers, editing will be done by the reporter watching his story typed out on the screen above him. But Lesher is still convinced journalism, especially in the suburbs, is just starting a new era.

GO SUBURBAN — Newspaper owner Dean Lesher talks to Journalism students J. Richard Wolff and Alan Whiteside about the bright future of suburban newspapers.

have more money to build a better staff," he says.

The type of news and reporting is the third change. "Local news reflects the diversity of the community," says Lesher who also believes there will be more openings for good qualified reporters. He emphasizes the role of the investigate reporter who should be "a person of a certain nature, an inquisitive nature, one who won't be stopped, be very patient, have a superior intellect, with training in darn near anything. Suburbia is an area of action, of happening, of interest."

Despite his success with his 14 dailies and weeklies, his 45 % interest in twice weeklies and his ABC radio station in

Home Economics Courses Offer Background in Home Living

Betty Headricks, here for one semester as temporary head of Home Economics at CCSF, believes that the home is the family basis of American life. "It is our job to try and make that arrangement better", she said.

"We're all concerned with homes and families, such as the economical aspects of budgeting with money for food."

Headrick's department is also interedted in teaching clothing courses and consumer education.

The purpose of Home Economics differs from school to school, but basically it tries to give background in helping with home living. As Betty Headricks put it, "Whether taught in scientific or art form we want the course to enrich people's lives."

Asked if she felt that women take the course with ideas of becoming good housewives, she replied, "That's a traditional thought. I don't think it's that way now. The institution of marriage, I believe, still has a place. But others feel differently. So marriage is not the central thought."

Some courses are more formal than others, with much discipline in reading from text books. But Headricks, even though she has lectures in her classrooms, thinks it is basically informal. "We try to present a variety of approaches", she said.

A basic problem the instructor faces, she said, is lack of interest of students who aren't enthused or seldom come to classes. "But the rest of the segment of students are pretty hard working."

Headricks also noted that there have been complaints by those who cannot even get into these classes.

The lovely substitute department head said she'd rate the lab equipment as good, but not excellent. "We have good quality but little quantity. We could also use more staff and then offer more courses when the money is available."

Probably less than half the students will major in this field, Headricks pointed out.

"Home Economics has gone through a great transition in the past ten years. It has changed to meet the needs of the times."

Contrary to some male beliefs, Home Economics is open for both men and women.

"We'd love to fellows around", she said.

New Building Need

EDITOR'S NOTE: The following story appeared in the June 11, 1952 issue of The Guardsman.

When the proposed classroom-library-building, now in the planning stages, is finally completed, it may bear the name of Could Hall in respect and tribute to Archibald J. Cloud, president-emeritus of the college.

This was the unanimous decision of the Student Council last week at its student government banquet as it paid its respects to the former college president who "played such an important part in the establishment of student activities at the college."

The Student Council passed a resolution that the Board of Education approve plans to dedicate the new building as Cloud Hall, in honor of the former president.

Superintendent of Schools Dr. Herbert C. Clish said he would present the resolution for approval to the Board when it re-convenes in August.

From such time as the board would approve the resolution, Dr. Clish said, Dr. Cloud's name will appear on the blueprint and eventually on the building itself.

Tutorial Center Works To Stop Drop-outs

The Tutorial Center is tutoring about 600 City College of San Francisco students a semester with about 125 tutors. Dr. Lance Rogers, a Physics instructor, started the Tutorial program about four years ago when a great number of his students were dropping out.

He decided that many of them dropped out because college work is difficult and they need help. So Rogers started tutoring in a little booth on the first floor of the Science building. It became so popular that the administration moved him to S-347 and established the Tutorial Center.

The Tutorial Center used all of its $15,000 budget this semester and could have used two to three times that amount.

Tutors are either paid $2.53 an hour, given units, or are straight volunteers. Dr. Rogers says that what they need is more volunteers.

The students are generally exceedingly complimentary of the tutors. Very few students complain and some are grateful for excellent results.

The 'Golden Years' Phase Out - Pioneer Amori Exits Jogging

in the U. S. Navy. Rising from Lieutenant Junior Grade to full Captain in 16 years active duty (almost unheard of in non-combat duties), he published numerous personnel manuals and surveys.

During the Korean conflict he served as Commanding Officer of the Oakland Airmen's Training School, since deactivated. Innumerable special commendations were awarded for his accomplishments in areas of service, morale, recreation, training, public information and personnel administration, in units and bases throughout the world.

Throughout these varied careers in Education, Athletics, the Navy, Journalism, and Community Service, Amori has been a prolific writer, publishing books and pamphlets on a variety of topics: The Junior College and Terminal Education, See Mexico and Live!, The Relief of Hypertension Through Deep Breath Exercises, Why Junior College Students Withdraw, to name a few random titles.

At home in the city, Joe Amori reflected on his experiences in community college education. "We started City College in 1935 with a faculty of 77. Only two of those people will be left after this summer. To me the first five were the school's 'Golden Years'. This was during the Depression, and there was a closeness and affection among faculty and students, a sense of being together, on a team. Those days are long gone, and we can't turn back the clock.

"The problems facing education today — money, population, conflicts and tensions — seem almost insurmountable. It will take strong, capable leadership on the part of everyone to move the school ahead and bring back some strong, positive morale."

As for personal plans, Amori confided, "I have a few irons in the fire. I'm mulling over 2 or 3 job offers; but mostly I want to write. I'll have the time now to sit behind the typewriter and knock out things I've been meaning to do. I've led an active life, and I enjoyed it all!"

Has the weak hip slowed him down? Amori laughed, "It's stopped me from jogging! I hate to sit! I've lost 15 pounds sitting around. Your cartilage is what absorbs all the weight and stress in your body, and eventually it wears out. It's like the problems ball players have with their knees. My doctor talks about replacing it with plastic cement. But I'm gonna fool them all. I'll be jogging again before they know it!"

Considering Joe Amori's amazing life and improbable feats, we — unlike the doctor — wouldn't be at all surprised. His retirement from education leaves a gap in administrative leadership not to be easily filled.

Subcommittee Views Admissions; Against Lowering Requirements

A state-wide subcommittee recommended last week that admission requirements at the University of California, the State University and Colleges and the community college campuses should not be lowered to meet minority demands.

The recommendation was made to the Select Committee on the Master Plan for Higher Education by its own subcommittee. It came despite pressure from minority groups to give them free access to the nine UC and 19 state universities and college campuses.

The Delect Committee was appointed by the Coordinating Council for Higher Education to review the master plan and recommend changes. Like its subcommittee, its members consist of both educators and non-educators.

The subcommittee chairman, Louis Heilbron, said there is "little evidence that tinkering with admission standards would produce any substantial beneficial results."

"Lowering admission requirements would likely produce higher attrition in order to preserve quality or would result in a lowering of quality", the report stated.

Under present regulations, UC takes the top one-eight of high school graduates, the state colleges take the top one-third and the two year community colleges take everyone who applies who is 18 or who has a high school diploma.

Heilbron noted that even if admission standards were lowered at the four year institutions the campuses are so crowded now there would be little additional room for any more freshmen.

The subcommittee report also recommended that the University of California, which community college graduates have the greatest trouble getting into, lower admission requirements for such transfer students to 2.0 (a C average).

And to make room for such students coming in at the junior year, the subcommittee recommended each public four-year campuses lower the number of freshman and sophomore from 40 percent to 30 percent of the undergraduate enrollment.

FLEUR DE LIS - This floral display in the French tradition won third place in CCSF's 14th Annual Floristry Department "Open House" contest for Grace Komaki from Japan. The show was held recently here at City College.

Senate Cuts Out Cal's Tuition

After a setback in the Finance Committee, an amendment on the University of California budget to abolish tuition was passed last week by the State Senate.

On a vote of 22-14 support for the amendment was almost entirely partisan with 18 Democrats for it and 13 Republicans in the opposition. If the amendment appears in the final draft of the state's $7.76 billion, Republicans will anticipate a veto of it by the governor.

The amendment's author, Senator Walter Stiern (D-Bakersfield), said the student fees were ordered in 1970 when the state sorely needed the funds, but that no such need currently exists.

Stiern's opposition to the university's tuition was also influenced by the fact that only $1.6 million of its $26.6 allowance is going to financial aid despite claims that the fees would account for a substantial part of scholarships for students who normally can't afford the costs of attending a UC campus.

Photography Head Speaks Out On Misused and Lost Equipment

Consider a photography class here at City College which loans equipment to its students for their use. And consider an estimated amount of losses of $2,000 a semester, give or take a few hundred, and the result is a very serious problem.

This has been the situation in City College's Photography Department which now employs a full time Civil Service lab attendant to reduce this rate of losses. Bev Pasqualetti, head of the Photography Department, claims they "check 165,000 items in and out a semester, which is a low conservative average. With that much equipment being moved about there's bound to be a certain percentage which will be lost."

The photographic equipment which is out of circulation deprives students of their chances to experiment and to learn from it.

Losses usually occur when a student has legitimately checked out an article. Pasqualetti explains that "students never show up again, are careless and damage the property or lose the equipment." He cited an example of a camera that was run over by a trolley car.

"The student is responsible for anything checked out as it belongs to the City and County of San Francisco" declares Pasqualetti. The Photography Department strives to help the student replace lost or damaged articles. "Minor things can be absorbed", says Pasqualetti, "but the big things handicap the department." When more expensive items are stolen the school turns the case over to the police department "after a reasonable amount of time."

Overcrowded conditions add to the thefts. Next semester, class size will be decreased "where students can learn more and teachers can teach better" pronounces the head of the department.

"It will be fairer to the students and better to the instructors." He explains there are about 400 students and two buildings being used by photography students presently.

Teacher Puts History To Music

Not everyone can conduct a history lesson and a sing-along at the same time. One such exception, folk music pundit San Hinton, was the last feature in this semester's Concert and Lecture Series.

Equipped with guitar and harmonica, the fifty-one year-old Hinton set out to review the significance of folk music since the 16th Century; but for most of his audience, it was an excuse for a good song-fest.

Hinton introduced his program saying, "Folk music increases the drama of an event." From there, he gave a recital of either extremely raucous or maudlin songs, with notes on their places in history.

He performed 18th Century lullabyes, complete with realistic animal sounds; as well as songs about the New World, the move west, and religious songs.

Eventually, the audience requested that Hinton play more popular tunes. Then the entire Little Theatre broke out in choruses of Woody Guthrie's "This Land Is Your Land" and Pete Seeger's "Rainbow Race."

When the spectators departed, the mood was not like that of students leaving a common history lecture, but rather from a pleasant and refreshing diversion on an other wise languid campus.

Universities of Future Aim to Cut Study Time

Classes on weekends, quicker routes to a bachelor's degree and "mini-courses" are among 37 pilot projects unveiled by the California State University and Colleges yesterday.

The $1.3 million in pilot projects is "a comprehensive plan to effect innovations that deal realistically with the changing requirements of the 1970's," Chancellor Glenn Dumke said in a statement released in Sacramento.

Money for the projects comes from the state college and university fund for inovation and improvement, created by the legislature this year.

Here are some of the projects planned on the 19-campus system:

Self-Pacing—At California State College, Bakersfield, students can set their own academic pace and earn a B.A. in either more or less than the traditional four years.

Weekend College—Trial teaching at the "Weekend College" for persons whose jobs prevent them from attending classes on weekdays, begins this spring at California State University, Long Beach. The Saturday and Sunday courses — featuring teaching teams of six professors — are in the lower division.

Mini-courses—The Fullerton campus will offer "mini-courses" differing in timing, duration and unit value from the traditional semester or quarter courses.

Mix—"A Community Access" project at California State University, San Diego will move education off the campus by a "media mix," including television, radio, cable communications, the mail, conference telephone calls and tutors.

Computer—Students at several campuses, linked by a central network, can use computers for drillwork and testing. "The approach is expected to provide significant instructional cost savings," a spokesman said.

Work Experience—At California State College, San Francisco, students can petition for academic credit based on knowledge and experience acquired off campus in fields such as foreign languages, humanities and business.

Bosso Resigns, VP Takes Charge

Exit Bosso, enter Thatcher in a pinch-hitting demonstration of the emergency assumption of authority in a student government's heirarchy.

An upward shift in AS officers became necessary when council members discovered that president-elect Bruce Bosso had transferred from City College and registered for the fall semester at U.C. Berkeley.

As the next highest-ranking man in the lineup, Vice-President-elect—Frank Thatcher rose one political notch to assume new responsibilities and privileges as City College's AS president.

"It was rather shocking," commented Thatcher, "but now that I'm in, it's okay. Do you remember those rumors about Bosso transferring to Cal? Well, they were true."

Several other position changes were effected during the September 18 Student Council meeting. Edward Blanco was voted in as Vice President, and the three losing candidates with the greatest number of votes assumed council positions left open by the authority change.

The renovated Student Council lineup is now established for the Fall semester with fifteen members: Frank Thatcher, president; Edward Blanco, vice-president; and council members Juan Galvan, Salvador Flamenco, Jose Gallo, Robert Hughes, Kenneth Craig, Kenneth Adair, Lance Burton, Joseph Lee, Anthony Morgan, Ralph Schoenstein, Johnnie Yim, Deborah Ann LeStrange and Kerwin Chan.

Steel Shape Graces Hilltop

WorldScape III is the new metal sculpture that has been installed at the south entrance to Science Circle drive. The sculpture is the work of Armand J. Trehan.

This is the first major piece of art work for the college since the Diego Rivera mural in the Little Theatre.

Trehan's sculpture was commissioned by the San Francisco Art Commission and donated by that agency to CCSF. A city ordinance states that 2 per cent of the construction budget of certain buildings is used for the commissioning of works of art.

A second metal sculpture will be installed at the north exit of the Science Circle drive as soon as the concrete foundation work is completed. This sculpture is titled Wyoming Coup, the work of Bill Wareham.

The CCSF Works of Art Committee, which was created in Oct. 1971 and met in January of this year, took action to get the new sculptures for the college.

The Committee hopes that in the future, sculptors and architects will collaborate to create new works of art for the college.

A new mural in the northwest corner of the cafeteria is also in the planning stage.

Medical Campaign Opens with Dental Care and Influenza Shots

Two student health advisers in S-190, Fran Gage and Elizabeth Braun, have been passing around leaflets on low cost immunizations and free dental care.

The first of the two immunization programs, which consist of flu vaccine and tetanus toxoid, will be October 5. The second will be on December 7. Both day's admitting time will be 10 a.m. to 12 noon.

People who have chronic heart ailments, respiratory diseases, diabetes, or renal disorders should refrain from getting the flu vaccination, so that their unhealthy counterparts can receive adequate protection.

Injections will be administered at S-190 for $1.50 an injection. Screening for allergies that can cause harmful reactions will be done prior to immunization.

As for the free dental care, consultants from the University of California Medical Center will be here to examine students, who can sign up for care prior to Oct. 4-11.

The consultants purpose is to screen out students that have family dentists, money to afford care, or both.

The less fortunate, who "deserve the break," will be treated at the Mt. Zion Dental Clinic. Others will receive information on low cost treatment.

In addition to treatment and information directing students to low cost dental services, the consultants will give raps on nutrition, cleanliness and other areas relating to healthy teeth.

Dr. Harry Buttimer, City College President, extends welcome to all new and returning students and wishes them a successful and rewarding semester.

Student Council:

College Board Action Opposed

The Student Council met for the second time this semester in an attempt to deal with the pressing obligations of student government.

First on the agenda was the announcement of a council member being seated to fill the vacancy of a member who was elected, but is no longer a student. Alex Hannah is the new council member, replacing Kerwin Chan who was expelled for lack of attendance.

The Council also heard several proposals from various groups on campus who are seeking office space in which to conduct their affairs. The two groups are the Revolutionary Communist Youth and the Christians On Campus.

The proposals were tabled for lack of office space at this time and also to check with the District Attorney's office to get clearance for RCY as a valid campus group.

Concerning more pressing matters, the council voted to compose a written objection to action of the City College Board of Governors, in changing their meeting place from the campus to the Board of Education downtown. With the Board of Governors meeting off-campus, the Student Council and consequently the students would be unaware of decisions made by the Board until a day, or as much as a week later.

With the Board meeting downtown, away from the school, it was charged that the students for whom the decisions are presumably being made would lose the ability to protest immediately, if necessary, the decisions of the board.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Jazz at Keystone Korners

The music of McCoy Tyner at Keystone Korner recently, can best be described as fiery, frenetic, and emotional; or perhaps "spiritual" is a better word. Most of the music was raga-like melodies, with the instrumentalists giving each other that precious gift of sensitivity and understanding.

On this tour, McCoy employed the services of Calvin Hill, a bassist from back east (Philly, or N.Y.) Alphonse Mouzon (of Weather Report) and Sonny Fortune who played Soprano and Alto saxes, and Flute. As a unit they played well and each seemed to know what the other was trying to do.

Even on a Sunday session the house was packed—as it was every night. Herbie Hancock and his trombonist, Julien Priestler, happened to be in on Friday night and had to endure the same agony of crowding while enjoying musical ecstasy.

Keystone Korner, 750 Vallejo Street in North Beach, is where all the goodness unfolded.

In upcoming weeks the agenda includes Sonny Rollins, fresh out of retirement, Les McCann and Joe Henderson, to name a few.

The Keystone has a relatively good atmosphere, and there is no pressure to buy drinks.

Admission, however, is $3. If you like jazz, chances are your money will get you a mindfull.

Politics Mar Olympiad

Most of us have been, or are, members of some type of organization or club. Whenever the organization planned an event, committees where formed to see that everything ran smoothly during the event.

The job of the International Olympic Committee is the same, to make sure everything is done the way it should be during the games.

The Committee was run by its now-retired president Avery Brundage, an 84-year old to whom the words "politics" and "nationalism" were like four letter words to the parents of an eight year old child.

According to Brundage, politics and nationalism did not exist during the Olympic Games, but in the Games just concluded in Munich they ran rampant.

There was a period of time when there was doubt that the Munich Games would ever get under way. Black African nations might not have come if Rhodesia had not been "disinvited." Also Russia might have withdrawn, in order to score political points with the Africans. Rhodesia was not there, but the politics and nationalism were, with the killing of the Israeli athletes, and the action of the Olympic Committee toward Vince Matthews and Wayne Collett.

The killing of the Israeli athletes was clearly a political move on the part of the Arab Black September group to bring more attention to the Arab refugee problem. If there was any country in the world which did not know about the Israeli conflict, they undoubtedly do now.

The way the medals were given out at the Games reeks of nationalism, but the Olympic Committee is not the only group to blame. Part of the blame must go to the news media. What Matthews and Collette said, in effect, is that we are all equal, but they were barred from further competion in the Games.

When the medals were awarded, the first, second and third place winners would stand on a raised platform, with the first place winner standing higher than the other winners. The national anthem of the first place finisher's homeland is played while the flags of the other medal winners are raised. The media would then report that thanks to the efforts of the winning athlete such-and-such a country had won its third medal of the Games.

Vince Matthews explained that he was no better than the second place finisher Wayne Collett, and also that it was not the United States who had won the medals, but he and Collett. Matthews invited Collett to stand with him on the first place platform. The two talked with each other while the anthem was being played, instead of standing at attention. For this they were excluded from future Olympiads.

As long as politics and nationalism remain in the Games they will never be a contest between individuals, but between nations.

University of San Francisco College Players will open their fall season with the city's first staging of Arthur Kopit's "Indians."

Set within the framework of a carnival, "Indians" is the tragedy of the native American relived in the agony of William Cody over the wrongs he committed as Buffalo Bill.

The play will be presented in the Gill Theater at USF on Sept. 29-30, and Oct. 5-7, with an 8 pm curtain.

General admission to "Indians" is $2.50, $1.00 for students, available through the College Players ticket office.

Season tickets for the San Francisco Symphony will be made available to students only from October 2 to 27 at the school bank in E-207.

The reason for the student-only sale is a larger than usual pre-season inquiry into ticket availability.

This stimulated Merritt Beckerman, the head of the student symphony season ticket sales program, into restricting sales.

Beckerman wants to make sure that students have a better chance to purchase season tickets than the faculty, who can purchase tickets after Oct. 27th at the school bank.

The sale hours are from 9 am to 11 am and from 1 pm to 3 pm daily. Additional information about pro-rated tickets to individual concerts will be available at A213 from 10 am to 11 am, MWF after Oct. 16th.

Further details will be posted on the school bulletin boards.

Respect for Speakers:

Let's Have a Little Quiet!

CCSF will have many guest speakers and performers come to the campus this semester. Members of the faculty and students will also speak before the student body.

Hopefully the audience will show more respect to our guests than was displayed last semester.

In the past it has become obvious that as time for exchanging classes approaches an increasing number of students in the audience begin to leave.

While performers or speakers are still speaking the noise level increases. Sounds of lifting chair seats, collecting books, talking, and—most disturbing of all—the opening of doors followed by unwarranted slamming, seem to continue incessantly.

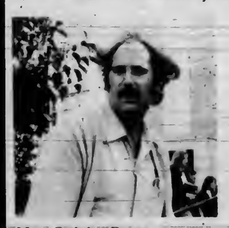
The departing students and unnecessary noise must have upsetting effects on the guest lecturers and performers.

For those students who are not attending classes or who know they will have till ten minutes past the hour for their class to begin, these distruptions render the guests inaudible.

Waiting for a suitable break in the program might conceivably cause someone to be late for class. This is not, however, usually of major consequence. If an excuse is needed, being respectful to invited guests should be acceptable.

More careful planning should be made by the committees sponsoring the guest speakers and performers.

Programs should be planned so there is a break when classes are to begin.



Speakers should be informed, so as to make such an announcement to their audience.

If everyone cooperates, speakers and audiences alike will reap the maximum benefit from the programs presented.

QUESTION: Have you ever been propositioned?

Mary Guthrie—Drama

Yes. What I thought were two lesbians. It happened on 3rd St.; they asked me if I wanted to walk with them, but I told them I was too busy.

Milly and "Sativa"—Living

Oh yeah! A dirty, creepy old man on Oak St. once asked me to go to his house and talk with him a while for $30. I told him I was too busy, so he doubled the price. I still said no.

Carla Stelling—Business

This guy that picked me up while I was hitchhiking asked me if I needed some extra money, but I told him I wasn't that kind of a girl. Then he let me get out.

Lloyd Ackerman—Broadcasting

Yes. But my wife shouldn't know about this. I was grabbed by a prostitute in Tijuana, Mexico once, but I decided against accepting the lady's offer.

Phil Tarley—Cinematography

Just this morning I was propositioned to buy a lid of grass but I'm waiting for the California Marijuana Initiative to pass so I can buy my herbs from Uncle Sam.

Frank Wodrezka—Political Science

Sure, I've been propositioned! A dope proposition: running some dope across country, but I turned it down. It was a little bit too dangerous, especially through those "redneck" states.

FEATURES, NEWS AND REVIEWS

Audiovisuals: Stop, Look, Listen

Under the library, at 249 Cloud Hall, there is a listening and viewing center that has cassette tapes, filmstrips and loops, slides, and recording facilities for student's educational use.

The listening center's selection of cassette recordings covers everything in music appreciation in addition to a selection of poetry and drama.

For future secretaries who want to improve their shorthand, the listening center has recordings for dictation practice.

When it comes to film loops, Health Education comes out on top, but students of Physics, Business, and Library Technology don't suffer too much, as their taped lectures are accompanied by slides.

Nevertheless, no one is left out, because the listening center's film loop selection covers everything from Arts to Physical Education.

Language students can supplement their labs with tapes on English, Chinese, and French.

For those with speech problems, there are recording "closets" which are open to everyone's use, but especially to those who record for the blind.

City "Bids" Playland Adieu

The laughing lady known as Ms. Sal, though seemingly tattered and grayed, still broadcasts a voice from another era. Small crowds of men, women and children still linger about as if waiting for something to happen.

And something did happen on a cold and dreary September day as once again the relentless sweep of progress made itself evident. San Francisco's famous Playland was finally auctioned off.

It was both sad and bizarre viewing the present scene at Playland. It was once the "Santa Cruz" of the Bay Area. To many San Franciscans, it was as big an attraction as the Golden Gate Bridge.

In what seemed destined to be the social gathering of the year, bidders and visitors crowded Playland for the last time. People were milling about impatiently.

A little lady even came with season tickets for the admission fee of $1-to ride and play concessions which are now defunct.

But all visitors came to attention as bidding for the artifacts of Playland began. The auctioneer, Bernard Osher, brought constant attention to some 366 items ranging from gems to junk, depending on the buyer's point of view. These were sold and carried away with, "Boy, I sure got a deal!"

Besides the many individual bidders, many members of the carnival world were also present. They bidded competitively with their business counterparts. One such demonstration of heavy bidding came about in the acquisition of a "ball thrown at the piled-up milk bottles". The "milk bottles", in fact, turned out to be stuffed cats.

Wally Yee, owner of Royal Pacific Shows in Honolulu, won after a "ping-pong" battle with someone who managed to bid $90 dollars. As for the concession: "I plan to keep it as it is and put it back to the life where it belongs," Wally stated.

Other customers were satisified to buy park benches for $15, pinball machines for $80, a whole unit of a "Big Dipper" ride for $100.

Those who didn't get what they really wanted usually found something else to buy. This was not true in the case of the long-awaited bidding for the 18-ton Carousel, however. Despite the moans and groans of the crowd, it was sold for the grand total of $45,000.

Many had hoped the beautiful antiquated horses and giraffes would be auctioned off separately.

Deidre Letchworth came to bid with the idea of buying one animal. Asked why she had such a yearning, she bellowed, "Because I want one!"

People in stylish dress were shoulder to shoulder as at a championship football game. They soaked up the sun in all its glory while consuming tons of hot dogs and hamburgers.

That was 30 years ago. Today, having succumbed to crime, drugs, vandalism, and just plain deterioration, apparently Playland's "time has come."

Playland's future? Jeremy Ets-Hokin has a plan to build an auto-free community to "keep people in the City."

As one drives by the now lonely and empty area an elderly man is seen reading a faded sign: "Anyone Can Win." Evidently Playland couldn't.

"SNAKE" ON CAMPUS — Concert series is kicked off by Karl Severeid, bass; Alice Stuart, guitar and vocals; and Bob Jones, drums.

Country Rock at College Hour

Unusally fine country-rock music by Alice Stuart and Snake marked the start of the Fall '72 Concert and Lecture Series, September 19.

Fortunately Alice Stuart and Snake bore no resemblance to Alice Cooper and his boa constrictor, as some had feared.

The Alice is very much a female, as her song lyrics amply demonstrate: "Now you've got to set me free. I'd do it for you, baby—now do it for me," or "He can come down easy, he knows how to please me, again and again."

A slender, fuzzy-haired, funky lady, she wails in a sort of country-blues voice which can call to mind vocals by Cold Blood, Mother Earth, or even Janis.

While ringing out sharp-edged licks on her guitar (which must weigh twice her weight), Alice looks a lot like Terry Garthwaite of Joy of Cooking, although her voice is more versatile and she gives the impression of being more aggressive in her guitar-work.

When it comes down to full-tilt boogie, in fact, Alice Stuart and Snake can probably "outcook" even the Joy. And that, as any Bay Area music freak knows, is praise indeed.

Alice's recently-acquired backup men, alias "Snake" are Bob Jones on drums and Karl Sevareid on bass. They are good.

Somehow bands consisting only of lead guitar, bass and drums plus many amplifiers often end up sounding like a lot of uncoordinated noise—witness Blue Cheer, Grand Funk et al.

Snake manages to produce an overall blend of sounds that is at least as satisfying as several well-known groups with twice as many members.

Due to a dearth of advance publicity the Little Theater was half-empty at 11 a.m. but began to fill as music resonated through the building. The audience was surprised and enthusiastic, forcing the group to play past the 12 noon deadline, when the building is used for classes.

The trio live in Marin and thus will be playing the bay area clubs. Alice also has two albums now on Fantasy, (the label best known for Creedence Clearwater). The first, "Full Time Woman", was solo. Her second album, with Snake, has just been released.

Alice Stuart could be compared to many other lady vocalist-guitar players and Snake can be compared to other rock trios, but in the final analysis they are unique in their blend of country, blues, rock and folk distinguished by eloquent lyrics and tight, clean instrumental solo.

With all they have going for them it shouldn't be long till they're headlining at Winterland.

For those who missed seeing them at school for free, we extend our condolences and advise checking the bulletin boards once in a while and, of course, read The Guardsman!

Rams Romp, Then Slip

After a fine pre-season performance at American River giving City College a win by a 24-8 margin, the Ram "Football Machine" ran out of gas.

Gavilan, capitalizing on City's inexperience and three counts of roughing the kicker, rolled on by with a 18-13 victory.

Head Coach Elston without a doubt was not taking it "sitting down" as he installed more emphasis on the fundamentals which may make City a stronger contender.

"It was a game in which we beat ourselves. We just took too many risks," reported Elston.

At the game's onset, the outcome was dubious as there were overt indications by both defenses that each wanted this first game. To the surprise of many, there was a showcase battle of the coach's thoughts as both defenses hovered over the offensive maneuvers with a Scrooge's tight fist.

Led by defensive standouts John Wells and Homer Lewings, shown to be of an aggressive nature, and a "give it all" Ron Weaver, City played a line coaches dream by allowing only 28 yards on the ground.

Gavilan, however was the first to score with a one yard smash by hard running halfback Ushery late in the first quarter. Obviously not wanting to move away from game plan, the Rams retaliated in the second quarter.

With a 33 yard touchdown pass by quarterback Joe Dutto to open-armed end Siegan Keys. City left the first half, thanks to an Ackerson kick, with a seven to six point lead under their belts.

But, as with best laid plans, tragedy struck.

Gavilan defender Crabtree, with one of his tree arms pulled down one of three intercepted passes by Dutto for the day and ran it back 45 yards for a touchdown and a go ahead score of 13-7. From this point, City never did recover as Gavilan quarterback Burgess fired his first and only ill-timed touchdown pass of the day. It was good for 28 yards.

Quarterback Dutto, despite only completing 8 of 25 passes, did amass 129 yards. He showed again a promising consistency with his second touchdown pass to Keys in the final quarter for 20 yards.

Believe it or not, this is the year of the Ram. With a strong one-two punch from Dutto and Keys and with a likewise explosive running back in Cordell Hawkins, who ran for 90 yards, the Rams can produce the offensive punch needed to win games.

Let us not forget the defense. Led by the bone-cracking antics of center Frank Viata and Linemen Lee Britton and Homer Lewings, the defense is beginning to "gel" as a unit which will solidify as the season progresses.

XX Olympiad: For What It Was And Wasn't Worth

Perfection, followed by tragedy, dishonesty and politics spelled "Olympiad 72." Individual athletes found themselves entangled in the web of political injustices.

Driven by some supernatural power to achieve perfection, athletes journeyed from all over the world expecting to compete on a fair basis. The scars of injustices inflicted upon these victims of circumstances cannot be erased.

From all the corruption, few signs of man's international brotherhood managed to come through. In spite of the obvious partial judging, Olga Korbut, through her self-determination and radiating personality, gave evidence we are all in some way tuned in on the same frequency. Her Russian heritage and skin pigmentation were not visible to those who were fortunate enough to see her on TV. Olga Korbut was portrayed as a peaceful human being.

Reginald Jones of the USA's boxing team undeniably defeated his Russian opponent. He stood through the seconds of the official decision-making anticipating sure victory. Before the eyes of millions throughout the world, Jones saw his long-awaited dream destroyed.

Rick DeMont, 16, of San Rafael, was stripped of his Gold Medal and barred from future participation in the games because of a dope test which proved positive. Ephedrine, sold over the counter without a prescription for asthma victims, but banned by Olympic rules, ultimately robbed Rick of his victory and chances for any other. Unfortunately, Rick learned too late of the drug's illegality in the competitions. DeMont's closest competitor refused the Gold Medal claiming "the medal belonged to Rick."

In spite of the many apparent injustices, Mark Spitz somehow managed to achieve total perfection. He won seven Gold Medals. Spitz's dedication and sacrifices paid off. His rewards will no doubt be numerous and longlasting.

Alexander Belov of the Soviet Union made a "third chance" shot to give the Russians an extremely controversial 51-50 basketball victory over the Americans. The United States team had a 63 game winning streak. The Americans were so disillusioned they voted to refuse the Silver Medal.

If all politics were eliminated and an impartial judging system based upon individual competition were established, hopefully "Olympiad 76" might go down in history as the event which bridged the gap between all men. Ultimately, it might be the link to "peace."

Until such time as all men are judged for their individual achievements and efforts, the world will remain a Munich 72.

★★ DUTTO OPTIMISTIC ON FOOTBALL FORTUNES ★★

Let it be known that Joe Dutto, City College's No. 1 quarterback, doesn't ponder the sting of past experiences. What he does ponder is how to win.

In a disappointing debut, an enthused football unit involved themselves in a game that "could have gone either way." Unfortunately, it went the wrong way in an 18-13 loss to Gavilan.

City on the whole played very well despite the fact she was riddled with the usual edginess of a young team. One of the stars, Joe Dutto, who believes the way to win is to stay in the bosom of the pocket, was a determining factor for City's offense as he accounted himself with a performance that produced 129 yards while passing 8 for 25 passes.

Despite the loss he didn't see it as the permanent menu for the remainder of the season. In fact, he's optimistic.

Although his offensive line played sufficiently, it was obvious that despite his penchant for winning, his low percentage (bark)ue to, as he put it, "mainly inexperience." But he speculates blooming maturity as the season moves on.

As for targets to throw to; Dutto may have found a threat in Segren Keys, a recent Balboa High graduate who caught two touchdown passes.

Meanwhile, he has a sound backfield in halfback Hawkins who turned in a flashy performance with a 90 yard total by the end of the game.

As for the upcoming game against an apparently huge defensive line, which is led by a 6 foot 7 inch behemoth of 330 pounds, a confident Joe Dutto confides, "It will be a passing game, but don't bet on it."

There are many questions left to be answered but with a man at the helm who knows only that all he can give is his best, you can bet that not only Joe Dutto but the rest of the CCSF football team will make it worthwhile to see.

Fresh out of the Air Force, he has qualities that could just make him the target of stardom. To top off his advantageous attributes of a 6 foot 1 inch frame and the ability to run, he has an arm that can propel the pigskin like a screaming cannonball with uncanny accuracy.

"I realize the key role that I play, one which not only means being the team leader, but psyching them up and making them work as a unit. As for me personally, I want to go into every game where I'll be sure of myself. Winning is the only reason I'm out there," he informed Guardsman sources.

VOLUME 75, NO. 2 — CITY COLLEGE OF SAN FRANCISCO — OCTOBER 5, 1972

Student Council Allocations Cut By Ten Per Cent

Nearly 25 political, social, and athletic organizations on campus this semester will receive less funds than those approved by last semester's student council.

The change in allocations occurred over the summer, after the term of last spring's council expired, when Assistant Dean of Students Vester Flanagan declared the council's budget for the fall illegal because of certain ineligible members.

In late August, Flanagan reported to Dean of Students Ralph Hillsman that the chairman of the June budget meeting, Associated Students President Bruce Bosso, and a number of council members did not meet grade point average requirements of the A.S. Constitution.

Flanagan then submitted for administration approval another budget based on "the legal recommendations of a constitutional Finance Committee."

The Finance Committee, made up of students appointed by the council, passed a budget that diverted over 10 per cent of a $46,000 base from "illegal" allocations to other organizations getting little or no money in the council-approved budget.

The spring council's fiscal authority was defended recently by the current A.S. President, Frank Thatcher. "I feel," he said, "that the last council was a representative body of students."

"Dean Flanagan's decision to veto and reallocate the budget was not justifiable. Taking the recommendations of the Finance Committee was wrong because its members were not elected by the students."

Vester Flanagan
Asst. Dean of Students

Thatcher also stated that the "school constitution clearly gives the student council 'final authority' in the affairs of the A.S."

Thatcher suggested that Flanagan should have checked into the grades of council members before their terms expired; and that an emergency session of representatives could have been called in the summer.

However, the reply from Flanagan is, "I had to wait until the final grades came in before I could make any judgements. By then (late June), it was too late to establish a new council."

"There needed to be a budget for this semester, and I felt the best thing to do was to consider the recommendations of the legal Finance Committee."

Although the Dean's decision made a number of people in student government unhappy, no effort has been made to reverse it, if only for the simple reason that it is irrevocably in effect now.

Was Last Election Legal? Council to Check Charges

Charges that the Spring 1972 Student Council is an illegal body and should be disbanded in favor of re-examination of credentials or new elections, are now being investigated by a special council committee.

The committee was formed after a council meeting last week when Charles Chickadel, a candidate for Associated Students President in the Spring elections, delivered a "manifesto" pronouncing the present student government "unconstitutional."

Chickadel's declaration contends, among other things, that too few students, 400 out of 15,000, voted in the previous election. One charge is that students were "not made aware of the impending Spring election," and that a news blackout of the election prevailed in The Guardsman.

But according to A.S. President Frank Thatcher, "Three weeks before the election, signs were posted all over campus, and I saw some coverage in The Guardsman and The Free Critic."

Another charge, aimed at challenging the eligibility of Thatcher to hold office, was based on certain constitutional requirements for units carried by A.S. officers.

Each A.S. officer is required to have completed at least 10 units in the semester previous to the assumption of duties. The complaint of Chickadel's manifesto is that Thatcher, who carried only nine units last Spring, was "unqualified at the time of the election to hold office and yet was certified anyway."

Thatcher, whose six summer session units were added to his Spring total through an action of the first council meeting this fall, answered the charge with, "there is nothing in the A.S. Constitution about candidates," noting that requirements applied only to office holders.

That reasoning would seem to justify the council's decision to interpret previous semester units to include credit from summer classes.

However, Chickadel maintains the council's decision came out of a meeting in which, "no minutes were taken so it is impossible to establish, except by hearsay, that a quorum was present."

The manifesto insists that the meeting violated a section of the A.S. Constitution which requires the council to "publicize and open all meetings to the students."

Claiming the support of City College Veterans, La Raza Unida, and the Experimental College, Chickadel promises to go to higher authorities, possibly the Board of Governors, if the council or the college gives an unsatisfactory answer to the problem of proper eligibility among student representatives.

CONTROVERSY—Joel Bierbaum and Charles Chickadel are challenging the legality of the Spring '72 student elections.

Day Care Center Needs More Men!

The CCSF Day Care Center contains food, paints, watercolors, clay, puzzles, dolls, sand, tricycles, one guinea pig, two rats, ninety children and approximately thirty amazingly calm adults.

The Day Care Center is located on the northeast end of campus, near the football field. It consists of two large rooms and two play areas. The maximum possible stay is five hours but most children spend two to four hours a day there.

The Center is supported by the Student Government and the Community College District. It admits children between two and five years of age whose parents are City College students. Admission requirements are a Tuberculin test for mother and child and a health examination. The Center charges $1.35 per semester per child for insurance.

The Day Care Center needs more men on the staff. According to Susan Davis, one of two teachers, the men should have either a specific skill that enables them to relate to children or "the ability to be silly". "Otherwise," says Ms. Davis, "they don't work out."

OUT OF ORDER—Joel Bierbaum reads "manifesto" prepared by Chickadel at last week's Student Council meeting. Bierbaum was ruled "out of order" and later suspended from the council for "irrational conduct" when he refused to sit down.

Aquatic Park Cleanup

MUSIC TO CLEAN BY — Landing craft, booms, and chemicals were used to eliminate the oil slick from a leaky pipeline which threatened Aquatic Park September 23-24. Guardsman photographer was on hand as street hands entertained the large crowd gathered to watch the DEL Pollution Control Co. clean up the sticky mess.

Ecology Movement is Spearheaded

Even though California's attempt at pollution control by levying fines on industrial violators seems to be running awry, big business has come up with a unique solution which effectively "shifts the blame."

It's called: Spearhead the Ecology Movement.

Stuart Baldwin is a 19-year-old senior at New York State University. He is also the chairman of the U.S. Youth Advisory Board of Keep America Beautiful, Inc. He spent his summer working for the Economic Priorities Report, a "watch-dog" periodical which publishes environmental information on industries.

Baldwin is here in San Francisco for the gala regional conference of Keep America Beautiful, Inc., (KAB).

"Our environmental problem will be solved," asserts Baldwin, "if there is a mixture of citizen action and regulatory pressure on government and business," —a statement which strikes a resonant chord of civic responsibility.

What is KAB Incorporated? God only knows. National Advisory Council lists such bedfellows as: the U.S. Dept. of Defense, the National Rifle Assoc., the Golf Course Superintendents Assoc., alongside the Sierra Club and the Camp Fire Girls. Its Board of Directors reads like a back page of the Wall Street Journal: U.S. Steel, Coca-Cola, Allied Chemical, etc.

What is the watchword of this illustrious array? "Keep America Beautiful...more than a slogan!"

PG&E pumps 85.4 tons of contaminants into the air in the bay area daily, (according to the Bay Area Air Pollution Control District's figures,) KAB sings its theme song: "People start pollution and people can stop it." Deftly sidestepping the industrial issue, this song is sung with the help of $40 million worth of free time and space donated by the Advertising Council coupled with KAB's annual budget of $500,000. Ecology has certainly become big business. (Or is it the other way around?)

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

NURSERYMEN'S AWARD—Peter Brannigan (left) was 1972 scholarship recipient provided by California Association of Nurserymen.

Minds and Bodies Come Together

Just like its topic, Human Sexuality, IDST 17 coordinates two subjects: Biology and psychology.

Michael Guthrie, the man who pushed for this course's acceptance, covers the biological aspects and Eleanor Fahle, from the Psychology Department, attaches the psychological overtones to the course.

Though this course is given on a credit or no-credit basis, its 3 units count towards the sixty units needed for graduation; and its academic level of coverage gives students the necessary tools to deal with heavier data on the subject of sex.

Somewhat optimistically, Mrs. Fahle looked forward to the day when information about sex will be so available that a course on human sexuality will be like taking an English 1A class.

However, Mr. Guthrie pointed out that we are a long way from that goal; "Everyone thinks he's an authority on sex, but after a little testing, we find the opposite to be true."

Mrs. Fahle added, "This so-called liberated culture, even though they hate to admit it, has some of the same sex hangups their parents and grandparents had."

KQED Fall Programming Lineup

The new Fall lineup for KQED Channel 9 in San Francisco will include a major collection of specials, seven new series, the return of a number of popular series and expansion of "Newsroom" to its former hour-long slot.

Premiering on Monday, October 9, at 9:30 pm, "The Bergman Film Festival," presented the United states television debut of "Smiles of a Summer Night."

The second week of the series will feature "The Seventh Seal," followed in later weeks by "The Magician," "Wild Strawberries," "Through A Glass Darkly," and "Winter Light."

On Sunday, October 1, at 9 pm, "Vanity Fair," in five parts began the season for the widely-acclaimed BBC Masterpiece Theatre. Thackeray's masterpiece stars Becky Sharp as the scheming social-climber in the acerbic study of 19th Century English manners and mores.

The Masterpiece series will include in later productions Balzac's "Cousin Bette," Wilkie Collins' "The Moonstone," Thomas Hughes' "Tom Brown's Schooldays," and "Point Counterpoint", by Aldous Huxley.

The Monday Night Special of the Week series opened on October 2, at 8 pm with Lillian Hellman's play, "Another Part of the Forest," staring Dorothy McGuire, Barry Sullivan and Tiffany Bolling. This performance was followed last Monday night by "VD Blues," an exploration of a current and critical nation-wide problem. The program, made possible by a grant from the 3M Company, was designed to launch a national VD awareness campaign. Dick Cavett was the host.

"The Family Game," began Sunday night, October 1, at 8 pm, as a series aimed at closing the generation gap. It examines such questions as authority and freedom, sex and drugs, and other topics of concern.

Legal experts, in dialogue with teenage panelists, explore consumerism, selective service, drug, and ecology law. The Ace Trucking Company provides satiric sketches.

A series of public affairs programs are presented on Tuesday nights at 8:30 pm by WNET, New York.

On Saturday evenings at 8:30 pm "Playhouse New York" presents an all-new anthology of drama by 20th Century playwrights. The first presentation was Jean Anouilh's "Antigone," starring Genevieve Bujold and Fritz Weaver.

"Germaine Greer vs. the USA" was the first of five non-theatrical films on Sunday evenings at 11 pm on the series "Entries in the San Francisco International Film Festival."

The new "International Performance" series (KQED, Channel 9,) premieres on Thursday, October 5, at 9 pm. (Color, reshown on Saturday, October 7, at 10:30 pm) with Stravinsky's ballet "The Firebird," starring French prima ballerina Claire Motte.

Metropolitan Opera star Robert Merill will host the series; a collection of the best foreign television music and dance productions of recent years.

The early productions in the series are from the ORTF, the state-operated French TV network. The productions which follow will be from Germany, Japan, Mexico, Russia, and several other countires.

The later productions include: "Orpheus in Hell" (October 12) performed by the Paris Opera Ballet, featuring singers Florence Raynal and Jean Aubert; October 19, conductor Charles Dutoit and his wife Martha Argerich, internationally famous pianist, will perform Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1; George Sebastian conducts the ORTF Philharmonic in music from the death scene of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." A ballet based on Greek mythology with text by Jean Cocteau, "Phedre", features Claire Motte on October 26, followed by ORTF's performance of Marcel De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat."

In November the series continues with a 19th century setting based around a Robin Hood theme of Offenbach's light opera "Les Brigands" (November 2). A musical tour through the historical Palace of Versailles is presented on November 9. "Splendors of Versailles" recreates the court of Louis XIV. On November 16 Edouard Lindenberg conducts the ORTF Philharmonic Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Overture "Romeo and Juliet", followed by Monteverdi's ballet "Tancrede and Clorinde."

This series promises to be entertaining and culturally beneficial for all who view the performances each Thursday evrning on Channel 9. —Marguerite Zipse

Today's Voting Information: To Believe or Not to Believe

Within recent weeks the voting public at large has been bombarded with a plethora of statistical computations. These are the public opinion polls, and they show that "candidate X" is so many percentage points ahead of "candidate Y." Depending on your political bent, these figures could be cause for either joy or consternation.

The immediate question is: What purpose do these polls serve? In the short term, they give comfort to the aides of the individual who happens to be leading at the time; on the other hand, polls tend to confuse a voter who is torn between his "convictions" (whatever they are) and his desire to "back a winner."

One disturbing aspect of political polls is that the statisticians fail to adequately define "a representative sampling" of the populace; a representative sampling of St. Francis Woods quite obviously differs with a comparable inquiry in Hunters Point. We must conclude then, that representative samplings are as vague and anonymous as the "secret plan" to end the war! Both should be rejected because they fail to satisfy the basic curiosity of the people, that being: who, what and where.

It is claimed that if the polls were discontinued the voting polarity might be in a turmoil. Without some sort of guideline perhaps the election could even be voided as a result of no one getting a clear-cut majority. With no polls it might be harder for voters to make up their minds.

Viewed from another perspective, however, if we must then endure another four years of the incumbent, can't it at least be a surprise?

Question: Do you think youth has lost confidence in McGovern?

George Socarras—General Education

We have no choice but to have confidence in McGovern. I would think that the active participation that youth has given this election would indicate more confidence in a party than we have seen in a long time.

Thad Doyka—Political Science

Everybody was for him because he was supposedly honest. Now he is switching to get support from people who he originally didn't agree with.

Carol Conroy—Criminology

Definitely. The primary reason was the Eagleton affair. He wasn't the sincere, honest man that his image made him out to be.

Tim Ratini—Music

No. In fact the Gallup Poll says he climbed six points more and is catching up to Nixon. I think the polls are wrong anyway and in reality McGovern is the favorite.

Gary Deutsh—Forestry

I think they have because he is being more realistic about what he has to do to get elected. He's trying to capture the older age group and thus more votes.

Martha Kelso—Teaching

It seems that propaganda has influenced him a lot; that the media has been putting him down from the beginning. It may be because McGovern has brought up a lot of liberal ideas.

Happenings Around Town

When the San Francisco City Theatre on Post & Mason St. was torn down in 1969, Jack Aranson and his company were forced to become "strolling" players.

Aranson and his wife, Mary Rose McMaster, opened at their new theatre location at 3250 19th Ave., Sept. 27, with Sean O'Casey's "Juno and the Paycock."

Aranson played "Captain" Boyle, the peacock of the title, while McMaster portrayed Juno. Jim Murray, Alice March and Dorothy French were the supporting cast. The play will run through October 8 with performances Wednesday through Sunday at 8:30 pm.

Later this year, after a previously contracted road trip, Aranson will bring his one man "Moby Dick" and "Dylan" shows to the new theatre location.

"Black Terror" by Richard Wesley recently had it's West Coast premier at the Julian Theatre, San Francisco. The play is directed by John Cochran who also plays the main character, a revolutionary. Other members in the cast are Raymond Johnson, Camille Howard and John Bailey.

The play will run through October: Thursdays and Fridays at 8pm; Saturdays at 7 and 10pm; Sundays at 7pm. Tickets can be purchased at the door.

Computer Learning:

Students May Operate New Library Terminals

If you've ever had the urge to fold, spindle or mutilate because of some computer, relax—you now have the chance to play games and learn with one.

The college library now has ten computer teletype terminals which put you in the operator's seat to play computerized games of battle, Blackjack or Hangman.

"But the primary use, in terms of intent, is tutorial," reminded Bruce Lerner of the Computer Services Dept. The computer will contain Math and English programs for tutorial puposes, and also be used for teaching programming.

The computer, which is connected by telephone lines, is located at Woodrow Wilson High School.

The computer and terminals were used by the Dean of Instruction for the first time this semester during registration to determine open and closed classes. This procedure was done manually before.

Not all of the ten terminals in the library are functioning as of this writing, but installation problems should be overcome in a short time.

The terminals are open any hours the library is open, including weekends.

"A definite asset to the students," was the statement of Mr. Lance Rodgers of the Tutorial Center.

The tutorial center will have two terminals in their room, S-347. The tutor will first learn how to operate the terminal and then instruct his student.

Remedial Math and English are the two major subjects which the tutorial center instructs in. "Helping to stop people from dropping out," expressed Mr. Rodgers, "is the aim of the center."

Now with the two terminals to help, the computer will definitely be on your side.

Cycle Hazards:

Nixon's Car Hit

Next time you bicycle riders on campus come roaring around; remember to slow down. Or face the consequences. Consider what happened to Orville Jackson, a student at another college.

He was riding a bicycle and turned into a gas station at the same time as the President's car. Nixon's Lincoln, was driven by a Secret Service man. The president was not inside. Damage to the president's "limo" was estimated at over $100.

The scene at the gas station looked like a police convention as one sergeant, one motorcycle patrolman, and two officers investigated the accident.

Jackson straightened the handlebars of his $97 bicycle, then was taken to a hospital where he was treated for abrasions, then released with a "gift" from the police. The gift was a ticket for failure to stay in the proper lane.

When someone mentioned to Jackson that he hit the wrong car, Jackson replied, "No sir, the wrong car ran into me."

Jackson plans to fight the ticket in court.

BIG BROTHER AT BIMBO'S—"The band has slowly but steadily worked its way back up since they lost Janis, but somehow even now her absence remains conspicuous."

Rock Music Minus Claustrophobia

For years San Francisco's afficionados of live contemporary music, or "rock fans" (depending on your point of view), have been targets for the slings and arrows of outrageous businessmen. They've paid their dues" in the "clubs"; sandwiched between an amplifier and a cigarette machine while blonde waitresses in white vinyl boots force overpriced, unwanted drinks on them. They've been herded into auditoriums and milled around like cattle trying to find themselves a little square foot of concrete to sit on. (Luckily for males, sitting on the floor isn't as uncomfortable as it could be: the admission prices make sure that their wallets are empty!)

After repeated heavy doses of this misery, most poor souls just give up and stay at home with their radio.

So, having never heard of the place, I was prepared for the worst as I headed for Bimbo's 365 "Theatre-Restaurant" at Columbus and Chestnut, (just up from Tower Records). The attraction was a dance/concert September 22-23 featuring Big Brother and the Holding Co., Alice Stuart & Snake, and Natural Act.

Upon entering I was relieved to find a comfortable, spacious nightclub with a real "live" stage, two bars, a large dance floor, and tables and booths big enough to relax in. There was no pressure to buy drinks, and one can order at the bar if they choose.

The customers appeared to be mellow folk: no Altamont-style motorcycle "red-freaks": no stoned-out suburban 14-year olds; not even the drunk - bleached - blonde - with - false - eyelashes crowd. The atmosphere felt relaxed and friendly.

The band on stage first, Natural Act, was unfortunately somewhat worse than mediocre. With three or four guitars making mucho noise and little real music; they looked and sounded like any of a dozen other local groups who always seem to be third on the bill at these concerts. The audience remained seated; applauding politely from time to time as the band screamed, screeched and buzzed to a halt. Groups like this can really make you appreciate a little silence.

Everyone was soon dancing, however, when Alice Stuart began singing and playing her potent blend of country, rock and blues. We covered Alice's gig here at City last issue, so we won't go into it again here; suffice to say that her music is as excellent for dancing as it is just for listening.

Big Brother and Co. then came out and played a fast, tight set that had most of the crowd dancing and yelling for more. They've improved both their style and material since I saw them last, two years ago. The band has slowly but steadily worked its way back up since they lost Janis, but somehow even now her absence remains conspicuous. One can't help but notice that without her unique voice, Big Brother is just another fairly competent male rock band.

The musicians were all clearly visible and audible—without being almost in your lap—and there was always plenty of room to dance.

The decor at Bimbo's is sort-of-pseudo-Las Vegas (red tablecloths, chandeliers, paintings of feathery nudes, etc.). This is a carry-over from the building's normal role as supper-club for older folk.

The promoters rent the place for these concerts, and all in all they seem justified in charging $3.00 admission. Beer runs 75c, (for a bottle, not just a glass). Cokes are 50c. Mixed drinks are fairly well-made and reasonably priced. Guys must be 21 to get in, but girls can have their hands stamped.

So, for an evening of music and dancing—minus the usual claustraphobia—you might check out Bimbo's next time.

The phone number is 474-0365 for information on upcoming concerts.

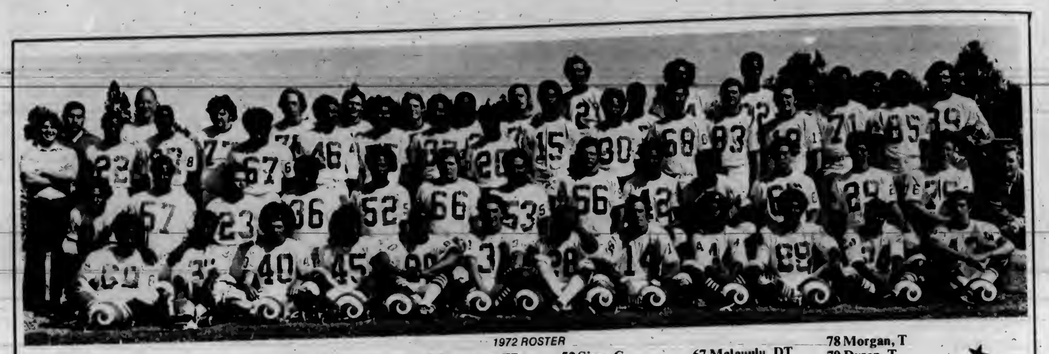
"Gay Literature" to be Offered

Dan Allen, an English teacher at CCSF, will be teaching a Gay Literature course with accent on works by and about homosexuals.

The class, which will meet Tuesdays or Thursdays from 2:30—5:30pm, will begin by October 12.



The course is planned mainly for gay women and gay men as well as those who are "straight," bisexual, ambivalent, and "polymorphously perverse", according to Allen.

Works by Walt Whitman, Gertrude Stein, James Baldwin, Tennessee Williams, Allen Ginsberg, Emily Dickinson, Gore Vidal, Truman Capote, Christopher Isherwood, Willa Cather, John Rechy, Horatio Alger, Edward Albee, James Merrill, Carson McCullers, W. H. Auden, Paul Zindel, Judy Grahn, William Inge, James Leo Herlihy, Jull Johnston, William Goyen, Henry David Thoreau, William Burroughs, Kate Millett and Hart Crane will be studied.

Allen is optimistic that the class will be on the regular curriculum next Fall.

Anyone interested can leave their name, address and phone number at the Experimental College, Bungalow 5.

San Francisco's Bunch of Cheapos

Though San Francisco is "gee-whizzed" by anybody who has been fortunate enough to visit her shores and been bedazzled by the many wonders no other city can claim, the "City" claims no championship sports team.

What would seem to be the problem, one might ask? We live in a city that seems to lack nothing else. The answer seems to be obvious. Sad to say, and disgustingly true, we're all a bunch of "cheapos." When one makes this reference, it is attributed to the owners of professional teams.

San Francisco teams certainly do have talent, but they lack something that makes the difference between defeat and success: leadership. It is a type of leadership that our pro teams don't want to pay for. The teams even have the audacity to bare the thought that "Well, there might be a chance!"

What obviously comes to mind was the trading away of such a leader as Willie Mays. He, as you should remember, was traded away early in the 1972 baseball season; a bad move which will not benefit the public—or the team, in any way.

Baseball has lost an integral part of its tradition which today no longer seems to take priority.

We will never again witness the spectacular play of Willie Mays, which brought baseball to national attention. No longer will we see the fleeting superstar play unparalleled in the game he helped make famous. As such, long-time Giant fans are left to view mediocrity. An ailing Marichal and reports of Willie McCovey retiring only supplements the worsening situation in the Giant organization.

It is not without good cause that Horace Stoneham should lift a concerned eyebrow as Giant attendance falls 300,000 off since last year.

Nevertheless, despite what many have said, Mays still means business. Eighteen thousand fans braved the cutting wind and cold of Candlestick Park to see him for the first time in San Francisco in a Mets outfit. It's the drawing power of Mays which New York now possesses.

Many a would-be Giant dollar goes elsewhere because many fans feel they aren't getting enough of their money's worth. Although there are many young Giants clustering like bees around the honeydew of stardom, many will not make it. Who has made it big in recent years except maybe Cincinnati's Johnny Bench? In the meantime, superstars like Mays are carrying on like an old bottle of vintage wine: getting better with age.

Water Polo Moves Up

If there is anything missing in this year's water polo program, it definitely isn't enthusiasm. With the advent of a tough season, a little of it will go a long way for our "amphibious volleyball" players.

To the delight of Coach Decker, (who enjoys nothing better than an excursion to the wine country), he has a "one of a kind" turnout this year, thanks to the water polo efforts at the Olympics.

"This is the biggest turnout ever," stated the coach. "Usually there are twelve but this year, there are 20 of them trying out. This is the first time I have had a chance to scrimmage and substitute."

Contrary to the belief of many, water polo is no easy sport. It is a game which requires utmost concentration and "100%" effort on the part of those chosen to play. Workouts (to the disgust of late sleeping members), start at 7 am and last about two hours.

As for applicants, who will undergo a series of strenuous intra-squad scrimmages to determine positions, it will be "worth it all" for some, and a "good try" for others. Only 13 of the 20 tryouts will make it into Coach Decker's little "black book" to see action on the team. As for qualifications: "He has to be very tough physically and have a lot of endurance," confides Coach Decker.

Youth—as far as experience goes—but not in age, seems to exemplify this year's team. Although defensively oriented, City has not won a league match in some time. But with the return of five lettermen, accompanied by the youth of Barcojo, an outstanding breaststroker from St. Ignatious School; Hall, the Rams' first black polo player in eight years and veteran of many aqua-war games; and Serwatka, No. 23; City is looking forward with optimism to this upcoming season.

But the Rams' aquanauts are not without their problems. Unlike other teams, City lacks the much needed height which is vital to winning games. Of his team's strategy which is deprived of the taller men found in this sport, Coach Decker tentatively concedes: "We'll just have to do a lot of swimming!"

But the big drawback in Coach Decker's eyes is not in the individual talents of his players but rather in the absence of a pool. It is here, he states, that this season could be a winning one instead of a "building year". Instead of having to share the pool with Balboa pool customers, the team could spend more time improvising aspects of their game plans. But with no signs of funds from either the state or federal level, Coach Decker, at least this year, can only hope for the future.

Rams Lose Again

Well, it's back to the drawing board and luckily the Rams had the weekend off to regroup. Saturday night, September 23, the Rams suffered their second loss in a row.

San Joaquin Delta's Mustangs had the Rams out to pasture for sixty full minutes of football, and played it all their own way. The Mustangs punted only once during the contest or should I say "no contest" (final score 52 to 12) and thought nothing of running on fourth downs.

The Rams defense quickly weakened as the Mustangs scored at will—from eleven minutes and fifty seconds in the first period on throughout the game.

The Rams did get on the scoreboard with 9:55 left in the second period, but still trailed 21 to 6 after a conversion attempt was blocked due to a high snap from center.

The second half was a carbon copy of the first even though the Rams managed to score again on a "fourth and goal" situation with four seconds left in the third period, and again the Mustangs refused to give up the extra point.

Last Spring's Honor Grads Get Awards

In an informal presentation on June 5, four City College students received the President's Award for achievement in the field of scholarship, or for outstanding service on campus. Pamela Stewart and Shelly Joe were presented with special cups in recognition of maintaining high scholastic averages: Miss Stewart has a cumulative grade point average of 3.95 while Shelly Joe's average is 3.82.

Dr. Harry Buttimer presented service plaques to Lawrence Pong and Olga Reneff for participation in various City College activities, clubs and organizations over a four semester span.

Initiated in 1948, the President's Award has become an annual tradition at City College. Graduating seniors are recommended for the service award by faculty members from the school at large, and scholarship award winners are determined on the basis of highest cumulative grade-point average.

Satanic Church:

"Sympathy For The Devil" Avowed By Satanist LaVey

HIGH PRIEST'S DAUGHTER — Karla LaVey, Criminology major, discusses the Church of Satin, founded by her father, with The Guardsman's Alan Whiteside.

"Most people indulge daily in the seven deadly sins. All of the seven sins (greed, pride, envy, anger, gluttony, lust and sloth) lead to physical, mental or emotional gratification," stated Karla LaVey, City College student, criminology major — and Satanist.

"If it were not for these things, that people do naturally, the Christian Church would not be in business today. The church survives on guilt." She continued, "As long as everyone is a sinner they will all go to hell (if there is indeed a hell), so why not meet all your friends there?"

Karla's father is the High Priest and founder of the Church of Satan, Anton Szandor LaVey. "The man," she informs, "who has brought Satanism above ground and who has now been called the world-wide leader of the Satanic movement."

Satanism, The Church of Satan, originated in San Francisco in 1966 on April 30, the Eve of May (Walpurgisnacht), and what was originally a small gathering has now become a world-wide organization.

As for why people are turning to new religions, Karla believes that, "People are no longer learning from their old religion. If you aren't learning from it, why continue? The old one (religion) no longer fits today's standards."

Anton LaVey's philosophy first reached the public through his book, The Satanic Bible and his latest publication, The Complete Witch or What to do When Virtue Fails. His newsletter, the Cloven Hoof, is sent to Satanists in local "Grottoes."

To Karla, Satanism is "a way of life, though more a philosophy than a religion." It has also developed into an occupation for her as she now gives lectures in the Bay Area.

Karla talked about vampirism last semester to a CCSF English class and she remembers, "They loved to hear about the unknown."

She has also lectured at the University of Santa Clara and the California State Universities of Chico and San Francisco on such subjects as Satanism, "lesser magic" and Dracula author Bram Stoker.

Ms. LaVey will be on radio KGO Friday the thirteenth to talk about superstitions.

"All good Christians want to go to heaven and they are all in such a hurry to get there. It's like a freeway on a Sunday afternoon and everyone is in a rush to get to the same place," Karla added. "No one wants to go to hell so the path is left clear, cool and breezy."

She generally agrees with the definition of Satanism which was part of the cover story in the June 19 Time Magazine: Satan being a symbol of man's self-gratifying ego but not a supernatural being.

Satanism is based partly on science and philosophy and could also be called "humanism or Ayn Rand with ritual," thinks Ms. LaVey. "One part respectability and nine outrageousness," (her father says in The Satanic Bible,) is the formula for an organization to be called a church and to be successful.

The church is a "getting together with people who think the same way and to enhance magical ability, which most people have but don't know how to use." "Magic" being defined as the ability to change situations or events

Student Council:

11-4 Vote Ousts Elections Critic

For the second time in two weeks the student council has voted to unseat former member Joel Bierbaum.

Bierbaum, who challenged the credentials of the entire council two weeks ago (when he served on it) was unseated on an approved motion by councilman Lance Burton.

However, the motion stated that Bierbaum should be taken off council because of his failure to meet a constitutional requirement to be an Associated Students Card holder at the time of his election.

Burton and the rest of the council rescinded the motion last week when A.S. President Frank Thatcher reminded them that the students' constitution made no provision for elections. It was also noted that several other council members were not A.S. Card holders during the Spring elections.

Burton then submitted another motion directed at Bierbaum's alleged "disrespect toward the chair" two weeks ago when he repeatedly demanded that the council be disbanded despite several "out of order" rulings by Thatcher.

The new motion passed 11-4 and Bierbaum's ouster was confirmed.

Board Member Urges Pot Legalization

John Riordan, member of the Board of Governors of San Francisco Community College District, urged removal of criminal penalties for marijuana use and called for approval of Proposition 19 in a statement last week:

"Members of College Boards throughout the State must speak out against the morally unjust and unfair criminal punishment given to those who use marijuana in this State.

"Arrest records, harsh fines or jail terms can easily destroy the future of our students for conduct which cannot be considered criminal. Under present law, police officers are commanded to use a cannon when artillery is not needed.

"Decriminalization has been recommended by President Nixon's Commission on Marijuana, the Los Angeles County Grand Jury, the National Institute of Mental Health and the American Medical Association Drug Committee.

"Mairjuana prohibition today is simply yesterday's liquor prohibition. Today's citizens who disobey the law by smoking marijuana are yesterday's whiskey drinkers. The result is identical: when people disobey the type of law they feel is unfair they come to disrespect the law generally.

"It is not today's revelation that enforcement of criminal laws for marijuana is selective law enforcement, turning on the color of skin, social status, income and youth.

"The term "drug," of course, includes aspirin, liquor and tobacco and they, too, may not be harmless to the vast majority of users. However, mere use of those drugs doesn't entail criminal penalties—but marijuana does, at present.

"Medical authorities agree that marijuana is not addictive, does not lead to other drugs and has no lethal dosage. This much cannot be said for whiskey.

"Enactment of Proposition 19 simply takes away criminal penalties. It does not change criminal penalty for activity under the influence of marijuana which may endanger others. It would also be a tremendous savings in our tax dollar, currently spent on the needless arrest, prosecution and jailing of otherwise law-abiding citizens.

"Our constituents are the youth and students within our District. Some of these will benefit by approval of this measure. We should do so," Riordan said.

Club for Vets:

ASM Changes Name To Sever "Stigma"

The fraternally named organization for veterans, Alpha Sigma Mu, is setting up a suborganization to expand its grant capacity and to eventually phase out the old name.

Currently hindered by "granters" associating their name to a fraternity, ASM has decided to develop a new organization, American Servicemen, to broaden its reaches into other fields.

ASM, which is currently a member of the President's Committee on the Employment of the Handicapped, hopes that the greater grant capacity of the American Servicemen branch will enable them to start some drug rehabilitation centers, in addition to some "halfway houses" for ex-convicts.

Since its beginning in 1954, Alpha Sigma Mu has been involved in keeping veterans in school and fighting for higher G.I. benefits.

In February of 1972, Neal C. Clark, president of Alpha Sigma Mu's national federation, went before the Congressional Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs to testify for an average $57.00 monthly raise for all veterans. This would bring the veterans' benefits closer to the cost-of-living that has risen 200% since 1941, when the G.I. bill first began.

Since its birth at the Newark College of Engineering in New Jersey, Alpha Sigma Mu has branched out to seven other states and currently has a chapter at City College.

Omega, the San Francisco chapter of Alpha Sigma Mu, meets October 22 11 am at 3626 Taraval St., Apt. 1.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Editorial:

Lots of Luck if You Use The Muni: You'll Need It!

If riding the MUNI is your thing, then RIDE ON!

Busing it to and from school can be quite an experience at times, often resulting in passenger inconvenience.

On board an overcrowded 10-Monterey recently, which incidentally is rarely on schedule, an observant City College student noticed a touchingly kind deed materializing. A student, patiently assisting an elderly blind man through the tightly-packed passengers, politely proceeded towards the rear of the bus, blatantly seeking a possible offer of a seat for his friend. A magnanimous gentleman, in his probable 50's, willingly surrendered his comfortable seat. The student hurriedly guided and secured the blind man to a vertical pole in the aisle;seated himself; lit a cigarette; opened his newspaper and with the same apathetic expression, proceeded to read. Did someone say that "dog is man's best friend?"

Then there are students walking into classes 20 or more minutes late who are not always late due to their own doings. Often the Municipal Railway can be held responsible for the lateness, there is the alternative of leaving home earlier, but it is the responsibility of the Muni in getting the passengers through on schedule. The idea of traveling by bus more than an hour to a single destination within the city's boundaries is inexcusable.

Considering the many Muni inspectors cars strategically stationed along bus routes, one would expect more efficient service. But, if there are no complaints from passengers, there will obviously be no changes made. It's up to us!

MOW-Food For Thought

Do you have a homebound or elderly parent or relative in need of help to prepare meals? Perhaps you have a friend who has met with a temporary setback and cannot get out for meals. "Meals on Wheels" may be the answer to their prayer for help.

"Meals on Wheels" attempts to meet the growing need for home health services. The focus is on helping the homebound maintain independent living.

MOW is based on a plan of community involvement through the use of volunteers and neighborhood distribution centers. It is designed to provide nutritious meals to the chronically ill and aged persons, many of whom have major nutritional deficiencies, and to facilitate the early return home of hospital patients of any age who require balanced diets.

Anyone who is unable to get out regularly for meals or shopping, or who resides in a hotel without adequate appliances for cooking or refrigeration, is eligible regardless of age or economic status.

The cost is $1.50 per day for a day's nutrition. The daily menus consist of frozen entrees, desserts and sandwiches, with other supper and breakfast items coming from "cans" and "packages." Volunteers from neighborhood churches and organizations heat and assemble the meals and deliver them on foot or by car.

The present service is for five days a week, but should be expanded to meet the even greater needs of weekend deliveries. Meals may be ordered on a day to day basis or on a temporary service during an illness.

To date there are four "satellite" centers with plans for two others. Currently Downtown, Sunset, Richmond, and Western Addition, Cathedral Hill, Polk areas are being serviced, with plans for Mission and Ingleside, Hunter's Point districts. However, volunteers are needed for all areas.

Each distribution center has developed a structure of kitchen, finance, referral and driver coordinators who train and supervise volunteers, under a general coordinator.

At present "convenience foods" seem satisfactory, but may not be adequate for districts reflecting other cultural patterns. Volunteers are needed who speak the language of the different ethnic people served.

If you are interested in this project, you may volunteer your services by calling 864-6470. Or, if you have a friend or relative in need of the services offered by "Meals on Wheels," call this number.

MOW originated in England with the British Women's Volunteer Service. Eventually private organizations, and later the government, supported the program. The first project of this kind in the United States began in Philadelphia in 1954. Since then, many successful variations of both programs and funding sources have evolved across the nation.

Service in San Francisco began in December, 1970, as a tax-exempt organization. It is currently funded by the San Francisco Home Health Service, the San Francisco Department of Public Health, and the Women's Auxiliary of the San Francisco Medical Society.

Gay Dance Dubbed "Tremendous Success"

The Free Gay Student Association sponsored the first dance of the semester last Friday.

The dance, which began at 8 pm, was performed by the five-man group, Tongue in Cheek.

Integrated by a few "straight" couples, the dance drew about 150 people.

Although one student told of a car full of "straight" men shouting obscenities, there were no major problems.

Faculty adviser for the group, Bob Dunbar, proclaimed the dance a "tremendous success."

Admission was $1.00; 75 cents for Associated Student card holders. "A great deal! Food, drink, and far-out music!" exclaimed another student.

Faculty were also invited, although few showed up.

"It'll take the teachers a little time to get together with us, but very soon I know they'll be right behind us, as we are behind them," Dunbar speculated.

New McGovern Headquarters Plans Action

A new "McGovern for President" headquarters for the Noe Valley-Castro Valley area opened September 23 at 284 Noe St.

The office is being run by the "Alice B. Toklas Memorial Democratic Club", founded in December 1971 through the efforts of twenty gay people and the County Council of Democratic Clubs. The goal of the organization is "to further the rights, freedom and dignity of gay people through the democratic process."

An open house was held on the Saturday the new office commenced operations. Due to the enthusiastic turnout, the club plans to continue the gatherings on a regular basis. Everyone is invited to stop by any Saturday afternoon til November 7. On September 30 from 4-7 pm a party was held featuring free refreshments and special guest, Assemblyman John Burton. Hot dogs and beer were available on October 7.

A fund-raising auction will be held Saturday, October 14, 2-7 pm. Guest auctioneers will include Sheriff Richard Hongisto and Supervisors Dianne Feinstein and Bob Mendelsohn.

The public is being asked to bring in any auctionable items to the new Noe St. headquarters in time for the auction. The assistance of artisans and craftsmen is especially needed. Phone number for the new office is 861-2515.

Bees "Bug" Canteen Patrons

Bees are flying around campus en masse where the concession trucks are peddling their goods.

The canteens are the major cause of the threatening bee population because they dispense coffee, apple cider, etc., which remains are left in unsanitary, uncovered wastecans.

The bugs, being attracted to the sticky buildup in the containers, have multiplied in weeks and have become a general nuisance.

When one throws trash into a container, one has to immediately move away from the disturbed bees. Ducking from them has become a way of life at CCSF.

When the manager of one canteen unit was asked what she intended to do about the bee invasion she replied with a resounding, "Nothing!"

She further explained that the canteen couldn't be the cause of the bees. "The bees are all over," she offered, "the cafeteria, and everywhere."

Ever see a bee in the cafeteria? There is no bee problem anywhere else on campus.

On The Academic Front . . .

Alpha Gamma Sigma Honor Society is now sponsored by Counselor Rick La Croix.

The society, formerly sponsored by Wally Wells, is open to all students holding a 3.0 grade point average with no "D" or "F" grades in their prior semester.

Anyone wishing to become a member of the AGS Honor Society is required to pay a small $1.25 initiation fee.

The society sponsors various activities and all interested students are urged to see Rick LaCroix in B404 (behind the cafeteria) for further information.

Students who have completed English G-5B, G-12, ESL-40 but did not receive recommendation for English 1-A from those courses may petition for eligibility by writing an essay and verifying completion of at least 15 university-parallel units with an overall "C" average.

Students who have completed Engineering 56 may also petition through this procedure.

The dates and times for writing the essay are:

European Jobs Available Now!

Just back from Europe, Dr. F. X. Gordon, President of Princeton Research, at the University of Southern California, said in a recent interview, "Jobs for young people are available in Europe."

In view of the fact that United States corporations are still cutting back personnel and are not planning replacements, it is encouraging to know that "the 300 million people Common Market is booming" making room for United States students to take advantage of jobs in foreign lands.

It is predicted that in 1973 high school and college graduates will face a long search for jobs in the States. Some 1,300,000 per year are entering the job-seeking market.

"Jobs Europe" is a program which guarantees salaried jobs in Switzerland, England and Belgium for some 2,000 young people 18 to 29 years of age. Jobs are available in Summer, Fall, Winter and Spring as general help (trainees) in hotels, restaurants, supermarkets, department stores, steward and stewardess on trains, etc. Board and room are usually provided.

Friends can work together if they apply together. Participants arrange their own bargain-youth or student fare transportation. They work anywhere from two to six months or longer.

Over the past twelve years 10,000 young people have been helped by "Jobs Europe" both on the Continent and in England.

For free information, send a stamped self-addressed business-size envelope to Jobs Europe, Box 44188, Panorama City, California, 9141.

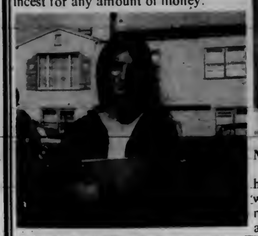
QUESTION: What WOULDN'T You Do For Money?



Paul Crismani - Knitting

I wouldn't take dope for any money! It's a sin against society; killer of youth. It ruined my friends, turned them into weird-looking long-haired hippies!

Alan Williams - Architecture

I wouldn't steal from other people. I would refuse to be a topless dancer; I wouldn't commit suicide; maybe murder, but not suicide. I wouldn't commit incest for any amount of money.

Cristoban and "Blue" - Dog Catching

Take nude pictures of me and my old lady; sell bad dope that could blow up someone's head; drive a truck cross-country or just having a good time, whatever that means?

Sally Buick - Hotel and Restaurant

I wouldn't be a prostitute; I wouldn't take bribes or deal dope. I don't think that I would do anything that is illegal.

Maureen Tierney - Business

I wouldn't do anything that would hurt anybody else or something that wasn't necessary. By unnecessary, I mean dealing in dangerous drugs, such as heroin.

Pat Haglin - General Education

There's a lot I wouldn't do. I wouldn't sell anybody out; I wouldn't sell my body; I wouldn't sell secrets to the Russians; I wouldn't live in New York City again!

JOHN MAYALL BACK ON TOUR — "Could it be that Mayall has finally assembled the right group of musicians to complement his talents?"

Mayall and King at Winterland: Why Not Just Use Cattle Prods?

Long-time English bluesman John Mayall is back on tour in California again. Along with Albert King and Delbert and Glenn, he headlined the bill at Winterland Arena Friday and Saturday night September 29-30.

Unlike the old Fillmore West, Winterland at least has enough room to walk around and dance. The stage has been moved from one end to the center of the side wall, so the bands can be seen now from almost anywhere in the building, including behind the stage.

One of the bummers at Winterland are the Rent-A-Cop ushers. If you can't find a seat you're forced to push your way into the throng on the central floor; since standing or sitting in the aisles or stairways immediately brings one of these dudes down on you. About the eleventh or twelfth time they tell you to "move on" you start wondering why they don't just get cattle prods and be done with it—either that or install more seats, for god's sake!

Despite the Rent-A-Cops, high prices and overcrowding, however, Graham's shows do have the advantages of big-name groups, perfect sound systems, and good light shows. Though it's well done, the light show should be larger. If you've ever seen one projected 180 or 360 degrees around you, then somehow Winterland's little square screen over the stage doesn't quite make it. (Light shows should be used to create a total environment, or else not used at all.)

Albert King finally unslung his guitar and bowed off the stage amidst a long prolonged orgy of hero-worship by the crowd. They were delighted when Mayall loped out with an almost all-black backup group, featuring Freddie Robinson on guitar and Blue Mitchell on trumpet. He also has his old drummer Keef Hartley back. Robinson and Hartley both laid down some fast, tight solo work, but essentially the band provides a perfect musical framework for all-out bluesfreak Mayall as he plays guitar, organ, piano, and harmonica and wails his high-pitched, soulful vocals. Could it be that Mayall has finally assembled the right group of musicians to complement his talents? Let's hope he at least cuts an album with his band in this current incarnation, before going off in search of yet another "new sound."

Bill "Everybody-Needs-Milk" Graham has, needless to say, already scheduled many more rockfests for the weeks ahead. Following the October 7-8 Santana concert and the October 9 Grateful Dead benefit, Winterland will have T. Rex, Poco, and the Doobie Brothers on October 13. On October 14 it'll be It's a Beautiful Day, Poco, and Lighthouse.

The Special Art Gallery of the Oakland Museum has an exhibit from October 3 to November 12 of a group of six strongly individualistic Bay Area impressionistic landscape painters of the 1920's known as "The Society of Six." Their paintings, sketches and memorabilia depict their rough and tumble life style.

The Oakland Museum is located at 10th and Oak Streets. The museum is closed Mondays, but open Tuesdays through Sundays from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., and on Fridays from 10-10 p.m. Admission is free.

Selden Gile, a New England expatriate and former bookkeeper, captained the coterie which included August Gay, William Clapp, Bernard von Eichman, Louis Siegriest and Maurice Logan. The last two are still living today.

Between 1923 and 1928, the group held annual exhibitions at the Oakland Art Gallery where Clapp was curator.

They rejected tonalist and traditional landscape painters, calling them "tobacco juice painters" and creators of gorgeous pot boilers."

As a group, they were influenced in their works by 19th Century European impressionists, rising modernists and the then-new abstract artists.

GUARDSMAN SPORTS AND NEWS

Water Polo Team Overtaken

Despite a swift "take-charge" by City College's water polo team, they slowly dwindled away in a 7-4 non-league affair with Contra Costa.

A strong effort was made by City College throughout the match. But bad passing was obviously the reason for a heartbreaking loss. Improvised strategy was in order as the Rams' play bore no resemblence to an earlier "white-washing" by a more mature San Francisco State team.

The Contra Costa team was riled on several occasions, however, as they displayed boxing techniques upon Ram team-mates. Referees at one point asked an offending Contra Costa player if he knew that he was in a water polo contest and not in a boxing ring! Looking at Contra Costa, one might wonder if one or two had not somehow lost their way from the football field.

City through the first quarter played like champions, the Rams quickly amassing a 3-0 margin. City was led by the swiftness of Bancojo, (a veritable dolphin in human form), and his team-mate Demay, last year's winner of the 100-yard freestyle at Lincoln High.

These two provided the "1-2" punch City was looking for. The sweetness of victory seemed to be only 3 easy quarters away.

But the "tide turned" in the early minutes of the second quarter. Contra Costa retaliated with a flurry of unexpected goals as they closed the gap to 4-2.

Despite the good defensive play of Dunne, who thwarted many an important pass; and the continual fluttering arms of Barrango, the team's "spark-plug" of spirit; Contra Costa still rolled by in the third period, and moved out to a 6-4 lead.

But there still lingered a small ray of hope as City again started pressing their taller opponents. Capitalizing on their opponent's bad passing, they made some unsuccessful "back to back" attempts at getting a score. As valiant as the Rams' effort was, their lack of a practice pool took its toll. Alert Ram defenders in the early minutes of play became slower as the game wore on. Points were scored easily against City as her swimmers got caught in the "short end" just trying to keep up. The final score: 8-4.

A LITTLE HELP — Wouldn't hurt. Put these guys on the water polo team.

The onset of the league games is just about here, and Coach Decker's swimming five should give good account of San Francisco's water polo talent in the junior college circuit. If you're betting against it, come on down and see for yourself!

Football Hall of Fame: Its Heroes and Old Memories

Seventy-seven years ago professional football was born. It was the year 1875.

By 1920 there were eleven professional clubs, and they decided it was time to organize. The American Professional Football Association was created in Canton, Ohio.

In 1922 the American Professional Football Association became the National Football League.

Just imagine a field goal kicker performing his specialty in a stadium full of people. The balls sails through the air leaving the stadium and lands on top of a nearby building. The football is the "roof" of the pro football "Hall of Fame" in Canton, Ohio.

A statue of Jim Thorpe greets visitors as they walk into the "Hall of Fame". Jim attended the Carlisle Indian School in Pennsylvania. A professional athlete, Thorpe joined one of the earliest professional footballs teams, the Canton Bulldogs.

Because of his professional standing his medals won at the Olympics were recalled.

As visitors walk up the curving ramp of the "Hall" the first thing in sight is a large mural of Thorpe. In front of the mural stands a full figure of a Canton Bulldog player sitting on a bench. The figure is wrapped in Thorpe's blanket.

Next to Thorpe lies a uniform, locker equipment and trunk belonging to Ernie Nevers, a Stanford University player of the twenties. Nevers played for the Duluth Eskimos in his prime.

The next exhibit brings pro football to modern times. All football widows might ask their husbands or boyfriend next Monday night as they serve him dinner in front of TV's Howard Cosell these questions:

"How long was the longest pro football game ever played?"

"Who kicked the winning field goal?"

The answers:

"82 minutes and 40 seconds."

"Garo Yepremian, Miami Dolphins, kicked the winning field goal December 25, 1971, against the Kansas City Chiefs. The final score was 27-24. Yepremian's shoe is cast in bronze in the "Hall of Fame.."

Tom Dempsey's shoe is also there. What makes his feat unique is he has no toes on his kicking foot. Yet when he was with the New Orleans Saints he kicked the longest field goal ever against the Detroit Lions on Nov. 18, 1970. The ball traveled 63 yards.

Two of the many football jerseys in the Hall of Fame are Joe Namath, Number 12, and Willie Ellison, Number 33. Namath played for the New York Jets when New York was the first team in the now defunct American Football League. In 1969 the Jets beat the Baltimore Colts of the National Football League in the third Super Bowl game by a score of 16-7.

Willie Ellison of the Los Angeles Rams broke the single game rushing record on Dec. 3, 1971 when he carried the football for 247 yards.

The enshrinees in the "Hall of Fame" are honored in their own separate area. Each of the 74 players have their own niche which contains a bronze bust of each player, and a large mural showing the player's position in football he did best. For example Ollie Matson, a new enshrinee, is shown running with the football.

To be selected for the "Hall of Fame" one must have been connected with Pro Football as a player, coach, or owner. A player must have been retired for at least five years. The members in the Hall are selected by representatives from each of the 26 National Football League cities and an officer of the Pro Football Writers Association.

Visiting the "Hall of Fame" is a great experience for everyone whether or not you are a football fan.

Rick Barry Bounces Back

Once upon a time there lived a great basketball player who brought continual "Happy New Year" spirit to S.F.'s sportsfans during the winter months with his crowd pleasing plays. Although he was taken away by the Oakland Oaks and then went to the New York Nets for more "green stuff," he was promised to be brought back to his "home town." But Rick Barry's fate wasn't to return home in this storybook fashion.

This was the year that Barry was supposed to "make everything right" and lead the stagnant S.F. Warriors back to glory. He certainly had the talent to do so.

Since leading the Golden State Warriors to the division title in the 66-67' season, he not only has sculptured an increase in his financial assets but also in his fame. While leading both the now defunct Oaks and the New York Nets to championship status, he manipulated with ease A.B.A. basketball players as well as N.B.A. counterparts.

He became the "class" of the N.B.A. He played with the ability of a small Jerry West and at the same time outplayed the equal, if not the taller, opposing forwards. He was considered the ultimate fulfillment of an outstanding forward, if not a great basketball player.

It is said that whenever he shot the ball, there was an instant magnetism which always followed a "swish." Consequently, what resulted was his reputation as a "glory-seeker". Whether this was true or not, it was his penchant for the bucket that made the Warriors such formidable contenders. He was the "king" who, with the aid of Nate Thurmond, decreed the pace of the game. He was the spark-plug of Warrior firepower and dominance in any given game.

But, following the "American dream," Barry left for greener (as in money) pastures; from which Warriors' owner Franklin Mieuli has, with the help of a Federal Court ruling, been trying to get Barry back.

But in his ardent quest for Barry, Mieuli seems to have forgotten the other side of the coin.

This "other side" includes:

—That Barry himself has no intentions of coming back.

—How will he explain Barry's $400,000 a year for six years, and no cut, and no-trade contract to his team-mates?

Will Bay Area fans pay the newly raised price of $6.00 admission fee?

—Though Barry played great before, nobody plays that well forever.

At that, one has to wonder since the present Warrior's haven't proved to be the combination needed to win games—why doesn't Meuli negotiate new talent from the College ranks with some of the money that he wants to pay Barry?

Rick Barry may be the problem here but Franklin Mieuli is the one who will have to decide. The results of his decision will mean either doing without Barry's money-making "drawing power," or risking financial ruin for the Warriors.

Hot Rodders Ball At Laguna Seca

The annual Canadian-American Grand Prix (Can-Am) will be held October 13-15 at Laguna Seca Raceway, on Highway 68 off Highway 1 in Monterey.

Beginning with the Can-Am weekend, a special discount ticket for students has been established. Prices are: Saturday $3; Sunday, $5; and $7 for all three days. A showing of student ID card must accompany tickets in order to gain admission to the track.

Satanism

into agreement with one's own will.

Ms. LaVey, a thin—almost fragile—woman with soft black hair, does not believe in drug use because "drugs hamper magical ability and you must have control over all emotions."

To the Satanists, God is seen as a balancing force in nature that makes everything happen, but this force is not concerned about suffering.

This force (God) is seen as too impersonal to care about happiness or suffering on this dust speck called Earth.

Hoping and praying are thought of as negative feelings: "There can be no room for doubt," Karla contends, "with positive thinking and positive action you know everything is going to work."

The casting of spells on persons is a ritual in the Satanic Church, but these spells are irreversible and are used in only the most extreme of circumstances.

As for Astrology, Karla believes that people make their Astrology for themselves; that is, once people find out what their astrological characteristics are, they tend to act them out.

The most important (highest) of all Satanic holidays is one's own birthday and another is of course Halloween.

The first (of nine) Satanic Statements preaches that we should indulge not abstain; so Karla advises: "As long as you have only one life, live it to the fullest."

Future Graduates to Face Overcrowded Job Markets

California College students who want to become chemists, teachers or social workers are going to have a problem when the time comes to look for a job. Students will find that there are more people in those fields than openings.

At the same time manpower shortages exist in the health sciences. These and other facts came out in a report for the committee which defines the goals of the University of California, State Universities, and Community Colleges.

A new master plan will be recommended to the Legislature and the governor next month.

The study indicated the campuses are responding to what is fashionable among students without regard to the consequences. It criticized the lack of planning in public and private colleges and universities.

"There is probably no greater waste of human resource than the lack of opportunity for college graduates to apply the skills and problem solving abilities that have been encouraged by public policy," wrote Durward Long, who is directing the master plan study in a foreword to the report.

'Social Need'

The report was made public today at a meeting of the Coordinating Council for Higher Education.

Long noted that "lack of policy and planning for effective use of college education manpower have produced a surplus of graduates . . . This condition is made worse by the social need for the skills of these highly trained professionals in occupations where manpower imbalances presently exist and are projected for the years ahead.

"It is equally costly when shortages occur in other career fields, such as the health sciences."

The study warned that "if present trends continue, unemployment, or at least under employment, among highly trained young people could develop into a serious social problem of national importance."

Women's Lib

The Women's Liberation Movement is rapidly increasing the number of women graduating into the job market, a force which could add to the unemployment pressures, the study said.

• Engineering — There is and will be a surplus in California at least through 1975, but declining enrollment and possible increases in federal spending may change the situation after that.

Council Dismisses Illegality Charges

Plans to investigate alleged ineligibility of student representatives were abandoned last week by the Student Council.

In a 9-2 vote, it was decided that the issue of the legality of last semester's election results should not be judged by the student government.

The specific question the council dealt with was whether to establish a students' committee that would make recommendations on the matter.

But weary cynicism prevailed among council members as Lance Burton motioned to indefinitely postpone the formation of a committee for the simple reason that "its recommendations will be vetoed by the council anyway."

The student officers' vigorous challenger, Charles Chickadel, could still get satisfaction through a referendum petition that would give the final decision to the student body in January's elections.

However, Chickadel first needs approximately 1800 signatures of City College's students before his initiative can get on the ballot.

SOCIALIST LINDA JENNESS — Gives bleak preview of coming election.

Socialist Candidate Claims SWP the Real Alternative

"No one thinks that when he or she wakes up one year after inauguration it's going to make any difference whether Nixon or McGovern is in the White House," says Linda Jenness.

Ms. Jenness, Socialist Workers Party candidate for President of the United States, appeared at CCSF last week.

To support her statement, she cited the fact that McGovern, who is running as a "radical" alternative to Nixon, voted for the Wage Freeze.

Ms. Jenness also declared that McGovern's opposition to the Vietnam was is "simply tactical." "He's opposed to the war because we're losing. McGovern has never endorsed anti war action, and has even called demonstrations 'disruptive'."

Jenness claimed that, "Both candidates are out to make profits. Neither has anything to say about the issues that really concern the American people."

"People are beginning to fight back and regain control of their lives. We have to do it ourselves," she went on, "Movements today are a tiny harbinger of what's going to come in this country. We have to join forces . . .to kick the enemy out! That's what the Socialist movement is all about."

She concluded, "The choice is between Nixon and McGovern on the one hand, and real social change on the other."

Ecology is the Key: Senator Milton Marks Urges More Open Space

A REPUBLICAN FOR ECOLOGY? — Cecil Horne enjoys rapping with foremost conservationist, Senator Milton Marks, (R-SF).

The only State Senator with a 100 percent rating from the Sierra Club, Milton Marks related at a recent lecture what he has done for California and its people.

Invited by Biology Instructor Ed Bedecarrax, Senator Marks presented the political and social aspects of the environmental issue.

"If you want a conservation bill passed, you would send it to a committee which you would think would be conservation oriented: the Natural Resources Committee," he said.

"But the majority of this committee is not conservation oriented and many good bills are killed in the natural Resources Committee."

Senator Marks is one of the authors of the Bay Conservation and Development Commission Law to preserve and protect the Bay Area.

"It is important to preserve our open space, which is getting less and less and less," he stressed. "If we don't protect it now, it's going to be way too late."

The Senator has also changed the "Presumption Law;" this law used to read that when a freeway was planned to go through a park, the "best use" for the land, under the law, was for the freeway. Now the "presumption" is that the best use for the land would be for a park, and the conservation of our open space.

One way to fight the problems of the environment without raising taxes is the Environmental Protection Program Fund authored by Senator Marks in which all the money collected from the sale of personalized license plates is used to fight the problems of pollution.

The lease for a downtown campus of CCSF was the result of a bill authored by Senator Marks.

In the question-and-answer period that followed his talk, Marks made the following remarks:

Nuclear Power Plants—"There is scientific evidence on both sides that these might or might not be dangerous.

STAIRWAY TO THE STARS — Esthetics is not the message of the "silver" dome.

Astronomy: The Sky Is The Limit!

Have you ever been to the top floor of the Science Building? Probably not. You may have reached the third floor and stopped there for classes.

A narrow stairway leads to the stars: to the "dome." For many people it is a landmark identifying the City College campus. The "Dome" is the Planetarium!

In this darkened circular room classes are held three times a week. "Exploring the Universe" is a planetarium-oriented course stressing the observational universe the universe as seen through the use of telescopes and other visual aids.

Don Warren, Astro instructor, introduces the students to the concepts in the physical and biological sciences appropriate to understanding the structure of the universe and the origin of life.

Warren also gives up-to-date information and explanations on the great ideas of modern astronomy. He incorporates in his talks his experiences as Assistant Supervisor at Morrison Planetarium in San Francisco's Golden Gate Park where he also gives evening lectures in Astronomy for the public.

The Planetarium has taken on some transformations recently. The equipment is being updated as rapidly as the budget will allow. Thus students benefit from exposure to some of the latest developments in the field of astrnomy.

Advanced courses in astronomy include cosmic evolution, astrophysics, planets and life, and a course on air navigation.

If you haven't thought of astronomy as a possible future, perhaps you should. There are many openings for jobs in this field all over the world.

Or, if you just want to know about the sky above you, enroll in the planetarium course and enjoy a voyage through the universe.

VD Tests Now Available

A new program educating young people about venereal disease will start soon in the public and parochial schools of San Francisco. The program is sponsored by the Health Department and the Human Rights Commission. The program involves high school students talking to other young people about venereal disease.

The program will place student aides in all San Francisco high schools. The aides will be paid $1.75 an hour for ten hours a week.

The student aides will explain, among other things, that a VD test only takes twenty minutes. Plans are being made to also use this type of program at the junior high level.

Mexican-Americans Struggle for Rights

Dr. Manuel Servin, Professor of History and director of American Studies at Arizona State University, headlines the Concert-Lecture Series Thursday, Oct. 5.

Dr. Servin, a pioneer in the field of Mexican-American studies, outlined the history of Mexican-American culture from its Indian beginnings in Mexico to the current struggle for civil rights in the United States, paying special attention to the development of the United Farm Workers and the La Raza Unida Party.

According to Dr. Servin, the Mexican-American culture has always included passive acceptance of one's social and economic position.

This changed, he said, during World War II, when, drafted into the Army, the Mexican-American was for the first time classified as an American. Dr. Servin stated that the current Mexican-American struggle for civil rights dates from this first exposure to the "American dream."

After WWII, the Mexican-American finally began to be assimilated into American culture. As he participated more in the "American way of life," he began, for the first time, to demand for himself the standard of living he saw around him.

Thus, concluded Dr. Servin, "The awakening must be considered a product of American culture."

1700 Scholarships To Be Awarded Soon

Students who need financial aid can apply for the State Scholarship Program for this coming Spring & Fall semesters.

Recently Assembly Bill 1592 made it possible for 1600 more students to attend any four-year college (or the California Maritime Academy) with scholarship aid.

Of the 11,200 scholarships to be awarded during 1973-74, 1700 will be awarded to currently enrolled undergraduate college students.

The scholarships range from $500 to $2200 at independent colleges and from $300 to $600 at the University of California.

Students planning to attend a community college during the 1973-74 season can have their scholarships reserved until they attend a four-year college.

No qualification standards apply if you are a veteran with over 181 days of continuous active duty; others must be under 30 before Oct. 1973 to be eligible.

Every college's office of Financial Aid has the applications for the 1973-74 State Scholarship Program, which must be filled out and sent in before midnight, November 20, 1972.

QUESTION: How much faith do you have in Astrology?

Andy Hayes—Libra

I think Astrology sometimes can be an indication of your personality. But it has to be taken as a whole picture of the total person and not just emphasizing individually the birthdate or the moon sign.

Margaret Quandt—Virgo

I follow the horoscope. I don't follow it that closely, although at times I may be influenced by the predictions.

Nan Smith—Gemini

Although I don't like to admit it, I do think that the stars do exert forces on each other and people. I follow the horoscope, even though other people may be skeptical about it.

Dennis Leong—Cancer

I once had my chart done by a friend. According to the chart my future plans in a way coincide with my chart, but I figured that was by chance. Anyway, I don't invest too much faith in it.

Gail Rutherford—Leo

I don't believe in it. Although sometimes in my weak moments I attribute things to it that I don't understand, but I know it doesn't work. Those predictions are so general that they could apply to anybody.

Cathy Nabberfeld—Pisces

I read the horoscope every day, but I don't plan my life by it. It's interesting to read what they predict about your life, but I don't follow it that closely.

Crime Double-Faults FBI Scarce Tactics

The Uniform Crime Report UCR Published five times a year by the FBI, was its old hysterical self in the annual wrap-up published this fall. It's a wonder that newspapers can still herald the arrival of the UCR with banners like: "Crime Wave On The Rampage."

The FBI has been on a scare-tactics campaign ever since its birth; the unsuspecting public being its sole victim. Before you swallow those statistics the Chronicle and other papers throw at you, there are a few points to keep in mind:

1) The UCR has never given the slightest indication of actual crime in the U.S. It deals with reported crime which really tells you nothing more than who the police are arresting. (This became obvious when the Presidents Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice conducted a house-to-house survey, in 1967. The commission discovered that unreported crime far out-numbered reported crime. Some estimates run as high as ten times that of reported crime.)

2) Although the UCR accounts for population growth it has ignored the simple fact that today 50 percent of the population is under 25. Persons under 25 are known to commit more crime than those over 25.

3) Reporting techniques, due to use of computers and better trained police have boosted the reporting of crime, not crime itself.

4) More people live in the cities than ever before, where the reporting of crime is more efficient and where most crimes are believed to occur.

5) Mass media, linked with the easy accessability of a telephone have made people more willing to report crimes that may have gone ignored before.

6) The wide-spread use of insurance policies, all of which require a signed complaint from the police, has certainly effected the reporting of crime.

7) The UCR lumps crime together in misleading buddles of fact which distort crime. They also give no historical perspective for crime. You might be interested to know that the murder rate has been dropping since 1940, when it was almost twice what it is today.

The UCR is the standard source for crime statistics. When you see an article on the "crime wave" check to see if it uses it as the source. To list all the faults of the UCR would take a book (try The Crime Crime War by Robert Cipes, only the major points have been touched on here.

Probably the biggest joke of the UCR are the "crime clocks." To quote Fred Graham in his book, The Self-Inflicted Wound:

"This baffling presentation, year after year, of the various offences across the country, seems to have no other purpose other than sheer terror." Graham suggests that instead of reminding you that a murder is committed every 30 minutes the UCR might remind you that, ". . . a person's likelihood of being killed in a car crash is almost 15 times the chances that he will be murdered by a stranger."

It would appear that the main function of the FBI's report is to insure the spiraling budget of law enforcement agencies. The more sophisticated these agencies become, the more crime that is "discovered." This "discovered" crime comes from the backlog of unreported crime, which in reality is there all the time. (It is an oversimplification to assume that all rises in reported crime shown by the UCR are "discovered" crimes, but it is evident that a large portion can be attributed to this discovery).

The widely popular Les McCann Quartet lived up to expectations—and then some—at Keystone Korner recently.

While waiting for the quartet to return to the stage who should pop up at the bar but McCann, in a jovial mood.

"Hello Isaac Hayes," he said jokingly to a bald, bearded gentleman.

After autograph signing, mingling and joking Les returned to the stage and did what he does best.

The far-reaching sounds McCann presented justified the interest and wonderment that has always surrounded him.

Like Sly and the Family Stone, McCann is capable of reaching white, black, young and old. This can be attributed to the fact that McCann hasn't let himself fall into a mold, rather he has and does experiment with all music available.

"If you believe there's any hope left for the world, turn around and say hello to someone you didn't come here with," McCann offered—as everyone fulfilled his wish.

McCann's next number was "If All Men Were Brothers," Changing the mood the quartet then chose to play the popular, "What's Going On."

McCann has been known for the social commentary in his music, and "Compared To What" his biggest hit is still a crowd pleaser.

Adding to the "well oiled McCann machine" is a trio of expert musicians who have backed McCann for the last two years: percussionist Buck Clarke, bassist Jimmy Rowser, and drummer Donald Dean.

The Les McCann Quartet has many faces and they all express something they feel.

Carlos Santana Returns

By six o'clock the line had extended through the Pierce Street parking lot where scalpers were selling their "extras" for triple the original price. The rent-a-cops were ushering the crowd into neat single file lines. Bill Graham was already nervously pacing under the marquee checking the situation out. It wasn't any ordinary concert at Winterland: it was the long awaited return of Santana.

It had been more than a year since Santana's last local appearance (closing night at Fillmore West). Tickets for their homecoming, which included Tower of Power and Lamb, sold out in four days.

Only three of the original members of the band remained, while five new faces were added. The new band consists of Carlos Santana, guitar and vocals; Michael Shrieve, drums; Chepito Areas, timbales; Armando Peraza, congas; Doug Rauch, bass; James Lewis, congas and vocals; Richard Kermode, keyboards; Tom Coster, keyboards.

The band played for an hour with the audience interrupting the show many times to show their approval. It was obviously a well-rehearsed set that proved the musicians, particularly Santana himself, are thoroughly professional and in a class by themselves.

Most of the material was new to the audience, and presumably to be recorded on their upcoming LP. A few already recorded numbers were performed including "Incident at Neshabur" and "In A Silent Way."

If the material used in the concert was a preview of their next album, then it should indeed be a dynamite record. Most numbers resemble the style used on Santana's third and last-recording, but with much tighter, deeper rhythms. The band would get into rhythms and hold them just long enough for the listener to fall into a musical "trance," completely enveloped by the extraordinary sounds of the exotic instruments.

The sound is held together by the pulsating beat of Armando Peraza and James Lewis on congas and the incomparable Chepito Areas on timbales. When the band is playing at full speed, Carlos Santana strikes chords that make the spine vibrate.

The funky sound of Tower of Power provided a fulfilling warmup for the "big boys." Riding high on the charts with their latest LP "Bump City," the band is fast becoming popular enough to be headliners themselves.

The ten-man band led by vocalist Rick Stevens includes a five-man horn section which is basically the core of their sound.

Most of the stuff like "Back on the Streets Again" and "You've got to Funkasize" are all original compositions, and show a lot of promise for a band that was still playing small East Bay clubs little over a year ago.

Opening the bill were local favorites Lamb, (not as gentle as their name suggests.) Led by Barbara Mauritz, (whom some consider today's finest female rock vocalist) the band produces a sound that ranges from country to rock and roll. Discovered a couple of years ago by none other than Bill Graham himself, the band has already released two LPs. Audiences around the country should be hearing a lot more from Lamb.

Credit should be given to promotor Bill Graham, who kept the auditorium's capacity to a comfortable level. Of course, Santana themselves added a lot to the overall atmosphere. All that's left to say is: Welcome back, Carlos!"

✶✶ Love Story Revisited ✶✶

The 12th Century love story, Abelard and Heloise, will be presented this fall by City College's Drama department.

The play, originally performed in London in 1971, will star Ed Johnson and Donna Yahner in the leading roles.

Ms. Yahner exclaimed, "This is going to be the most fantastic play that City College has seen!"

"The play is one that all students will be able to relate to. The tale is of Abelard and Heloise, a 37-year-old theologian and the 17-year-old niece of a Notre Dame canon."

"The plot is very much like that of Erich Segal's Love Story. The everpresent emphasis on mores and religion of the 12th century period should make the play intriguing. The theme is enough to make one want to attend the play: the individual against society."

Performances will be on Oct. 27 and 28, and Nov. 3 and 4. Also, on Oct. 26, there will be three free performances for students.

Admission is $1.50 for general audiences and $1.00 for students. Curtain time is 8 p.m. at the College Theater.

League Opener:

Ram Footballers Blanked 28-0

City College is the largest junior college in the country, and yet it has a losing football team. Players should be proud to represent a school this size by going "all out" to win.

City College had a record of 1-2 before going into last Saturday night's game against Foothill Junior College at Los Altos, Calif.

Surely the outcome of the game wasn't because it was their first league game in the Golden Gate Conference. The Rams didn't look as good against the Owls as they did against SJD at Manteca because Foothill had a physically smaller team than the Rams and didn't show any outstanding talent.

The Rams are going to have to "get on the good foot" and play some football to compete for the championship. Instead of 1-3 the Rams should be 2-2, but they refused to accept the gift.

Foothill made mistakes that were costly but the Rams made so many it didn't matter. As "physical" as football is, it is also a game of mental gymnastics. The Rams made a "comedy of errors" that kept them from scoring at least 50 points.

The Rams received the kick-off and lost to downs. The defense gave up an early touchdown by jumping offside and the Owls went for a first down and scored their first 6 points.

Foothill's conversion made the score 7 to 0 with 8:35 left in the 1st period. They scored again with 2:23 left in the 1st period.

The second period was all defense and punting, but the Rams could have at least taken 3 points into the locker room at half time as they recovered a punt on the 19 yard line but fumbled on the first play from scrimmage.

The Rams should have riddled the Owls secondary all night long, but the receivers just couldn't find the handle.

The second half was still penalty-ridden and hampered everything the Rams could have had going for them, including an interception of a Ryan pass. Ryan started as QB and played up until that point.

Foothill scored again in the third period and got their last touchdown early in the fourth.

The Rams never gave up and did cross the goal line about midway through the fourth period, but to Day's dismay, flags were all over the end zone and his touchdown was called back on a penalty, thus erasing the Rams' hopes as they lost their league opener 28-0.

Soccer "Family" Out-Gunned

When Alfredo Vidrio, Jr., co-captain of the Ram soccer team, said, "We've got to be like a family to win," he couldn't have been more prophetic.

In a game marred by a lack of communication among Ram teammates, badly timed passes and the absence of a referee, DeAnza slowly wore down City in a 3-0 victory.

On several occasions, the Ram offense brought the ball down easily, but faltered when a score was needed. Their way was barred by too many scurrying DeAnza players.

The loss, which saw a good defensive first-half marred by a letdown of the defense in the late minutes, was City's first defeat of the new season.

This is a new year for Coach Diederickson and for the team. Last year, overflowing with seasoned players, the Rams came home undisputed soccer champs in the Community College Division; their long season culminated in a tough 3-1 victory over East Los Angeles.

Earlier in the week, Diederickson noted that "this was the most inexperienced team we've ever had." Shots on goal "left something to be desired" and the influx of recent high school graduates didn't help this year.

Although the team agreed it has potential, the three short weeks of practice made itself evident in the early part of the first-half. Our team, not yet coordinating to each other's playing caliber, allowed DeAnza to plummet down the Ram goal.

Thanks to the aggressive defensive play of Marwan Sahouriech, a potential All-Conference player, who "hustles like hell," and the quick hands of goalie Cortes, who dives at oncoming balls, the Rams were able to hold the fort.

Fouls in the first-half and the absence of scoring opportunities on the part of City College drove a sudden "fast break" pass, ending the slow play of the defenses. DeAnza drew first blood and scored with a 1-0 lead.

As courageously as the defense played in the first half, the Rams were not without their problems. Time after time blocking of their best scoring shots left Ram players just strutting back to their opponents.

One had to be awed by DeAnza's individual talent as they seemed to be in the right place when they were on offense. As coach Diederickson put it, "They passed where it hurts."

In hopes of scoring, City opened the second-half with a five-man offensive line. What followed were better scoring attempts but with a DeAnza line that collapsed like a sunset on the run. Good offensive efforts from City College's Carlos Molina, twice All-City at Mission, and Gary Meorff, a much-improved player, all seemed to be in vain. They just weren't able to work together when scoring was within grasp.

City College obtained good efforts by co-captain Vidrio, an All-Conference returnee from last year, as he coordinated the stubborn defense.

Though plagued by a "no show" offense in this early season, Vidrio assures that they will win in coming weeks, when the "family" comes together.

THE CHESS EXPLOSION: Elen Nettelbeck and Diane Merlino ponder their next move.

Chess Interest Broadens; Thanks to Bobby & Boris

When someone approaches you with an offer to work out a Nimzo-Indian Defense, don't expect to sign a petition protesting the seizure of Indian lands.

If you accept the offer, you will be going through the moves and variations of a play named after Aron Nimzovitch, one of the greats of modern Chess.

After a summer of rampant chess fever, it was not surprising to find a minor explosion of chess addicts on campus this Fall.

There are many who profess a desire to play but as yet there is no adequate chess program scheduled.

There was an attempt made last semester at CCSF to form a chess club. The notice, which ran in the Student Bulletin for a few weeks, eventually disappeared without any explanation. So far this Fall nothing has as yet appeared to renew the idea. This may be due to the lack of campus communications the first few weeks of the semester.

At first glance, the academic environment would seem conducive for the abstractions of chess.

Speculation on the future of chess in the United States has generally subsided. It is still impossible to predict the consequences of this summer's chess event. It is not unfair to suggest that a great deal of the coverage it received was due to the banality of the National Conventions.

One of the best indicators of the popularity of the game is the ratio of chess to cash. Chess books, which previously sold only to a small percentage of the reading public, now are selling out.

The Bobby Fischer "Memoirs" haven't been released yet but he already has a few books out which probably need reprinting, including "Bobby Fischer Teaches Chess."

George Koltanowski, a Chronicle columnist, is one of the best and most consistent sources of chess information. He is currently reviewing the Fischer-Spassky games move-by-move. Generally, each column contains a problem that can be worked out by average players. A chess problem-solving contest is conducted weekly in the Chronicle's Sunday entertainment section.

Basketball practice begins on Monday, October 16. Anyone interested is urged to see coach Phelan at the men's gym as soon as possible.

"VD Blues" - A Shot in the Right Direction

An unusual Public Broadcasting special with a unique off-beat approach to a formerly taboo topic entitled "VD Blues" was shown on KQED, Channel 9, at 8 pm Monday night.

It was an attempt to help launch a nation-wide campaign against a critical health problem.

Not a documentary program but an entertainment show with the purpose of contributing to the lessening of the disease which has descended for generations, the program, hosted by Dick Cavett, featured music, comedy, satire and drama.

The show dramatized the human predicaments of individuals faced with VD, but also imparted to viewers such vital information as how the disease is diagnosed, cured and prevented, the difference between the various forms of the disease, and what can happen if VD is left untreated.

Following the show, a panel of medical authorities, including Eugene Schoenfeld, M.D. (Dr. Hip Pocrates) as moderator, answered questions about VD phoned in by viewers.

* Law - If present trends continue in California there will be a surplus of lawyers in California by 1975, unless social needs for legal services are translated into government jobs. There may be a larger surplus of lawyers after 1980. No new California law schools should be established, contrary to recommendations from UC and the Legislature.

* Teaching - There is a current surplus of elementary and high school teachers in California which is expected to continue through the decade. The study calls this field "one of the most pressing problems for educational planners in the 1970s."

Electronic Music: Sounds of Tomorrow are Here Today

MELODIES — Of the future?

Over a period of two decades, electronic sound has gradually become established as a prominent composition source for contemporary music. The City College music department decided to tap that source this semester by offering an Electronic Music Lab.

Jerry Mueller plays dual yet coordinating roles as a part-time instructor in the CCSF music department and a full time maestro of the Electronic Music Lab. Mueller conducts laboratory activities based on the two major goals he hopes to accomplish as the electronic music course progresses.

According to their instructor, EML students should approach the close of the fall semester having acquired practical skills in the technique of "coaxing sound from an electronic synthesizer," and "structuring those sounds into musical composition."

Once the working principles behind the class's small Putney synthesizer have been mastered, the major problem with electronic music presents itself. "Structuring the musical varieties of tones and pitches emitted by a synthesizer is the problematical crux of producing electronic music because the potential is limitless."

"Frankly," admits Mueller, "most electronic music bores me. There's a lot of it around, but most people just turn the machine on and let it rip. That's why

High Court refuses To Void Viet War

In a recent decision the U.S. Supreme Court refused to place on their docket a proposal to declare the Vietnam war unconstitutional.

Justices Douglas and Brennan dissented on the basis that Congress did not officially declare the war in Vietnam. The justices mentioned that according to the constitution the power to declare war is vested in Congress.

The case was initiated in Los Angeles district court where Irvine Sarnoff, Kenneth Rottger and Raphael Konigsberg challenged sections of the Foreign Assistance Act (passed in 1961) which say that the President can give "foreign military assistance," without specifying the countries involved. As a result of this, it was claimed, the President took over functions which Congress should have retained.

In another action, the court gave permission to Falls Church, Virginia, to close massage parlors where men were rubbed down by women. The city claimed that the parlors were used for prostitution.

Robert Kisley, operator of two parlors, claimed that a city ordinance which prohibits women giving massages to men violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act which made "sex discrimination" illegal.

The court dismissed the appeal for "want of a substantial federal question." This gives cities the right to regulate massage parlors, and to close them down if necessary.

PRESS CONFERENCE—George Spadoro, Student Bar President at Hastings Law School, introduces former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark.

Student Leaders Endorse McGovern

Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark highlighted an October 14 San Francisco Airport news conference announcing support of over one hundred northern California student body presidents and campus newspaper editors for the McGovern-Shriver ticket this November. Forty of the student leaders were present.

Results of recent opinion polls taken at six large California campuses were released. They showed McGovern far ahead of President Nixon at all schools polled (including a 73 percent/18 percent split at Cal Berkeley and a 68 percent/17 percent at Stanford.)

Voter registration drives resulted in 96 percent registration of eligible voters at Stanford, 97 percent at Berkeley, 84 percent at San Jose State and 93 percent at Sacramento State, it was announced.

Recently returned from a tour to Indochina to inspect American bomb damage there, Clark focused on the "moral lessons to be learned" from the continuing Vietnam war, namely the "common humanity" of mankind. "We don't cherish Vietnamese children as we do our own," he stated, "and if we don't, can we expect them to cherish our children as their own? No!"

Referring to the difference between the two presidential candidates, Clark emphasized that young people need to be aware of the issues "because they are the future."

Asked about the upcoming election he replied, "I don't think it's a sprint from now until November 7, but a long distance race between civilization and catastrophe!"

The apparent aim of the conference was to disprove Nixon campaign claims that the "youth vote" is leaning toward the incumbent.

S.F. Christians Get High And Loud On J.C.

Christians in San Francisco, without a doubt the most vocal group on campus this fall, have now been recognized as a "legitimate" student organization.

The group, frequently referred to as "jesus freaks," have fulfilled all the requirements, including formal leadership and a constitution. There was no opposition to the Student Council's action.

The Christians, organized here last year, have had extensive activities from the very beginning of the semester. Their noon-time "sing-a-longs" on the hill and in the Student Union, are by now familiar sights to most students.

Their enthusiasm for preaching the "Word" has evidently generated a lot of hostility towards their methods, if not their message. For students who wish to relax in the sun between classes or banter in the Student Union on wet days (and conceivably untroubled by any lack of faith), the crusading Christians can be a source of irritation.

The general objection has been that the singing and chanting is distracting and disruptive to the academic environment.

"We don't want to antagonize anybody on purpose," explains the group's President Mathew Ferrari. Keith Houser, another member adds, "we realize that there is going to be a lot of misunderstanding."

SING ALONG — Everybody can't be wrong or can they, by God?

During the Monday, October 9 Council meeting, the Christians conducted a rally downstairs in the Student Union. Dean Flanagan had granted the group (at the time still unrecognized by the Council) permission to use the area.

Abortion Unit Okayed; New Juke-Box Slated

The Student Council has endorsed the CCSF Womens' Abortion Committees' "workshop" on abortion.

The workshop, scheduled for Thursday, Oct. 26, will include a film, It Happens to Us, a debate between representatives of Pro Life and the Women's Abortion Coalition, and a presentation by a woman doctor.

If time permits, there will be a get-together for women afterward.

A juke box is scheduled to be installed this week in the lower level of the Student Union Building.

The new addition is the result of an agreement between Student Council and a San Leandro firm. Both have consented to a 30-day trial period.

According to estimates, the box should contribute about $60 a week to the Associated Students' fund, or 50 percent of gross receipts.

GUARDSMAN OPINIONS, FACTS

Editorial:

Students Need New Constitution-Now

Student complaints about college regulations, funds for campus activities, course requirements, or anything else are best handled through the use of student government. But how can we impress obstinate administrators with a government which is based upon a constitution that's almost a joke?

For starters, the current constitution, approved in last Spring's election, simply instructs a number of office holders to "run" their departments, (whatever that means). The document misuses other terminology when it tries to give Student Council power to unseat the A.S. President. It uses the word "impeach," which means only "to bring to trial."

Worse than the common semantical errors are the several "cop-outs" found in our constitution. The preamble announces that the affairs and activities of the A.S. are to be "delegated by the President of the College," thus, in effect leaving out the students altogether.

In addition, another clause tells Student Council to interpret for itself the unclear or complicated sections, making it impossible for the document to stand on its own, legally.

But help is on the way. A new constitution is being drafted for our approval in this semester's election.

If attending college isn't just a mindless habit for you, then exercise your vote next January; or better yet, run for office. Either way you'll aid in the effort to force the bureaucrats to share some of their power.

QUESTION: Do You Have Any Gripes About Students?

Frank Holden - Computer Science

I think students are the greatest group in the world. I find them personally to be extremely mature and responsible. I see this evidenced in two areas, particularly in the hiring of faculty members and faculty evaluation.

William Neff - Biology

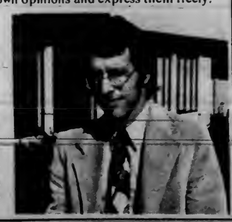
Yes, I have a gripe about students; they have an incurable disease called "youth." I have great admiration for students because of their effort to advance themselves and society. It's too bad that broad-mindedness is wasted on youth and lost until they grow old.

Ganelle Griffin - Nursing

Since I am a member of the Nursing Department, I am mostly associated with students who are here for a distinct reason. I am really amazed that some students pursue such a subject such a long time considering their heavy work load and financial situation.

Mary Thurber - English

Sometimes discipline may cause problems. Usually the younger they are, the less disciplined they are; they are usually the ones just out of high school who haven't learned how to act like college students yet.



Dr. Sydney Ancker - Humanities

I haven't any gripes. My feeling is that many students are more serious-minded than ten years ago. They are more individualistic. They have their own opinions and express them freely.

Ron Rubin - Business

Generally, I think students have too many outside problems. Most students who are attending City College on a fulltime basis are also trying to work 20-25 hours a week, comparable to having two fulltime jobs. This usually affects either their school work, job or health.

Student Loan Procedures Reinstated

A significant and supposedly pertinent change was made to the Federally Insured Student Loan Program in spring of 1972. Nevertheless, it only affects student applicants who received loans after June 30 and prior to August 19, 1972.

The federal government assumed payment of interest on student loans as of June 30, 1972, only 8 days after it was signed by President Nixon.

However, since the passing date was so close to its enactment date, confusion caused delays in loan activities.

The seemingly irreparable complications that caused the delays gave rise to Nixon's seeking of emergency legislation giving the loan program more time to adjust to the new procedures, when it became evident that the delays would affect loan-seeking students returning to college this semester.

Consequently, Congress concurred on August 17 by reinstating the old loan procedures that will be in effect until March 1973. Procedures are now exactly the same with one exception; students must now submit a notarized affidavit that the loan is for educational purposes only.

Birds Back in Palace Lagoon

The ducks are back in the lagoon at the Palace of Fine Arts, along with swans and geese. There have been no birds in the lagoon since June.

Ecologists and others raised a hue and cry when the birds in the lagoon had to be killed because of a rare disease, viral enteritis.

Thanks to financial help from two vintners, and proceeds from a recent jazz concert, birds from all over the world were brought to San Francisco and placed in the lagoon while a band played "Born Free."

The caretaker of the birds, known as "the birdman of the lagoon," identified the different species of birds as they were happily placed in the water.

The Palace of Fine Arts League, and the Recreation and Park Commission were co-sponsors of the restocking event. Among the dignitaries in attendance was Mayor Joe Alioto.

FEATURES, NEWS AND REVIEWS

"Identity" or "Individuality:"

"Melting Pot" Brews Discontent

At first glimpse, City College could pass itself off as a "melting pot" of different religious organizations, political philosophies, ethnic and racial groups, and sexual organizations.

One cannot cross campus without hearing the "Christians on Campus." The Christians can be found on the south side of our grassy hill overlooking Statler Wing.

Also found on campus is a group for freeing of the Soviet Jews. On somedays, one can visit their table near the flag pole.

Next comes the Newman Center. This is a "drop in anytime" organization with social activities held in a Christian context. Headquarters are off campus in a college owned house at 210 Phelan Ave.

There are also quite a few political groups on campus.

The most active thus far have been the Socialists Pamphlets by the Socialists can be acquired at their table near the flag pole.

Also on campus is the McGovern campaign and the Nixon campaign.

Two new political organizations found on campus this semester are the Communist Youth, with a table near Statler Wing, and the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS).

The present sexual-orientation groups are the Free Gay Student Association and the fraternities and sororities.

The Free Gay Student Association is both a social and political organization. The younger of the organizations, the FGSA has been found to be more active.

First activity of the semester is a dance on September 29.

The fraternities and sororities are strictly social organizations with private parties and dances for club members.

Among the ethnic and racial organizations, one will find the Black Students Union, La Raza Unida and The Chinese Cultural Club. All are social organizations.

These are some of the different groups found on campus. However, in order for the campus to truly become a melting pot, these different groups will have to break up and form one group for all the students.

Among some of the organizations there is prejudice towards other organizations, and some students often have a strong dislike for different campus groups. This is seen, for example, between the fraternities and the Free Gay Students.

Then again, some students feel that a melting pot is not an ideal and that many will lose their identity. In the present situation this "identity" is our "difference" a difference that in most cases is looked upon unfavorably.

Identity and individuality are not the same. One need not lose his or her identity if one keeps his or her individuality. Individuality is not sexually oriented or race oriented. It is yourself being yourself. It is time to get together and break the bonds!

Art Department Here Draws Praise

"In my opinion the Art Dept. at CCSF is the best to be found anywhere," were the words of Mrs. Marjorie Close, former student of Evans Ecke and Fanchon Geary Mead of the Design Directions Dept.

Recently Mrs. Close was invited to exhibit in the 23rd International Grand Prix Painting Exhibition in Deauville, France.

With 1267 paintings submitted by 714 artists of 34 countries, Mrs. Close won the Grand Prix Award in the still life category for her painting, Mediterranean, a flower study.

The award was her 45th in the past 12 years. Mrs. Close says she is just "one of many who has done well under the guidance of Mr. Ecke and Mrs. Mead."

Upon graduating from CCSF, Mrs. Close studied privately with Thomas Leighton and the late Matteo Sandona. She has exhibited in a group showing at the De Young Museum.

SCHOOL DAZE –Comedian George Carlin graduated from "straight necktie" to "long hair and hush-puppies."

New Records:

"Nose-Humming" and "Cheek-Popping"?

"Class Clown"
by George Carlin
Little David Records LD1004

Some people contend that once one has become "of age" one can't re-enter the childhood world again. George Carlin is an exception to the rule.

In his newest album "Class Clown" Carlin brings back the havoc of classroom scenes.

"Certain kids just learned things a lot faster than others," notes Carlin, "like Hawaiian nose humming . . . and cheek popping."

With a responsive audience, Carlin got them all to "cheekpop" together.

There were many stories pertaining to the controversial Muhammad Ali draft case but none can match Carlin's spiel: "I'll beat 'em up, but I won't kill them," vows Ali in Carlin's routine.

Out of 400,000 words in the English language there are seven you can never say on TV. Appropriately titled: "Seven Words You can Never Say On Television" is the best way to end a great album. Positively, it'll flash your mind apart with its symbolism in word associations. With a moment of thought almost anyone could name the words taboo for TV.

However; "there are some two-way words, the ones you used to laugh at in English like, "the cock is crowing," Carlin reminds.

George Carlin has been a dedicated comedian for some years now and he is just beginning to reap the real benefits.

Carlin dropped out of entertainment for awhile which is why it may seem like he just popped up a minute ago.

The truth is he had a "straight" act in the beginning. Upon his return to stage and screen Carlin's style had changed from "straightie necktie" to "long hair and hush puppies." The change has been all the better for George, who has appeared on the Flip Wilson show and the late-niters. All in all, with his physical appearance changed, "Class Clown" and appearances galore, George Carlin has firmly established himself as a star comedian.

UNICEF Christmas Cards Aid Needy Children

Christmas holidays and all the addenda they entail are swiftly approaching.

The annual variety of Christmas cards is already on the counters of most department stores in the City. UNICEF designs, donated by many artists and museums throughout the world, are now on sale at Macy's Serramonte and at the new UN San Francisco headquarters, 1739 Union Street.

Proceeds from the sales of a selection of holiday cards and gifts from now until Christmas will benefit children of the world's underdeveloped countries. "The holiday season is for children. What better way to celebrate than by helping the children of the world through purchase of UNICEF cards and gifts," says Mrs. Andrew S. Halley, chairman of UNICEF sales in San Francisco.

Sale of a single box of cards can "provide enough dopsane tablets to treat a leprosy patient for an entire year, seeds to produce 2,000 vitamin-rich tomato plants, 200 glasses of milk for needy children, or a laboratory thermometer for science instruction."

Special large edition cards depict illustrations such as an abstract oval design by the 20th Century Dutch artist, Piet Mondrian, or an eighth Century Celtic manuscript from the Book of Kells.

Bilingual calendars with paintings by such artists as Goya, Hals, Rembrandt and Gainsborough, and sculptures by the Romans, Egyptians, and Chinese, are also available as gifts.

Buy "Yourself" for Xmas?

Here is an idea for people who want to get their Christmas shopping done early. Neiman-Marcus Christmas catalog has the perfect gift idea for the person who has everything.

For the amazing price of "only" $3,000, you can have a sculptor make a life-size model of yourself, or anyone else. Also included is a tape recording saying whatever you want.

Other unusual gifts available are submarines, camels and a pair of "jaguars" — for a man; the car; and for a woman, the coat.

RamCagersOptimistic, Hungry

For Coach Phelan and his 1972 Varsity Basketball team, it's a new season & they have one thing in common. Both are hungry for league action.

With championship teams in past years, this last season has been a big blow without the usual "first place." As a result, this semester many players have taken the responsibility to be at practice early.

Inexperience, seems to spell the situation with the athletic departments at City & basketball is no exception as much of the hope lies in recent graduates of the various high schools in San Francisco.

Due to graduation, the Rams lost practically their entire team, including the swift play of guards Willie Daigle and Bob Taylor and the supportive front-line play of Ron Dale.

But what seems the real "scar" was the loss of 6'6" Cliff Williams, who dropped out of the world of basketball for religious reasons. Just last season he progressed to be the most outstanding center of the league. Williams had the maneuverability of a high-flying grasshopper.

Coach Phelan does not see these losses as the "end of the world," however: "We have a great number," said Phelan, "who are strong and are really adequate players."

"Size isn't everything," he added.

This year's team hopes to draw no parallel to last year's team or their record. Last year, not having the initiative to play as a team proved to be the Rams' downfall. As Robert McGriff, who hopes to be the floor leader, puts it: "a game of little passing and a lot of one-on-one!"

Meanwhile, choice of the starting five is still anonymous. "It's too early to say," confides Coach Phelan. But look for strong efforts from return guard Ray Frazier, a sight to behold on-court, and Atchen, known to his team-mates as a young "Earl Monroe," in addition to the aggressive play of sturdy Bobby Pruitt at center.

UP AND AT 'EM. – Vince Chambers stuffs in a basket.

Other possibilities include Vince Chambers and Kevin Mooney at 6'7", the tallest players on the squad to grab the forward positions.

Though aggressiveness is not lacking, superstar status which can, according to Phelan, "break the game open" is. In it's place, "We can only work hard, develop a combination, and hope," confides Phelan.

It's a long season ahead with a lot of pre-season games to determine "who's who," but you can bet teamwork will be on the minds of this year's Ram cagers.

"TAKING A BLOW" – Coach Phelan allows a moment of peace while getting the squad ready for the season.

Ho Hum, Rams Keep Record Intact 38-0

From the look of things, the Rams might as well forget the championship, unless they get on the stick and play some football.

Suffering their fourth loss in a row is slowly destroying the morale of the team and creating a situation where the Rams will be playing for little or no purpose for the remainder of the season.

Last Saturday night the Rams played another one of their now routine losing games.

The Rams were hosted by Chabot Junior College of Hayward in what could be called the mud bowl, but that's no excuse for the Rams 35-0 loss to a team that wasn't all that impressive.

The Rams are giving up about 28 points a half—usually in the first—and that habit is costing the Rams respect in the league. Everybody seems to know the Rams have a very weak secondary, and so far, they don't even worry about punting. They pass. The Rams can't keep the ball long enough on a drive to give the defense a well-deserved rest. With fumbles and penalties, the defense weakens after struggling doggedly through nearly sixty minutes of football.

Maybe the Rams need to "make change" in the back-field and get some backs that run instead of "tipping."

Ram Athletics: Last In Every Department

Maybe the coaches and assistants haven't noticed, but every school except CCSF gives out programs at games.

Rosters aren't everything but they sure are nice to have when one wants to find out who a certain athlete is.

A Guardsman reporter had earlier in the year been told by a coach that the school would do something about getting printed rosters for games. That's apparently as far as it went.

Maybe the blame for "inhospitality" or negligence is attributable to the fact that there are so many losing teams at CCSF. Even so, the athletic department should stop to consider that this school is already the most inconvenient this reporter has had opportunity to visit.

So, out of respect for thyself and convenience for visiting guests—get on the ball, athletic department!

Everyone knows that programs won't be the answer to the many problems facing you, but it'll save complaints and the department will be doing something it should have been doing all along.

Colorful Hayakawa's Had Enough, StepsDown

At a recent press conference Dr. S. I. Hayakawa, famed semantics authority and President of California State University, San Francisco, (better known as S. F. State) announced his impending retirement. He has requested the title of President Emeritus.

Named president of the college in 1968 after Robert Smith resigned to return to teaching, Hayakawa originally came to the campus in 1955 as an English professor.

After taking office, Hayakawa called in the local police to keep the campus open during a student class-boycott. Wearing his famous "tam o-shanter," he leaped up on a nearby truck in an appeal to striking students.

The campus has calmed down nowadays and is running smoothly. Hayakawa, 66, has passed the normal retirement age for campus officials.

Hopefully, in the near future a committee will name a successor to Hayakawa. The committee plans to include students' suggestions in its search for a replacement.

Christians-Cont.

The loud singing and chanting caused complaints among students including some in the lounge who were studying. One student's complaint reached the Council meeting, still in progress within the building, but without apparent effect.

At one point in the rally an obscene chant was spontaneously taken up by a group of students. Although the chant was short-lived it was met with approving applause by some of the other students. The Christians ignored the outburst but noticeably abandoned the provocatively evangelistic rhetoric they had used earlier to address the captive crowd.

This was the only occasion when the Christians use of the area was officially authorized. They have continued to use the area when bad weather has forced their activity indoors.

The "issue" of the Christians' activities is presently being widely discussed on campus. While most students opposed to the Christian group are content with exchanging jokes, there are some considering more positive administrative action.

I really emphasize structure." Anyone can get a synthesizer to produce electronic sound, but far too few people are involved in using the machines as musical instruments.

While Mueller has established criteria of knowing techniques and producing "structured" sound from the synthesizer as class format, the bi-weekly lab sessions encompass a variety of procedures. These include lectures and subsequent class discussions, listening to and reviewing composers' or students' pieces, and accumulating experience on the Putney synthesizer by individually experimenting with the machine during a specified time. Students taking EML will be expected to produce a five-minute tape of their own electronic musical composition at the end of the semester.

There are basically three types of people, Mueller feels, who can do well in the EML: the technically-minded individual (i.e., electronic engineers); people involved in broadcasting or media production arts; and music majors interested in composing electronic pieces.

Mueller was chosen to conduct the EML class because of his involvement in composing the score for the CCSF drama production, Ondine, and his background in the use of synthesizers. Despite obstacles that have cropped up, he plans to continue teaching the Electronic Music Lab unless there is low student registration or the Music Department heirarchy dictates otherwise.

Ecology:

Lead "Leads" in Pollutants

In a recent optimistic newsletter circulated to Chevron Service Stations, Standard Oil stated: "Unleaded gasoline is being used more and more as people are becoming aware of the advantages of this fuel."

Though its illustrated text seems to prove that unleaded gas burns cleaner, lengthens muffler and spark plug lifespans, this reporter wondered if the general public is really becoming more aware of the "ecology-minded" fuel.

According to Ron Morales, proprietor of a Chevron station on Mission Street in Daly City: "People not only don't know the advertised advantages of unleaded gasoline, they simply don't know what less lead means."

"People come in here and ask if unleaded has more octane than supreme," he continued. "They just don't know that more lead, which is a major pollutant, means higher octane like in supreme."

One of his attendants complained, "A lot of hot-rodders come in here ordering supreme, and they have 'ecology now' stickers on their rear windows." After a pensive pause, he continued, "They must mean it is alright for us to pollute, but not for you."

"Since unleaded is only usable in 15-20% of the cars built prior to 1971," Morales added, "many of the attendants are reluctant to chance selling it to a customer." "They're afraid the customer will return complaining of a loss of power or pinging."

However, the dauntless Standard Oil people have begun a program to stimulate inhibited gas jockeys into feeling freer about selling unleaded gas. Standard has representatives going to various stations ready to give $5.00 rewards to attendants promoting Chevron Unleaded.

Downtown Campus

The San Francisco Community College District recently announced plans to build a seven-story college campus building in the Yerba Buena Center, the south-of-Market area of San Francisco. The structure will cost almost four million dollars.

The building will occupy the northwest corner of Fourth and Mission Streets, presently the site of a bar and pawn shop. The land will cost $243,750.

VOLUME 75, NO. 6 CITY COLLEGE OF SAN FRANCISCO November 2, 1972

Special Report:

Cow Palace 25,000: "We Want George!"

"Time Warp"

The huge traffic jam on Hwy. 101 and all roads leading to the Cow Palace, Friday October 13, was the craziest mix of cars and passengers imaginable. It was as if San Francisco's spruced-up Sunday churchgoers, noisy beer-drinking baseball fans, sign-carrying peace marchers, and stoned-out rock concert mobs had all driven through some great time-space warp, funneling them toward the Cow Palace parking lots.

"McGovern" bumper stickers—visible on shiny Olds Cutlass and battered VW alike—seemed to lend some sort of symbolic unity or sense of purpose to the slowly moving flood of overheated automobiles, glistening in the early evening drizzle.

Energy

Despite the rain, traffic, and accidents (the press bus was rear-ended by a taxi) enough McGovern supporters showed up to see and hear their candidate to make it the largest political event in California history. Some 20,000 jammed the Palace to capacity while an estimated 7,000 listened outside over a PA system, surpassing even the crowd gathered in 1960 to hear John Kennedy campaign against Richard Nixon.

McGOVERN IN SF – "In person, George McGovern's honesty is convincing."

The energy level always runs high at political rallies, but the vibrations on this night were enough to register on Cal Tech's Richter Scale: the evangelistic fervor of a Billy Graham meeting, combined with the high-level emotions of a rock-festival might begin to approximate the mood prevailing amongst McGovern's audience.

It was more than appropriate, then, that music should begin the onstage activities. The San Francisco Street Strutters, a funky "ragtime" combo, and black blues singer John Hendricks entertained the multitude for almost an hour while McGovern wrapped up his fund-raising dinner downtown at the Hilton. Musicians will probably never perform to a larger, more enthusiastic—yet impatient—crowd.

Careers:

New Guidance Center Aids Student Problems

Many City College students are confused about what they want to do when they finish school. In response to this need for career counseling, the Career Guidance Center opened Tuesday, October 24.

Resource material is available on specific job descriptions (including training and entrance requirements), California and out-of-state college catalogs, civil service announcements and handbooks, and job-finding techniques. The Center also uses facilities of the Testing and Research Center to administer aptitude and interest tests.

Career Guidance Counselor Ann Clark, and Student Assistants Nancy McKay, Norris Kagan and Patsy Hom are available to interpret test results, help prepare resumes and letters of application, and even arrange industrial tours and visits to job sites.

The Career Guidance Center located in the bungalow behind the cafeteria is supported by the Community College District. It is open Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. It accepts referrals from the Counseling Department, or the student may go in on his own.

"CAN I SEE YOUR LICENSE PLEASE?;; – Deborah LeStrange and Barbara Jackson are first policewomen at CCSF.

Kampus Kops "Beautify" Their Image

San Francisco Specials no. 7037 and no. 7778 are now an integral part of the campus police beat. But, "the men behind the badges," aren't men at all. They are Deborah LeStrange and Barbara Jackson.

Last semester was the beginning of a new movement when the first two women enrolled in Criminology 70A. Although the student Chief of Police at that time was opposed to the idea of women peace officers patrolling the City College beat, the other officers in the department found that the 'novel' additions to the force were valuable assets.

Chief Pat Brennan, the current student co-ordinator of CCSF campus police, related how the department shake-up resolved itself: "It started on an experimental basis last semester and it worked out so there is no need not to continue."

"The Campus police have always been kind of closed to women interested in criminology. Now they are experiencing a chance to get a real feeling of what it would be like to be in an actual police department," Brennan said.

As far as Deborah and Barbara are concerned, Chief Brennan's statement sums up their motives for enrolling in the force—experience for the future. Both women plan to pursue careers in law enforcement after graduating from City, and Deborah sees her involvement in the campus police department as a learning experience that "has opened many doors" into various fields of law enforcement and not only a peace officer vocation.

Recommendations on State Propositions

In the hope that most of the bodies filling CCSF's halls and classrooms belong to concerned voting citizens, The Guardsman is publishing its staff's position on the various state propositions on next Tuesday's ballot.

Proposition 1

YES Authorizes $160 million in bonds for expansion of California community college campuses. CCSF will get money toward remodeling of Science Hall and construction of proposed Cloud Hall East.

Proposition 2

YES Issues nearly $156 million in bonds to University of California to develop Health Science facilities (i.e., new UC Med Center buildings for San Francisco). Should result in more accepted applications to medical schools.

Proposition 5

YES Permits legislature to authorize local school boards to act independently in experimental education programs or other activities not regulated by state law.

Proposition 8

NO Exempts from ad valorem taxation the pollution control devices that many industries are required to install in plants throughout the state.

Proposition 9

YES Changes two-thirds requirement on bond issues (that would earthquake-proof public schools) to a simple majority of voters.

Proposition 10

YES Extends property tax exemptions to veterans blinded by service-connected injuries.

Proposition 11

YES Adds privacy to state constitution's list of "inalienable rights." Can be used by bankers who refuse to open records of clients for police investigation.

Proposition 12

YES Extends more tax exemptions to other disabled veterans; those suffering from loss of limb as well as blindness.

Proposition 14

NO Lowers property tax in scheme to provide home-owner relief, but takes revenue from school and welfare systems.

Proposition 17

NO Circumvents state constitution's "cruel or unusual punishment" clause without repealing it to bring back the death penalty. (As Lenny Bruce once said: "'Thou shalt not kill' means just that!")

Proposition 18

NO Redefines "obscenity," throwing out "redeeming social importance" test, and would ban literature like Playboy Magazine or even Ramparts.

Vet's News

ATTENTION VETERANS: to receive your educational benefits, you must report to the Veteran's Office, Room E-202, each semester to report the number of units you are enrolled in. If you have not previously confirmed your units at this office, please do so immediately so as not to delay your payments further.

Heliotrope

Catalogs for November classes at Heliotrope, an alternative university, are now available. In addition to a small number of classes offered in the East Bay, Marin and the Peninsula, 105 classes are listed for San Francisco.

The courses cover a wide range of interest, from Practical Mysticism to Bicycling, Belly dancing, and Psycho-Cybernectics. Other subjects include film making, music, art, cooking, small businesses and growth techniques.

The classes are scheduled for week nights and weekends. They frequently are held in the instructor's home. The fee for each class runs from ten to twenty dollars.

The catalog is well distributed among stores serving a youth market. At CCSF copies are usually stocked in the news rack outside the Student Bookstore.

Heliotrope is especially interested in finding more teachers. Teachers receive half of the class fee. For further information contact Heliotrope at 398-7042 or come by the office at 21 Columbus Avenue in North Beach.

Gay News

The Free Gay Student Association announced that it will begin gay rap sessions on Thursdays at 11 a.m. in B203. All students are invited to find out what the "Gay Lifestyle is all about" from the gay students themselves.

On Tuesdays in B203 at the same time, Dan Allen's Gay Literature class will meet. The class which previously met on Tuesdays from 2:30-5:00 p.m. in the Experimental College, has changed the hours in order to have larger attendence of students and faculty.

CCSF Radio

CCSF's radio station, KALW FM, 91.7 on the dial, broadcasts between 1 pm and 3 pm every weekday. News shows concerning the College will start soon. The station airs mostly rock, but devotes Fridays to special shows.

Classical buffs should tune in between 1 pm and 2 pm, Fridays.

The other arm of City College radio programing is KCSF. KCSF will broadcast closed circuit to Statler Wing daily from 8 am to 4 pm.

Theatre

Improvisation, Inc., directed by Cindy Kamler, is a 20-member troupe whose new theatre will open at 149 Powell Street on Friday and Saturday, November 3 and 4. A preview performance was given on Tuesday, October 31.

The first of its kind in San Francisco, Improvisation, Inc., is an outgrowth of the vital "experimental" motif developed in Chicago by "Second City" following World War II.

Although Director Kamler, an alumnus of the original Committee Workshop Series, uses set pieces in addition to improvised pieces, the specialty of the group is responding immediately to audience suggestions with improvised acts.

Many of the young actors in the troupe have been active in Berkeley theater for several months as well as attending colleges in the Bay Area.

What they end up performing depends entirely on what the audience wants to see, and how the audience chooses to participate in the spontaneous act of creation.

UNICEF

The recent Trick or Treat campaign featuring UNICEF's national day, October 31, provided an opportunity for children of the community to learn an important lesson in "caring and sharing."

The familiar black and orange cartons (for collecting coins for UNICEF) rewards America's own children with a sense of sharing, and helps to bring food and water: the relief of pain: the tools of learning: and the knowledge that others care to millions of youngsters in 111 countries of the developing world.

For over 25 years the funding of these various projects dedicated to removing the obstacles to growth faced by the one billion children now living in Africa, Asia, and Latin America has been voluntary. Governments, private organizations and individuals have voluntarily supported UNICEF.

The annual national Trick or Treat collection on Halloween has brought in almost $3,500,000 last year for UNICEF's world-wide child care efforts.

Recycling Center Opens at Parking Lot A

Members of the Horticulture Department have begun a recycling center which will receive aluminum and clear glass and bottles of brown, dark and light green colors from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m., the first and third Saturdays of each month.

The Center's depot will be at Faculty Parking Lot A. It is located off Judson street, behind the bungalows near the old Art Building.

Tam Halaj, student director of the project, visualizes the Center's purpose as being, "to beautify the campus; to buy more aesthetic trash cans and to promote their use."

In using ideas that unite groups of people for a single purpose, Tam hopes that he can get people to aid in breaking the glass. If possible, the Center might have a pick-up service for transportationless groups of people who have 25 pounds of recyclables at one location.

The Art Department is being urged to paint the trash cans.

The project, while still in it's embryonic stages two semesters ago, received a brightly painted green and white delivery truck as a donation from the Coca-Cola Company.

Now used to haul recyclables to recycling plants, the truck made its first delivery last semester reaping a $30 return which will be used for gas, oil, or new trash cans.

Because the Center is funded by the City which will pay for major truck repairs, Tam Halaj doesn't think that any of the problems that plagued "capital gain" organizations will bother them.

"However there is one problem in sight," said Tam, "what to do with Bi-metal can products?" Bi-metal, which is tin, pays $4 per ton, which makes the trips unprofitable.

Fiery Mid-East Issues Debated

A debate on the "Burning Issues of the Mid-East Crisis" was attended by 75 students at CCSF recently. The two speakers were Joshua Bartlett, supporter of George McGovern, and Gordon Fox, supporter of Linda Jenness, Socialist Party candidate for President.

Fox began the debate by condemning what he termed the "witch-hunt that has been unleashed against the Palestinian struggle for self-determination by the Zionist rulers and their allies in West Germany and the United States," as a result of the Munich killings.

He cited as evidence the escalated bombing raids by the Israelis on Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon and Syria and the increased police harassment reported by Arab organizations in West Germany and other European countries.

While criticizing the use of terrorism as a "strategy for gaining liberation," Fox stated that "The real terrorists are those in Washington who are responsible for the slaughter of thousands of Vietnamese people and the Zionist rulers of Israel who order the bombing and napalming of Arab civilians and defenseless villages."

Fox denounced McGovern for "preaching peace to those who are fed up with American involvement in Southeast Asia while promising increased military aid to the Israeli government and threatening war with the Palestinians."

He concluded by explaining that the Socialist Workers Party and their candidates support the stated goal of the Palestinian liberation movement which is a "democratic, secular Palestine and a non-religious state in which Jews and Arabs would have equal rights."

Mr. Martlett began his remarks by denying that a "witch-hunt" had been opened against anyone and termed Fox's statement to the contrary "too ridiculous to comment on."

He stated that a "democratic, secular Palestine" was a "good idea," but that he saw it as being an unlikely outcome due to the "history of Arab violence against the Israeli Jews."

Martlett went on to give his interpretation of the history of the establishment of the Israeli state and show that the only viable solution to the problems of the Jewish people was a strong Jewish state. He concluded by saying he was supporting McGovern because he offered the best program for achieving this goal.

The heated debate was followed by several questions from students.

Dillon — "Wild Bill Hickok Was a Bum!"

"I don't think Western fiction is worth the powder to blow it to hell," declared Dr. Richard Dillon.

Dillon, an authority on the Old West (who looks like a used car salesman), spent most of the Oct. 19 Concert-Lecture hour knocking the treatment that the Old West has received at the hands of fiction writers — and Hollywood.

He argued that there is more drama in real history than in most Western fiction, because, "People who came out here (west) were the most bizarre group since the Renaissance Pleasure Faire. Imaginative, restless people flocked here like lemmings."

Another reason for this drama, according to Dillon, was the sheer death of people in the region, making the few who were there seem larger than life.

"Nowhere has an individual counted for more than in the Old West."

He also unmasked a few myths, revealing that Daniel Boone fled the country to escape hounding creditors: that Kit Carson was illiterate and was socially ostracized by his contemporaries for twice marrying Indian women: and that Wild Bill Hickok was "a killer, a ham, a so-so scout, and a bum . . . arrested frequently for vagrancy."

While acknowledging that there is "usually a grain of truth in folk history," Dillon contended that "the media have harped on anti-heroes."

He concluded with some guarded optimism about the future of historical writing: "I see no let-up in 'hokum,' but I do see a more educated, demanding public."

SF Film Festival — 'Dirty Little Billy' Meets Vocal Movie Critics

The San Francisco Film Festival is over for this year. If you have never been to the Film Festival, it is an experience you should consider when it is presented again next year.

If you don't mind sitting in the first few rows, waiting while your ears adjust to the blaring sound, and of course taking a chance on the new movies you see; then the student ticket price of $1.50 is probably worth your money.

Besides the movies, the Film Festival is an audience participation / reaction event. Outcries from the audience before, during and after the performances are standing.

Following is a review of two films and the audience's reaction to them.

Solaris, the Russian science fiction film, was billed as the "answer" to 2001, but visually it was standard science fiction, and no more.

The idea behind the film was of an "intelligent ocean" on the planet Solaris which sent "guests" derived from the memories of the Earth spacemen. The movie went wrong when the "guest" from the leading character's mind was that of his dead wife.

If only some portion of evil or imagination in his mind had been recreated by the ocean, the movie could have been greatly improved.

The one minute short feature that preceded Solaris drew more applause than the film itself. Equal portions of boos, hisses and applause greeted the end of Solaris.

Preceding the movie, three awards for television commercials were presented. Levi Strauss, Bank of America and Del Monte were the winning commercials. The announcement of one of these companies drew a large chorus of "boos" from a segment of the audience.

Dirty Little Billy presented the early life of Billy the Kid. It is another "anti-hero" western in which the leading characters are cold-blooded killers.

The term "dirty" applies to everyone and everything in the movie. All the people and settings are lavishly coated in mud and dirt, apparently to achieve authenticity.

Michael J. Pollard has the title role of Billy the Kid. If you have seen Pollard in other films, then you know he is just playing that same type of character which he repeats in so many of his films.

The violence (four short scenes), is rated "R". At the end of a knife fight between two women, vocal reaction from the audience was: "Sick!" and "Let's all walk out!" The sex was edited in hopes of a "G" rating, making it not even worth it's time in the movie.

Applause at the end of the movie slightly outweighed the "boos" from the anti-violence segment of the audience.

Because the movie is more character development than action, it becomes tedious a good portion of the time. But if you really like goofy ol' Michael, then you just might like Dirty Little Billy.

CCSF Play Staged This Weekend

All of the controversy of nudity on the stage, homosexual relations and immorality have been rolled together into City College's fall drama production, Abelard and Heloise.

The plot centers around the love affair between Peter Abelard, a 37-year old theologian and Heloise, the 17-year old niece of a Notre Dame canon.

Throughout the play we see the character Robert de Montboissier, Abelard's servant, played by Tim Hindman. In the second act, a very emotional scene, Robert proclaims his love for Abelard to Heloise. A weak point in the play is that this paradox is dropped. The audience is faced with a controversial situation but nothing comes of it. Heloise does not even react.

Special effects to show the passing of time are excellent. Also well done is the fashion in which the play starts the story with the use of the present moving into a flashback. Dr. Krumm deserves credit for his excellent choice in lighting to set the mood.

John Condrin does a fantastic job in character-acting as Gilles de Vannes, a Canon of Notre Dame.

Tim Hindman does an excellent job as Robert de Montboissier and is exceptional at expressing his emotions. This is especially true in the scene in which he must punish Abelard at his demand.

Special credit goes to the set designer, W.D. Harris. The set is both attractive and sets up the scene.

The technique of using nuns and monks as part of the set is both interesting and provocative in achieving the effect.

The nude scene was somewhat clumsily done. The lighting helped set the mood but the situation was still something of an illusion and could have been improved. The manner in which Heloise's uncle, Fulbert, was played by Ed Drake, was a little too unreal. His reaction was rediculous and could have been performed better.

Special credit for fantastic performances go to Ed Johnson and Donna Yahner in the leading roles.

The couple do a fine job of keeping the audience interested and truly perform as experts in the art. Ms Yahner carries the emotions of a young woman in love with an older man beautifully. She screams out her wanting of Abelard in a frightening, bizarre way.

Ed Johnson is outstanding in his role as Abeland. His haunting devotion to God is climaxed in the closing scene many years after he'd been castrated for loving Heloise.

The play is recommended. It is controversial, frightening, and beautiful. The Easter Sunday scene is reason enough to want to see the play. It is beautifully directed. Curtain time is 8 pm on Nov. 2, 3 & 4. Students admitted free on Nov. 2.

Reverberations From Another Era

In the age of electronics when revolutionary technological changes have taken place in the world of music and entertainment, one might imagine the old silent-film pipe organ relegated to the dusty confines of a darkened theatre loft to be forgotten for all time.

It is not so for one veteran practitioner of this now seemingly "passe" entertainment. For fifty years Gaylord Carter has been playing theatre organs in many parts of the world. He began his career in Los Angeles in 1922 at the Sunshine Theatre.

An original, uncut version of the 1925 silent film classic, The Phantom of the Opera, starring Lon Chaney, Sr., was specially presented Monday night, October 30, at the Orpheum Theater with Carter at the mighty pipe organ.

In addition to his concert tours, featuring pipe organs and silent films, Carter has been composing and recording organ scores for silent movies for exhibition throughout the world in theatres and on television.

Although in recent years he has presented pipe organ and silent screen programs in Bay Area theatres such as the Orpheum and the old Fox theatres in San Francisco, he is probably best remembered by the "middle generation" for his playing of "The Perfect Song" every night on the former Amos and Andy radio program.

To date, no specific problems while on duty have arisen for either Barbara or Deborah because of their sex. "I get a few comments" states Barbara; but both officers find that student reaction is positive on the whole.

QUESTION: Who do you think will win the Presidential election and why?

Lynn Milloich—Pre-School Ed.

I have a feeling that Nixon is going to win. Mainly because the majority of the people are middle and upper class and would be hesitant to vote for McGovern because there are a lot of discrepancies in what he says.

Bill O'Neill—General Education

I think Nixon is going to win because of the state the country is in. The people with the wealth don't want to give it up so they keep people like Reagan and Nixon in power. The "Silent Majority" is gullible and believe the falsehoods they are told.

Sherry Rodamor—General Education

I think Nixon will win. McGovern might have a chance but Nixon has the powerful people on his side. Most people aren't happy with Nixon but they will choose him over McGovern.

Paul Takamatsu—Art

I hope McGovern wins but not because I like him. If Nixon wins, it will be because most people aren't ready for the changes that are necessary. They are too conscious about money.

Linda Castillion—General Education

I think President Nixon will be re-elected. A lot of people have lost faith in McGovern because he doesn't always stick to his ideals. I really don't like Nixon but I think he'd do a better job than McGovern.

Dennis Callahan—Nursing

I think Nixon will win the election because people aren't believing the things McGovern is saying. Nixon has all the big business and money behind him. Nixon also has a very sexy daughter.

GUARDSMAN SPORTS AND NEWS

Football:

Rams Best Effort Still Not Enough

It was excellent football weather, and the Rams seemed to have been up to par for their Bay Area rivals, Merritt College of Oakland, in an exciting game.

The Rams played one of their best games of the season Friday in the first home contest of the year, but lost by a narrow margin of 16 to 7, in a game that again should have been won by the Rams.

Merritt scored first with 6:50 left in the first period and went on to pass for a 2-point conversion to lead 8 to 0. Oakland scored again in that same period to take a 16 to 0 lead, but couldn't keep the Rams from taking 7 points into their locker room at the half on a pass from QB Greg Jiminez to wide receiver Frank Byron, with 1:11 left in the half.

The second half was scoreless but just as exciting as the first. Except for the two touchdowns the defense gave up, they played as well as any defense in the league, intercepting two passes — one by hard-hitting Stan Bethea; and another by Williams Wilder who nearly had a touchdown as he ran the ball back to Merritt's 20-yard line.

The defense also blocked a punt attempt and as usual, middle linebacker John Wells "did his thing" along with William Goode and Homer Lewings.

Water-Polo:

Tailspinning Fankmen Take Another Dive

If there were any bright spots in the Ram's affair with Foothill College, you would have to look for them with a microscope. City's water polo team was drubbed to the ground in a 28-4 loss to the swimming Owls.

The only scoring came from Barcojo and a substitute, Larry Elton.

Before the game, Coach Decker heard via the "water polo grapevine" that Foothill had one of the best teams to come in some time. How right they were!

The Foothill Owls came on more like sharks as they routed Ram defenders. As easy as the Rams set up for the attack, Foothill scored without hesitation. Many times they were able to score from distances no more than three feet from the Ram goalie.

The early goings showed indications of a pre-meditated "white-wash" as Foothill amassed three quick goals in less than two minutes.

Coach Decker, in hopes of keeping the game from being blown wide open, substituted "bench warmers" and starters without as much as blinking an eye.

But it was to no avail. By the end of the first quarter, the score was 7-1. City's only score came by the way of Serwatka, who was thrown out shortly after for a major foul.

Though they were outclassed it was discouraging to see the Rams swim half-heartdly. The Owls just outswam them. All defensive tactics that City could muster up made no difference. Throughout the entire game, Foothill scored not only when they wanted but where they wanted in the pool.

As Co-Coach Bart Robatto, commented, "we're losing because of conditioning."

Toward the end of the game, the score became lop-sided, with the final score 28-4.

The Rams again received sound efforts from Barrango, Demay and from new goalie Hikkoks, who blocked some important passes.

Sports Editorial:

49'ers Sing "Quarterback Blues"

Well, to nobody's surprise, the great bubble has popped! The 49ers bid for another crack at the Super Bowl or even chances at the Western Division title will depend on the quarterbacking of Steve Spurrier.

Regular QB John Brodie is out from 1 to 3 weeks or till who-knows-when, thanks to an ill-placed tackle. Once again the 49ers will have to make do with what they have.

But unlike the replacement of a running back or a weak-kneed tackle, the replacement of the team leader is as controversial as Spurrier's capabilities.

That the 49ers are now in third posting with a 2-3 record doesn't mean they're "throwing in the towel." Coach Nolan, for one, isn't worried. As he puts it, "I have confidence that Steve will do the job."

Although a former Heisman Trophy winner, Spurrier has been put under the microscope by the press and dissected without remorse. Reputed by Bay Area sports pages as the "gimpy-armed" one, he hasn't drawn much favor as the heir to the quarterback slot. Maybe that's why there's a Joe Reed?

But the time for speculating is now gone and it may or may not benefit Spurrier.

For starters, it gives Spurrier the chance to finally prove his worth. If he does give a good performance on the field, it will solidify his existence on the club. But if he substantiates his critics' thoughts, the 49ers might as well bring in Joe Reed.

Though shown to be winners, the 49ers haven't really shown the quality invested in past years—consistency.

After two years and a professed "we got it together" by 49er coaching personnel, the real 49er situation made itself evident in their third loss of the 1973 season. Skepticism resulting from those "proven years" was overtly displayed as die-hard fans booed in the rain at Candlestick park.

As the saying goes "when you run into one problem, you might as well get all of them." To everyone's disbelief the heralded defensive end Cedrick Hardman was demoted as team-mate; Bill Belk taking over his spot.

Hardman, one of the better defensive linemen to come around in some time, did not whimper at the decision. Instead he attributed it to his own bad play.

When one looks at the man who was to be part of the "championship years" for the 49ers but was replaced, one wonders what is going on in 49er-ville.

With an offense that has been geared to the bullet-passing of John Brodie for two years (then the next week told to adjust to a Joe Kapp style play) it's almost a certain omen for disaster.

Throughout the winning years Coach Nolan has told the press that the 49ers can win with Spurrier. That promise will be put to the critical test in the next three weeks. This is the time that will "make it or break it" for the 49ers this year.

Richard M. Nixon — Linda Jenness — Joseph Schmitz

THE OTHER MAJOR CANDIDATES — Though not as active on campus as the McGovern campaign, Young Voters for Nixon had a table set up to distribute literature. The Guardsman was unable to obtain an interview with Nixon staffers prior to press time. Young Socialists Alliance brought Socialist Workers Party candidate Linda Jenness to speak at CCSF (See Guardsman Issue No. 4). Joseph Schmitz, American Party Candidate, had no campaigners on the campus.

and wild gesturing. A more aggressive and effective fundraiser would be hard to find. Brown is obviously the black man to watch in future Democratic political circles. He has the charisma and stage presence of a Martin Luther King, Malcolm X, Rev. Cecil Williams or a B.B. King all in one animated, energetic yet always sincere package.

"I want every one of you to take that money our of your pocket and wave it in the air!" he demanded. "Take out some of them dead presidents—none of that change—don't insult my sensibilities with none of that change!" The Cow Palace almost immediately became a forest of waving green bills.

"Holdup"

Brown wasn't finished yet, however: "I want every one of you politicians here on the stage to give me your money!" he proclaimed. "If you want to sit up here with George, it's gonna cost ya! Sherriff Hongisto . . .give me twenty dollars! Mayor Alioto . . .give me twenty dollars! . . ."

Interestingly enough, aside from Nixon's Alioto's was the only name to draw "boos" all evening (mingled with applause and cheers for Brown's onstage "holdup" of the local politicos), while Hongisto and his lovely female companion probably got the wildest cheers of all.

Notified of McGovern's imminent arrival, Brown left the stage with the warning: "I need $25,000 to pay for this rally; and if I didn't get it I'm gonna be back!"

"Orgasmic Release"

By this time the crowd was fully primed and the suspense was getting unbearable. As McGovern finally entered with his wife and Secret Service escort, and began moving towards the stage, the prolonged hysterical outburst of cheering seemed an almost orgasmic release of pent-up tension.

Looking exhausted, but buoyed by the reception, the candidate thanked Willie Brown and the hundreds of high-school and college volunteers who made the rally possible; then launched into an emotional condemnation of Nixon's continuing "slaughter" of Vietnamese people. (After seeing McGovern speak, it would seem impossible for anyone to doubt his sincerity—whether they agree with his policies or not.)

Nixon

As in his half-hour TV speech the preceding Tuesday night, he made liberal use of Nixon's own Vietnam statements, such as:

"Those who have had a chance for four years and could not produce peace should not be given another chance."—Oct. 8, 1968.

"Once the enemy recognizes that it is not going to win its objective by waiting us out, then the enemy will negotiate and we will end this war before the end of 1970"—Sept. 26, 1970.

More vintage Nixon, following the invasion of Cambodia: "The decision I have announced tonight means that we finally have in sight the just peace we are seeking."—Apr. 21, 1970. "This action will shorten the war."—May 8, 1970.

"Honor"

In response to Nixon's statements, McGovern continued amidst applause and cheers: "We remain in Vietnam, we are now told, to preserve our honor. But how can there be honor in persisting in a mistake? What is truly honorable is to stop compounding that mistake and start binding up the wounds it has created!"

"How can there be honor in destroying a nation in order to save it? What is truly honorable is to finally bring peace to a people who have known only a generation of war."

"And perhaps that is the most fundamental difference of all between Richard Nixon and myself. For while he says there will be no peace without honor for America, I say there can be no honor for America until there is peace!"

Mailer

In person George McGovern's honesty is convincing. The emotions he expresses—whether outrage, compassion for human suffering, or even love of country—seem almost embarrassingly sincere.

While covering the Democratic Convention for Life Magazine, Norman Mailer said of him: ". . .it occured to me that if I had stood next to many politicians over the years, I had not ever before had such a splendid sense that I was standing near a man who had a heart which could conceivably be full of love—something awfully nice came off McGovern . . ."

"Pavlovian"

McGovern's apparent imminent defeat—if we are to believe the polls—could indicate a large-scal national shift to the politically-conservative "right". On the other hand it may merely mean that America, long "conditioned" by overexposure to mass media, is ever more vulnerable to slick public relations/advertising-style "molding" of public opinion (as practiced so ingeniously by the vast Nixon apparatus).

In the latter case we may be witnessing once again the "selling" of a President; and the American people, wonderful consumers that we are, are just "buying", as usual. (Perhaps we should all start paying more attention to people like Marshall McLuhan and Vance Packard—obviously Nixon is!)

Either way shift to the right or Pavlovian conditioning a McGovern defeat November 7 will be cause indeed for some grave doubts about the future of our nation, and the world, no matter how many pieces of paper Richard Nixon signs or doesn't sign.

Abortion Controversy Heightens: "Off our Knees, into the Street"

"Off our knees, on our feet, out of the kitchen and into the street," is a slogan of the feminist movement.

In the street was where women from all over California were on Saturday, October 28 at the climax of the Northern California Tribunal on Abortion, Contraception and Forced Sterilization, held at U.C. Berkeley.

The march to Berkeley City Hall ended two days of testimony, both personal and professional, on the effects of restrictive abortion and contraceptive laws. Findings of the Tribunal included:

"The psychological examination necessary to obtain a legal abortion is often humiliating and traumatizing."

"Legal complications often delay legal abortions past the twelfth week of pregnancy, after which the simplest, safest procedures are no longer possible." (A death was reported due to this delay.)

"The requirement that abortions be done only in accredited hospitals raises prices beyond many womens' means."

"In illegal abortions, women are frequently crippled and sterilized by infection due to unsterile instruments and procedures."

"Most legal abortions are performed under the 'insanity' clause (the woman declares herself insane). With medical records becoming increasingly public, this can terminate the career plans of many women."

"Unwanted children tend to have serious psychological problems. Their treatment or incarceration is a financial drain on society."

"Seventy-five percent of all deaths from illegal abortions are among non-white women."

A list of charges against the State of California, the California Legislature, and Governor Ronald Reagan was drawn up; and the people moved into the street. They were joined by sympathetic bystanders along the route, so that an estimated 300 to 400 people crowded the steps of Berkeley City Hall.

Among the charges read by Carole Seidman at the top of the steps were:

"The California Abortion law forces women to become criminals by denying them legal abortion."

"Governor Reagan is responsible for denying women under 18 the right to protect themselves from unwanted pregnancy."

"The State of California magnifies racist oppression suffered by Black, Asian and Chicano women by denying them control of their reproductive lives."

"Women are sterilized against their will and there is danger that legislation will formalize this and make it more widespread."

"California legislation forces women to degrade, humiliate and incriminate themselves by declaring themselves mentally ill."

"All abortion laws are unconstitutional."

Over 60 letters were mailed to California state and federal legislators inviting them to attend the Tribunal. Only 16 were answered. Some legislators were sympathetic and wanted more information, but not one attended the Tribunal.

Financial Aids — What's Goin' On?

For some students at City College, the on-campus Financial Aids Department has often been a mounting source of frustration in the students' attempt to find some way of remaining at school with limited financial capabilities.

Briefly, the function of Financial Aids is to assist the needy student by means of grants, work study programs, or loans. As simple as these procedures might appear, the task of processing, interviewing, and finally getting the desperately needed money to the student is quite a time consuming excercise indeed.

The Financial Aids Department at City College is headed by Ms. Juanita Pascual, a professional counselor. Ms. Pascual took over the position in mid-August and has dealt admirably with the pressing obligations of her position.

Students who are unaware of what exactly goes on in Financial Aids have charged the department with being overly sluggish in the discharge of its duties.

JUANITA PASCUAL

"For the first time since Financial Aids began, students are getting their checks during the second week of school," she conveyed, "but the laws are continually being changed, and processing is lengthened to four or six weeks."

CCSF Gains Lawn Sculpture, Library Mural

A metal sculpture and a multi-hued ceramic mural, unique in the physical mediums employed yet strikingly similar in their source of inspiration, were recently installed on campus.

Wyoming Coup, an aluminum structure created by Bill Wareham, rests on the left side of the lawn in front of the Science Building, while Peter Vandenberge's untitled clay mural hangs on the south wall of the library in Cloud Hall.

Student Council:

Feud Over Member Eligibility Drags On

The issue of ineligible Student Council members was revived last week by newly-appointed councilman Bill Lang.

In Wednesday's meeting Lang submitted a motion to establish a committee of three council members and three "students-at-large" for the purpose of investigating grade point averages and unit counts of challenged representatives.

Unlike a similar motion offered last month, this one was approved by the council, 6-2.

Under the new legislation, the three students-at-large will represent the opponents of the present governing body while the three council members will be those who have urged dismissal of all challenges.

Within two weeks, the committee should present a report to the Student Review Board for a final decision.

The Student Review Board is comprised of six students and three faculty members who provide evaluations of current or prospective college officials.

The greatest problem the investigation committee faces is one of gaining access to academic records of challenged councilmen which, by law, are confidential.

The stumbling block could be overcome by cooperation with the Dean of Students, Ralph Hillsman, or through legal action.

New Campus Planned

San Francisco's Community College District recently entered initial planning stages for a project that should materialize as the city's first community education building for 1975. The structure will stand seven stories high on the northwest corner of Fourth and Mission Streets, with the estimated cost set at $3.9 million for the building itself and an additional $250 thousand for the land.

The Yerba Buena Community Education Building will support three distinct teaching formats upon completion. Approximately one-half of the structure will be occupied by extensions and new additions to current City College business courses, specifically scheduled from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. for the people who attend school and work in the downtown area.

The remainder of the center will be utilized by the second division of the Community College District, Adult Education and Occupation programs, and a small portion of space will be rented to California State University at San Francisco for specific extension courses. The adult courses are also designed for the business community and residents in the downtown area surrounding the Yerba Buena building. The main student influx is expected to come from the Chinese and Phillipino populations.

Because of the unique threefold teaching format, it will be possible for a person to attend the complex without having received a high school diploma or speaking English, and go on to the University to receive a degree.

Construction of the college extension will not begin for at least another year. Vic Graff, the Associate Director of Facilities and Planning Commission for the Community College District, expressed the reasoning behind establishing community education buildings. "We feel that we're not reaching out adequately into the community."

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS CLUB — Adrian Baretto, President (Peru); Jose Lopez, Vice President (Argentina); Monica Sung, Secretary (Mainland China-Shanghai); and Khanh LeCong, Treasurer (South Vietnam).

International Club Plans Colorful Gourmet Dinner, Music, Folk-Dancing

Buenas Dias! Bonjour! Chow Un! Hello! Any of these greetings may be heard emanating from C258 twice a month as the members of the International Relations Club meet on the first and third Tuesday at 11 am. At present they are preparing for their annual Fall International Dinner and floorshow.

One of the oldest clubs on campus, the IRC has an active membership of approximately 50 people who meet regularly each month in an exchange of cultural and social activities. Foreign Student Adviser, Dr. Joseph Jacobsen, has been sponsor for the club since its inception in 1954.

San Francisco High Schools have benefited from the talents of the club members who have visited the schools in their native dress in an attempt to promote cultural understanding and good will. Organizations like the Crippled Children and others have also benefited from the volunteer performances of the IRC members.

Enthusiasm, a zest for joyful living, and an interest in peoples from all corners of the earth illuminate the exuberant faces of the new officers of the IRC as they explain their hopes for the future of their organization.

"We would like 'visitors' to attend our meetings, to become members of our club," says Adrian Bareta from Peru, Vice President of the club. "Everyone is welcome, including native-born Americans," he adds with candor.

With the help of the H & R Japanese club, the Statler Wing dining room will be a kaleidoscope of color and excitement on Thursday, November 30, as club members from a variety of nations present their annual International Dinner with gourmet food from all over the world. Entertainment in folkloric dances and music will follow the dinner in the Student Union Building, with a live dance band for guests to trip the light fantastic after the show.

Everyone is welcome—faculty, students, friends!

Lecture Series:

To Inform or To Win Votes Is The Question

William Kantor, who recently spoke to City College students as part of the concert-lecture series, is a man with an interesting hobby. Kantor, who is a broker by trade, collects films of TV political commercials. The topic of Kantor's talk was "Classic TV Political Commercials."

There are two types of political commercials. One type is paid for by the candidate, and the other is free time offered by the station. The purpose of these commercials is to inform the voters and to "win votes."

Kantor talked about the different production techniques for TV commercials. One is the formal statement where the candidate prepares the speech. Another type shows the candidate in an open field or in a relaxed state. The "question and answer," where people ask a question of the candidate, is another technique. Eisenhower used this type in 1952. Unrehearsed dialogue between the candidate and voters is also used. McGovern favored this type in the recent election.

In 1960, TV proved to be the "difference between victory and defeat" for John Kennedy over Richard Nixon. (Kennedy won by a very slim margin.) Many people felt that in the 1960 debates on TV, Kennedy came across to the viewers much better than Nixon.

During this same campaign Nixon commercials highlight his running mate's, Henry Cabot Lodge's experience in foreign affairs as the United States ambassador to the U.N. In this last campaign there were few commercials on the Vice Presidential candidates.

Mr. Kantor concluded by stating that TV is one of the most "dynamic means for promoting a service or product."

Broadcasting Careers:

Radio is "Where It's At!"

Last week Dave McElhatton, anchorman from 6-10 an on the all-news San Francisco radio station KCBS, told City College broadcasting students about beginning jobs in radio broadcasting.

"The first job most people get in a large radio station is 'desk assistant.' This is similar to a copy boy in a newspaper office. The assistant's job is to supply coffee and food for the busy broadcasters. Although not glamorous it allows the beginner to learn the inner workings of the radio station. If he keeps his eyes and ears open he might learn of openings in other departments," stated McElhatton.

"Next step is tape editor. When a field reporter brings in a tape, it is the tape editor's responsibility to cut out all unnecessary parts of the tape, leaving in the most important statements. The tape then goes to the editor who listens to it and decides if it is worth broadcasting on the air."

McElhatton himself started out as a stock boy. He mentioned that he was "a super ditto machine man." That job lasted eleven months. From this he was promoted to record librarian, then a "relief" announcer giving station breaks.

McElhatton concluded by saying that there are jobs available in radio broadcasting because more people are interested in working in TV than in radio. For anyone interested in radio broadcasting, McElhatton advises students to "get in at any level you can, and work your way up."

Editorial:

"Melting Pot" Keeps Boiling Over

Controversy is steaming down The Guardsman's back. Following the editorial "Melting Pot" Brews Discontent, four members of various fraternities told of their disapproval of being classified as "sexual orientation groups."

One member said, "We do not orientate sex at our meetings. Neither are we 'strictly social organizations.'"

A fraternity member of Beta Tau said that the organization gets involved in the community by putting on Christmas shows for hospitals and holds blood drives on campus.

The main argument is the disapproval of being classified as a "sexual orientation group." Another Beta Tau member claimed that "we would even let a girl join! Anyone can join the fraternity who is a student here." Members also claimed that there are some gay students in the fraternity.

However, contradictions overpowered the conversation. Beta Tau president, Randy Cherniss, claimed that students petitioning to join the fraternity are "voted in by active members." With this, one can assume that if a student isn't wanted by fraternity members, he won't be voted in. Also, how can a woman join a fraternity, or "brotherhood," as the word is translated?

Sororities are found on campus for women. Fraternities and Sororities connote differences in the sex of members. Would one expect to find men in a sorority, or sisterhood?

Water began boiling over with the paragraph on the attitudes expressed by fraternities towards members of the Free Gay Student Association.

The fraternities claim "no official stand on gay students." However: "there are people in the fraternities that don't dig gays." Who's to say that this view does not prevail?

While in a hot confrontation in the Student Union Building, Cheniss laughingly told another fraternity member, "Sure I'll go down to Polk St. and hassle some queers, not as a club member but as an individual!" Where does the responsibility as a club member, not to mention president, end and the responsibility as an "individual" begin?

One wonders just what the fraternities are all about. This reporter offered equal time for the fraternities. An offer to come to one of their meetings and report on their activities was made by The Guardsman. "You can't do that. Only club members are allowed to come to meetings," stated Beta Tau member Bob Eustace.

Bill Nolan, an inactive member of Alpha Sigma Delta stated that "you can come to 'Greek Council' in the Student Union Building."

What is 'Greek Council'? Over the phone Dean of Student Activities, Vester Flanegan stated, "Greek Council is made up of representatives from the different campus fraternities and sororities to plan various activities such as Thanksgiving dinners for needy families . . ."

It still seems that one really wouldn't find out much about the fraternities and just what they're all about by attending a Greek Council meeting.

What is it like to be in a fraternity?

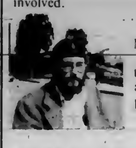
QUESTION: Why don't you take part in Student Government?



Joe Artman—Inhalation Therapy

I have absolutely no interest in the established student government. I just don't think that they can serve any valid function in determining student policies.

Katherine Platts—General Education

I'm too busy with outside activities that I just don't have the time to get involved. Most people though feel it's being taken care of by someone else, so they don't get involved.

Mike Moore—"Living"

Probably because the feeling of responsibility is distributed over a large number of people. Most people aren't politically interested until the problem hits them personally.

Kay Sharkes—General Education.

I just don't have the time for it. It's so discouraging that so few people take part. I never felt that student government affected me directly. I would probably participate in some way if I had the time.

Tom Butcher—Liberal Arts

I listened to some of the council's meetings last semiester but thought it was a bunch of bull. The members would argue over trivial matters and would never get things done.

Betty Felder—Business

I don't care about it. It doesn't seem to contribute much to the school. I've never been interested in participating in it.

Jazz at Keystone Korners:

Benson Group Pleasant Surprise

Discovering a free-swinging sound excursion in music is to find the refreshing George Benson Quartet.

In the past two weeks they interested, excited, amazed and swayed everyone who had the pleasure of seeing them at Keystone Korner.

With more-than-adequate organist Lonnie Smith (not to be confused with Lonnie Liston Smith Jr.); saxist Dave Hubbard; and drummer Art Gore, the group ranged in sound from modern to "standard."

Surprising everyone (except himself) Benson broke out in song. Tunes masterfully sung by the surprising guitarist were "Make It With You" and "You've Got A Friend." By the time everyone had soloed on the latter, the song had been taken apart and redressed completely.

The always poised Benson blew more than a few minds with his fantastic guitar solos. Although he remained "light to the touch" he was powerful enough to draw undivided attention and respected applause from an audience completely absorbed in his music. Many times while soloing it seemed that he'd picked the highest note on his guitar, but like a true professional he always found still a higher one.

Adding spice to the quartet was guest artist and local tenorman Clarence Wheeler, leader of the Enforcers Band. Combining tenor saxes, Wheeler and Hubbard did a splendid version of "Let's Talk About It." Not since Johnny Griffin and Lockjaw Davis have two tenormen so moved an audience as did Hubbard and Wheeler.

The Benson Quartet moves freely and is surely a band that's here to stay; although they haven't exactly become a "household word" yet. But with the warmth and expression that comes out of their music, rest assured that the George Benson Quartet will be around for some time; for they're truly saying something.

PIANO MAN — Elton John: "The first few bars drew approval from the audience".

Elton John: New "King of Rock" ?

Clad in a dazzling green sequined tuxedo and huge white sunglasses, Elton John burst unto the Berkeley Community Theatre stage in a special Wednesday night concert Oct. 25 and overwhelmed his audience with the most entertaining show to hit the Bay area rock scene in years.

Grinning, waving and bowing John strolled to the grand piano and launched into a dramatic solo rendition of "Tiny Dancer," illuminated by a single spot on face and hands. The first few bars drew instant approval from the audience, setting the pattern for the rest of the night.

The second solo number, "Danielle" is from John's LP to be released next January. From the pen of Elton's lyricist/partner Bernie Taupin, the song foreshadows yet another million-plus selling album for the tiny 25-year-old English pianist.

"Mellow" from the recent "Honky Chateau" record was begun solo with John wailing and plonking away in almost total blackness. As his fingers struck out a chord (on the line "Ohhhh, you make me mellow...) the stage lit up to reveal Elton's backup group kicking in with drums and guitar.

Nigel Olsson is a whirlwind of energy surrounded by two bass drums, five snares, and six cymbals—wearing earphones to follow the piano lead behind his incredible wall of noise. The flashy lead guitarist, Davey Johnstone, also plays some sensitive mandolin on "Mona Lisas and Mad Hatters" and nicely funky banjo on "Honky Cat." Bass player Dee Murray (formerly with Spencer Davis) rounds out what is probably the most competent backup trio around—they could probably make it on their own even without John's and Taupin's unique combination of talents.

In all, the two-hour set included 12 of the many hits from the first four albums—plus some surprises. In the middle of "I Think I'm Gonna Kill Myself" the crowd was amazed to see a bizarre figure in white silk pajamas, chrome crash-helmet with pink ostrich-plume and big flappy clown-shoes tapdancing across stage. With some perfectly-timed softshoe routines and appropriate facial expressions, "Legs" Larry Lewis soon had them breaking up in the aisles.

Wearing old raincoats and hats, Elton and "Legs" did a vaudeville song-and-dance duo of Gene Kelly's "Singin' In The Rain," complete with tinsel "rain." As always, John exuded a warmth and sincerity which seems to say "I'm having fun doing this, and I want you to enjoy it too."

It's hard to isolate "high points" in the concert—moving as it did to progressively higher and higher plateaus of excitement, and concluding with a wild "Take Me To The Pilot" followed by two encores.

Several times (especially after a full-speed "Whole Lotta' Shakin' Goin' On" with Elton jumping all over the piano in true Jerry Lee Lewis style), John looked totally exhausted; closing his piano and begging the crowd to let him go. But they just kept on screaming and stomping till he'd launch into yet another number with even higher-pitched voice and still faster more frenetic piano-work.

Elton John is a professional in every sense of the word. For my money even the Stones or the Who can't generate the aura of energy, enthusiasm, and sincerity he exudes onstage. Taupin's poetry, John's vocal and piano talents, and the best backup musicians and engineers available mark his albums as enduring "classics" in their field.

Bill Graham has said, "There are a lot of bands who merely try to recreate the music off their records. There are very few true performers in rock today." As Graham obviously recognizes, Elton John and his group entertain their fans.

Elton's record company press-releases call him "an important new force on the music scene"; in his case this is more understatement than hype. For practical purposes the Beatles are musically long-dead; so long live the new "king" of rock and roll: Elton John!

GUARDSMAN SPORTS AND NEWS

Sports Editorial:

Nobody Loves The Football Team

Just the other day City College was engaged in a football game at Foothill College. It was a typical game which encompassed all the activities of intra-collegiate sports. There was a display of school spirit there, it wasn't the case with City College's students.

True, in a disappointing season thus far, the Rams haven't shown much to be out there yelling about. But it's really discouraging to see nobody rooting in our stands except for the song-girls and the bench-warmers.

At one time the "jocks" were the darlings of the college social circle. They played a substantial part in not only bringing acclaim to themselves but to their schools.

Today we find that situation reversed. Students don't even go to the games if admission is free and accompanied by a coke.

Apathy has engulfed City's student body. Many will deny it, but just who is sitting in the stands at game time?

Students couldn't care less if the athletic department rolled over and died. Some would even be elated with the fact that they wouldn't have to take gym any longer.

In a recent talk Ram football coach Elston plainly stated that "we need their support," and it's echoed by the players who so far this season haven't won a league game.

It goes without saying: apathy breeds more apathy.

Earlier in the season there was an air of winning and the hope of bringing home a long-forgotten football crown. Now with the apparent reality that losing the remainder of the games is a good possibility, the football program may take on a different attitude.

It will no be beneficial, as players will only play for themselves, and personal recognition. They will follow in the same way as present-day American society. Self will be more important than the unit.

One wonders whatever has happened to those students who once rooted so proudly for Lowell, Wilson, Balboa, or Washington during those prep football seasons. Certainly some of them attend City, but their enthusiasm has long since waned. In its place is this logic, "That was kid stuff, but now it's time to grow up." As a result City is left with neither spirit nor pride.

ALL IN VAIN — Down and out Rams can't find a friend anywhere.

An even more obvious portrayal of the situation is the statewide soccer championship win the Rams took last year. Now, when some team wins statewide recognition, doesn't that call for some kind of celebration?

But nobody paid any attention or was even aware of this "win." Only a few remaining players on the soccer team wear the champ jacket, a small reminder of that special glory.

With no student support one of these days there might not be any athletic department at City!

Abortionist Tells Like It Is

"Women will always have abortions. The choice is between safe, legal abortions and unsafe, illegal ones," according to Dr. Felicia Hanz. Dr. Hanz, who performs legal abortions, was one of three speakers at the CCSF Womens' Abortion Committees' Abortion Workshop, held Thursday, October 26.

The Abortion Committee, the only feminist organization on campus, held the workshop to prepare for the Northern California Tribunal on Abortion, Contraception and Forced Sterilization in Berkeley, October 27 and 28.

The other two speakers were Debbie Sanders from Pro-Life and Sarah Ullman from the Womens' Abortion Coalition.

The "Pro-Life" argument revolved around the idea that "a fetus is a human being from the time it is conceived," and, "once conception has occurred, the mother doesn't have the right to avoid the burden of pregnancy and child care." Ms. Sanders stated that "The only reason a mother can kill her child is that she hasn't seen it yet and doesn't feel it is human." She added that the reason more women don't give up unwanted children for adoption is that, " when she (the mother) does see the child, she loves it too much to give it away" a statement that brought derisive laughter from the audience.

Ms. Ulman, from the Abortion Coalition, had more arguments in favor of legalized abortion: "You can legislate forced childbearing but you can't legislate love. Child-raising against the mothers' will is 20 years of involuntary servitude." She added that child batterers are almost always unwanted children themselves and, therefore, unavailability of abortion has effects on into the third generation.

Ms. Ulman also expressed the opinion that "Raising children in a slap-dash manner is madness . . . a fertile uterus is not sufficient qualification for motherhood." On adoption: "no one should have to go through an unwanted pregnancy to make babies for someone else," and, "people keep unwanted children out of insecurity and guilty."

She concluded with, "of course, no one should ever be forced to have an abortion if she doesn't want it, but, even if you agree with the "moral" arguments of the "Pro-Lifers" forced morality isn't morality, it's compulsion."

After the debate, Dr. Hanz discussed abortion procedures and contraceptive methods.

The Workshop ended with the film "It Happens to Us", a documentary of several womens' gothic experiences with restrictive abortion laws.

Financial Aids - con't.

The "law" referred to is an amendment to the Education Act which now requires students to submit a record of their parents' financial situation as well as a personal statement from the student, even if the student is self-supporting. In addition, the student is also required to have documententation to the effect that the money received from Financial Aids will be used for school; this document must now be legally notarized.

Presently, the on-campus Financial Aids is attempting to service 2,400 students. To date 600 to 700 have been processed, according to Ms. Pascual, (until recently she was the only person interviewing prospective recipients for aid.) Recently the administration has cleared another person to interview, but she says this is not enough to meet the task of dealing with all the students swiftly. When asked when more people will be added to the staff, she replied, "They know I need them, I put it in writing and they know it's justified."

There have been a few new additions in the basic programs at City College. "For the first time we have work-study programs off-campus." Heretofore "work-study" was confined to on-campus jobs. There have been 106 students placed in jobs off-campus who are making $2.59 an hour, "And," she added, "we pay 80 percent of the student's salary."

One factor that delays aid for some students is that in filing an application for aid (processed in Berkeley); some students fail to indicate that they attend City College. Berkeley's Scholarship Service services several colleges on the west coast but they make no attempt to notify a student if his application is incomplete.

One way to expedite aid for next semester is to apply early. As a matter of fact, Financial Aids is accepting applications now. Applying now will facilitate the chance of receiving aid near the beginning of next semester. "But," Ms. Pascual exclaimed, "unfortunately there's so much red tape; it's a shame."

"Psyche" Yourself Out; Time Is Short

City's Health Department in S190 needs 10-12 volunteers to form a group for psycho-therapy.

Generally, for students who feel they need more attention than the rap Center can provide, the group's "depth" of involvement will depend solely upon the group's participants.

At this stage, preferably, the group will be closed; this means that after it is formed no one else will be allowed to join. Whether or not it stays closed depends upon the group.

To volunteer, contact Ladonis Elston or Andy Curry at S190, or sign up at the Rap Center which is located on the lower level of the Student Union Building.

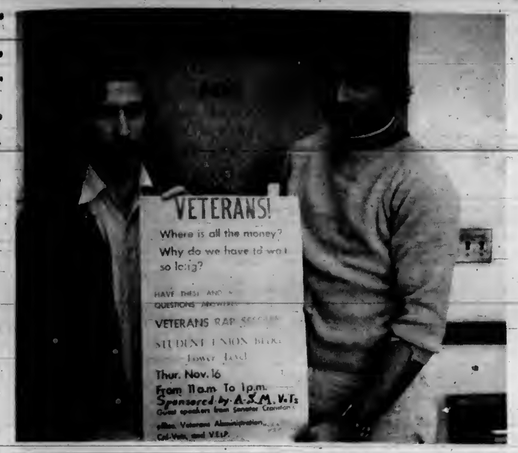
"THANKS BILL." — Victor Graff (L) Director of physical facilities receives new sculpture from its designer Bill Wareham.

Both pieces were acquired through decisions enacted by the City College Works of Art Committee, a three-way alliance consisting of administrators, faculty members and students, and headed by chairman Vic Graff (the student membership is theoretical, since no students have applied for positions on the committee). The campus organization, along with other responsibilities, handles all art work added to CCSF grounds from outside sources.

Wyoming Coup and the Vandenberge mural were secured through dealings with the San Francisco Art Commission, and financed out of the Commission's fund, derived from taking two percent of the total cost of any public building that is erected, and setting it aside to provide works of art throughout the city.

Wareham's sculpture was entered in the S.F. art Festival in 1969, and the Art Commission purchased it from Wareham when it won first place honors. The search was initiated to find a suitable exhibition place for the aluminum sculpture; the Commission contacting various schools and administrative buildings in the city before reaching an agreement with the CCSF committee.

A graduate of U.C. Berkeley, Wareham explained the origin of the idea that eventually materialized in the silver, welded sculpture that now rests on campus grounds: "It's a result of traveling through that State, some of the feelings of the landscape in that country. 'Coup' is a way of gaining honor and the means of showing it was notched on indian head-dress feathers. The plains Indians counted 'coup' by touching an enemy, the honor was in touching the enemy and then leaving. The sculpture has my feelings of touching Wyoming and leaving it. It reinforces a lot of my childhood feelings about Indians and their culture."



The seedling ideas for Vandenberge's 8' by 8' mural also germinated in his experiences in a particular part of the world, and deals intricately with his childhood impressions: "It's about animals in the jungle because I used to live in Indonesia. That was when I was a kid, way back when."

The untitled ceramic was originally produced under assignment by the San Francisco Art Commission and intended for display between columns in a playground in Diamond Heights, but the potential for vandalism of the art work was substantial enough to prevent putting it up.

Vandenberge is satisfied with the mural's present site, although its theme was initially directed for young children. "I was thinking a lot about kids and what they encounter; you have your own kind of animals and fantasies and pets. The main animal is a combination of a lot of strong animals - a mandrill, a little bit of lion. The only odd thing is that his tail ends up in the asparagus . . ."

Students interested in planning health programs to fit their needs are encouraged to attend a meeting of the Student Health Advisory Board on Tuesday, November 14, at 3 p.m., Room 209 of the Student Union Building.

Vets Hold Seminar Today; Nixon Signs New G.I. Bill

A.S.M. the Allied Servicemen organization, is sponsoring a seminar on veteran benefits today, November 16, 11 am to 1 pm.

The seminar, to be held on the Student Union Building's lower level, will begin with all speakers giving five-minute lectures.

After the lecture series, the speakers will form a panel which will answer questions from the audience for the remaining period of time.

A spokesman, sent by Allan Cranston (a chairman of the Senate Veteran Affairs Committee) is to attend. Also speaking are representatives from the Veterans Administration, Cal Vets, the veterans employment incentive program, (VEIP) and Donald Hanson from H.E.W.

VETS — Rob Hughes and Tom Fanfulin announce CCSF Veterans Benefits Seminar.

Concerning every area of V.A. benefits, from politics to alternative funding, this Seminar should be a "must" for all veterans receiving money or care from the government

The new G.I. Bill was one of the last bills President Nixon signed before the election.

The bill, enacted October 23, increased financial aid to full-time student veterans (with no dependents) from $175 to $220. Vets with one dependent to $261; two dependents, $298; and $18 for each additional dependent.

The new bill is retroactive to September and will be reflected in paychecks for November or December.

Beginning with November payments, paychecks will be paid in advance. For example, a new vet who enrolls at City College for the Spring '73 semester will receive February's payment in February instead of March.

This "pre-payment" for new vets (as well as other returning student vets) will hopefully decrease the "drop" rate of vets who, in the past, have been unable to meet expenses because of the time interval in check payments.

To initiate an inquiry for a non-arriving check (after the 15th of a particular month) call the Veterans Administration Contact Division, 556-1466.

Vets changing campuses must fill out VA Form 21E-1995 prior to leaving the camps. Forms are available from the campus Veterans Office.

For further information consult the bulletin board outside the Veterans Office, E202, Second Floor, Educational Services Building.

The new veterans' education law, signed by the president October 24, includes a woman-veterans' "bill of rights."

Women will no longer have to prove that their husbands are incapable of self-support in order to receive the same benefits that men receive for their wives.

The new law also liberalizes the criteria for paying additional amounts for children in the custody of a veteran and awaiting adoption.

The new law says that for all VA benefit purposes, a "wife" shall include the husband of a female veteran and the term "widow" shall include the widower of a female veteran.

Dean Hillsman:

Working For Better MUNI Service At CCSF

Although San Francisco is still a year away from subways the CCSF community will be aware of important developments because of Dean of Students Ralph Hillsman's participation in the Coordinated Transit Planning Project meetings.

It's a good thing for the school that he does because he's fighting a part of the new layout plan, which directly affects students.

Hillsman noted that the project originally was to have the "K" cars bypass City College station loop so as to discharge and accept passengers from proposed traffic islands opposite the firehouse at Howth Street and Ocean Avenue.

"But I objected, pointing out the extreme traffic hazard of 300 or more students at one time boarding or disembarking on Ocean Avenue—that it could be more efficiently and certainly more safely done at the City College Station," he stated.

Project director Gerald P. Cauthen "appreciated Hillsman's concern" and further planned not to proceed without his input.

There was some speculation about cut-rate student fares on the new transit system but Hillsman assured this reporter it was much too early for such decisions.

CONCERNED — Dean Ralph Hillsman is working for improved MUNI and BART service to CCSF.

BART TRAINS' — Plush interior, and picture windows for scenic viewing

The Coordinated Transit Project is Muni, not BART; yet to be seen, it promises "a dramatic improvement in transit service for the thousands of San Franciscans who ride the streetcars." On completion the line will be known as the Muni Metro.

That construction on outer Market, and the portal work on Duboce are some of the reasons San Francisco can be called "the city scarred by progress." But in its place—someday—there will be paved streets again and all five Muni streetcars will be running underground.

One tough problem remains, however: how to get the "J" and "N" cars into service without first going through Twin Peaks Tunnel. After the subway is built, there won't be any turn-around at Van Ness Avenue.

Muni's studying all the possibilities to make a new connection; across the Sunset, the Mission, or extending the line via San Jose Avenue.

There are many problems and challenges facing the planning project and the public is invited to give their input at the meetings.

Schedule of public meetings:

November 15-7:30 pm Luther Burbank Jr. High 325 La Grande Ave.

November 16-to be announced.

November 29-7:30 pm Eureka Valley Recreation Center 18th & Collingwood Sts.

Candidates Endure College Apathy

When the Youth Citizenship Fund (a junior League of Women Voters) organized the three-hour "Candidates' Day" in the lower level of the Student Union Building a fortnight ago, it sponsored an event that had something for everyone.

The Socialists listened to the Socialist candidates, the Republicans listened to the Republicans, the Democrats listened to the Democrats and everybody else listened to the music.

The day was inaugurated by the local rock group Sand, whose vibrations were made audible clear out to the Ram; attracting students who came down mainly for the mellow atmosphere that was created (notwithstanding persistent pamphleteers).

However, the interest in the band was strictly voyeuristic, with no one daring to challenge a blockade of ill-placed chairs in a scene that couldn't be improved even if the YCF distributed "dance cards."

But the band kept on cooking and people were enjoying themselves—until the squire running the show walked on and introduced himself.

"Hello, my name is Frank Thatcher. I'm your A.S. President, and whatever feelings you may have about that, let's forget them today." Already people were leaving. (Maybe if you passed out apples, Frank . . .)

The candidates were scheduled between numbers by the band. The idea of course was to keep attention fixed on the platform while the spectators awaited the next appearance.

As it was, the candidates had to exert a tremendous amount of energy just to turn a few heads. Most didn't bother.

Sue Vass, campaigning in the fifth congressional district succeeded for a time. After an introduction, she declared that her speech deserved more attention if only because she was three months pregnant.

EDLO POWELL — fishing for votes

All a Nixon spokesman had to do to spark some animation was allow himself to be introduced. For about 15 seconds a chorus of boos greeted the man.

But strangely enough, once he got his speech under way, the crowd returned to its apathetic indifference.

When Sand wrapped up its last number, there was apparently nothing left to do (for the audience) except leave the remaining candidates an empty hall.

Arabs Protest West Germany's Action

A protest rally was called Friday, November 3, in the Student Union to publicize and condemn the treatment of Arabs in West Germany.

The rally, which was sparsely attended, was jointly sponsored by the Arab Student Association, the Black Student Union, La Raza Unida, the Young Socialist Alliance and the newly-recognized Revolutionary Communist Youth. The latter two groups also maintained literature tables during the rally.

The arrest and deportation of Arab residents in West Germany, notably those of Palestinian origin, has continued unabated since the Palestinian terrorist assault on the Munich Olympic games last August. An estimated 1,000 workers and students already have been deported. Police, armed with sub-machine guns, have made many arrests.

The West German campaign has sparked a wave of international protest. Demonstrations have been held in London, Beruit, New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, and San Francisco, in addition to hunger strikes staged in Bonn and Paris.

In San Francisco on October 20, members and supporters of the Committee to Defend the Rights of Arab Students and Workers demonstrated in front of the West German consulate.

Speakers at the Student Union rally claimed that a news black-out is enforced both inside and outside Germany to conceal the government's actions. It was charged that the West German government is using the Munich events as an "excuse for their repressive practices."

The case of the Jews under the Nazi regime is the inevitable example used to explain the nature and extent of the repression.

The last speaker was a German citizen and resident of the U.S. for the last 15 years. He blamed the German government for trying to identify the entire Arab population with a small group of terrorists.

The speech was dry and rhetorical, stretching the attention span of the audience (already strained to a maximum due to the sudden influx of the lunch-time crowd).

When the German citizen tried to explain the historical reasons for a German-Arab solidarity, he was interrupted by a lone heckler who asked him, "Are you a Nazi?" He replied in the negative and continued his talk.

After the German speaker finished, the audience (by then the majority were lunching students) was thanked for its attendance.

A small group remained for a brief discussion with the heckler.

Lecture Series:

Speaker Decries Isolationism

"Will we move back into isolationism or into freer economic interaction?"

This was the question asked by Robert Scalapino at the Thursday Lecture, November 2.

In the lecture, Scalapino outlined the structure of political power and its relationship to economic strength.

According to Scalapino, the cold war between the U.S. and the Soviet Union ended with the Sino-Soviet rift. This rift caused Russia to expand its commitments in Southeast Asia at the same time that we reduced ours.

Mr. Scalapino says that foreign policy in the next four years will revolve around the relationship between the U.S., the Soviet Union and China on one hand, and that between the U.S., Japan and Western Europe on the other. He predicts "intense negotiations with everybody."

Scalapino's view of the world as being politically and economically interdependent led to his statement: "I think any serious retreat into neo-isolationism is both unrealistic and dangerous." He added, "How we reach decisions is important" expressing the opinion that delicate foreign policy decisions should be handled by "appointed experts" because they are too complicated to be handled by (elected) "amateurs."

Mr. Scalapino claimed to be "moderately optimistic" about foreign policy in the 70's, but felt that he "can't look to the abolishing of limited wars."

Ecology:

Safer Phosphate Soap Out Soon

Proctor and Gamble have now announced that they have produced an "effective" and soon-to-be-released low phosphate detergent.

Developed from the "zero phosphate" campaign they're on, the new detergent will immediately cut the phosphate content of their product in half.

Later (8 or 9 months from now) when all their plants are converted to the new "surfocant system," Proctor & Gamble will reduce their detergent's phosphate content to six percent.

Said to be "calcium insensitive," this new cleansing agent will work effectively despite the presence of minerals in water.

"Zero phosphate" began when it was revealed just how dissatisfied housewives were with existing non-phosphate detergents.

In "restricted" areas, such as Miami and Chicago, where high-phosphate soap sales are not permitted, housewives would leave the "dry" areas to purchase banned detergents because they cleaned better.

Big business is beginning to climb on the "ecology bandwagon." Let's just hope such tentative "experiments" aren't already too late.

The Guardsman is keeping abreast of local and national events of consequence to our environment. If you have information on ecology, contact Associate News Editor Tom Fantulin MW 1-4 pm at Ex. 446.

Cosmopolitan Dance Spectrum Has It All

One half a city block down from the swirling dirt and crowded vehicle-traffic of Mission Street is an aluminum and glass entrance crowned 3221 22nd in bold black characters. Through the doorway, up the photo-lined staircase, several turns and one lobby later is the combination studio/theater of what the Examiner's Arthur Bloomfield christened "A Universe in Motion." The "universe" refers to the art of dance, the "motion" is supplied by Carlos Carvajal's Dance Spectrum.

The Spectrum, dedicated to exploring the world of dance in its multitude of forms and variations, pioneered in utilizing modern light and sound mediums to enhance, and often structure, the actual choreography. A refreshingly informal atmosphere prevails at the studio performances, engulfing an audience with spell-like power, tuning in their senses to receive the full benefit of each individual performance.

During the company's late October performance entitled Dances of Latin America and the Phillipines, onlookers shuffled into the darkened candle-lit studio against a background of taped music, picked their choice of floor space and sat down on the wooden boards to await the program's initiation. Dancers intermittently wandered in and out, preparing costumes and props, while the urban symphony and lights from Mission Street glinted in through domed windows.

Carvajal gave an explanation of the program's purpose as demonstrating the blending of cultures. "This evening I want you to see the similarities rather than the differences in this day of the shrinking globe," and the spectrum began.

Performances spanned a geographical range from the Andes through Peru, Spain, Argentina, South America, and the Phillipine Islands, in dance choreographed and brilliantly costumed as close to the authentic forms as possible. The overall program — from dazzling, energized dance composition to creative sound and light media — was a captivating experience; an additional laurel wreath in Carvajal's growing collection.

Dance Spectrum originated as an underground movement in the late 60s, when 8 members broke away from the San Francisco Ballet in search of a more complete vehicle to explore dance forms. Carvajal verbalized the feeling of the originators of Spectrum: "There were a lot of energies that wanted to dance. The old system became obsolete for me; I could no longer work freely in the old system." While he has had extensive experience in performing traditional ballet, Carvajal's search goes beyond that form and crystallizes into reality as the driving purpose behind Dance Spectrum. "We want to represent dance, period, and not just one type of dance. I only have this lifetime to do it in . . . I don't have time to devote to restaging the old classics," he states.

Based on Carvajal's rejection of the "old system," the Spectrum has broken away from the ladder method of communication ("We communicate across —laterally.") where hierarchal authority and compartmentalized duties and functions are the traditional mode.

According to their founder, Dance

They're Great — but they don't get money from the city.

Spectrum has abandoned the obsolete and stifling system to the extent that progress is enhanced, and their most recent program was entirely organized within a three week period. Members of the company are united with one mind rather than subdivided with specific responsibilities, explained Carvajal, so that performers themselves, based on their outside interests and involvements, voluntarily handle all aspects of a show: "We draw completely on our own personnel, and from people in the different classes."

Dance Spectrum is not known on a widespread basis yet, receiving no funds from the City or foundations, but operating by seeking out performance openings. The group has performed in Grace Cathedral and at the '72 Pops concert in July to a record success that will draw them back again next year.

The Spectrum's next performance, Program for the Winter Solstice, will take place on December 15 and 16 in Lone Mountain's Wabe Theater.

"Jobs Back After Strikes" Supreme Court Rules

The United States Supreme Court recently made a ruling which affects workers. The Court said that workers who refuse to cross a picket line during a strike by their fellow workers have the right to get their jobs back.

The case came to the Supreme Court from Santa Maria, California. In August, 1967, teamsters there started an organizing campaign to get moving companies to join their group.

When Teamsters' efforts stalled, they called a strike against all local moving company outlets including International Van Lines.

Four of the International employees were fired when they decided not to cross a picket line. Justice Potter Stuart said in his opinion that "unconditional reinstatement of the discharged employees was proper for the simple reason that they were the victims of a plain unfair labor practice by their employer."

Editorial:

Panthers Provide Alternative

Although the election for president is over and one candidate has finally won; it doesn't really matter to most of the public.

After all, everyone's had a full dose of Nixon and no more need by said, and McGovern changed his stands all too often and got himself in spot after spot.

"It's like deciding between cancer and polio," noted one observer of the two candidates running for the highest office in the land.

And what about the stronghold of the two-party system in American society. It's high time that some competent people broke out of the old mold and started some new political parties. Then casting the vote for a candidate would prove to be meaningful: The The best one vote could do this time around was to elect the lesser of two evils.

The Black Panther Party has made one of the most significant moves to make it a "three-party" system. They have two candidates running for office in Oakland on their Survival Ticket: Bobby Seale and Elaine Brown.

If the Survival Ticket has significantly expanded by 1976 it could have tremendous effect on current political trends and how voters vote.

Traditionally the Black vote has gone to the democratic candidate and this year seems to have been no different. Black senators, assemblymen, etc., gave McGovern a "gift" without stopping to think about how much bargaining power was offered without getting anything for it.

Although Mrs. Shirley Chisholm couldn't win they might have cast their support for her and given her enough power to control quite a few votes.

These days one would like to imagine people aren't voting for a man because he's a republican or a democrat. Rather, the most qualified person or the person who appears most qualified to each individual voter is the one who should receive the vote.

On the other hand, if one doesn't know the issues or the candidates, should he vote?

Since this election year was as much a farce as it could possibly be, all one can do is hope that by 1976 there will be more new parties in the picture as well as candidates who have a reason other than money, favors and power running for the highest seat in the land.

Students React: How do you feel about the election results?

EDITOR'S NOTE—Following President Nixon's landslide November 7, The Guardsman took a random sampling of students' reactions — both to Nixon's victory and the results of the various propositions on the ballot.

Sandra Demmings - Psychology: "It's the dirtiest campaign ever in history! How can people knowing the high cost of living, unemployment, and the corruption of the big companies like P.G.&E. ever re-elect an inconsiderate and greedy man like Richard Nixon? I was definitely against the death penalty. It costs more to kill a person than to give a man a life sentence. That's a fact! Marijuana should have been passed because people are going to smoke it regardless and putting them in jail won't stop it. And there's no evidence that it's harmful. Marijuana is a non habit-forming drug so it's impossible for it to lead to harder dope. I'm glad that proposition 22 was not supported because farm workers deserve the right to strike in this country because America grants freedom of expression. I'm against obscenity. Obscenity exposed to children is not good because it can give children a distortion of the beauty of sex. Obscenity degrades sex. Obscenity also hides the beauty of sex. The beauty of sex is an expression of love between mature adults. Whereby obscenity covers the beauty of sex."

Edward Lawless - Traffic and Transportation: "I feel that since it was Nixon's last campaign, they gave him a vote of confidence and a good turnout for his last campaign. The Republican Party gave a good, clean campaign and they would have a better image in international affairs. He made some good promises and I'd like to see if he's going to keep them. I didn't vote on too many propositions; just two propositions. 19 lost because too many people are afraid emigrants would come into the country. But it's not a dead issue and it'll come up again. I think that the whole campaign brought up a lot of issues that the American people were not aware of and I think something will be done about it in the future."

Sean Bailie - Pre Law: "I'm not an American so I didn't vote. I think that the American people really let George McGovern down, not that I'm for him, but he tried so hard and the people didn't vote for him. He really believed in what he stood for and of course Nixon never said what he believed in. I'm glad that the death penalty was reinstated. Also, I'm glad that the coastal initiative passed and the farm labor initiative was defeated. I thought Marijuana would have passed. A lot of kids were for it and parents didn't really care. I would have voted no on the rest."

Michael Mastropiero - Philosophy: "A combined analysis of the results of the presidential elections and the reinstatement of proposition 17 (Death Penalty). It's no wonder that they reinstated the death penalty since they overwhelmingly re-elected a murderous felon as the nation's president. As for the marijuana initiative, maybe we can look forward to a San Francisco referendum for June since the Board of Supervisors meetings are now open."

Bernada Montell - Drama: "I think that it's f*cked and I'm scared to death about another four years of Nixon. Lord knows what "Tricky Dick" holds for the future. I'm really upset about how the American people voted on the propositions. What else can I say?"

Guiseppe Sala - Music: "I think the results are preposterous! Any idiot knows that Nixon has won because of all the financial backing and the buying out of people that he did. And I hope that some day America will be able to hold legitimate campaigns. It's obvious that the majority of the American people are basically barbaric. They still believe that the Death Penalty should be reinstated."

Yancy Derringer II - Life: "I believe in the Democratic process of law. It's a shame that society can't keep money out of elections (i.e. Big Business). I'm happy that the coastal initiative passed. It shows that the people really care about their environment. It's ironic that they don't care about their Bro's by the stated fact that the Death Penalty was reinstated. Have a Happy Thanksgiving because you're going to need it, America."

SUNDOWN LADY — Lani Hall: ". . . the performances here are mellow enough to please even the Lawrence Welk/Tony Bennett set.

Record Review:

A Real "Gem" from A&M

"Sundown Lady"
by
Lani Hall
A & M Records SP4359

Every once in a while our shipments of new albums by unheard-of (and generally mediocre) artists contain a real musical gem. Lani Hall's new album, for instance, is probably one of the best ever recorded by a female vocalist anywhere. While her name is new, her singing isn't unfamiliar to the public: Lani spent six years with Brasil '66 before getting it together with Herb Alpert to produce her own album on his A & M label.

Lani's voice is unbelievable: she has perfect pitch, and she uses it in a well-controlled yet versatile style on every song. If you didn't see her rather striking portrait on the album liner, you'd probably have a hard time figuring out whether she's black, Latin, or white. Incredibly flexible in both range and inflection, her voice reminds me of Carole King, Aretha Franklin, Barbra Streisand, and maybe a half dozen other top artists; so easily does it produce those breathless moments only such talent can evoke.

Even her choice of material is flawless. Lani rocks along on Elton John's "Tiny Dancer," (rivalling the original in catchy tempo, and far surpassing it in emotional expression); also turning her vocal competence and feminine viewpoint to "How Can I Tell You?" by Cat Stevens; "Wherever I May Find Him," from a Paul Simon song; and the Don McLean tune you've probably heard on the radio: "Vincent." The latter is at least 100% improved over McLean's version, incidentally. You can make out all the words now, and it somehow makes more sense sung by a woman anyway.

"Come Down In Time," another Elton John number, and Lani's own composition "You" are equally fine. (Lani puts more emotion into the three words "I love you" than is found in whole albums by many other artists).

The songs manage to be relaxing without being boring, each cut a differently textured acoustic massage for your eardrums, (so long tortured by screeching guitar-strings and slapping drumheads).

While catchy and forceful enough for even the most hardened rock-freak (like myself), the performances here are mellow enough to please even the Lawrence Welk/Tony Bennett set.

If you're like us and have a record collection consisting mostly of British and American hard rock and blues, you probably often find yourself wishing you had something "mellower" to listen to. When you don't feel like boogeying, but just want to relax, try putting on some earphones and let "sundown lady" Lani Hall unwind your head. (She has no unpleasant after-effects, but she just could be habit-forming.)

Record Review:

Emerson, Lake & Palmer Create Moog "Collage"

Trilogy
by
Emerson, Lake and Palmer
Cotillion Records
SD9903

Trilogy is an album with so many musical changes in tempo, style and sound that it would seem not to work; but work it does in this album by Emerson, Lake and Palmer.

From piano solos, through classically influenced melodies, to rock and roll, this trio of musicians, Keith Emerson (keyboards and moog synthesizers), Greg Lake (vocals, bass, and guitars), and Carl Palmer (percussion), combine to present an album of quality music and musicianship.

"The Endless Enigma (part 1)," "Fugue," "The Endless Enigma (part 2)" begin side one by combining the various styles mentioned and give the listener pleasurable experiences in all of those musical styles.

The final three tracks on side one have melodies which are consistent throughout the songs. "From The Beginning" is a very relaxing tune which gives way to "The Sheriff," a western tale done with strong bouncing beat. Bringing the side to a swirling climax is "Hoedown," an electrified organ and moog footstomping western square dance.

"Trilogy," beginning side two, is a fine piano solo love song. It increases in tempo into heavy moog-influenced rock and then reaches it's peak with the love song continued in a latin rock beat.

Perhaps the two weakest songs round out the album. "Living Sin" is a heavy, sinister-sounding cut, in contrast with the more tasteful songs on the rest of the album. "Abaddon's Bolero" sounds like an eight-minute and thirteen-second introduction that never gets into its melody.

Keith Emerson's keyboard and moog work is the main force behind the entire album. His versatility and skill are well displayed throughout all the songs.

Overall, Trilogy is a fine album (improved by the playing of side two before side one.)

Winterland:

"Hot Tuna" Ain't No Casserole!

If you feel that concert-going isn't the thing to do because you've seen all the good bands then renew your faith for Hot Tuna's here! Yes, Hot Tuna. Not the economic tuna casserole that so many people exist off in times of slack, but the Jefferson Airplane's fine "offshoot" group.

After many appearances at Winterland the group got its first top billing there a couple weeks ago. And after not having seen them for a year or so, my judgment is they're still getting better. But as a group they surely haven't "peaked" since most of their time is spent working in the "parent" group, the Airplane.

When it was Hot Tuna's turn to play the audience was half asleep, maybe from the heavy contact or the mellow New Riders of the Purple Sage, or both. But when their music started, a new feeling struck the audience, which suddenly became "antsy."

"Uncle Sam ain't no woman but he can sure take your man," wailed Jorma Kaukonen on the group's opening number. By the time the second number was complete Hot Tuna had everyone wide awake and dancing.

Unlike a lot of bands that put you to sleep, Hot Tuna's music is always danceable and lively, to say the least.

First notice of the group was a couple years ago at the Old Fillmore when the Flamin' Groovies headlined the place. At that time Hot Tuna was a trio consisting of Joey Covington on drums, Jack Casady on bass and Jorma Kaukonen playing guitar and doing vocals.

As there were many electric-rock groups around, Hot Tuna had to play hard and tough to still be around. At that time they were producing what is still known to some as San Francisco Rock.

But their sound spaced out in other directions with maturity and the addition of electric violinist Papa John Creach. Creach has given Hot Tuna a lead instrument that blends well into the rest of the unit, and, above all, showmanship. It's a pleasure to watch Papa John jump up and down the stage, and get everybody excited while setting his violin strings afire at the same time.

At Winterland, when people tired of dancing, Hot Tuna came across visually. They were just as much fun to watch work as they were fun to "work with." They're real entertainers.

By now it's an understatement that the groups that deserve a lot of publicity aren't the ones that always get it. For some unclear reason Hot Tuna is one of them.

Positively there is no way one can't like a little Hot Tuna, if not a lot.

KSAN Fillmore Weekend a "Tape Sellout"

Radio station KSAN in San Francisco has already received impressive feedback on the impact of its "Fillmore Weekend." The Weekend, billed as "A Three-Day Trip Back to the Good Old Days," featured rock entrepreneur Bill Graham recreating some of his favorite rock shows through records, live and taped interviews and unreleased tapes he recorded at his shows over the years. Graham arrived at the KSAN studio at 6 p.m., Friday, November 27 and remained on the air almost nonstop until 6 a.m., Monday, November 30.

Initial reports on the impact of Fillmore Weekend were received at KSAN on Friday afternoon when listeners began phoning in complaints that they had tried to buy blank tape to record Graham's unreleased tapes and found that all major San Francisco tape outlets were sold out. This was confirmed by KSAN staffers who telephoned several outlets to check the reports.

Additional post-Weekend reports indicated the KSAN special caused a definite loss of business in small clubs around the Bay Area and Graham's own Friday and Saturday night Winterland shows drew less than expected. According to Graham, reports from Columbia Records indicate sales of the "Last Days of the Fillmore" album doubled in San Francisco over the weekend.

Upcoming are "The Prison Music Special," a live broadcast from the San Francisco County Jail featuring the inmates' band, poetry reading and requests from and for prisoners (November 18) and KSAN's second "Women's Special." Titled "He Hit Me and It Felt Like A Kiss Part Two," it will be produced by the ladies of KSAN and will feature music and interviews relating to Women in Music.

When the SAN FRANCISCO PHOTO FESTIVAL comes to MASONIC AUDITORIUM this November from the 17th through the 19th, it will bring, through its multi-faceted format, what has been called a "full spectrum photo show."

The Festival is produced by the leading international manufacturers and distributors of fine photographic equipment in cooperation with Bay Area photo dealers.

It is a project designed to have East meet West as photo artists, journalists and technicians from both coasts combine their efforts to bring the full meaning and potential of this visual media to the Bay Area.

The SAN FRANCISCO PHOTO FESTIVAL program is composed of four basic areas: The Lecture and Film Series; The Photo Gallery; The Equipment Fair; and the Special Events Program. The Festival will feature lectures on photography and photographic technique, a film and slide series, and display-demonstrations of cameras and other photographic equipment.

A particularly exciting feature of the show will be the Photo Gallery, consisting of hundreds of photographs by nationally and internationally reknowned photographers, as well as the works of distinguished Californian artists and journalists in the photographic field. In addition, there will be a demonstration of holography, a new sense defying process of recording images in true three dimensions, and an activity area simulating various studio conditions for the use of show attendees who bring their cameras.

There will be literally something for everyone at the SAN FRANCISCO PHOTO FESTIVAL which has been designed to provide for the edification of budding and advanced photographers, as well as for perfect entertainment for the entire family.

In keeping with the cultural tone of the Festival, there will be no selling on the Festival premises.

The San Francisco Photo Festival is sponsored by IPOSA, the International Photo Optical Show Association. IPOSA is a non-profit organization of leading international manufacturers and distributors of fine photographic equipment, dedicated to the purpose of promoting fine photography.

"High" School Drug Problem Studied

Recently a Congressional Committee on Drugs stopped in San Francisco to find out about drug abuse among youth. The committee heard from an undercover officer, high school students, and a former prostitute.

The undercover SF police officer stated that at one local high school drugs were as easy to get as a drink of water. One student offered to sell him some LSD, but the officer refused.

Truancy was high in the school. The officer went to a civics class with an enrollment of 32 students. Only eight were in class. Any student could find a card game going, and there was always a dice game under a school stairway.

Most of the young drug users support their habit through crime. This was brought out by a high school student who said that he stole cars and anything else he could in order to get money to buy drugs.

The adage that high school drug users get poor grades was torn down by a student who did the reverse. He got good grades because then he would be undetected. This student wound up using acid and mescaline. He earned $1,000 a day.

The drug problem is not confined only to males. The committee heard from a woman who is now a youth worker with the SF police department. She was turned on to drugs by her husband, an addict. He was sent to prison. She had to support her $150 a-day habit, but she stopped when she was sent to prison for selling heroin.

San Francisco Superintendent of Schools, Steven Morena, was asked what he felt was the major problem in fighting drugs in SF schools. Morena summed it up in one word, "money." The school district does not get enough money to alleviate problems in the schools.

Morena would like one full-time teacher at each school teaching drug education. Presently, one teacher teaches drug education only one hour a day. The cost of a full-time drug education teacher at each school would be 1.3 million dollars. This would solve only part of the problem. The other part is to make schools more exciting so the students will not have to turn to drugs.

"Mayflower" Sails Again

The New World beckons! Over 350 years ago a band of people—men, women, and children—set sail from England and first arrived in Provincetown harbor on the Atlantic Coast of America where they stayed on board ship for about five weeks as they could not land safely on shore.

In mid-December, 1620, in their search for a good harbor and a suitable place to settle, the Pilgrim explorers found a safe harbor for their mother ship, the Mayflower. Through their efforts the Mayflower was safely anchored in Plymouth harbor about December 26.

The ship served as the Pilgrim's sleeping quarters during the long winter of that year (approximately 111 days). It was not until the first of the year that they went ashore to begin to build their first shelter, a common house. Because of the severe winter it was nearly a month before they were able to complete the common house; so each night they returned to the ship to sleep.

On a spring morning in April, 1621, a band of Pilgrim men, women, and children climbed the hill overlooking Plymouth harbor to watch the Mayflower sail back to England. None of the Pilgrims returned with Captain Jones despite his offer to give them return passage.

These brave pioneers now numbered less than half the more than hundred who had set out from England in September, 1620. In spite of their fear of possible Indian attacks and other hardships, they chose to remain in the freedom of their new world even though many of them longed for the relatives and friends they left behind and the comfort of their English homes.

As the Mayflower sailed out of Plymouth harbor its guns sounded a farewell salute to the group of tense and determined people on shore; Miles Standish, chosen leader of the Pilgrims, responded with a gun-salute from the hill overlooking the harbor.

The Pilgrim community watched with mixed emotions as the ship and its sails dropped below the horizon, their sole connecting link with their homeland, England.

This marked the beginning of a new era in the New World.

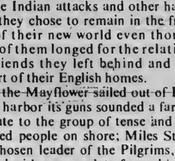
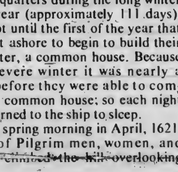
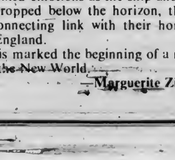
QUESTION: What Do You Consider Obscene?



Debbie Dole—Art
"It's only in the eye of the beholder. I don't consider anything obscene really. Except for two things: Dog sh*t and Nixon. Especially on the sidewalks either one of them."



Jimmie McNeal—Physical Education
"I don't think anything is obscene unless you're taking advantage of someone. Fighting someone or something like that."



Tim Ratini—Music
"I think that wearing swim suits on a beach is obscene. I believe in nude beaches. I think it's obscene for one person to dislike another for his beliefs. What one person does in privacy is no one else's business. An example of such is homosexuality."

Gary Pool—Business Management
"I don't consider anything obscene. I've tried it all and it's beautiful. You should try it too. As they say, 'try it, you'll like it'."

Ricardo Menedez—Dental Technology
"I don't feel that anything is obscene. Obscenity doesn't really exist. Obscenity usually goes with sexuality and anything goes with sex."

Alan Pedreira—Elementary School Education
"Nothing is really obscene unless you take it that way. If you have a sex-orientated mind and think a certain way it just becomes obscene to people who think and act that way."

Control of Women's Bodies is the Issue

The Northern California Tribunal on Abortion, Contraception and Forced Sterilization, held in Berkeley last month, aroused amazingly little public reaction. The purpose of the Tribunal was to publicize the destructive effects of restrictive abortion and contraceptive laws, and to lay the blame for these laws where it belongs—at the feet of the legislators who make them. Its aim: to have the laws repealed. It was attended by approximately 400 people.

This apathy would be understandable if these laws didn't affect everyone. But they do.

Some people feel that effective contraception is an answer to the problem of unwanted pregnancy. But effective contraception isn't available. The statistics on contraceptive failure are one-year statistics. There are 25 years in a normal woman's reproductive life. Multiplying the "failure rate" of any given contracentive by 25 would give a realistic idea of the chances of eventually becoming pregnant while using it. In this country, approximately one woman in four will have at least one abortion in her life —legally or illegally. Making abortions illegal does not "save" children, as some anti-abortionists seem to think. It only kills women.

The "Pro'Life" people say that the fetus is a human being and has rights. Whether or not this is true, the "mother" also has rights. No one has ever seriously suggested that anyone be forced to donate a kidney, a lung, or any other part of his body to anyone else without his consent even to save a life. Why, then, should a woman be forced to donate not only her uterus but her whole body to a fetus without her consent? Why this reversal of all medical and legal procedent?

Perhaps the most common reason why people are against safe, legal abortion can be summed up in a comment recently overheard in the cafeteria: "A woman knows what she's doing when she has sex, and she should take the consequences." This attitude, that sex, especially for women, is an evil thing that should have negative consequences, still exists in our society. It crops up in nearly all anti-abortion arguments. It could well be the real reason why some people favor restrictive laws.

It's not likely that a child whose mother considers his existence to be a "punishment" for her "sins" will grow up to be a useful, productive member of society. Even if it were, there is no reason why women should allow people who hate sex and who hate them to control their reproductive lives. This brings us to the real issue—Control. The real issue here is not, after all, whether or not women "should" have abortions; it is whether her body is controlled by the government —or by herself.

The Women's Abortion Coalition and the CCSF Women's Abortion Committee are circulating a petition for the Abortion Rights Act which would repeal all abortion laws. We urge that you sign this petition, and pressure our newly elected legislators to get these laws off the books.

Are We Grateful for Today?

Thank you! How often do these two words fit into our daily vocabulary? Not as often as they might, wouldn't you say? This being the season of "thanksgiving" set aside by our pilgrim fathers a few centuries ago, let us attempt to tabulate our thanks in our world of doubt and cynicism.

Let us start with you! Thank you for being you—the students, the faculty, the administration, the people of San Francisco—for without you there would be no CCSF. Of course, we are not always grateful for what you represent, but we are grateful. How are we grateful? Let us count the ways!

There is—the opportunity to move on to higher institutions of learning; the opening of new doors—past, present, and future—if we are so inclined; the stepping stone to our "hope" for the future for time spent on this campus in pursuit of truth and knowledge.

There is—our good health even if sometimes we must walk at a slow and careful pace; the gift of sight, of sound, of smell and taste, of voice (to speak the truth and defend it according to our beliefs), and, most of all, of our whole being which helps us share the joys and sorrows of our fellowman.

Sometimes we are lonely and feel cast aside—lost—in this plastic world of jet-speed and mass-confusion. Who cares who we are or what we are? Anyone?

Sometimes we are discouraged; sometimes we are sad; sometimes we despair and are ready to give up! But a kind word or a helping hand changes our thoughts from negative to positive with a sense of renewed hope and perhaps even joy.

When a group of men, women, and children reached the shores of this continent some years ago they had little else than their faith and courage and a will to begin life anew despite the strange new wilderness which surrounded them. As historians have recorded their plight, no doubt they, too, were lonely and unhappy. But they believed and hoped in the future. Nor did they forget to show their gratitude for the gifts of life, of health, and of the abundance of their harvest.

Many of us today are the heirs of this faith, courage and determination which marks the early history of our country. Unfortunately, although our pilgrim fathers fled from what they believed to be injustices, in time they and their heirs followed the unjust path. But should we forget their original intent to seek a better life than that which they left behind?

Although ours may be a more sophisticated world, we should meet the wrongs which now exist with the same faith, courage and determination. We must be grateful for what we have and believe in the promise of the future.

Whatever our beliefs may be, let us take the time to pause a brief moment in silent meditation in gratitude for all our gifts—most preciously, the gift of "life."

Letters to the Editor

(Address letters to Paul Snodgrass, Managing Editor, The Guardsman, 50 Phelan Ave., San Francisco, Cal. 94112. All letters should be typed and double-spaced.)

Melting Pots . . .

Dear Editor,

In reference to your two "Melting Pot" articles, I would like to say this in regard to the supposed conflict between fraternities and Gay Lib.

The basis for your first article, dated Oct. 26, 1972, seems to have been a few isolated incidents between Fraternities and Gays that occurred on "Gay Day" 1971, and on perhaps one or two occasions thereafter. On this basis, The Guardsman stated that there is a "strong dislike" between the fraternities and the Free Gay students. Now I don't know how the "Gay Libbers" feel about fraternities, but out of over fifty fraternity members I have met from my fraternity (Beta Tau) and others, there are only a very small number that harbor any feelings against gay people.

Which brings me to my next point. The views of one fraternity member do not necessarily represent the views of anyone else.

In your Nov. 9 "Melting Pot" article, you printed some statements made by Randy Cherniss, Beta Tau President this semester, where he spoke of going down to Polk St. and "haseling queers." I believe that your printing that statement in the same article where you said he was president of Beta Tau was misleading in that people reading the article might think all members of the fraternity feel that way. I would like to say this about the whole thing: Randy often says things he doesn't mean, and he does not speak for anyone besides himself, regardless of the fact that he is our "president."

As for fraternities being "sexist," while it is true that membership in fraternities is limited to males; it was not brought out that Beta Tau started a sister sorority, Theta Tau, which is about as close as they can come to letting girls in, taking into account the nature of fraternities and sororities.

I feel that the Guardsman's "fanning the flames" of disagreement on this issue is not necessarily a service to the students of this campus. As for Spencer Nutting's open question, "What is it like to be in a fraternity?" I invite him to find out for himself.

Burt Lustig

. . . And Steel Shapes

Dear Mr. Snodgrass:

I read the first issue of the Fall, 1972 Guardsman, volume 75, number 1. What struck me first, and the reason why I am writing to you, is the article titled STEEL SHAPE GRACES HILLTOP.

City College strives to beautify its campus even before it is barely functional. Art on our campus is important, however, I do not enjoy attending a college that places aesthetics ahead of duty, duty to make a college campus accessible and safe for all students.

Thousands of students enter and leave C.C. campus from the West, that is, from the bus and trolley station at Ocean Avenue. When these students reach Phelan Avenue and attempt to enter campus along the Educational Services Building they are blocked by a melee of cars and motorcycles. This is a parking lot. There is no walkway or path which would separate the student from parked or moving vehicles. (see picture no. 1)

This area is very dangerous, for students enter and leave by this route every hour by the thousands. What must students do in order to reach the Education Building, the Bookstore or Smith Hall? They must slide, trip and weave a path through a labyrinth of steel.

Thousands of students merge between the Arts and Visual Arts building. Legally parked cars, again, block the pathway for students. But here, students crowd around these cars to make it even more difficult to walk in this area. Pciture no. 2 and no. 3 especially clearly show students using the cars for benches.

Why are cars parked, legally, so close to the student's path as to make passage difficult and dangerous? Semester after semester I have seen confusion and near accidents at both area no. 1 and area no. 2. Parking in these areas should be stopped. This means painting a red no-parking line in three or four spaces at area no. 1 and only two or three spaces at area no. 2.

Furthermore, when will a concrete walkway be paved for students along the E.S.B. (area no. 1)? A pavement was made for the front of the cafeteria in the Spring of '72. Clearly, this path was made for convenience. Can we not now make one for protection?

Crowds of passing students slow the traffic which use the lot and the street. But, what about in between classes? What is to prevent a motorist from sweeping his way through these areas at 10:25 a.m. and not see a student leap from behind a legally parked car? Clear these areas of parked cars and motorcycles: then we can take time and admire the "steel shapes" that grace, instead of hinder, our campus.

Respectfully,
Domenic D'Ortenzio
Student

Enclosure: three pictures taken on CCSF campus, September-October, 1972. (Copies of this letter and pictures were sent to Dr. Harry Buttimer, President of City College and Ralph Hillsman, Dean of students.)

Why Are You Here? -- Test Yourself, Find Out

Are you wondering what you are doing here at CCSF? Do you worry about your future? Do others at City College have more academic direction? How do you compare to your fellow Students?

Well, you need not wait any longer to find out. Here for your comfort (or despair) is the "Official" City College Students' Test (Revised 1972) which should help CCSF students get a better understanding of themselves.

Remember, all the answers may seem correct, but one is "more" correct than the others. Use pencil, not pen. Mark your answers clearly and have a nice weekend worrying about your grade.

1. Score 5 points if you live at home, add 1 extra point if you can communicate with your parents (this is "in" this year) and award 2 bonus points if you have both parents fooled about what you're doing. If you live in a commune or non-legal unit you receive 3 points but only if you do your part by cleaning someone else's hair out of the bathroom sink. Living in your own apartment, whether married or single, gets you 10 points, but minus 1 point for each time you clean your apartment at least once a week or fail to cause one complaint per week.

2. Driving a car to school gets you 9 pollution points plus a bonus of 1 point for each time your car has been scraped or hit while in the student parking lot or on the street. If you take the bus or streetcar, give yourself 6 points but only if you can think of six obscene names to call the Muni system, the driver or the service. 6 points are awarded for hitchhiking, plus 1 point for each time you've been propositioned by a friendly driver of either sex, but minus 1 point for each time you've made it to school on time. Walking to City College is good for 2 points. Sorry, no points awarded for being physically fit or in good health because you shouldn't be well most of the time.

3. In the academic field, if you have a major, 6 points are yours for having the courage to know your grim future at such an early age. A declaration of no major receives 2 points. (Stop! Go directly to your counselor. Do not pass Go. Proceed to John O'Connell Vocational School.) 4 points for all those with a General Educational major, which means you're still undecided but your parents don't know it.

4. If you belong to a school club, group, social organization or the student government, subtract 5 points because you are in a minority. Give yourself 1 point if you know there's something going on somewhere at CCSF besides classes.

5. If you work more than 20 hours a week, pay is 9 "exhaustion" points with a bonus of 2 points if you think you'll develop an ulcer before 25. Working less than 20 hours a week gives you 6 points but only if you have to work weekends. Having no job, collecting any form of welfare or getting an allowance is worth 3 points but only if you can explain how you do it and remain friends with those who work.

Bonus Question: Score 2 points each if you can name our CCSF President, Men's and Women's Deans, and recognize them on campus.

Scoring: Figuring your total score is optional. If you really did use a pencil, you're good at following directions; report to your nearest Army recruiter. If you worry about this test for any period of time, turn yourself in for observation, 'cause it's too late for you now.

Man's life does not fill a hundred years, but always is it full of a thousand year's cares. Short the midday, bitter long the nights.
Why then do you not grasp the lamp, seeking out for yourself the short-lived joys, why not today?
Why will you wait year after year?

"JOCKO GOES TO CLASS"

Cartoon by Mr. Yang

Hardworking Ray Frazier's Ready for Hardwood Season

What is an active athlete? He carries on in an animated fashion, relentlessly shooting and dribbling the basketball away. For many others it would seem to be a waste of time. After all, you can only do your best.

Ray Frazier is no youngster and he is good. Just being good at shooting isn't enough; for Frazier all his hard work may mean fulfillment of his ambition for the past year—the championship.

In a season that promises the return of City's basketball team to the top, Coach Sid Phelan is still skeptical of just who his starting five will be. Frazier realizes, as do his team-mates, if anything will sway the coach's opinion it will be skillful playing, usually accomplished by continuous practice.

"I plan to play a big part in the team this year, but then, of course, it's still up to the coach," Frazier confides.

Consistency is one way of reaching perfection and Frazier follows this philosophy to a "T". Although he didn't play first string last year, he has come a long way.

In a recent interview with Coach Phelan, he had nothing but praise for Frazier. "He has the making of a pro and he has a lot of drive. Besides that he is an excellent shooter."

Asked why he wasn't chosen to play anything but a swing man last year, there but the key is the ability to work with the other four players. Frazier just didn't fit in as last year's team was real green. Getting the combination is the hard part but now it's a new season."

TIMES NEARING– and Frazier's Ready

Boasting a 6 foot 2 inch frame, Frazier patterns himself after Walt Frazier (no relationship) and for sure hustles like him. He has a natural magnetism for driving which is invaluable to the offensive strategy of any team. Movement is a vital part needed to win games and he has it.

Unlike some players who year after year try to perfect the dribbling and shooting aspect of the game, these come as naturally as sleeping to Frazier.

"I have played the game since I was seven; the ball-handling that bothers others doesn't bother me," he boasted.

Although he starred at Poly with a 16 point average, he only managed to pull a 6 point average at City last year.

Frazier has a goal of eventually making it in pro basketball. But while at City, he has no regrets about picking Business Administration as his major.

This is a good year for City, basketball-wise. "There aren't any problems this year because unlike last year, we're working as a team and not bickering about who should do this and that," Frazier states.

And if this is an indication of what is to be in basketballville at City College, it might be worth your while to come see the Rams and Ray Frazier.

BLOWN OUT – Rams find out how a ball game on a rainy dal feels.

Defending Soccer Champs Drop Finale in Mud 2-0

Before the final game, Ram teammates agreed that it would be an all-out effort against Marin. But it wasn't enough; the Rams lost a comical "grudge" match in a mud-bath on their own campus by a score of 2-0.

From the onset of this rain-ridden game, it was destined to be a comedy of errors. From the interruption of a dog chasing after the all, to the slipping and sliding of players it proved a fitting finale for a long and frustrating Ram season.

Fielding the play with only nine players out of the required eleven in the early moments, Marin had pot shot chances at scoring. To theirs and the Ram players' surprise, City had them on the run on a few occasions.

Relentlessly City pressed offensively led by co-captain Alfriedo Vidrio, Jr. and team-mate Carlos Molina. Defensively Marwan Sahouriech and Gary Meroff repulsed possible Marin scores.

HAVING FUN – in the muddy mess.

With regular goalie Maximillo Cortes back in the game City found itself more on the offensive. Cortes again showed his worth as he dived without a second thought at attempts by Marin. Many times Cortes found himself wiping off the mud. Asked what he thought of playing in such crummy conditions, he remarked, "It's kinda fun in a way."

Credit has to be given to this year's soccer team, if not praise.

After back to back morale-breaking losses to Ohlone, and Skyline, by the margin of 1-0 scores4 the Rams throughout this final game hustled as if it was as vital as the opening game.

Hampering scoring opportunities for them on many occasions was a wet field. Many times the Rams slipped and skidded on the wet turf, falling on crucial plays. To add to the misery, the ball seldom ever rolled. In one case, Vidrio had placed the ball so perfectly for a score that all Marwan Sahouriech had to do was kick it in. Instead, the ball just stopped, and so did Sahouriech.

In the second half, it was a case of who really wanted the game. Marin evidently did, as she scored two quick goals in a series of volleyball kicks.

By the end of the game, the Rams were drenched with mud and soaked to the bone. The season was over.

New Song Girls Enjoying Selves at Football Contests

With but two games left in a bad football season, it's amazing to see City College's "song girls" carry on like it's still a virgin season.

One has to wonder why these petite but pretty girls exert themselves so meticulously, like busy bees on a spring day.

The answer is simple: they find it fun!

These "volunteers" receive a unit credit but it's not an easy unit. Sponsored by Assistant Dean Flanagan, the song girls have practice sessions on the football field or in the Student Union Building; all of which involves eight hours a week of coordinated yells and leg-kicking. Their attitude about the football season, unlike many others on campus, is not one of criticism. They don't treasure the idea of losing any more than the players they root for, but "that's life," they shrug.

"It's fun cheering for them; the guys are nice, and besides, we go to football parties," confided one of the girls.

Leader Cynthia Lewis, a sister from Wilson, is in the company of girls from many different backgrounds. These include Jonnie Beaghler from Balboa, Ruth Terrado, Maria Salvador of Washington High. Carolyn Panelo and Marlene King from Mission, Eve Delcastello of Lowell, and Linda Castillion of Cathedral High.

Some are former song girls while others are new to the job. When together you couldn't tell that they were a little green; they put on a convincing show with the "Stripper" theme song. They act like they love doing it.

WHOSE GREEN? – Not these beauties.

Eve Delcastello says she "has always wanted to be one," but to her surprise it's not too well received. School spirit is not as vital at City as it was in those prep years—the girls will vouch for that.

"We work too hard for too little. The attitude toward sports here is very different. There's no spirit here like in high school," remarks pretty Linda Castillion.

As for their impact as a determining force in City's football season—well, they tried; it might be a new ballgame for the basketball season.

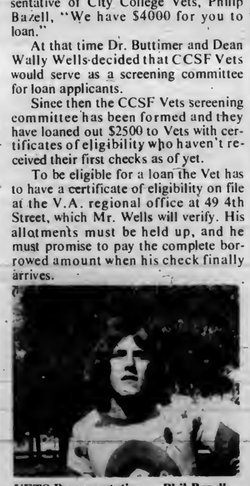
President Agrees To Needy Vets' Demands for Loans

During a recent meeting, the CCSF Vets decided to do something for the student veterans who have not yet received federal aid.

After the meeting they marched over to City College president Dr. Harry Buttimer's office and demanded to speak with him.



Approximately 45 minutes later the discussion ended with Buttimer asking the veterans to come back and see him tomorrow.

The following day he told a representative of City College Vets, Philip Bazell, "We have $4000 for you to loan."

At that time Dr. Buttimer and Dean Wally Wells decided that CCSF Vets would serve as a screening committee for loan applicants.

Since then the CCSF Vets screening committee has been formed and they have loaned out $2500 to Vets with certificates of eligibility who haven't received their first checks as of yet.

To be eligible for a loan the Vet has to have a certificate of eligibility on file at the V.A. regional office at 49 4th Street, which Mr. Wells will verify. His allotments must be held up, and he must promise to pay the complete borrowed amount when his check finally arrives.

VETS Representative – Phil Bazell

CCSF Vets claimed that approximately 20 percent of the 4,000 Vets receiving federal assistance on campus have had their checks held up for some reason or another.

Some of the Vets who have contacted the screening committee haven't received their educational assistance checks since the beginning of last summer.

Many of them were evicted from their apartments or suffered some other kind of bill crisis.

Bureaucrats Meet CCSF Vets Head On

American Servicemen's seminar had a late start and ended an uproar when Tom Chekey demanded that the Veterans Administration should do something for the veterans with "bad" discharges who are not eligible for V.A. assistance.

Robert Hughes, the Area Director of the American Servicemen Organization, opened the seminar at 11:15 am after waiting 15 minutes for stragglers to wander in.

The action began with Fred Simonson speaking to the crowd of 150.

Simonson spoke for about five minutes as planned, but then went off the schedule by opening the meeting up for questions.

AUTHOR – of the SANTANA cover story in the current ROLLING STONE, journalist/disc jockey Ben Fong-Torres (Center) raps with GUARDSMAN editor Paul Snodgrass and reporter Spencer Nutting.

Rolling Along With Ben Fong-Torres

Ben Fong-Torres, a man who has worked in both broadcasting and journalism, was recently interviewed by the staff of The Guardsman.

Torres, who is 27 years old, graduated in 1966 from Cal State University, San Francisco. While there, Torres was a reporter and editor for the paper. One of his assignments was to be the "Herb Caen" of the college paper.

After graduation from college, Torres started as a disc jockey at a San Francisco radio station. From there he went to the telephone company and became a magazine editor.

In 1969, Torres joined Rolling Stones magazine, where he now writes feature stories and artists' profiles concerning big name rock groups. He specializes in stories that dig below the surface of the music industry, revealing the truth about people who try to lie to and cheat others. Torres has met most of the big stars in rock music today in order to evaluate "the artists' professional facets and how they handle their talents and people."

Torres also has a radio show aired Sunday nights on KSAN-FM from 6-9 pm. He feels that valuable writing experience can be obtained from working for all media.

The interview was concluded by Torres advising aspiring journalists. He is against the idea of young journalists starting a career with a paper in a remote area of the country. "Stay where you are or where you like to live. If you are lucky, you could end up with a job on a big city or large suburban paper."

Campus Communists Finally Get OK From Administration

The Revolutionary Communist Youth finally won its semester-long struggle to gain recognition. After months of haggling on campus and several legal maneuvers President Harry Buttimer granted the RCY legal status as an on-campus organization.

The group had been active prior to recognition, but now it is able to request office space, the Student Union facilities for rallies, and also receive money from CCSF with which to engage in lectures, films, and other activities.

RCY's attempt to gain recognition is an interesting story. President Buttimer refused to grant the RCY legal status after the Student Council had approved the group.

The college president's objection was founded on a state educational law (no. 25512) that in effect states that only politically-affiliated youth organizations with a candidate on the state ballots may distribute literature and conduct rallies on school campuses. But the RCY, and its head, Sue Miles, attempted to explain that "In no way does Section 25512 apply to the RCY."

RCY PRESIDENT – SUE MILES

Buttimer still refused to relent, and consequently, the group sought legal assistance. They got it in the person of the American Civil Liberties Union.

The ACLU gathered the pertinent information in the case, and sent a letter to Dr. Buttimer informing him that refusal of the RCY was an abridgement of Amendment 1, the right to free speech. The letter went on to specify why section no. 25512 would not apply to the RCY.

Finally on November 3, Dr. Buttimer rescinded his veto of Council's action, thereby granting the RCY legal status.

RCY President, Sue Miles, charged that other campus organizations refused to come to their defense. Ms. Miles claimed that the SDS, BSU, and La Raza could not or would not lend support.

Feminists Picket Local TV Station

The Second National Feminist Party Convention, held at San Francisco's Glide Memorial Church, attracted women of all ages, races, and economic backgrounds, from all over California.

The convention, whose theme was Women Against Supporting Their Enemies, picketed KRON-TV (Channel 4). The reason for the picket, according to Florynce Kennedy, founder of the Party, was, "We've been covered better by other stations. We feel we should support our friends and withhold support from our enemies."

Ms. Kennedy explained the goals of the Feminist Party: "We're not here to break from the Democratic and Republican Parties. We exist to get Feminist women into office on any ticket they can. I'm willing to infiltrate the party where my money's going and make changes in it."

The Feminist Party also called for a national buyers boycott of 50 of the 125 top advertisers to protest sexism in their ads.

QUESTION: What do you think of the guys on campus?

Nina Jasinski—Art

The guys at Statler think they're real cool. They think all the girls want to go out with them. All they're out for is a good piece. (But still some of them are really nice.)

Cathy Koppel—General Education

It's hard to meet guys on campus. Most of the guys I met are pretty nice though. The trouble is that all the guys hang around in groups and this makes it hard to meet them personally.

Ann Driscoll—Child Psychology

Most of the guys I have met are really nice. But it's kind of hard to find a place to meet them socially. It's easiest to meet guys at the recreation association and in the classrooms.

Laurl Mullan—General Education

There is such a variety of different kinds that it's hard to say. It's nice to have a variety though. It's really easy to meet guys on campus because they're really friendly.

Debby Greaves—Mass Transportation

On campus they are not easy to meet, but in the classrooms they are easy to talk to. There aren't that many, but the one's I've met have been really friendly.

Maggi Flaherty—Biology

A lot of them are really nice, but some of them are still in their high school trips. The guys that do find me come out of theijr trip real cool. The easiest place to meet guys is in the classes.

Is Overpopulation a Myth?

A CCSF Economics instructor and alleged expert on population growth told his view on the controversial subject.

Speaking at the Unitarian Church located at the corner of Geary and Franklin Streets, Professor John Bardaro, the author of the soon to be released book, "The Myth of Overpopulation," spoke out against the Malthusian belief.

Calling over population the bogey of the 20th Century, Bardaro stated the whole myth began with the Reverend T. R. Malthus' book; The Population Principle, which was published in 1798.

Malthus claimed that population grows on a geometric scale which doubles it's self everytime, like, 2-4-8-16, etc. And he stated that food grows on an arithematic scale of 1-2-3-4 and so one.

Malthus concluded that the disparity between the two ratios could be controlled by three things: murder, disease, and birth control.

Bardaro claimed that this theory caught on not because it was true, but because it was conductive to the laissez-faire mood of the 18th century.

Bardaro displayed such books as, The Population Bomb. It has a picture on the cover of a baby in a bomb that has a lighted fuse. Bardaro then claimed that these books appealed only to the emotions.

Using Paul Erhlich's own words, "I am a part time propagandist," Bardaro professed "I come not as a propagandist but as a person with these valuable things on his side: reason, facts, and historical truths."

Following this, Bardaro illustrated the graph used by neo-Malthusians to depict the history of population growth. Then he mentioned such graphs were based on census reports which have a high rate of inaccuracy in primitive population areas.

Returning with another emotional neo-Malthusian claim, "If this rate of growth continues for the next 700 years," he exclaimed while pointing at a near perpendicular line indicating population growth, "There will be two people per square yard." Calling this "an impossibility," Bardaro went on, "even though it is statistically and mathematically true, it is a physical impossibility."

Extending his attack on the Malthusian prediction, Bardaro showed how 3.6 billion people, the estimated number of world population, could live in the state of Texas with every unit of four people having a land area of 8,100 feet to live on.

"The United States is producing more and more food," he continued, when attacking Erhlich's prediction of famine, "and this is a continuing world trend," he concluded.

Reading Lab Dubbed "Substandard"

According to Edward Kloster, instructor of Reading, "The English Reading Lab is simply too small and under-equipped to adequately meet the needs of the campus."

Kloster who heads the Reading Curriculum Committee, believes that perhaps 50 percent of CCSF students are in need of reading instruction. At present, 30 sections of reading courses are available. He added, "An expanded reading program and a larger, better-equipped Reading Lab is what is needed now."

"In primary schools, largely ghetto schools," he explained, "many of our students weren't taught to read properly and were passed from grade to grade, partly because of administrative and instructor indifference; as a consequence, they can't read here."

He continued, "And for many of our students, English is a second and a perplexing language."

The Reading Department which holds classes in the Visual Arts Building is equipped with a one classroom-size reading lab. The small lab is crowded with tables and chairs and little else. There is a dearth of equipment; a few old tape recorders, three Craig Speed Readers, and, when they are all working, a maximum of eight EDL Controlled Readers.

Film strips for the controlled readers are mostly mutilated and are not replaced when unusable.

New carrels have been ordered for the lab. "However," Kloster adds, "we've had to wait a long time for them."

Why does this situation exist? Kloster explains, "It's a matter of priorities; basic reading skills are given a low priority at the college level because it has been assumed that students know how to read by the time they reach college."

"Lab space and available equipment for the study of foreign languages is triple what we have. And," he continued, "for whatever reason, our 627 square feet of lab space is the least available space in any Northern California school. The next smallest reading lab is 900 square feet."

Kloster believes that the reading situation at CCSF does not correspond to the national norms because of the higher number of foreign students here and the many students who are lacking the basic reading skills.

He believes that in order to effect an improvement, the department should be considered special and given a higher priority by the administration.

Contraceptives Now Available At Clinic

For the first time in its history, CCSF has a clinic for women that dispenses contraceptives.

According to Fran Gage, a nurse at the Student Health Center, "The need for a source of contraceptive information and supplies has been apparent for a long time." In answer to this need, the Women's Clinic opened here Wednesday, November 8, climaxing many months of negotiations between the Student Health Advisory Board and the San Francisco Public Health Department.

The Clinic is staffed and supplied entirely by the S.F. Public Health Department, but the school does have some control over activities and services. Says Ms. Gage, "We try to keep the service personal, to provide opportunities for women to discuss any problems they have with contraception or sex."

Clinic office hours are 12 noon to 3 p.m. every Wednesday. In addition to contraceptive information and supplies, it offers pelvic examinations, pap smears and VD screening. Under certain circumstances the Clinic treats vaginal infections.

The Student Health Center, as a normal service, does pregnancy testing and abortion referral —Elen Nettelbeck

Visitor Compares S.F., New Zealand Life Styles

Ever stop to wonder what this part of the world looks like to an outsider? The Guardsman got an inside look from Mark Perry, a vacationing student from Auckland, New Zealand. Believe it or not they're enjoying summer right now in New Zealand.

While on his first visit to the U.S. Mark noticed that San Francisco is characteristically "very good and the people make it what it is."

He's a second year political science major at Auckland University where all bachelor's degrees can be acquired in three years. However, certain courses aren't taught at the university, like Journalism.

Unlike the CCSF campus Auckland isn't overrun by pretty faces and nice legs for "the ratio of men to women is 3-1," Mark sadly noted.

Comparing Auckland to San Francisco Mark found that the population is similar but that's where resemblance ends. In Auckland almost everyone lives in a bungalow-type house on a 1/4-acre plot as compared to the squashed-up City apartment buildings. And "school buildings and classrooms here are just as ugly as everywhere else," Mark added, "but the people are friendlier which makes up for it."

Would You Believe, "A $35 Lid" — Mark Perry discusses his homeland with reporter Andy Maker

Penny for penny Auckland is cheaper to live in, but if you want to enjoy some of the pleasures life has to offer it's a different story. Who'd believe that a '65 Mustang sells for $4000 and it costs $35 for an average ounce lid. But if he desired either in Auckland he'd pay the price or be left out.

There isn't as much music in Auckland as in the City for the record companies don't release a lot of records. "There are some records out by Frank Zappa and the Mothers but not many. The Fugs and the Grateful Dead are almost unheard of," Mark said. But the music loving New Zealanders don't get any grief about their long hair from the local people.

Mark will return to Auckland in February to begin his final year of school, but for now he's eager to see southern California, Colorado and Mexico. —Andrew Maker

Night Life:

Keystone Korner Makes Change from Rock to Jazz

Perhaps you noticed too that the Keystone Korner in San Francisco doesn't book rock acts anymore. Now they're boasting the names of McCann, Turrentine, Tyner, Ammons Benson and Kirk; the best in jazz.

CAME OUT FLYING — Rahsaan Roland Kirk

Since it was a rather unusual stroke, (a rock club changing to jazz so suddenly), the obvious question why —was asked on opening night of Rahsaan Roland Kirk's second week at Keystone. After trying all night to talk to the very busy Cisco (taking care of business at the door) he finally had time when the last set ended.

Simply, "The Keystone changed its format from rock to jazz when the ownership changed," Cisco said.

Keystone came along just in time. The other major jazz clubs in the City are quieting down; they just don't have name acts people want to see, or they're already closed down.

Though San Francisco is known for its good jazz sound and the making of important new artists there isn't one jazz club that has been in continuous operation for an appreciable amount of time. What happens then? The Blackhawk, the Jazz Workshop, great places. But where did they go, and others like them? One explanation given by Todd the soundman was, "some clubs were charging too much because they didn't have the seating capacity and so they had phenomenal prices."

"I remember one night," Todd recalled, "I spent $35 in one club on just my old lady and myself." There are many more who can recall similar incidents. I for one can remember being asked to leave the Both/And after only 45 minutes of Cannonball and $15 less in my pocket.

Todd optimistically predicted the Keystone would be around awhile "because we have the seating capacity and aren't charging a fortune for people to have a good time."

There's nothing that adds to a group's performance like a good opening number. And as usual Kirk came out flying and stayed up in the clouds throughout.

So after giving up on Cisco for a while undivided attention swung to Kirk, who had the audience swinging and wouldn't turn them loose. A couple of rare dancers emerged from their seats to partake in the action.

Always knowing what his audience wants, Roland played Monk's "Light Blue" and to make things more interesting he announced free drinks for everyone. (He must have known it was my birthday.)

Backing Roland solidly on bass was Henry Pete Pearson, drummer Robert Shy and long-time pianist Ron Burton.

Beautifully Done But Boring Film

The King of Marvin Gardens* is the movie Director Bob Rafelson wanted to make, but will it be the movie the public wants to see?

"I can only make a film I want to make and hope you (the audience) can like it," said Rafelson speaking at CCSF, the day after his film was previewed for the Bay Area media. The preview crowd hardly applauded at the finish of The King of Marvin Gardens.

Jack Nicholson and Bruce Dern play brothers in the film. Dern, a front man for a Black Syndicate, talks his brother Nicholson, a late-night disc jockey, into coming to Atlantic City to hear about and get into his plans for a casino and resort in the Hawaiian Islands.

Ellen Burstyn, a former beauty, and Julia Anne Robinson, her step-daughter, are the women involved with Dern.

The story line is minimal. The characterization, the interaction between the brothers, the women, and the Black Syndicate are what hold the picture together. A New York Times review of the film was right on when it stated that the film was acted, written, directed, and photographed beautifully.

But if as a mere moviegoer one is waiting for something to happen; the film's surprising climax scarcely warrants 103 minutes of almost plotless movie.

Director Rafelson's first flick was Head, starring The Monkees, Victor Mature, the late Sonny Liston, and S.F.'s own Carol Doda. "All the so-called losers," was his comment. The sum of the reviews for Head showed that it was "universally despised," he remembered.

BOB RAFELSON — "... hope you like it."

After two years, Rafelson next directed the much-acclaimed Five Easy Pieces. Questioned about the two-year lapse, he answered, "It took a long time to find out what I didn't want to do."

Rafelson finds that the movie public knows too much about a movie before they see it. From reading reviews, books or plays on which the film is based, the public "doesn't experience the picture fresh," he observed. This seems to be what he succeeds in doing with The King of Marvin Gardens.

The viewer finds himself confused about the situation in which Dern is involved, and wondering about the slightly mad personalities of the two women. But does an audience want to sit through a movie lost and bewildered for most of the time?

The final all-important questions: Are you willing to spend $3.00 to see The King of Marvin Gardens? Are you going to recommend it to your friends? All things considered, my answer would be no.

Feminist Cites Womens' Problems

"Women are raised to be a sex object or a slave, or some impossible combination of the two," said Shirley Boccacio at the Thursday lecture, November 16. Ms. Boccacio denounced public education, claiming that it socializes women to failure. She explained, "Success for women is viewed as a disaster."

"This socialization process is reinforced by textbooks, the media, (where dominating women are always portrayed as castrating bitches) and children's toys which reflect future roles." She added, "babies of different sexes are even handled differently."

Ms. Boccacio declared that the motives for oppressing women, while partly psychological, are largely economic. "Women must be kept oppressed so they'll remain a source of cheap labor (the work of a housewife would cost $14,000 per year if hired) and so they'll push their husbands to achieve. They must be kept insecure so they'll buy more products." Ms. Boccacio advanced male insecurity in the face of female competition as another motive for oppressing women; an attitude that she called "an insult to both sexes."

Ms. Boccacio believes that solutions to economic oppression are within reach: through affirmative action programs, class action suits, suits for equal pay, the unionization of housewives, and the passage of the Equal Rights Amendment.

She was less confident about eradicating psychological oppression. She felt that education will have to be changed so that both men and women feel free to be whatever they really are, but added, "There is no blueprint for what we're doing because it's never been done before." —Elen Nettelbeck

IN BUSINESS—After a long wait Steve Spurrier's ship has finally come in.

Sports Editorial:

49er Fortunes Change With Spurrier Doing Signal Calling

Six weeks don't make a season but you'd have a hard time convincing quarterback Steve Spurrier and the average 49er fan of that. After an impressive six weeks of signal-calling Steve Spurrier, filling in for injured quarterback John Brodie, has taken the 49ers from oblivion and put the Super Bowl back in their future. Under Spurrier the 49ers are 4-1-1.

Let's face it: during the first five games the 49ers (2-3) looked like they'd replace the Saints in the division cellar but with a change of quarterbacks things started going the other way.

Before that break Spurrier had thrown only one pass in the regular season. Throughout his career with the 49ers he has substituted only briefly and along the way has picked up little encouragement from critics who judged him by his limited appearances. Well, what do they think of him now? He has to have something going for him—for he was, if you recall, a Heisman Trophy winner when the award still meant something.

It took a game or two for Spurrier to regain his timing and to get the feel of playing again. After all, he should have been rusty after six seasons of watching Brodie from the bench.

The game with the Atlanta Falcons was the turning point in Spurrier's career and the 49ers' playoff hopes. In leading the 49-14 rout he tossed three touchdown passes and more important he got the 49ers out of a month of winless Sundays. Since that heroic feat Spurrier has thrown on to rank among the top NFC passers and is currently second in the league to only Broadway Joe Namath in touchdown passes. Namath has 17, Spurrier 16.

In getting the 49ers back in their winning ways Spurrier has provided desperately needed offensive-scoring punch. The overworked defense has kept them in many games but, until recently, couldn't get the help they needed to achieve victory, like a couple touchdowns or even one.

How often have the 49ers gone into droughts where a touchdown wasn't scored for something like 6 or 7 quarters. Ridiculous!

With Spurrier at the controls, the 49ers have again become a high scoring offensive machine that can crush any opponent. So don't be surprised when you hear a play-me-or-trade-me ultimatum from him should Brodic get the nod next season.

Or maybe there won't be any of that. It's just about time the 37 year-old Brodie stepped down anyway. Granted, he's a great quarterback but everybody can't meet the call like a George Blanda can. And the possibility always looms that Brodie might not be able to beat Spurrier out to regain the signal-calling chores (as history has proven time and again.)

The combination of Brodie getting injury-prone while aging, his contract in the neighborhood of $1 million, and Steve Spurrier doing a wonderful job; all weighs in Spurrier's favor.

In all probability Spurrier and company will beat the Rams and Falcons out for the NFC west title and they'll have a chance to make big names for themselves. Because they'll have to face Dallas and Washington respectively before getting to the Super Bowl.

The 49ers have some offense to go with the defense they've always had; and now that the two are on the team at the same time and that man named Spurrier can't seem to do any wrong, the sky's the limit. See you in L.A. Super Sunday, 49ers.

Basketball

Ram Cagers Haven't Jelled But Aggressive and Winning

Plagued by well intended but badly-timed passes and a sluggish offensive effort, the Rams basketball team brought into perspective, possibly a new route to "success" as City got by Modesto with a score of 59-52.

After a strenuous overtime win of 80-77 over a determined Peralta squad the night before, the Rams didn't seem to have the zest vital on a basketball court. As guard Greg Johnwell, a master-of-promoting the fast break, puts it, "We were just tired and not running. Besides we haven't practiced since Wednesday (before Thanksgiving)."

From the onset of the game, it was a see-saw battle as neither team seemed to establish any dominance. Beset by over-looked fouls and sloppy passing, caused at times by good Peralta defense, City managed to lead only by a half-time margin of 26-24.

The Rams are still stymied by just who will be the starting five. Though they opened with guards Ray Frazier and David Smith, accompanied by forwards Flash Atchens and Darrel Jackson, and rounded out by center Vince Chambers, the addition of Bob Pruitt and guards Les Grays and Greg Johnwell proved to be the turning point.

This year City is by no means a tall team and the game strategy is reflected by the squad's play. There is no Abdul Kareem Jabbar or Nate Thurmond to center around. Instead the Rams have to rely on a fast-paced running game, oftentimes fast-breaking, before her opponents can set up defensively.

While not particularly tall or super-quick, center Bob Pruitt not only held his own against his No. 1, 69 counterpart, Tom Canter, but proved to be the sparkplug in igniting the offense.

With the score in the third period 33-31 in City's favor, he hooked two quick shots as the Rams with the quick fast-breaking combination of Johnwell and the timed rebounding of Atchens rolled the Rams for ten unanswered points and a commanding lead of 41-31.

Aggressive rebounding and smart downcourt passing to a fast-breaking Ram Cager may prove to be the secret ingredient to winning this year.

Out of coincidence, both teams ended up with 35 rebounds for the evening, but the 17 turnovers which hurt them had beeter be polished out before they embark in real season play.

Top scoring honors go to the Flash with 15 and Dave Smith with 14.

TOO SWEET—Displayed in the foxiest fashion is Carolyn Panelo, one of eight pretty leg kickers who perform at CCSF athletic contests.

asked, "Why are the phones always busy at the 4th Street office?" Simonson replied, "There are nine phones from various departments connected to that number, and we (the VA Regional office) service approximately 1 million claims."

In the mean time Robert Hughes, A.S.M.'s area director wanted to know what happened to the game plan: all speakers were to lecture 5 minutes before forming into a panel that would answer questions from the audience.

The question and answer period continued for about fifteen minutes before Simmonson was interrupted and the meeting was redirected to its scheduled procedure

Then the meeting continued as the A.S.M. sponsors planned but little of what was said was pleasing to the crowd. That is, not until Phil Bazell spoke.

Bazell, the speaker for the campus veteran organization, CCSF Vets, spoke in positive terms. "The CCSF Vets have established a $25 loan program for books, a hot lunch program, and a loan program for veterans who haven't received their benefits as of yet."

When Bazell finished, the crowd did something alien to its previous nature, it applauded him as he seated himself.

Robert Martinez followed the concrete statements of the CCSF Vets spokesman with something less than that.

Martinez introduced himself as the representative from the veteran branch of Health Education and Welfare. At the time it wasn't clear to the audience that this was an organization in its embryonic stages.

As Martinez tried to continue some probing questions from the audience brought out the fact that this veteran organization existed on paper only.

At this point one veteran complained, "Isn't this just like the service? They build you up and they never come through."

Adding to this, Tom Chekey addressed the Va's regional offices Representative, Fred Simonson, "You (meaning the VA. regional office) have to do something about the brothers and sisters with bad discharges. When they get out of the service they aren't even eligible for unemployment," he finished.

Simonson replied that the veteran administration doesn't have the authority to change that regulation. We can only review the vet's court martial and determine if it was fair or not.

The previous program lost $9,000. Many of the Vets felt that they could avoid the same hang ups that plagued the former director of CCSF's V.A. office.

Feeling that the CCSF Vets can do a better job at screening loan applicants, Bazell stipulated that their level of communication with Vets gives them more leverage.

"This program is important in that the administration has given us a chance to implement some badly needed programs for veterans, and with the success of this program we will have more success in getting other programs to help more Vets," Bazell concluded.

According to Miles, "only the Young Socialists Alliance (from which the RCY is a splinter group) managed to muster even token support." Sue Miles also charges The Guardsman with not reporting the events.

(Editor's Note: See "Student Council" story in Issue No. 1.)

Now that the RCY is a full fledged campus group, it can engage in the dissemination of literature germane to its platform, "We seek to build a revolutionary youth movement which can intervene in all social struggles armed with a working-class program based on the politics of Marx, Lenin, and Trotsky."

Students Disagree on Evalution Procedures For Faculty, Selves

Students' participation in the formal evaluation of their instructors and counselors should be the issue in a few weeks when the college Board of Governors meet to decide what procedures they'll assign to the regular reappraisal of CCSF's faculty.

The Board will judge at least two recommendations; one proposal which was written by the Academic Senate's Executive Council (the faculty equivalent of Student Council), and another which was voted for by most of the faculty-at-large.

The Executive Council proposal outlines a system whereby uniform circulation of a student evaluation survey would indicate whether an investigation of an instructor's competency is justified.

Administrators and department heads could also make recommendations.

The plan, approved by the faculty, stresses more participation by the instructors and less by the students.

Under the plan, distribution of student questionnaires could be regulated by departments, despite critics' contentions that the law requires campus-wide uniformity in procedures.

The faculty plan also refrains from attaching to student evaluations (which only "may" be utilized) any mandatory impact on overall evaluations.

This proposal is better known as the Dolson, Hanson and Marcus plan, named after its authors (Lee, Rollin and Donald), the chairmen of the History, Mathematics, and Counseling departments.

Although the role played by students in his plan is apparently a small one, counselor Marcus insists, "It's taken for granted that the student input would be commensurate with a valid evaluation."

However, according to Bob Fankenhauser, a student who collaborated with the Executive Council, the DHM plan "doesn't say how many students should participate, which opens the way for no participation—which is what these people intend."

One of the faculty members who wouldn't support the DHM plan is James Cagnacci, Chairman of the English Department.

Abortion Concerns Woman and Doctor Court Decrees

The California Supreme Court has ruled, in effect, that the decision to perform an abortion during the first 20 weeks of pregnancy is between a woman and her doctor.

The ruling stated that the medical criteria for obtaining an abortion are "impermissibly vague."

Abortions are now legal in California when performed by a licensed physician in an accredited hospital.

The ruling does not, however, really permit abortion on demand.

Food and Health Information Given at Successful Food Fair

Yah! Here comes the food! It wasn't officially national-be-kind-to-your-body week although various city organizations combined to put on a Food Fair in the lobby of the Educational Services Building. The Food Fair was made possible through student health nurse Fran Gage and her staff.

"We've worked real hard for this because we feel the nutrition information is necessary for students," said Fran.

As well as being informative the Food Fair was fun. There was a nutrition game set up on one table with a 12 question quiz. If you got the answer the board lit up and if you didn't it was fun anyway.

Participating in the Food Fair were the Dairy Council of New York, Weight Watchers of Northern California, a Foodstamps representative, the Traveling Medicine Show and the Food Conspiracy whose bright yellow sign asked the question "What is it?"

Election Rights Controversy Rages

According to Robert Hughes, a student council member, "Frank Thatcher (Student body president) who has been involved in controversy before, now has another to contend with."

The charges stem from Thatcher allegedly handing Bill Lang, (a council member requesting a blank election petition) a partially filled-out one, saying, "Here, you're running on my slate." Lang was quoted as saying, "I'd rather run as an independent."

Later, after locating Kevin Kent, the election commissioner, Lang returned the petition and told him under what circumstances he received it.

At this time Kent was quoted as stating that this and other petitions were illegally removed from his desk.

The controversy officially surfaced when Mike McGrath, a student sitting in on the student council meeting, addressed himself to its members.

Stating his protest in question form, McGrath asked if this manner of petitioning for election was not illegal. In his opinion it was, he stated. Then he recommended that all the election petitions now circulating should be barred from the coming election on January 10th and 11th.

Robert Hughes, a student council member, punctuated McGrath's complaint by holding up a petition and saying, "This should be invalidated."

"That," according to Hughes, "brought the sleepy meeting to life."

"Almost everyone except Dorian Redus, who is Thatcher's next running-mate, was unraveled by my plea," Hughes claimed.

Later, when the meeting calmed down a bit, Lance Burton motioned that from now on election petitions should be locked away and only given out after the student has shown their I.D. card and the student's name and student body card number has been placed on the top of the petition.

His motion passed unanimously.

Women Seek Financial Help for Schooling

"Welfare won't help them. The Financial Aids Office won't help them. If you're alone, nobody listens to you. But," hopes Maria Garcia, "maybe they'll listen to a group."

Ms. Garcia, a CCSF student, is the organizer and driving force behind a now-forming organization to provide financial aid to needy women students.

At the first meeting of the as yet unnamed group, women discussed their financial problems. Some of these problems were caused by family situations or physical disability, but most were solely the fact that the people involved are women.

Many of these women are welfare recipients who cannot pay babysitters or buy school supplies on their minimum-subsistance grants, and whose children are too young to be cared for in the CCSF Day Care Center.

The Welfare Department has no funds to send these women to school, even though doing so would get them off welfare. Nearly all of the women who attended the meeting will be forced to leave school after this semester if no help is found for them.

Edna Pope, CCSF's Assistant Dean of Women, suggested that the group become an officially recognized campus organization so that it can request funds from Student Council.

She added that if the group becomes large enough, it can demand that a representative from Social Services come to CCSF to discuss these problems, and it could pressure the Social Services Department to develop a program to provide childcare and money for school expenses. "But," she added, "all this depends on getting together enough interested women to apply the pressure."

Further information can be obtained at Dean Pope's office, E106.

FOR SAFETY'S SAKE — Construction on campus will allow for better fire fighting facilities.

Roadways Town Up for Fire Safety

The disrupted, pebble and concrete-chunk studded sidewalks running below Cloud Hall and alongside the gyms, can all be accredited to a suggestion given by the Battalion Chief of the San Francisco Fire Department that was, of necessity, taken to heart by the CCSF Facilities and Planning Office.

Early in the summer, CCSF received a letter from the fire department expressing concern about the lack of facilities for fighting fires in the lower area of the campus, including the 300 series bungalows and the two gyms. The water-supply construction work (which has been causing students to high-step it across muddy digging since early November) is accomplishing two purposes. Upon completion of the project, fire fighting facilities will be established for the eastern edge of the campus, and domestic water supplies for all future construction sites on CCSF grounds will be provided for.

Vic Graff, director of the Facilities and Planning office, described the technical work that is now underway, "The existing fire main is being extended to completely circle the campus, with four additional fire hydrants in strategic places." The entire cost of the project is $76,000, financed out of local tax funds.

Guardsman Exclusive:

Airport School Offers Unique Training for CCSF Students

CCSF is everywhere even at the airport!

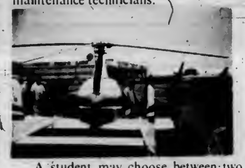
On one bay-bordered cubbyhole of the San Francisco International Airport's expansive grounds, planes, in perfect flight condition, taxi but never leave the ground.

Adjacent to the semi-functional runway is a Pan Am terminal totally devoid of bustling, excited passengers and airport personnel, totally silent of the microphone voice announcing departures and arrivals . . . yet filled with airport sounds and activities.

The Pan-Am terminal, originally constructed for landing sea-planes that came in off the bay, has long since been abandoned by the airlines for more convenient and modern headquarters; the unusual circumstances that occur with Monday-through-Friday regularity on the grounds are the result of a foresighted idea that crystallized in the fall of 1971 into reality as the Aircraft Maintenance Technology program of CCSF.

The relatively little-known program and satellite campus were established by the aviation industry, rather than by request of students or administrators. The industry saw the need for a larger supply of qualified technicians to meet future demands in the fast-growing world of general aviation.

Various airlines at the airport contributed funds to initiate the school for the San Francisco Unified School District, and after several administrative transitions, the terminal and runway became an affiliated part of City College. The CCSF aircraft technology school is the first in California, and possibly in the United States; to receive a federal license.



The school maintains ties with the giant industry that mothered it through an Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of all airlines at SF airport; included are personnel from the Coast Guard and the maintenance manager of Flying Tigers Airline.

The committee acts as a resource center, giving guidance to direct the programs and curriculum, setting up materials, and providing airport job opportunities. Through the committee's operation, students have full co-operation of the airlines, and often visit the Coast Guard and Tiger Line hangars for demonstrations of various equipment.

Due to this close affiliation of the CCSF "satellite" campus with the airline industry, 40 to 50 percent of all students involved in the school have secured part-time technical jobs at the airport.

The purpose of the program, which handles 190 students at the airport campus daily, is officially noted as: "To provide occupational training and/or technician education to develop the necessary skills, positive work attitudes, habits, abilities and knowledge as required for Federal Aviation Administration certifications and employment in the aerospace industries as aviation maintenance technicians."

A student may choose between two separate areas of specialization—the Aircraft Power Plant Maintenance Technology (engine work), or Airframe Maintenance Technology (all parts and surfaces except the engine).

Each full program involves two years of training and is designed so that students may satisfy college graduation requirements as well as requirements for the Associate in Science degree. An aircraft technician's license must be secured through FAA examinations.

The curriculum is approved and regulated by the Federal Aviation Agency, so graduates are qualified to meet all FAA license standards for the written, oral and practical examination. Academic courses are held on the CCSF Phelan Ave. campus, and include evening division formats.

The main level of the reclaimed Pan Am terminal consists of various workshops, with the classrooms and offices upstairs; this gives students as much practical experience with demonstration units, simulators and highly specialized aviation parts and equipment as possible.

Otto Wendehost, airframe and power plant instructor, stressed the importance of establishing a sense of reality throughout the airport school, so students entering the industry would not encounter anything they had not been exposed to before.

The school also boasts two helicopters, one navy fighter and a twin engine Cessna 310 which are used for ground training but cannot be flown because the State has been unwilling to underwrite flight insurance for Community Colleges.

Information and material concerning the Aircraft Maintenance Technology program may be obtained by calling the Registrar's Office at CCSF, 587-7272, or the Airport School, 877-0161.

QUESTION: What do you think of the girls on campus?

Steve Scholz—Business

The chicks are nice looking but a lot of them come across snobby. I wish they would talk a little more and smile. The chicks are foxier on sunny days because they wear less clothes.

George Wyley—Criminology

They're nice as hell. It's as simple as that. Most of the chicks I see dress real foxy. Most of them are pretty down to earth and friendly to talk to.

Nick Luizzi—Business

Chicks on campus are very unpredictable. Some think they're mature, others think they're something special. The majority of them just want a good time and if that's what they want, I'll just give it to them.

Harvey Won—Sex Education

Most of the girls here are O.K. They're generally friendly and open-minded. I'm in the class sleeping most of the time, but when I have a break I'm wide awake, looking.

Mike Brown—Marine Biology

First of all I have a very jealous girlfriend. But I have to say that the girls here are really nice looking, sexy, cute . . . It's really surprising how so many good looking girls could be in one place.

Pat Idiart—General Education

The chicks out here are all right. Some of them think they're really bad. As far as I know there's one really nice one. On hot days the parades are really great.

Crime:

Upswing in State "Gang" Activity

Crime in California is on the upswing according to a recent report made public by State Attorney General Evelle Younger, under a 1971 law requiring the State Department of Justice to report on crime to the legislature. Gangs, vice and drugs were mentioned.

Chinese gangs named were Wah Ching, Yu Li, and Suey Sing. These gangs have committed burglaries, extortion and murder. Most of these crimes occurred in the Bay Area.

The report pointed out that the Hell's Angels motorcycle gang has enlarged and increased its activities. Three Angels members have been charged with murder in Contra Costa County. Three bodies were found on a ranch which is known as "a Hell's Angels burying ground."

Private planes have been used to fly marijuana from Mexico to the Central Valley Area of California; massage parlors in California have been used for illegal acts.

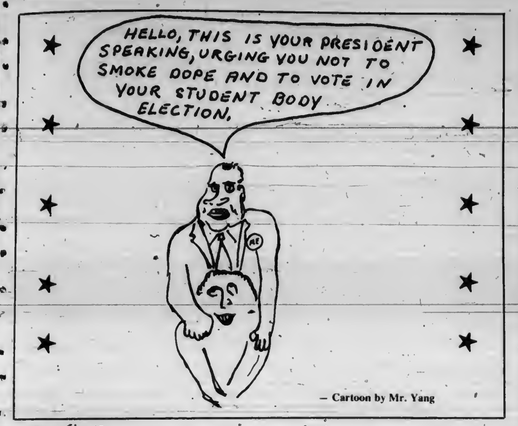
A New "Pollution-Minded" Superbike

Kawasaki's 903cc four-stroke "super-bike", unlike its counterparts, has voluntarily added a new dimension in its quest to be number one: smog control.

Crankcase fumes are routed through maze-like corridors in a cannister perched atop the transmission and then back into the plenum which feeds filtered air into the carburetors.

Allegedly, the rehreather system cuts the hydrocarbon emissions by 40%.



Adapted to run on unleaded fuels, the 903cc bike doesn't suffer from poor gas mileage like most vehicles using smog control devices.

Recently the big bike was tested against seven other super-bikes by CYCLE magazine. Its only competitor was its brother, the 750 two-stroke Kawasaki.

Editorial:

Register Your Views Vote in AS Elections

RECORD VOTER TURNOUT — LESS THAN 2 PERCENT! This may well be the headline after the A.S. elections are held on Jan. 10 and 11.

If the upcoming elections continue to follow the pattern from the two previous elections, the City College student government will be elected by about 200 voters.

The Fall 1971 election attracted 838 voters. The Spring 1972 election showed a 100% drop in voters to a total of 418. Another 100% drop in the voter turnout would mean that approximately 18,000 City College students would be represented by a student government elected by a little over 1 percent of the student body.

A small turnout for the elections might make it easier for one political party, organization or club to elect its own members to the student council. This could cause members of a certain group to vote as a block on issues and budget requests brought up before the student council therefore possibly dictating their own views for the entire student body.

The Fall budget for 1972, approved by the student council, was well over $40,000. Some of the organizations, groups and clubs which received part of the budget include: most all CCSF varsity athletic teams and their related activities, the choir and choral, Child Day Care Center, Experimental College, Free Critic, Free Gay Association, Black Student Union, Newman Club, Student Mobilization Committee, Young Socialist Alliance and the Women's Abortion Committee.

As in local or national elections, the voter tries to elect someone with whom he feels represents his views and / or will take action that he feels is necessary. It is thought that the minimum voter turnout would include the members of these groups and any other group that receives part of the budget and this should be more than 1 or 2 percent of the student body.

It is hoped that any student with an opinion towards any activity on campus would vote in accordance with his thoughts.

Even if your candidate or platform is not elected, any student who has a complaint or request of any nature can have his item placed on the agenda and given a chance to bring it up before the student council.

To be a voter, all a student needs is his college-issued identification card, not an Associated Student Body Card, to participate in the election. The apathy for the A.S. elections on the part of City College students may be part of a general campus apathy that also shows itself in the scarce attendance at athletic events, drama productions, for guest speakers and lecturers and numerous other CCSF activities.

If you want to see any changes made on this campus, you can achieve them through the process of electing people who reflect your views. The time is now to get off your apathetic ass and make this college what you want it to be.

Remember: The Associated Student elections will be coming up after Christmas vacation, Jan. 10 and 11.

(Due to a conflict in dates, the Guardsman will not be able to publish an election issue. A staff member of the Free Critic said that they will bring out an election issue in January. We ask you to read their election issue and then go out and vote.)

Caveat Emptor:

700,000 Children Hurt By Dangerous Toys Each Year

Anyone planning to buy toys for Christmas for any "tiny tots" in their family or among their friends, BEWARE! There is danger for these little ones unless care is taken when making a purchase.

According to a recent report by the San Francisco Examiner, dangerous toys, which are bulging on store shelves in the San Francisco Bay Area, injure an estimated 700,000 children each year.

Children choke on easily removed pins, wires or other small parts of toys; they swallow poisonous liquids, damage their hearing with noisy toys and chance setting themselves and their homes on fire while playing with flammable toys.

In 1969, in an attempt to avoid such injuries, Congress passed the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act which authorizes the federal Food and Drug Administration to ban toys which, its tests show, could harm children.

Susan Miller of the Examiner further reports that the FDA's list of banned toys currently includes only 800 of the 100,000 or so types of toys sold in the country.

However, such toys as bicycles and chemistry sets, responsible for many accidents, are still outside the agency's bailiwick because regulatory standards haven't been established yet.

Keeping tabs on the $4 billion a year toy industry is no easy matter, explains Ms. Miller. Toy manufacturers number about 1,200. In addition, each year 83,000 shipments of toys are made to the U.S. by foreign firms. November and December toy sales comprise about 80% of annual sales.

It is impossible for the FDA to track down every dangerous toy in the country; therefore no one should be complacent in purchasing a toy for a young child.

To add to the difficulties is the fact that FDA can't test toys before they're sold at retail unless a manufacturer requests a check. That means a toy can be banned only after it's already on the shelf.

The fact that a toy escapes the ignominity of the FDA's banned toy list, Miller adds, is no guarantee that it's safe. The shelves in some stores are filled with flimsily made, unpackaged toys often unidentified except for country of origin.

Imported toys, cheap and popular as stocking stuffers, are prominently displayed in the stores now. The FDA has the power to detain dangerous shipments from abroad, but only spot checks are made.

Shopping guidelines to follow in the purchase of toys are: making sure labels on cloth toys say non - flammable, flame-retardant, or flame-resistant; check for long cords, sharp edges, small removable parts, pins, and wires; some baby toys are also on the banned list, so shop carefully, name brands do not necessarily ensure safety — they, too, have made the FDA list; avoid toys that make loud noises — the noise hazard is very real and may seriously damage a child's hearing.

Interested shoppers can get a copy of the list of banned toys from the FDA district office at 50 Fulton Street, or try the public libraries who also keep a list on hand for reference.

New Club:

"Moral Support" For Over-Thirties

There are 1,484 students over the age of 30 registered as day students at CCSF. They represent close to 10 percent of the day-time student body.

The 30 plus club is a recognized campus organization. The idea for the club came from Anne Giannarelli. She noticed that the older students tended to sit alone in the campus cafeteria.

Anne thought that it would be great to have these students share their experiences with each other. She mentioned this to her counselor who encouraged her to talk to the students for their approval. The students agreed with Giannarelli on the idea of forming a group.

The officers of the club are: Ron Grahm, President, Anne Giannarelli, Vice President, Edith Stern, Secretary, and Bernard Keane, Treasurer.

The concerns of the 30 plus club are: the creation of to opportiunities for students to meet to exchange views on problem-solving, to provide moral support for each other, and to allow some input to the common needs of the over-30 group concerning all phases of the campus.

The club recently requested space on campus for their meetings, and also asked for a budget allotment.

In a Manger Gently Laid

Who can say with certainty the origin of the first manger scene? Was it a poor shepherd tending his sheep in the hills of Italy who to while away the time carved the little wooden figures?

Or was it a peasant farmer in northern Germany or southern France, who wanted to bring meaningful reality for his children of that first Christmas day?

The truth is not known by anyone as to when and where the first creche (nativity scene) was made, or who made it.

A link to the idea of the creche is found in the fifth-century stone frieze on the walls of the catacombs under Rome. There, very simply, a nativity scene was carved by an unknown artist. Today it is a crumbling scene but the figures of the Child in the manger and Mary and Joseph are still distinguishable.

More specifically, the first representation of the nativity can be attributed to the medieval miracle plays which were enacted in churches. There, the miracle of Christmas itself was dramatized by the people.

But in time the miracle plays became crude, and the church decreed that the plays must be given outside of the church.

Praesepio

In 1224 in Italy, Francis of Assisi asked the Pope for permission to set up a manger scene in the town of Greccio, Italy, with the hope of bringing the coming-of-Christ closer to the people.

He was confident that the villagers would sense the depth and gentleness of Christmas in the realization that Christ had come into their midst as a Child whom they could know and love.

Francis arranged his manger at the entrance of a cave on a hill just above the town. In it he laid a carved wood figure of the baby, Jesus, in a manger with real straw.

Francis chose real persons from the village to represent Mary, Joseph, and the shepherds. He also brought an ox, an ass, and some sheep to the interior of the cave.

The small creche or praesepio may have had its beginnings in this small Italian village. Perhaps among the worshippers that first night in Greccio there was a woodcarver who went home and carved smaller representations of the manger so his family could keep it for themselves.

Creche and Santons

The idea of the creche spread from Italy north to Germany, and then across to France into Spain.

For nearly ten centuries the people of France had been accustomed to seeing in churches Pastorales which were liturgical dramas—the miracle plays of France—and like those of Italy became too worldly. The creche, therefore, developed here later than in Italy.

The story is told in the south of France that about 200 years ago an Italian street vendor stood on a busy corner in Marseilles offering little terra cotta figurines for sale of Mary, Joseph, the shepherds, and the Child.

Those who saw them were delighted and immediately bought them. Soon the surrounding villagers were fashioning their own figurines from their native red clay. They called them santons (little saints).

The art of santon making became popular with families. Children gathered moss and stones so as to arrange figures against a natural setting. The family gathered around the santons on a shelf in the living room and sang carols and listened to the father read the Christmas story.

The santons of Provence are a true folk art. They began very simply with the manger scene, including shepherds resembling the men who tended the flocks in the Provence hills.

The Provencals brought many charming innovations to the nativity setting. The nights were cold in Provence and therefore a fire was needed to warm Mary and the Child. Who else but the fagot-gatherer in the village, an old woman, should carry the bundles to the manger? Her name was Misere.

Soon other townspeople joined the gift-bearers to the Child—eggs, milk, vegetables, and garden produce, the mayor, the police, all the well-known townspeople were moulded in the brightly painted clay as visitors to the manger.

Krippe - Oberammagau

In Germany the Krippe is the German creche. As in Italy and France, the figures were first set up in churches. However, the mountain people of Bavaria have always been excellent woodcarvers and placed their carved small figures of the holy family under the Christmas tree.

By far the greatest number of small German cribs for homes are made in and near Oberammergau. The woodcarvers of this Alpine village, which has long been known for its Passion Play, are especially adept at carving the little nativity figures, most of which have a special character in their simplicity and peasant-like quality.

In the workships of Oberammergau, young boys can become master craftsmen in a few years. As individual imagination as well as skill is encouraged, no two figures are alike making the figurines the most sought after. Oberammergau figurines have found their way into Christian homes all over the world.

From the Bavarian Alps, from St. Francis' first creche in Italy, from Southern France's Petits Santons, from Spain and Portugal, the treasured figures have come to make up family creches in countless American homes.

Internationally Speaking:

Christmas Travels in Tradition

England

The open hearth is the very soul of the English countryside home, for the Christmas fire is the center of the season —living symbol of warm emotions and good thoughts.

The English family, dressed in holiday attire, follow the father of the family into the house as he leads the way pulling the newly cut log for the fireplace with the rest of the family bringing garlands of fresh greens to decorate the room.

The room is circled three times before the log is placed in the fireplace and lighted with a piece of last year's log. As the new log takes torch and glows, everyone in the room is conscious of its symbolism—an emblem of the light that came to earth at Christ's birth.

Norway

In the land of the fjords and frozen lakes, snowclad mountains and pine-fragrant woods, bells from a thousand towers ring out the good news that Christmas Eve has come.

Families gather around the Christmas tree after a bountiful meal; they light candles as the father of the family reads passages from St. Matthew's record of the first Christmas.

The family follows the reading with the beloved song I Am So Glad Each Christmas Eve composed by a peasant woman as she sat in her kitchen one Christmas Eve over a hundred years ago.

In the earlier part of the day, father and the children have tied the best sheaves of grain to poles near the house for the birds; the cattle are given extra fodder, and Julenissen, the imaginary creature who is part of the family, was given a heaping bowl of rice and milk.

Germany

Oh Tannenbaum! The everlasting wonder of the Christmas tree with its stars, candles, silver nuts, and shining baubles, is all part of a sepcial ritual on Chrjstmas Eve as the family gathers round the tree after a festive dinner.

Earlier in the week, the father and the children have selected their tree; mother trims it while the children sleep, and on Christmas Eve everyone is delighted with the wondrous enchantment of their first sight of the beautiful tree.

Candles shine from every window of the house to light the Kristkind on her way from home to home, as German children believe that she is the messenger of the Infant Jesus, and brings them gifts.

At midnight churchbells ring, and the people of the villages go down to the valley to the Christmas service.

Switzerland

In the quiet valleys of the Swiss hamlets families gather around the creche and listen to the story of the first Christmas as they admire the beautiful carved figures of Mary, Joseph and the Christ Child which the father of the family has spent many hours carving in loving labor.

Mother has been baking all kinds of delicious cookies, and the children have been busy preparing something for Christkindli, in return for the gifts he brings them from the angels.

Sweden

In Sweden Christmas lasts a month! Although the families prepare for the festive holiday as early as December 1, the celebration of St. Lucia's Day, December 13, ushers in the Christmas season.

One of the ladies of the house is chosen to be St. Lucia, and at the first cockcrowing, goes from room to room in her home singing the carols of her land and serving coffee and cakes to everone.

On Christmas Eve at five o'clock, all work ceases and church bells ring throughout the land. Families gather for Christmas dinner with roast goose as the piecé de resistance. Services on Christmas morn are as early as five o'clock; the churches are lighted with candles everywhere, symbolizing the birth of the Father of Light.

Christmas Day is traditionally a quiet day in Sweden. The social life of the community begins with the Second Christmas Day and lasts until St. Knut's Day, January 13.

Denmark

Chruch bells peal out on Christmas Eve in Denmark, and the family goes to the candlelight service. The church services are followed with a festive Christmas dinner at home. Guests and children are not allowed to see the tree until dinner is over. Then the father lights the candles and opens the doors, and there is the wondrous tree.

Among its branches are little paper nisser—handmade woven baskets, small dainty mobiles, flags, gay peacocks, apples, nuts—and kraemmerhus (colored cone-shaped baskets filled with Christmas treats).

Everyone joins hands and circles the tree, singing Nu har vi Jul igen (Now We Have Christmas Again).

Other countries have similar customs, and yet others, have great variations of them. Space does not allow for listing all of them, but they are equally interesting in their presentation.

DRINK UP — and be Merry Ole Girl!

Celebrate Xmas With Charles!

"Fezziwigg's Warehouse", next to the San Francisco Produce Market, has been transformed into winding streets and a grand concourse complete with shops and stalls, resplendent throughout with authentic theatres, a music hall, alehouse and sundry stages.

This is all part of an engaging recreation of a London Street fair and market place during the times of Charles Dickens, The Great Dickens Christmas Fair Pickwick Comic Annual. The fair will be open December 23 from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., Saturdays, and from 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. Sundays.

The parade of entertainment is continous just as it was at such London Marketplaces during the Christmas holidays a century ago. Fairgoers can enjoy a Christmas mummers play, living waxworks and shadow plays.

Lectures are offered on the wonders and mystery of science, or on the disclosure of such rare recipes as lambs wool for the Wassail Bowl of Christmas.

The lectures are a combination of talent and history, for they re-create similar public lectures about the new wonders of Dickensian times, offering both whimsy and insights into the Victorian era.

Amid a setting of winding London Streets and alleys lined with ships, stalls, stages, and pubs, some one hundred craftsmen form a unique Christmas gift bazaar, selling handmade holiday gifts and decorations. Traditional Old English Yuletide foods and beverages can also be found. Topping off this Holiday spectacle is a colorful Christmas pageant with Yuletide characters.

The Dickens Fair may be reached from San Francisco or the Peninsula by taking the Bayshore Freeway exit at the Army Street off ramp, and follow the signs to Fesswigg's next to the Produce Market corner of Jerrold and Rankin Streets. Parking is free.

By bus take a metro shuttle express to the Fair leaving every half hour from Union Square.

Student tickets may be obtained at the Student Activities Office, Student Union Building, through Frank Thatcher, Student body President.

Nureyen Performs on KQED

A Christmas Holiday Special starring Rudolph Nureyev in "The Sleeping Beauty" will be presented on KQED, Channel 9, on Sunday night, December 17.

The widely acclaimed Canadian production had its premiere in Ottawa, Canada, in September and its American premiere later that month in Philadelphia. It will not be performed publicly again in the United States until the Christmas season television broadcast; it will then tour major American cities on a limited engagement basis in 1973.

The distinguished Greek designer and painter, Nicholas Georgiadis, who has worked with major European dance companies, designed both the scenery and the costumes for this ballet.

According to impresario S. Hurok, the 90-minute special is the most spectacular production of a ballet ever staged in North America.

Chanukah Rededicates Temple

Chanukah, the feast of lights, was celebrated by Jews throughout the world last week. Usually Chanukah falls at the same time as Christmas, but this year because of the lunar calendar, Chanukah was early. The holiday commemorates the rededication of the temple in Jerusalem which was profaned in earlier times.

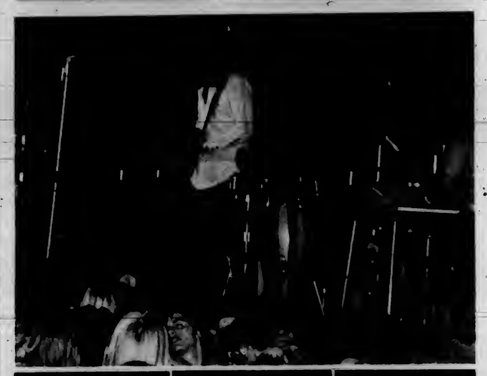
Messengers of King Antiochus of Syria in 162BC placed an idol on the altar of the temple in Jerusalem, and burned incense. The messengers also ordered the inhabitants of Jerusalem to forsake their God and worship the idol.

Mattathis and his sons were one family who resisted the intrusion to their way of worshiping. After Mattathis died, his sons, led by Judah Maccabee, continued to resist and found other Jews who supported their ideas.

The odds were against Judah, but with his small band of followers defeated the larger army of Antiochus.

Three years later, the idol was removed from the temple altar and the temple, the temple was rededicated and the Jews celebrated their victory.

According to legend, when the temple was profaned all the oil used to light it was also polluted, but some oil had been hidden away. The oil was to last for a short time, but it lasted for eight days and nights; this is wh Chanukah is celebrated eight days and nights.



In remembrance of the rededication of the temple and the celebration which followed, Jews throughout the world exchange gifts on Chanukah.

"Live" Music:

Alvin Lee and the Screaming Horde

There's always a crowd in Winterland but it seems that Ten Years After's appearance drew the usual crowd and another. With balloons flying, spirits rising and Bill Graham introducing England's long-united pride the ballroom began to look like Mardi Gras day.

Some young women were fortunate enough to have a strong set of shoulders to see the show on and they needed to for all the tall people in the world suddenly stood in front. It didn't matter really, all one had to do was remain where he was because it was impossible to inch any closer to the stage when Ten Years After was on.

Although the two previous bands, ZZ Top and Wild Turkey, drew appreciable response it was nothing like that which the audience gave the headlining group.

Perhaps it's good an unusually large crowd turned out because they all got to see a drastic change in Ten Years After's style: guitarist Alvin Lee is playing with the band instead of the band playing with him.

Now Ten Years After doesn't try anything out of its reach nor did they try to make instant music history out of an ordinary set. The group has learned what it can and can't do and that's attributable to the fact that the same four men have gone through changes with each other and come out smelling like a rose.

Rather than seeking just another rock and roll sound Ten Years After is more sophisticated than that, they always have a few good selections on each of their albums that people vow they'll never forget. And where a lot of groups don't stay around too long because they play too much of one thing that's selling to too few people, Ten Years After won't be caught short, either. Like Chicago, they realize that a blending of the two major music forms will be more likely to attract attention.

After boogeying the audience out for two straight hours Ten Years After got a well-deserved standing ovation. And for a deserving tired hot screaming audience the sporting Englishmen returned to the stage for 3 encores starting with Sweet 16. They followed with "a new one" they didn't announce and closed with Baby Let Me Rock and Roll You.

How that standing room only crowd kept theirselves off the painted aisleways could qualify for eighth wonder of the world. But when the Winterland police, who are getting meaner and meaner every concert, stopped pushing and hassling the crowd in the concert's last 15 minutes it was still packed to the seams.

Merry Christmas rock fans!

Radio:

KSAN to Celebrate Birth of Rock

"Perhaps the most hopeful thing about rock and roll is that it's so bad it cannot endure indefinitely," Recording company executive to 1956 Music Educators National Conference.

"It is only logical to assume that it rolled out from under a rock," Classicist" quoted in the Miami Herald 1956.

A tribute to the man who invented the term "rock and roll" and introduced "the big beat" to mass America will be presented by radio station KSAN on Monday, December 18, 6 a.m. to midnight.

Titled "Happy Birthday Alan Freed," the December 18 special will recreate the sound of radio in the fifties. Jingles, bells and chimes, oldtime radio contests, listener phoned-in newstips and interviews with stars of the fifties and sixties will attempt to tell it like it was. Music will consist exclusively of "oldies but goodies."

A 1951 Mercury complete with spinners, duals and furry dice and 18 12-volume sets of original oldies will be among the prizes to be awarded through such radio contests as "Jock in the Box," "Name It and Claim It" and "D.J. Derby."

Going back to the early, early days when there was an R&B station called KSAN, blues musicologist Dusty Street will do a special "old KSAN" show, drawing on her great love and knowledge of the music of that era.

Alan Freed, always a controversial figure, was the first major Northern disc jockey to air what were then known as "race records" (Muddy Waters, Guitar Slim, Little Walter, Joe Turner, The Midnighters, etc.).

When white rock and roll emerged on its heels, he named it and presented it nightly from WJW, Cleveland. Freed invented requests and dedications, TV dance parties, all kinds of outlandish radio contests and, at the peak of his career, while broadcasting from WINS, New York, received over 10,000 letters and requests a week. He was syndicated to 40 radio stations across the country and reigned supreme as "The King of Rock and Roll." Freed died in 1965 at age 43 but his music and his broadcast style live on.

CCSF Theater:

"Powerful" Japanese Legend To Be Staged

A new conceptual theatre style is brought to life at City College of San Francisco in its lively storybook presentation of Fay and Michael Kanin's Rashomon. This powerful tale emerges out of a Japanese legend essentially an inquiry into the nature of truth.

The play's three principal characters are involved in a murder and a rape; each character recites his own version of the event through a myriad of staging techniques involving mime and synthesized voice.

The audience must decide the relative truth of each one's testimony—if truth there be at all. The performance by the actors is almost ritualistic with attitudes and gestures derived from ancient Kabuki and Noh drama.

An original music composition by Jerry Mueller weaves a multitude of sound effects within the play. His skillful use of the Putney synthesiser, prepared piano, concert gong, flute, and various percussion instruments, enhances the oriental flavor and accentuates the emotional tone.

Under the exciting direction of Jim Orin, Rashomon will be presented to the public on January 12, 13, and 20, 8 p.m., in the Little Theatre of City College. Student discounts are available. Call Ext. 100 or 132.

New "Black" Film:

Honest Perspectives Lacking Smells, Guts

The new genus of low-budget movies are the black exploitation films—exploitation films have a veneer of authenticity over shabby stories—like Superfly. Black culture is not honestly reflected in these films that follow the same reality-distorting formulas Hollywood has made so infamous.

Sounder is a new "black" film which is set in some honest historical perspectives and for this it deserves some attention. A sharecropper family ekes out an impoverished existence in Louisiana during the Depression; the "times is hard" and the father is sent to prison for stealing food.

The story is very moving at times—I noticed that some of the audience was emotionally touched by a few scenes. Overall the movie was too contrived, however, the actors too "city-fied", the clothes and sheets too clean. I felt there was a conscious effort to make this film respectable, full of hygiene and high principles, but lacking smells, and guts. Those who have seen a real black film, like Nothing But A Man, would know what I mean—Sounder just doesn't have the emotional feel of reality despite its story.

Perhaps the fault lies with the people who were responsible for the film—both the director and producer were white (or more accurately, not black)—and therefore too sensitive to criticism and too insensitive to the truth. By the way, Mattel Co., the toymakers, backed the film financially.

Taj Mahal wrote and performed the excellent score and acted in Sounder as well. A rare and sincere man, Taj believes in this film which is enough to make me like it. But let us hope this is still the beginning, cause "times is hard" for black films.

Since this film is a regular feature of the Guardsman column I thought I'd mention something about going to the movies.

Movies are expensive, $2.50 to $3, but sometimes half priced if you go in the afternoon. If there's a movie you want to see call the theatre first to check.

The Times in North Beach is still 99 cents and it shows 2 films daily. The Clay charges $1.50 and often has excellent programs.

A few theatres offer cheap midnite shows on weekends. The Surf Theatre offers a reduced rate of $6 for four tickets.

"SOUNDER"—Paul Winfield as Nathan Lee Morgan, a black sharecropper who struggles to support his family in the Deep South during the Depression.

If you're interested in the avant-garde of films Canyon Cinemathèque has a showing in the S.F. Art Institute every Thursday night for $1.50.

Video Free America at 442 Shotwell has two shows: All The Video You Can Eat, Friday night and the story Carol and Fred, a documentary about a homosexual junkie couple on Saturday night.

The theatre is a converted warehouse. There are pillows and mattresses on the floor, overstuffed chairs, tall plants, brownies, coffee and 11 TV screens to blow your mind.

Von Freeman Finally Makes It — On Records

VON FREEMAN "Doin It Right Now"

"Doin It Right Now"
by Von Freeman
Atlantic SD1628

There are a lot of good musicians who have had a hard time breaking through in search of recognition and fame. For some it has been easier, for some it has been harder, and for a lot they remain undiscovered on the farm, or playing for nickels and dimes and wine money.

After 20 years of paying his overdues Von Freeman, Chicago tenor saxaphonist has broken through for attention from a national audience. His first album, Doin' It Right Now, is a specially good one because Freeman isn't a new musician.

"Great musical ability is found in Freeman . . . during the 40s and 50s were the Golden Years for the saxaphonist in Shytown, and Von Freeman was in the thick of things," attested Ahmad Jamal.

All Freeman needed was the break to record since he's already a fully developed musician who can rival Stitt, Ammons, Shepp or Kirk. Roland Kirk is more responsible for his record than anyone else, incidentally.

On Doin' It Right Now Freeman's many years of experience show, his range extends from Ellingtonish to the modern blendings of jazzyrock or rockyjazz, the kind you need at a party when everyone wants to hear something different.

Expect his next album to be better although this one is worth the money. Basically Doin' It Right Now was used to showcase his talent as a new face. In the future, and Freeman has a bright one, look for a lot of originality to come from him as he writes a lot of his own material. It sounds even better with blinking Christmas tree lights to top it off. Merry Christmas to all!

Herbie Mann — Evolving Toward Wider Audience

"Evolution of Mann"
by Herbie Mann
Atlantic SD-2-300

Actually this album is a collection of Herbie's recordings from as early as 1962. This is a cute way for Atlantic to say "The Best Of Herbie Mann." The music is good. Mann explored the latin thing while Santana was probably still in junior high school. Although the latin theme is prevalent in most of the recordings, Mann displays the talent that won the Downbeat Readers' Poll for so many consecutive years. The album is interesting in the sense that it shows the various dimensions of the artist at his craft. Mann does Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies" (Tois) and old standards like "Georgia On My Mind," "Drown In My Own Tears", and "Motherless Child." Through these he swings effortlessly, but the style that got Herbie the notoriety that he today enjoys can be heard on things like "Why Don't You Do Right," "Scratch" and the very rhythmic "Potato."

Evolution Of Mann would make an interesting addition to a record collection because the music, although at times a bit tedious, is never really boring. As far as Herbie Mann being a stellar musician, the indication of his greatness lies not in the intricate composition of the music, but rather the simplicity which opens his efforts up to a wider audience.

Nostalgia Trip with The Divine Miss M.

"The Divine Miss M"
by Bette Midler
Atlantic Records

A new record has been released which should be watched closely. The L.P. is Bette Midler—The Divine Miss M. The record is probably one of the most provocative encountered in a long time.

Bette Midler looks like a musical star from the early forties. What's more, she sings like one. The song Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy reminds one of Judy Garland's musicals and is a lot of fun to listen to.

Nostalgia is the key word these days. People are wearing original clothing of the forties and earlier, and now music is moving back, too.

"Miss M" also does an excellent performance of Chapel of Love—a song from the very early sixties. Listen to the record. If you're the type of person who digs the nostalgia trip—you'll love Bette Mitler—she's "fave"!

MOVIES:

"Young Winston": Schoolboy to Statesman

Young Winston is the film portrayal of Winston Churchill's early life. It is the saga of a great man who made it although it seemed as if everyone was against him.

Winston was a boy who had prominent parents who didn't have time for him, sent him away to school and never visited him.

Young Winston recently opened at the Ghiradelli Cinema.

The film opens with Churchill as an army correspondent covering the embattlements in India. Almost immediately, there is a flash back to his early childhood days as he is taken to school by his mother.

The film from here on is composed of different scenes depicting the many aspects of the life of Churchill and of his parents.

Winston's first major speech in Parliament follows.

Simon Ward, playing the lead role to perfection, studied Churchill's voice pattern for some time. He narrates the film in the three voices of Churchill: the teenager, the man in his twenties, and the elderly Churchill.

Ann Bancroft's performance as Winston's mother, Lady Randolph Churchill, is interesting if not inspiring. There are two major scenes: her interview, and the news of her husband's infection from syphilis.

Credit for an excellent performance goes to Robert Shaw's portrayal of Sir Randolph Churchill, Winston's father.

Shaw is convincing in showing Sir Randolph's bewilderment at his son's slow learning mentality, as well as the pain of Winston's failures.

A prime example of this is the scene in which Winston expresses his joy at passing his entrance exam for the army after two previous failures.

Sir Randolph roars, "You are my greatest disappointment. Sorry, Winston. How many times have I heard that word from you after you'd fail after every possible advantage? . . ."

Of course the film does have its flaws . . . plenty of them. It takes two scenes before the average viewer realizes that the film has moved into a flashback.

With more time, the film could have been improved. There is a bit of wasted footage but overall the film holds the viewer's interest.

Television:

Man's Nightmare Future

The melodramatic voice of Orson Welles comes over the soundtrack! Future Shock is the impact of everyday situations moving in at so fast a rate that man cannot adapt to his environment.

CCSF students reviewed a new film, Future Shock, to be televised in mid-December.

Narrated by Orson Welles, it is a nightmare documentary that chills the audience with its impact.

The film covers every aspect of man's present existence ranging from temporary housing to alternative marriages, from liberation movements to artificial humanoids.

Man's inability to rely upon anything is the basic point of the film. Relationships are unstable due to incompatibility; one will cease to recognize friends due to cosmetic surgery; children will be conceived in men's minds and conceived from test tubes.

With the overcrowding of the populace, violence will take place. In the scenes of overt violence, the music intensifies the activity in a way that revolts the audience.

In a simulated sequence, an argument between the husband and wife in a befallen marriage gets the audience roaring at the campiness of the situation.

Seeing the film motivated the reviewer to read the book. The book covers the same "stomping ground", but goes into more depth and is more thought-provoking.

Nonetheless, the film is worth viewing when it comes to television.

Welles' ever-present debonair voice intrigues the audience and intensifies the film's impact.

Oscar Brown's "Songs in Search of a Play"

"Movin' On"
by Oscar Brown Jr.
Atlantic SD-1629

Oscar Brown has been known more for his efforts as a stage performer and personality rather than a pop singer. Brown, noted for his authorship of Joy '69 and '70 and for his writing lyrics and music for Big Time Buck White, attempts to record songs about Black life; to my mind he does a fairly decent job. Oscar may not have the most prolific voice among the ranks but the truth (after all ain't that the most important thing?) of the lyrics comes through.

All of the songs on the album were written by Brown and his choice of musicians was appropriate (David Newman, Thad Jones, and Cornell Dupree—to name a few). The music for the most part is "neo-bop-soul-pop-rock" with a smattering of jazz (something for everyone!). The most effective area of the album is, however, the lyrics. Brown's songs depict abject poverty via "A Dime Away From A Hotdog" and "No Place To Be Somebody," expressions of togetherness in "Gang Bang," "The Cold Blooded Sister," "Walk Away" and the "super-bad" brother, "Ladies Man." In spite of all the superficial happenings, there is still time to love "First Lady" and "To Stay In Good With You" which shows a well-rounded perspective.

OSCAR BROWN – "Movin On"

Although this album will probably not sell very many copies, these songs are presented with intelligence and feeling, there is definitely some merit to the attempts of Mr. Brown to say something. I do feel though, that these are really songs in search of a play.

Inconsistent Warriors Stay Alive Despite Many Letdowns

HUNG UP — Between a high preseason polling and having what many consider to be a potential championship team, the list of Warrior critics grows on.

The time is now, but the Golden State Warriors will never see it, at least not now. For the first time in five years, the erratic Warriors have the opportunity to become the National Basketball Association rulers.

Though rocketing off to their best season since their conception, they have showed poise that has made many a die-hard Warrior fan glow with holiday cheer. But they have fallen into the gutter of inconsistency, even with the likes of long-sought super-hero, Rick Barry.

Despite glittering efforts against stronger teams as the Los Angeles Lakers and New York Knickerbockers, they have failed against teams less generously endowed with championship potential. Last week's game against third place Phoenix Suns couldn't have been a better example of the uneven play of the Golden Staters thus far.

For the Warriors, this should be the year of reckoning, following three years of "so-so" plays. During those years without Barry, the Warriors sported mediocre players in hope that the young blood would mature. But the reigns of a championship could never be realized because of inconsistency and inexperience.

To the disgust of wait till next year Warrior basketball fans, players such as Bob Portman, Bud Ogden, and others always choked when their services were so vitally needed. In their own right, all three were good players in their collegiate days, but that was really as far as their skills matured. It wasn't enough for the pros.

Then an answer came from nowhere in the repossession of a nomadic Rick Barry, who finally admitted there would be no need for Bekins Movers anymore.

To top this bag of fortune, the Warriors acquired rights to aging but still titillating Abdul-Rahman, formerly Walt Hazzard.

The scene was set; their quest for the crown would no longer be of dubious nature. They would foray the N.B.A. and take what was destined to be theirs —the championship.

But instead once again they found themselves playing second-fiddle to arch-rival L.A. Lakers.

For Coach Al Attles, it has thus far been more than a mild disappointment. Conceived was his dream team, with ace-in-the-sleeve Rick Barry heading the list. But they haven't come to par.

Rick Barry hasn't proven anything except that he is only half the whiz-player he was in the Western Divisional championship of the '66-67 season. Maybe he lost some of his "sparkle" in the A.B.A.

But whatever his hang-up is, it has more than affected the Warriors. Once known for his offensive punch, it boggles the mind how he ever achieved such honor. From his off-balanced shots derived from unorthodox drives and forced-up jump shots, he portrays a man who is trying to keep alive the splendor of a legend.

But the worst short-coming is his lack of good defense. Often times not being swift enough despite his 6'7", he has found himself on the short end in his battle with opposing forwards. Treatments by Bob Love of the Chicago Bulls and more recently, Connie Hawkins who compiled 31 points against him are small reminders that he has become a burden for a defensive-oriented club.

But Rick Barry is not the only problem afflicting the Warriors which can't be corrected.

For some time, the Warrior hub has been trying to find a guard that will complement the sure-handed play of Jeff Mullins.

And they have been relegated to the likes of Fritz Williams and the rough-and-tumble Dick Barnett, whose only excuse for ball-handling is that his college coach told him so. Without saying they are bad components of a team which strives on plays that springs offensive opportunities.

But then there is Abdul-Rahman who has found a reluctant home on the bench, just waiting for the Warriors to utilize him. He is not without resources as he is a superb ball-handler, the swash-buckler that can promote a better game tempo.

But he just sits. That is the way of the Warriors.

Fun! Intramural Sports Night Tonight

Student Activity Aide Chris Davis

As far as athletic prowess goes, some people have it and some don't. But if you're in the neighborhood of digging "non-competitive" intramurals, you might look into Sports Night, December 14.

Spear-headed by Chris Davis, Student Activity Aide, it more than likely promises to be CCSF's athletic social event of the year.

Unlike the much heralded "jocks", many times the typical student isn't able to feel the jubilation of galloping for yardage against an opposing college or star in a junior college track meet. And that is why there is a Sports Night, and Chris Davis.

Sports Night, allows regular people, maybe not superbly endowed with agility, to compete and to have fun. "The purpose of the event is for students to compete on a non-competitive basis, where they can enjoy sports and even receive awards," confirmed Davis.

Though originally designed for boxing enthusiasts, because of Davis' efforts, it has expanded into other aspects of sports. It includes African dancing, volleyball, basketball and even special attractions. This year a visit from Mission High's drill team is included.

Surprisingly, attendance is expected to parallel last year's attendance of a thousand participants.

Davis, when not involved with student activities, has been an assistant coach in this unfortunate football season.

A football enthusiast himself, he was an All-Conference guard at CCSF and later did a rebound at S.F. State.

Though not particularly big, he was noted for his "animalism."

Tickets go on sale for 75 cents at the Student Union Building.

Activities start at 4 p.m. and end at 11 p.m.

buy their food in large quantities it's cheaper. Sometimes we go straight to the farmer and cut the middle-man out completely," said Gallagher.

The Traveling Medicine Show is a University of California project headed by Ruth Fleshman, Mental Health and Community Nurse. It provides medical information for people who live in communes and those who are into being their own doctors, (communes because Nurse Freshman has done community nursing as a volunteer in Haight-Ashbury and saw the need for such information.)

The foodstamps booth was telling the usual tale of how you can stop being hungry forever. But more interesting was a baffling section of their flier that read: "Household is the group of people you live with and share living expenses. If you live alone and prepare and eat your food at home YOU are a household. The head of the household is the member who assumes primary responsibility." Does that say one can be two or not?

Overall the turnout was good and all the hard work didn't go for naught. Throughout the day the exhibits were crowded and it was even nicer toward the close as the crowd died down. It was a lot more convenient to stand and dine on grilled cheese and pepperoni than to have to wait in line between hunger pangs and hundreds of other hungry people.

Are San Franciscans Biggest Boozers?

San Francisco's reputation as the "hardest drinking" city in the country was challenged recently by Robin Room of the U C Berkeley School of Public Health.

Room's findings are part of a continuing study conducted by the Public Health School. The results are based on a sample of 1,278 San Franciscans along with 2,746 other Americans. It was shown that a lot of the drinking is done by tourists in San Francisco. Bar owners say that they would have to close down without the tourist trade.

Another reason for San Francisco's reputation is that cases of cirhosis of the liver run high here. This is due in part to the efficiency of the Coroner's Office in San Francisco which conducts autopsies in 98 percent of deaths. What all this means is that you can't take statistics at face value.

Part of the study was concerned with a sex difference among drinkers. On a national scale five percent of women drink five or more drinks per week, while in San Francisco eight percent of the women have five or more drinks per week. The percentage of heavy men drinkers is 22 percent in San Francisco compared with 25 percent in other cities.

Women's Liberation may change the situation. Drinking is related in some ways to status in society. This means that "with the changes of women in society, we can expect a higher proportion of women drinking heavily," states Room.

uniform," he says, "and that part of the uniform nature of any proposal should be the mandated inclusion of a uniform student evaluation."

Department Head of Health Education, Ray Burkhead, expresses a more favorable view toward the DHM plan.

"The faculty will get more of an opportunity to express itself," Burkhead said, ". . . We want student involvement, but we also want more involvement by the faculty."

Faculty sentiment might mean a great deal to Marcus and his colleagues when they present their proposal to the Board of Governors.

"If they (the Board) change our proposal radically, it would have to be sent back," Marcus said, ". . . They're going to want faculty approval."

RUNNER-UP — William Goode III (GTCC)

"WRITE-IN" — Karla La Vey (Ind.)

As a member of La Raza Unida, Gulvan campaigned with the endorsement of the Black Student Union, CCSF Vets, and two other organizations.

This and the other issues (i.e., bookstore prices, financial aids, transportation) won't be totally settled by last week's election anyway. Next semester's student government will still be obliged to solicit cooperation from the administration on such matters.

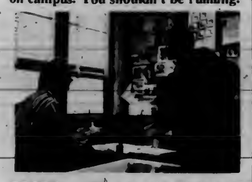
"THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE"

THE GUARDSMAN



VOL. 76 NO. 11 CITY COLLEGE OF SAN FRANCISCO JANUARY 19, 1973

GOODE — "I didn't even know we had a Day Care Center."

NUTTING "You're running for president and you don't even know what's on campus. You shouldn't be running!

GOODE — "There's a lot of changes that need to be done but I don't want to get into specifics."

Candidates Play Politics With Sports Dept.'s Funds

Despite many philosophical similarities, the four presidential candidates in last week's A.S. election offered student voters at least one issue they could divide ranks under, namely, funding of CCSF athletic programs.

William Goode III, a former player on the Ram football team who headed the campaign for the Good Thing for City College Party, received the most criticism by another candidate when he engaged in a debate last week in the Guardsman office with opponent Spencer Nutting, president of the Free Gay Students Assn. on campus.

His relationship with the Athletic Department notwithstanding, Goode pledged, "I would concern myself with all the students, although that's going to be hard."

This led Nutting to challenge Goode's familiarity with most of the students' needs, asking him to appraise several non-athletic activities, one of which was the Children's Day Care Center.

But Goode honestly admitted, "I didn't even know we had a Day Care Center." This prompted Nutting to deliver a condemnation, "You're running for president and you don't even know what's on campus. You shouldn't be running!"

"I'm aware that I'm not aware," Goode replied, "The things I don't know, I'm going to find out."

Pressed by Nutting for more pertinent answers, Goode stated, "There's a lot of changes that need to be done, but I don't want to get into specifics."

The day after the discussion, the Good Thing for City College party issued copies of a platform that included, among other specifics, support for "expansion of the Children's Day Care Center."

However, during their debate, Nutting was most concerned with the allegation that Goode's party was in the election primarily to prevent a loss of allocations for the sports programs.

Although he refuted that claim, Goode defended the right of te Athletic Department to receive student funds. "The teams help build the name of the school," he argued.

The only other sympathy for the athlete's cause was expressed by write-in candidate Karla La Vey.

"Even though I'm not interested in games," she remarked, "there are lots of people who are, and I think they should have an opportunity to enjoy what they like."

The sports issue was neatly balanced by the Progressive Student Alliance candidate for president, Juan Galvan.

He announced that his funding priorities would be directed toward "activities that in the long run will benefit the students as far as their education is concerned."

Ex-President's Claims Refuted

A pre-election Fact Finding Committee member for the Student Review Board sparked a special hearing when he gave the reasons for his impending resignation recently.

Guardsman News Editor Nate Justice first became disillusioned with the Fact Finding Committee when Student Body President Frank Thatcher, claimed his eligibility for this election had been okayed by the Student Review Board during a taped interview.

The pre-election committee's purpose was to collect information abo it the candidates, and to make recommendations on the legality of their qualifications for office.

Following these recommendations, the Student Review Board was supposed to make its decision of letting or not letting the candidate run for office.

But Thatcher's claims gave Justice reason to believe that the Student Review Board was operating on its own without the Fact Finding Committee's approval.

Since it seemed that the Board had already made its decision, Justice felt that making a recommendation during the Fact Finding Committee's meeting (which hadn't occurred yet) was useless.

Later Justice explained his frustra-

Professor Emeritus

Dr. Booher Views Retirement

In Room S236, second floor, Science Hall you will find Dr. John E. Booher, Chemistry Professor; a charming, affable, lean and energetic, but very "retiring" gentleman. As you are reading this, Dr. Booher is about to retire from City College to take up new life of leisure and varied interests.

Since his first year of teaching at City College over 36 years ago, Booher has seen many changes take place at CCSF as the college has expanded its facilities. He helped launch the science program in the first building on campus —Science Hall.

As to his future plans, Booher has a number of ideas which he hopes to implement as the months go by. The first will be a trip of a few months duration to France and Italy.

As a principal feature of his trip, he hopes to explore the beauty and excitement of cities such as Florence and Paris. At some other propitious time, Booher plans to visit Japan with special emphasis on Kyoto.

Booher's travels in the past have included several trips to Hawaii as well as the South Pacific.

A long-time hobby of raising bonsai plants in his outdoor Japanese garden will occupy many of Booher's leisure hours.

Of very special interest in Booher's life is his son's family in Los Banos, which consists of four grandchildren.

One of Booher's hobbies is duck hunting. He looks forward to pursuing this pastime with his 14-year-old grandson, the proud owner of a flock of sheep.

UC, Berkeley, is Booher's alma mater. After a year of college, he decided to take one semester off and go out to sea. Returning from his sea-going sabbatical, he resumed his education at Berkeley where he received his degrees culminating in a Ph.D.

He taught for six years at USF, then joined the faculty at CCSF.

At the time, classes were held all over the City prior to the establishment of the present campus on Phelan Avenue.

Booher has taught thousands of students over the years. He continually encounters his former students "who," he states, "are not necessarily engaged in the field of chemistry. "In fact," Booher says, "most of them have gone into businesses not even remotely associated with the subject I teach. They are happier doing what they are than they would be pursuing a subject in which they have a limited interest."

According to Mrs. Shirley Kelly, Instructor in Chemistry, she will best remember Booher as "always being able to look at the other side of the coin."

"For example," she reminisces, "a well-known quote of Dr. Booher from the proverb Things worth doing are worth doing well he reverses to Things not worth doing at all are not worth doing well."

Another colleague, Mrs. Valerie Meehan, remembers one of Dr. Booher's special quips, 'If you're working too hard, the students are not working hard enough."

The Guardsman Staff and all Dr. Booher's CCSF students wish him well. His returning to the campus as a professor emeritus to speak on his experiences and travels should be of great interest to all at CCSF. Aloha!

SUCCESSFUL DAY - Dean Willis Kirk and Mr. Parkie Low of Hewlett-Packard Corporation discuss a successful recruitment day.

Future Engineers Interviewed

Earlier this month, graduating engineering students and industry representatives completed a successful recruitment day at CCSF.

Under the leadership of Dean Willis Kirk, who now heads the Personnel Placement Services, and Mr. James Schon, Chairman of the Engineering Department, the CCSF Placement Office planned the day.

"The Placement Office staff worked like beavers to prepare for this day," said Dean Kirk. Over one month's planning resulted in a successful recruitment day for both students and employers.

Students indicated their preference for specific companies and then were scheduled for twenty-minute interviews with the firms of their choice.

Over 26 representatives of Bay Area engineering firms were on hand for the day. "They came out here to hire," emphasized Dean Kirk.

A single recruitment day for business and industry was the policy before this semester, but now engineering will have a day twice a year for May and January graduates and a business recruitment day may be held in the Spring semester.

From talks with the company representatives after the interviews, and from letters received the following week, the general consensus was that the CCSF engineering graduates were well prepared for their interviews and presented themselves "quite well."

"This is the first Recruitment Day for January engineering graduates only. It is hoped that it will continue to be successful for both the students seeking employment and the engineering firms seeking qualified personnel," said Dean Kirk.

No Further College Growth Recommended

A report to a legislative committee released today has called for a halt in growth of California's two systems of four-year public higher education and recommended creation of a new college run by nonacademic professionals.

Warren Bryan Martin, provost of the Old School and professor of history at California State College, Sonoma, told the Joint Legislative Committee on the Master Plan for Higher Education that "it is clearly unwise for the University of California and the California State University and Colleges to proceed with any extensive expansion of their campus facilities and regular faculties."

Martin said fewer youths in the decade ahead will be interested in conventional programs on established campuses. He predicted that implementation of the report's recommendations would result in "education for a new clientele — older people, younger people, all of whom heretofore have been underrepresented in conventional institutions of higher education."

In making the no-growth recommendation, the report — entitled "Alternative Forms of Higher Education for California" — noted the potential of nontraditional ways of teaching and learning, the availability of computerized home instruction consoles, and a projected decline in student enrollments.

Martin urges that while little or no growth be permitted for four-year institutions in their regular campus programs, programs should be expanded in the area of nontraditional study or variations of the "open university".

He characterizes the nontraditional programs of UC and CSUC as "cautious, tentative starts in the right direction" but comments that "nowhere are the traditional underpinnings for nontraditional superstructures more visible than in the extended degree programs of the University of California or the external degree programs of California State University and Colleges."

Establishment of the new institution — which would be called the College of California — would be distinguished by the fact that its policies and programs would be determined by professionals from occupations other than those directly associated with the educational academy.

"At present, administrators and faculty from the University of California and the California State University and Colleges envision external degree programs as just that — as external provisions for degrees heretofore offered internally. And however innovative the arrangements may be, these educators mean to keep control over both process and outcome . . . Many perceptive observers have commented on the extent to which educational professionalism is an enemy of change. Perhaps leaders from industry, labor, the communications media, the churches and synagogues, the art forms, etc., could design alternative programs that would be better than programs set up by professional educators operating out of, and in the interest of, established educational institutions."

Bar Admits Gay Libber

In Minnesota last week, Gay Liberationists scored quite a few points.

Jack Baker, well known as the first openly gay candidate to win presidency at a major university, has been ruled eligible for the Minnesota Bar examination.

The University of Minnesota Law School graduate will be the first homosexual considered to be of "good moral standing" — a rule that has denied all previous gay applicants eligibility.

Baker is also the controversial gay activist who took advantage of his knowledge of Minnesota state law and won a legally sanctioned gay marriage by pointing out that "Minnesota law does not state that marriage applicants must be of the opposite sex."

Baker was denied marriage at first, tried a few other tactics, and was finally granted recognition.

William J. Lloyd, director of bar admissions in Minnesota, wrote Baker stating that the board "will make no objection to your application, which will be processed in due course."

As if winning presidency at University of Minnesota Law School, having a "legally sanctioned gay marriage," and gaining eligibility for the bar examination are not enough; Baker and his lover Michael McConnell plan to test the "same-sex" marriage issue again by filing a joint income tax return in April.

Baker summed up the situation by stating, "Unless we prove that we are the same as anyone else, we will never be treated like anyone else."

Project SHARE

"No one expected me to find anybody here, because City College is supposed to be so apathetic; but we now have between 65 and 75 active tutors from this campus," declared Gaby Toure at the close of her first semester here.

Ms. Toure is CCSF campus co-ordinator of Project Share, a tutoring service for elementary school students. In the program, the tutor develops a relationship with the child in an effort to solve the mental and emotional problems that sometimes cause learning difficulties.

The project is funded by the Government and, therefore, has an evaluation program. "But," Ms. Toure cautions, "The kind of results we get are hard to measure. How do you measure something like interest or self esteem?" She added that the lack of these can cause serious learning problems.

Ms. Toure will be actively recruiting again at the beginning of next semester. Interested students are encouraged to drop by her office in S160.

Film Festival on Campus

The second annual CCSF Film Fiasco will be held in V115 8 pm January 19.

"Film Fiasco" is a tongue-in-cheek title for what would otherwise be known as a Film Final. It is an assembly of student work from the Film Department.

The event was held for the first time last year and was surprisingly successful.

"Many people who attended film finals at other schools compared ours favorably," stated Fiasco organizer and film instructor Richard Harkness.

Doug Bonham, a film student, has worked three months on the film he will show. "It's important," he feels, "to test my film for audience reaction now."

Admission for the Film Fiasco, Friday night is still 49 cents.

KQED'S Pert Newswoman Thrives on Controversy

Organized crime "runs around with a Rolls Royce full of heroin," and "could buy Standard Oil," stated KQED newswoman Marilyn Baker in an interview with Guardsman reporters. She spoke on organized crime and the major problems facing the news media.

GUEST SPEAKER - Ms. Marilyn Baker

Ms. Baker, the leading advocate of equality for female journalists, spoke self-assuredly about a woman's role in this field. She believes a woman has to be better than any male reporter if she is to succeed in the business. Many editors don't think a woman can effectively cover hard news, but it is often much easier for a woman to interview a male.

The lawsuit Ms. Baker has brought against the San Francisco Press Club involves suing the organization for not allowing woman journalists to use certain facilities and obtain regular membership instead of associate status.

A proposal for a new press club was initiated by working journalists, because of the strong influence the PR men hold over the present club, but out of the 400-600 working journalists in the area only six were present at the first meeting. This, states Ms. Baker, shows the general apathy that runs through the news media.

"Laugh-in West" is what Baker calls the local TV news programs. She feels they are trying to imitate Channel 9 Newsroom at KQED, but are unable to succeed because none of the men that announce the news on local programs are reporters, merely announcers, who "rip and read" and know very little about the news they're reporting.

Ms. Baker admitted that the KQED news at one time was slanted in its views and had greater restrictions on coverage than it does now, but since they have acquired a new producer their news is less slanted and the reporters can choose their own assignments. In Newsroom each announcer covers his or her own beat so that they will be familiar with the news they are reporting on the air.

"I spent four days in the can for refusing to reveal a news source," she states, relating back 20 years to the incident. She feels that the journalists currently in jail for pretecting sources are being unjustly treated, but that they have brought it on themselves. Traditionally, journalists have made it a habit to reveal some sources and conceal others and because of this they are now being told they must reveal all their sources. Ms. Baker believes if they had refused to reveal any sources they wouldn't be in the predicament they're in now.

Although she is an outspoken, self-assured journalist Marilyn Baker has had very little formal academic training. She entered the School of Journalism at U.C.L.A. but was thrown out in her first semester for "lack of talent." Convinced that she would make a good reporter, she walked into the editor's office of the Herald Examiner and announced that she was his new reporter. She was hired, but as a copyboy not a reporter. She feels this was only because during World War II they couldn't find any boys for the position.

From copyboy she soon progressed to reporting for the women's page. From there she moved to the morgue beat, Watts district beat, and eventually into crime reporting which lead to political reporting. Ms. Baker feels it is inevitable to report on politics if one is reporting on crime because she feels the two are frequently synonomous.

Year of the Ox

A stock brokerage firm is "Bullish on America," but is is not the only one interested in bulls.

The Chinese on February 3 will usher in their new year. The omnipotent ox will lumber in, routing the rat. The highlight of the festival will be the annual parade to be held on Saturday night, February 17. A path will be cleared for the golden dragon and its glittering entourage.

Chinatown's oracles evaluate the year of the ox as a period of productivity, a time to cultivate practial pursuits and carry past projects to fruition. It is said that the aspects are auspicious for marriage and conciliation.

Legend has it that the ox was once a star deity. Disturbed by people's pitiable struggle against starvation, Buddha dispatched the ox to tell his subjects that if they worked unstintingly they would receive a sustenance every third day. Instead the people were fed every day, so the ox fell out of favor with Buddha and became earthbound.

In general, individuals born under the yoke of the ox are strong-willed introverts. They can be eloquent when so inclined. This, combined with the gift of inspiring confidence, makes them natural leaders.

The hitch is that ox-types, while clever and politically adroit, are eccentric, and in some cases schizoid. Napoleon, Bach, Van Gogh, and William F. Buckley were born under the sign of the ox.

Editorial:

Freedom of the Press - Lost?

Ever since last June 29 when the Supreme Court ruled 5-4 in three companion cases that it would not grant "newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy . . .," reporters and editors have been bouncing in and out of jail and even more seem destined to see the world from behind bars.

Since then Peter Bridge of the now defunct Newark Evening News, William Farr of the Los Angeles Times, Harry Hornton of a Chattanooga, Tenn., TV talk show; and John Lawrence, Washington Bureau chief of the Los Angeles Times, were jailed for failing to disclose their sources.

Then on December 18, Clay T. Whitehead, director of the White House Office of Tele-Communications Policy, declared that the present Administration wanted legislation to hold local TV and radio stations accountable for the content of network newscasts they televise and that this would be a factor in their license renewal.

In other words: CENSORSHIP.

It is becoming all too apparent that the Nixon Administration would like to dry up the ink of journalists' pens. Examples are: Vice President Agnew's speeches attacking the press, President Nixon's Supreme Court appointments which upheld the "reveal or else" decision, and threats against license renewals for TV and radio stations who criticize the White House.

The freedom of the press is an invisible part of all our lives. Loss of it would not incite riots or change the lives of Americans. It would creep up slowly and unnoticed until one day when you would pick up a newspaper to find only the comics remaining on the front page.

Fortunately, California Governor Ronald Reagan, recently signed a bill granting newsmen in this state full immunity, several other states have bills pending passage to protect newsmen.

But the irony of the whole matter is that if "Freedom of the Press" was included in the First Amendment of our Constitution, then why must laws be passed in 1973 to protect the freedom of the press?

Adult Leaders Needed for Scouts

Be Prepared! Remember your scouting days, or were you ever involved in such activities? If not, here is your opportunity to help some young boys who are eager to belong to something which will fit their need for companionship and recreational activities.

John Kleinow, District Scout Executive of the El Camino District of San Francisco, visited City College recently in an effort to recruit students as leaders for the ever-expanding scout program in this area.

In Kleinow's district alone (Mission District bounded by Market south to Army, Mission to beyond Ocean Ave.), there are 40-50 cub scout packs and boy scout troops combined.

Adult leaders are desperately needed to meet the potential membership among the young boys in the district who are mostly from the minority groups and in need of adult guidance for their educational and recreational activities. Many are turned away for lack of adult supervision.

Requirements for leadership are anyone (male or female) 18 years or older who is interested in helping young boys in continuous programs such as field trips, summer camp programs in the Bay Area, crafts, technical skills (electronics, etc.), tutoring.

There are numerous opportunities to serve as assistants to scoutmasters or cubleaders, as typists in the various centers, and many other services directly or indirectly connected with scouting. Girls are also very much in demand for various jobs in scouting.

Information about this program which would be of mutual benefit to college students and the boys they help can be obtained from Kleinow's office in Diamond Heights Shopping Center, 2258 Diamond Heights Blvd., (9 a.m.-5 p.m.), or call 647-9509.

Facilities Budget Can't Handle Costs

The constant flux in the architectural facade that City College displays to passersby is the result of a series of failures and green-light successes in a co-ordinated program of long-term/past planning, and long-range predictions and projections into the future, based on the needs of a Community education service.

Currently, three major projects located at various progress levels in the planning-to-construction process are underway: the Interim Student Health Facility, a 49-1/2 million dollar state bond issue, and Phase 1 renovations of the Campus Science Building.

The events surrounding the establishment of the Student Health facility notate a momentary failure that may be overridden with a revision in planning. Construction proposals for a temporary Center situated north of the entrance to the student parking lot just off Ocean Avenue were rejected at the Community College Board meeting on Wednesday, January 9, because all bids overshot the estimated 84 thousand dollar cost by at least twice that amount.

After two years of planning procedures, the architectural firm involved submitted the price estimate of 84 thousand dollars for the Interim Health Facility which would function to expand all services and equipment presently housed in S190. When the plans were recently put up to bid for actual construction work, the estimate proved insufficient, and since the Facilities budget could not expand to cover the additional cost, all bids were rejected.

Vic Graff, director of the Facilities and Planning Office at CCSF, points out the course of action now left open: "We'll try to change the design and review specifications for the building so as to reduce cost."

In terms of time and revisional activity, if the architectural scheme can be modified to fit the budgetary allowance, all plans must get Board approval first, then go through a four-part review process (including approval by the Chancellor of California Community Colleges in Sacramento, and the State Office of Architecture and Construction) before actual construction begins.

The entire procedure, pending whether or not the plans can be renovated this week to fit within the specified cost frame-work, constitutes a dealy of two to several months.

The January 9 Board meeting saw the rejection of this one set of carefully laid plans alongside the affirmation of a proposal of yet another major issue, involving a broader cross-section of the public and a much larger quantity of state and local fund sources. Dr. Batmale, chancellor of City College, proposed that the Community College District request that a 49.57 million dollar bond issue be placed on the November '73 ballot to provide funds for a large-scale construction and rehabilitation program, now in its initial planning stages.

The program (which Graff refers to as "Talking about construction that will occur between six and ten years from now" includes the establishment of Cloud Hall East, and Engineering Building, the second phase of the Science Building remodeling program, a library building, renovation of Cloud Hall and an addition to the two gymnasiums.

If the bond issue can be placed on the November ballot and is passed, it would also provide funds for five adult education centers located in various districts throughout the city.

The Board authorized Batmale to take the bond matter to the Planning Commission last Friday, January 12, for the completion of the second in four verification steps previous to the establishment of the bond as a ballot issue.

While the processes of revision and planning for the Interim Student Health Facility and the bond issue comprise a theoretical-based headache for the Department Facilities and Planning on campus, the first renovation phase of the Science Building — slated to commence in June '73 — will very likely be causing students very real headaches along with a well stocked, one-year supply of sundry inconveniences.

The 1-1/2 million dollar renovation project will span a time period from June '73 to June '74, financed by funds supplied through the passage of Proposition I, and local sources. Construction will take place during class hours and specified changes scheduled for each floor in the thirty-year old structure.

The first phase remodelling basically includes a modernization and expansion of spaces and facilities, involving the secural of new equipment for the Engineering (basement), Physics (first floor), Chemistry (second floor), and Life Sciences (third floor), Departments.

Student Union Falling Apart

Look out below! One way or another, the bureaucracy is going to hit you over the head!

The asbestos-plaster ceiling tiles in the lounge of the Student Union are pulling away from their supports. Already a few tiles have fallen while a much larger number have for the moment been pushed back into their grooves.

Coming Down — Right below the sofas

Kevin Kent, acting Election Commissioner, frequents the Student Union and is keeping tabs on its condition. He flatly concludes, "The building is just poorly designed."

"This door has been broken for the last year and a half. Nothing's been done so I took the sign down that was up so it'll get broken and then they'll have to fix it."

Although no one has yet been injured, Kevin emphasizes the potential injury a falling tile might cause.

Besides problems with windows and thin walls, the major structural defect appears to be the leakage of rain water into the downstairs restrooms.

Water from an outdoor gutter gets onto the roof, creating pressure enough to force water through the roof and into the restrooms. Every night after a rain, the janitor must mop up more than an inch of collected water. Kevin claims that the walls of the restrooms are beginning to bulge.

The water build-up on the roof could conceivably have serious consequences for the entire building. But at present the leaking remains limited to the restrooms. There seems to be little done about it except mopping it up.

"It's all being fixed," is the word from Vic Graff, Director of Facilities and Planning: "We have tiles falling in classrooms, and leaks. It's all a matter of priority. It's a routine matter." Associated Student Council President, Frank Thatcher, admits he can sometimes feel the Student Union Building shake," when there's a good gust of wind.'

Kevin Kent also points out a problem that many students are already familiar with. A pool forms just outside the side entrance of the building when ever it rains, making it impossible to cross safely without proper footwear.

Another pool forms in the patio just in front of the lower level. A clogged drain allows water to collect until it runs off down the hill adding further danger to the threatening mudslide behind the building.

When Dean Flanagan was asked if he had reported these various problems, his answer was emphatic: "Have I? I've got a schedule of complaints. In other words, when nothing's done, another complaint is automatically sent."

Some people, including Kevin Kent and Frank Thatcher, have come to the conclusion that the building is shifting. To the non-professional, the evidence seems to support this. The pulling away of the ceiling tiles is concentrated near the beams, and there is a buckle developing in the hallway of the upstairs offices.

That's Right — It Could've landed on your head.

Whether or not the whole structure is pulling apart, the large number of serious problems and their apparent neglect raises some important questions.

Is the problem one of poor design? Is it a matter of improper maintenance or some combination of the two? Is shoddy construction a possible answer? More immediately, what exactly has priority over the pressing repairs needed by the Student Union structure?

The problem of design and allegations of specific poor design have also been raised by students familiar with the new Arts building.

Obviously, if the answer to the first question is positive, it will unleash a host of questions about the planning of the school and the building of the new Cloud Hall extension.

Multi-Million Dollar Classroom Plan

City College Chancellor, Louis Batmale, put forth a $62 million plan for CCSF to the district board of trustees, in order to provide an unusually diversified college community. The board unanimously approved the proposal, with reservations regarding the financing.

Batmale's program calls for new buildings on campus to replace some 50 temporary buildings now being used. Besides the Phelan campus, new construction would be erected at a downtown center at Fourth and Mission, the San Francisco Airport which has an Aircraft School of Technology, and another "midtown" site for the elderly & civil service employees.

Chancellor Batmale's proposal suggests most of the financing for this plan be made through a bond sale. Some board members felt that this was not a particularly appropriate time for a bond sale but they did not suggest any alternative method.

Total student enrollment at City College is 92,000 (day & evening). 20,000 of these students are at the main campus; the rest take courses elsewhere. With that large an enrollment, it has become obvious that more facilities are needed.

The proposed main campus buildings would be classrooms, library, and engineering technology.

It is estimated the downtown center will be used by 8500 fulltime students with many taking on-the-job-training courses. Part-time studies by another 4500 adults are expected to add to the center's enrollment.

The board currently has enough money for the downtown center, but the rest will hopefully come from a bond sale.

How To Better Understand Women

CCSF wil offer several courses next semester for students who would like to better understand the changing position of women in society.

The History Department is again offering Women in U.S. History, (History 12).

Interdepartmental Studies (IDST) will repeat Women in the Modern World, (IDST 20).

Sections 7, 11, 16, 20 and 21 of the English 1A class will have Women's Liberation as their theme. The English Department will also continue English 45 (Women in Literature).

The Psychology Department will repeat Psychology 25, The Psychology of Women, and will add an orientation course (Psych. G7) for mature women who have had a significant time lapse in their formal training. The course is designed to help students to cope with the scholastic and personal problems involved in returning to school. The eight-week class will be offered for 1 unit.

More information on these and other women's courses can be obtained from the women's table at registration.

The Guardsman staff wishes you lots of luck on your Finals and lots of good times over semester break. Next semester we are expanding our staff and the size of our paper to keep up with expanding campus activities and ever-changing student interests. We need photographers and cartoonists, so if your talents are in these areas, come up and see us in S-304 and we'll talk about the ways you can express your creativity.

Black History Week At CCSF To Be A Gas!

Black History Week at City College should be one of the most significant events to transpire on campus next semester. Many Black students are banding together now to insure the success of the week; designed to heighten the awareness of the historical heritage of Black Americans.

Among the vanguard promoting Black History Week to the fullest will be the Black History Week Association of CCSF and its chairman, Lance Burton.

Burton is a Broadcast Arts major who has been presently active in student council and other campus groups. Black History Week, which will be held during the week of February 20-23, will feature live entertainment, guest speakers, a fashion show, a dance, afro-dancers, and a faculty-student dinner.

Black History Week started in the Fall of '71 under the direction of George Crippin. It was the goal then to create something that Black students from all fields could get involved in. It was started with five students and now it has grown to about thirty students, and three faculty members.

A considerable amount of time is devoted to scheduling the various shows, speakers and other events during the week to make the presentation function as smoothly as possible. Details must be worked out months in advance so that last-minute cancellations can be handled with the minimum amount of worry. This work is being undertaken for the benefit of all students at City College, but particularly for the Black student.

"As a (student) council member students often say that there is nothing to do on campus which is why there is so much apathy, but if Black History Week continues to grow the way it has, there will be no need for any Black student to say that City College is dead," said Burton.

Supervisors Appeal To Exempt S.F. From Prop. 20

In a recent KPIX editorial, supervisor Quentin Kopp challenged the Board of Supervisors to appoint him and Supervisor Molinari to the Coastal Commission for the express purpose of exempting San Francisco from proposition 20's rule.

According to Kopp, who claimed that he and Molinari strongly endorsed the new height and bulk revision to the city code, "proposition 20 is superfluous."

Kopp's voting record affirmed his claim that he endorsed the city planning codes revision, but Molinari's endorsement is a different matter.

The August 2nd edition of the San Francisco Progress reported Molinari as being opposed to the city planning codes revision, which set a height limit of forty feet for most areas of San Francisco.

Proposition 20 has a provision that lets such legislation exist without affecting its performance to retain excessive building.

"Beginning February 2nd, 1973, anyone who wants to undertake any development (with minor exceptions) within the permit area (from 1,000 feet above mean high tide level to 3 miles out to sea) will be required to obtain a permit from the regional coastal commission as well as from any local agency that may also require permits."

This exemplifies Kopp's major complaint in the editorial, "Under the commissions' law, anyone living inland, to 40th Avenue in the Sunset and Richmond districts, where we live, would have to obtain a permit from the coastal commission, in addition to all the required city permits, before he could make more than $7,500 worth of repairs or additions to his home."

Nevertheless, Kopp the most "disputatious supervisor," as referred to by the Chronicle, who ambiguously claims to be living on 40th Avenue, is stretching his lot a little, two blocks to be exact, since his residency is listed as 450-38th Avenue.

Policy Change Makes English 1-A Conducive To Student's Majors

Thematic course descriptions for English 1-A courses are available for the first time at CCSF this semester.

According to James E. Cagnacci, the personable chairman of the English department, "An open-book policy with regard to control and approach has been adopted for the English 1-A courses. However," he added, "course objectives for for the English 1-A and 1-B programs will remain essentially the same."

Cagnacci explained that the new policy will allow students to select courses, "which will relate to their major fields of study or other dominant interests." He added that it is primarily, "the methods of instruction which will change from the format of previous semesters."

He further explained that the new policy involves updating course material.

"The new policy will allow students to select courses with such varying themes as; Women's Liberation, Maps of Consciousness, and The Individual and Society," Cagnacci stated.

The English 1-A and 1-B Electives Committee recently compiled a listing of the new courses available under Thematic Course Descriptions. The compilation lists such interesting and provocative reading as: Siddartha, Without Christ or Marx and Touch The Earth.

Altogether, an impressive selection of writers and essayists are being harvested to the new approach, "which brings into focus one concept such as ecology, and builds the whole course around that one central theme," according to Cagnacci.

Cagnacci also said in reply to a recent article in The Guardsman critical of the English Reading department's Substandard Reading Lab, that he basically agrees with Edward Kloster, chairman of the English Curriculm Committee who stated, "The problems we have with poor readers originate in the primary grades, and due to instructor and administrative indifference, they end up here unable to read." (The Guardsman, December 7)

However, with regard to the English Reading lab, Cagnacci said, "The Reading Lab hasn't proven itself sufficiently to warrant a further appropriation of either space or equipment."

"Furthermore," he continued, "of a five hundred dollar allocation to the Reading Department at the beginning of the semester, only fifty dollars of that money has been spent."

Cagnacci explained that he has approved every request from the Reading Department that has come across his desk. "But," he added, "those requests just haven't been forthcoming. Nineteen carrels were recently ordered for the lab, and they are on the way."

"Spaceship Earth" Professor Speaks

"We're treating our planet as if we had a spare in the trunk. Not only is there no spare, there's no trunk."

The author of this statement is not an ordinary prophet of doom. He is Dr. Irving Bengelsdorf, Director of Science Communication at California Institute of Technology. He is the author of Spaceship Earth: People and Pollution. He writes a column for the National Science Association and is senior lecturer in the Department of Chemistry at University of Southern California.

When Dr. Bengelsdorf participated in CCSF's Thursday lecture recently he discussed the effects that poverty and overpopulation are having on the environment.

Despite pompous tautologies like, "The Earth is a spaceship" (because it travels around the sun), and, "all forms of life are fellow-travelers on earth's journey around the sun," Dr. Bengelsdorf developed an interesting lecture around the fact that the earth's resources are finite and that "mankind produces nothing, it only uses things."

Alas, the statement most relevant to the students' lives was probably "Many of us would like to get off (presumably the Earth) but we can't!"

Bureaucratic Foul-up In Computer Causes Man's Arrest In Foster City

Beware of the computer!

One student got a D in a course, when he actualy got a B. Someone subscribed to a magazine and instead of getting one copy he got fifty, but at least these people did not have to spend time in jail as Guardaman Daggal did.

Duggal left his home in Foster City, California, and was stopped by a policeman because of a cracked car windshield. The policeman checked to see if Duggal had any warrants on him. The answer came back that he had $355 in violations. Duggal protested that he had already paid the fines, and had receipts in his car to prove it. In spite of his protests, he was taken to jail in Redwood City at 11:30 p.m.

Booking procedure was completed at 5:30 a.m. A manpower shortage was the reason given for the long booking procedure.

During all this, Duggal was in jail and not permitted to make a phone call.

Mrs. Dugall finally found her husband and learned of his predicament the following day.

She spent $70 in cab fares going to San Francisco, Foster City, and Redwood City, in search of the car with the warrant receipts in the glove box. The car was found. Fourteen hours after Mr. Duggal's arrest word came through that the warrants had been paid.

A police spokesman mentioned that it can take as long as ten days for traffic fines to clear the department. Twenty hree days passed from the time Duggal paid his fines until the evening he was stopped. The fault was either in the computer or in the human hand which fed it. Duggall can forgive a computer mistake, but not a human one.

The next time a D instead of a B comes out in computer form, or fifty magazines instead of one arrive, do something about it, and be thankful that it isn't a trip to the County jail.

QUESTION: What is the first thing you do when you get up in the morning?

Holly Woodstar — Drama
Ordinarily I sleep in the bathtub so the first thing I check for is to make sure no one ripped off my "Irish Spring."

Marie Passanisi — Art
I look for my glasses. It's just that I can't see without them. I'm really hopeless in the morning.

Cindi Johnson — General Education
I wake up, roll over and fall out of bed, crawl under the mattress and turn off my electric blanket. This is all very embarrassing.

Rex Holl — General Education
A cigarette. I just have to have a cigarette. Everyday at 7:45 am. Then for a quick trip to the bathroom, and later breakfast.

Viki Menzies — Teacher Assistant
The dog. He's only seven weeks old and he's super frisky. Even when I get out of bed, I'm not awake.

Joel Carpenter — General Education
I reach over for my lady to see if she's there, then I look for my dog and cat and d hope that they are still there too. Then I make sure I'm in the same place where I started out the night before.

An Outstanding 'Rashomon'

There is a double treat awaiting those who will see the CCSF drama department's production of Rashomon which continues this Friday and Saturday at the college Little Theater.

Not only will the audience be seeing a fine performance, but a new conceptual theater style is brought off in one of the smoothest technically-run shows ever presented by the Drama Department.

This unique theater style is derived from ancient Japanese Noh And Kabuki drama in which scenery is non-existent or merely symbolic, the actors wear masks, there is seen-violence, characters wear bizarre make-up, and the performance by the actors is almost ritualistic with attitudes and gestures derived from the ancient dramas.

Director Jim Orin has added his own unique touch to the performance with the use of "shadows", black-hooded and leotarded actors and actresses, whose innumerable jobs include changing scenery, handling props, and playing percussion instruments.

The play's three principal characters are involved in a murder and rape with each person giving his own, yet different, version of what took place. Each version expresses what each character thinks they are and how they acted; yet what really happened and what the characters are in reality is finally disclosed by another witness.

Dual roles give the three main actors, Buddie Speck (priest and the bandit Tajomaru), Tim Bailey (woodcutter and samurai), and Bonnie McCord (samurai's wife and her mother) an acting test and finds they handle each character convincingly.

Dudley Jones (wigmaker) performs equally well with his fellow actors, and Sigrid Wurschmidt in a non-speaking role as the medium is commendable (with her role done in gestures).

An original music composition by Jerry Mueller and Ed Drake weaves a multitude of sound effects within the play. Steve Soja and Ed Drake perform the original music.

Rashomon will be presented this weekend, January 19 and 20, at 8 pm, in the Little Theater. General admission price is $1.50 with students receiving a special rate of $1.00. For further information, call the theater office, extension 100 or 132.

The Filming of 'Jail', Outside Looking In

"Jail" is an eighty minute experiment in cinema-verite shot last spring in the San Francisco County jail at San Bruno.

Prison documentaries are rare and "Jail" is assured a special place in the field. As opposed to the sensationalized treatment of prison life by Hollywood, "Jail" attempts to present the daily life of the inmates as it is actually lived.

There are inherent weaknesses in the cinema-verite technique but that is outside the scope of this review. The footage was shot both in San Bruno and in the jail housed on the seventh floor of the Hall of Justice. Both locations are used without distinction because the attempt is to show life in "Jail" and not life in one particular jail.

The filmmakers are four long-time Bay Area activists: Michael Anderson, Paul Jacobs, Saul Landau andBill Yabraus. Paul Jacobs may be familiar to you from his work with KQED. He is the author of the controversial film essay on the ex-FBI agent that became the subject of national television debate.

The filmmakers worked on the Hongisto campaign and upon his election took the immediate opportunity to ask his permission to film the "Jail." They received his enthusiastic cooperation although he has only a minor part in the film itself.

Collective decisionmaking was employed in all of the filmmakers work. They met in the morning and discussed the plans for the day. They then entered the jail and were allowed to roam among the different tiers.

Attempts to include film of the Women's Jail had to be scrapped in the middle of shooting because they could not get the cooperation of the inmates. The sessions there were always under the supervision of a guard making it difficult to freely explore the environment. It was agreed that a female crew would have been necessary to achieve any meaningful results.

Their decision to scrap the Women's footage turned out to be a blessing, eliminating the problem of identifying transvestites who might otherwise be mistaken for women.

Interviews with prison officials are spaced throughout the film. The Hongisto sequence is used as an introduction. He explains, "the perfect jail would not exist."

The sound is entirely naturalistic and disturbing because of the constant roar of background noises. In the San Bruno facility, a "courtyard" runs the height of the six floors. Thus a sound issuing from sixth floor south can be heard in first floor north.

The concrete reflects noise and "there is literally nothing but bodies to absorb the sound."

Special attention is placed on the prison poet, Michael Beasly, one of the many poets popular among the inmates.

The film has been shown on New York television in an unusual experiment where half-hour rushes were aired five consecutive nights and the completed feature on the sixth.

Attempts are being made to air it locally but so far have been without success.

The Surf Theatre, Irving and 46th Avenue (664-6300) premiered the film.

Opera

Communities from the San Francisco Bay Area to Palm Springs will be part of the itinerary of the Western Opera Theater during this first month of its 1973 season.

Western Opera Theater was founded in 1967 by San Francisco general director, Kurt Herbert Adler, for a three-fold purpose: to bring opera, in English, to areas where the art is rarely seen; to bring opera to students and new audiences; and to provide repertory experience for young professional singers which previously only existed in Europe.

The ensemble opera company, in its seventh season, travels through mid-May from California to Oregon and Arizona.

Community groups interested in sponsoring Western Opera Theater performances should call 861-4074.

Winterland -

GRATEFUL DEAD — "Shook Winterland as no earthquake could."

Dead Arise on New Years

Having spent the last New Year's Eve's rather unsoberly amusing myself with Guy Lombardo, I decided this year enough is enough and ventured out to find other ways of celebrating the coming of the New Year.

Obtaining a pair of guest passes, I was able to celebrate the New Year dancing, singing and generally having a great time to the tune of the incomparable Grateful Dead.

Knowing how Dead freaks operate, I was forced to sit in line and view the walls of Winterland as most people were still eating breakfast. With the only accompaniment my trusty bottle (for purposes of keeping me from turning into an icecube and for other alcoholic reasons) and succeeding partly in the latter and fully in the former, I was able to sit through the afternoon, with an occasional nod, waiting for the front gates of Bill Graham's fortress to be opened.

Entering, I found the main floor already covered with wall-to-wall people. After a grueling uphill climb that almost made me quit smoking; I was rewarded with a choice seat in the heavenly reaches of the balcony.

After three hours of blues-rock by the Sons, and some country-rock by the New Riders, a funny-smelling but familiar cloud of smoke grew within the auditorium, leaving a green-stained grin on all participants.

As the seconds neared and countdown began, a thousand balloons descended from the ceiling rafts signaling the New Year, while the Dead unleashed into an uncontrollable rocker, to the frenzied delight of dancing freaks who shook Winterland as no earthquake ever could.

There was magic in the air, among other things, as the mystic rock and rollers and dean of all bands, the Grateful Dead, went through their endless repertoire.

It was not until dawn that the amplifiers were turned off and seats emptied and I returned to the realities of the outside world.

Exiting, I walked back to the spot where I spent a part of the last year, retrieved my empty bottle and wandered down the deserted streets wondering how Guy Lombardo spent New Year's.

"Gullible's Travels" On KSAN

Radio station KSAN this week introduces a new five-minute travel feature, "Gullible's Travels", to be broadcast Tuesdays and Thursdays at 2:30 and 8 p.m. and Saturdays at 10:30 a.m. and 8 p.m. Each of the three weekly reports will be rebroadcast at 10:30 a.m. the following day.

"Gullible's travels", produced by newsman Peter Laufer, features Laufer "wandering aimlessly" around the world with a tape recorder and sending back reports on "the weird, the perverse, the obscure and the hard news".

One of this generation's best-known "media hoboes", Laufer has travelled extensively in the U. S. and worked as a newsman, talk show producer and traffic reporter at KNEW, KPFA and KSFO, San Franisco, before joining KSAN in 1970.

He helped to produce KSAN's 1971 award-winning documentary on George Jackson and recently produced a special one-hour report, "Sic Transit", on the problems of Bay Area Rapid Transit.

Laufer and KSAN news director David McQueen have been cited by local newspapers and journalism publications for their in-depth reporting of community problems.

Film

Streisand as Fantasy Housewife

Barbra Streisand is back again at the UA Cinema in Stonestown but this time in an even better, (at least more realistic) role. Ms. Streisand plays the downtrodden, fantasy-crazed housewife of a very successful college professor/writer in Up The Sandbox.

The film is a bit tedious at first but this effect helps the audience understand what the average housewife's life is like — boring.

Ms. Streisand has one wild fantasy after another during the course of the film. Imagine if you will, being seduced by Fidel Castro who later turns out to be a woman instead of a man. "You're not a chick — you're a dyke!" exclaims Barbra.

Also, this "every-day housewife" dreams of blowing up the Statue of Liberty, pushes her mother's face into her anniversary cake, amongst other hilarious daydreams. The audience loved her. Also, the film said quite a bit for women's liberation. Barbra does an excellent monologue on "the thousand and one things I do during the day ad why I'm bored."

The ending is interesting in that the audience is left guessing: Does she get an abortion?

This may not be Ms. Streisand's "finest" role but it is one of her most interesting by far. Judge for yourself. You'll likely agree that the film is a potential all-time great.

"Poseidon": Real Adventure

If chewed finger nails are a sign that a picture is worth seeing, then THE POSEIDON ADVENTURE is indeed worth seeing.

Gene Hackman stars as a street minister who helps eight survivors on an overturned (but not sunk) oceanliner.

Also starring in the picture are academy award winners Ernest Borgnine as a contrary and doubting policeman, Shelley Winters as an obese and heroic grandmother, and Red Buttons as a lonely haberdasher.

The film is realistic except for the tidal wave itself. One with any knowledge of tidal waves knows they do not curl until they hit land. But with the use of some imagination, it can be quite a chilling scene.

The film is filled with symbolism, and Hackman seems almost Christ-like in his last effort to "save his people" by sacrificing himself.

The set, a capsized ocean liner, is terifyingly realistic. Taking over six months to complete, one can well imagine himself in Dante's Inferno.

If there is to be one really heart-rending picture this year, this just could be it. The viewer shares enough of the background of each of the cast's lives so that each death becomes a traumatic experience.

Two Seldom Seen Groups Hit SF

Bill Graham's December shows provided just what easily bored rock fans needed: bands that hadn't been touring in the area lately.

Among them: Tito Puente-Malo and Steve Miller-Mike BloomField were headliners.

The Miller band, originally from the bay area but now living in Texas, of all places, was an instant success. The well behaved grown up audience gave Miller the kind of response that most performers only dream of.

It's strange how the crowds differ with the bands but if that's any way to judge the musicians' messages then Miller's colorful group has to rank high.

The highlights of the Tito Puente-Malo set were many, even saw Bill Graham waltzing with a pretty senorita. The ultimate Christmas present for the spectators was when Malo returned to play their encore and brought Carlos Santana out to play with them. Santana was decked out in all white with matching midi jacket. As he came to the front of the stage to take a bow he removed his beanie cap to reveal his freshly done serviceman's short haircut.

Top billed Latin artist Tito Puente gave some of Malo's members a big thrill when calling on them to jam with his smooth 14-piece band.

Malo's men saw just how bad they were when they took the stage with Tito. It could be said that they learned more in 15 minutes with Tito than they would have thought about in a week.

Even so, Tito has been thrilling music fans for 20 years and Malo's been around for slightly more than one sixth of that time. However, Malo is solid and they can make bands of comparable size look like they're just making noise.

Coming to Winterland:

Jan. 27-28 Curtis Mayfield/Tower of Power/Barkays;
Feb. 3 Edgar Winter;

"BAAAADDD!" — Rumbling hard and fast down the musical pathway originally cleared by Santana, Carlos' brother Jorge Santana and his own Latin-rock group, Malo, have come rocking' out of the ghetto and right into Bill Graham's Winterland Arena rock concerts.

Flashy Rams Roll to 4-0 Record Despite Close Call

It had the makings of a championship game. From the first time appearance of a roaring enthusiastic band, to the tantalizing leg-swinging displayed by a multitude of pretty song girls and to the pandemonium that broke loose after the game.

But when it was over, City went on not only to beat but demoralize a highly-touted Chabot squad by the final score of 53-48.

"We played a stalled offense in the beginning", admitted Phelan. "And we weren't working the play. As for our victory, it wasn't our ability, it was our drive. Coming back like that made me very proud."

For John Atchan alias the "Flash", it seemed destined to be a so-so year. But the reigns of stardom seemed to be promised himby a force above tonight.

With but only a half left and trailing 30-18 after a very poor first half, it seemed destined that City would lose it's first.

But like a flash of lightning, the Flash made short work of a previous offensive lag in 5 minutes time.

Almost single-handedly, he rebounded, shot-blocked, caused offensive fouls, stole the ball a couple of times, and caused turnovers, but most important, brought City back with the shooting eye of a hawk. Like a "wild man", as some of his friends called him, the Flash rolled City on to twelve unanswered points. By the end of the second half, the Rams had enough momentum to carry them to their victory.

PLAYER AND COACH — "Flash" Atchan and Coach Sid Phelan put on victory smiles.

But the most pleased was coach Phelan who really didn't give much thought of starting Atchan after his meeting up to his expectations in the early goings.

"We're a strange team this year, said Phelan. "It seems we play better when our people come off the bench than when they start. John may have been questionable before but he has won a starting berth. He was great tonight."

For the Rams, the beginning of the game was almost as dubious to the final gun.

All week long, Coach Phelan tried to prepare for the Gladiators, a favorite this year. But it seemed to be of no avail, at least not in the first half. Lacking scoring punch and plagued by early miscues, it brought stagnancy; one which saw Chabot run their type of game in the early goings.

Chabot quickly and seemingly very easily pierced the best laid plans of the Rams. With center Bob Pruitt, vital in hauling timely rebounds, getting into early foul trouble, Chabot's massive 6' 7" center, Ray Awl, scored many easy buckets playing the low-post position, playing stall-ball till the end of the first half.

Meanwhile the spectacular play of Brian May and Curtis Wright, regarded very highly as game-breakers, never really materialized. But possibly the most inspirng play of the game was placed in the hands of guard Dave Smith. Though only scoring eight points, it was again his smooth swift drive that scored a decisive two. Coming in cold with the score 40-30 in City's favor, he laid up the much needed bucket to spring City's momentum after a momentary period of staleness. Needless to say, the Flash finished the night with a game high point spread of 16, 12 of them coming in the second half, matched by 9 rebounds for the evening. Turnovers a problem a week before in the City's opener which the Rams beat Meritt by the score of 86-72 was a lot lower, committing only 17.

Surprise Crowd Makes Sports Night Worth Enjoyment

An unexpected turnout of over seven hundred students turned what was destined to become just another unnoticed campus event into something of worth and enjoyment.

Sports Night, a bi-annual campus affair, was a success largely due to the efforts of Activities Aide, Chris Davis. "I felt it definitely needs more improvement," Chris related, "That is in terms of participation and publicity; basically though, I need more help."

The Man — The brains behind sports night Activities Aid Chris Davis.

Chris was responsible for the intramural participatory programs in basketball, volleyball, boxing and gymnastics to name a few. Sports Night attempts to promote interest in what otherwise would be sports and/or athletes that would go unnoticed on campus.

To illustrate that Sports Night was not solely a sporting affair, one of the highlights of the evening was a creative dancing solo by Carolyn Bryant.

The factor that heightens the impact of Sports Night is the turnout of over seven hundred students to a night time affair in mid-week; also of importance Chris points out, "I had all nationalities taking part together in making Sports Night the success that it was."

Grays Team-minded -- Wants Championship

It becomes almost natural for a basketball player to score whenever he touches the ball. It is the ultimate goal embedded in his mind as soon as he comes in contact with the game known as basketball. But then you wonder why there is guard Les Grays, an unselfish player, who would forsake the credo to win.

Undoubtedly, this has been a "team-effort" year thus far for the Rams and it has been a rewarding one at that. Coming back from a bad year which saw Coach Sid Phelan's first team knocked out of contention, the team though maybe not as awesome in individual talent or height, is again assaulting the league. Going into the Chabot game, they boasted a 2-0 margin.

One of those "Unsung Heroes" this year has been Les Grays. Though he started the first six pre-season games, he has now become invaluable at being plugged in when the pace of the game is going badly for the Rams.

Grays is a constant complement to team-play; his team-mates will validate that. Though he never receives out-right praise, Coach Phelan knows his worth and prefers not to instill overconfidence. "He is a rare thing," confides the coach before the big game against Chabot, "He is a catalyst for our team. None of his personal abilities are spectacular. It's very easy to miss his creditable play on court. But when he's in there, he makes things happen."

Though only 5'11", Grays is not too small to be an effective component in City's bid for the championship. He isn't particularly fast but he exemplifies the type of play that is as essential to winning as having a superstar. It is his good sound ball-handling which appears as a consistent flow of waves, and his ability to go for good shots.

"I work hard for my shots. Every time I force up a shot, I feel the team has been cheated of two points," declared Grays.

Winning, a starting spot, and helping the team is of primary concern and the graduate of Polytechnic glory years knows it. But though his playing status is as dubious as the outcome of any game, he bears no malice for the players who are starting. "I feel that if they're doing their job, then it's alright. But if they're not, then I'll be complaining," Grays admitted.

He's Patient — Grays feels that every little bit helps to win.

As for personal glory? "It's good when it comes. Everybody likes glory, but I have the same notion as everyone on this year's team—the championship," he said.

But as much as he is an asset to the ~~setting up of the offense, you will find~~ Les out on court helping someone else on defense. Many times turnovers are quickly fast-breaked and turned into Ram scores.

Basketball has been a constant players on the team, has been a constant friend of Les Grays since grade school. From there, he, with team-mate Ray Frazier, played together at Poly. Currently enrolled at City as a business major, he, like Ray, has aspirations of playing in the pros. But "that was when I was a kid and it's not really important anymore. But if I had more speed and height I would be more effective," admits Grays.

Even though the precisioned indoctrinations of Coach Phelan's sets are sometimes tedious and tiresome, the quick guard appreciates them. "We are all good players but if it wasn't for his way of conditioning, it would be a lot harder," the guard declares.

Though Les Grays probably will not be a high scorer or swashbuckle the team to wins, you can bet he'll be helping the team toward the League Championship.

TIMELY CONTRIBUTOR — Dave Smith figured in Chabot's defeat.

tion explicitly in a rhetorical question: "Since the Student Review Board had already made its decision, why should I, after the fact, make a suggestion one way or the other?"

When the Student Review Board got wind of Justice's suspicions, they decided to call a special Student Review Board hearing to investigate the matter.

In the closed hearing Justice played the recording of Thatcher claiming that his eligibility for this election had been "fixed" with the Review Board.

After listening to both sides, the Board dismissed Justice, and talked to Thatcher individually.

Later, the Board decided to write a letter to the Student Council refuting that they had okayed Thatcher's eligibility for this election before any recommendations had been made by the Fact Finding Committee.

After the meeting Thatcher told Justice that he had decided not to run for re-election this semester.

NEW PRESIDENT — Juan Galvan discusses his new responsibilities (and the "PSA" coalition which helped elect him) with reporter Yancy Derringer.

New AS Pres. Assesses Student Power

Juan Galvan, who led the Progressive Student Alliance's sweeping victory of the A.S. elections, was asked of his opinions and goals for this semester.

When asked "How powerful is the Student Council?" Juan replied, "The Student Council has always been there, the influence and the power of such an organization is always present, but it is when the people that are filling these positions decide to mobilize, that things start to happen."

PSA, who won 14 out of 15 seats on the Student Council, is composed of The Black Students Union, La Raza Unida, CCSF Veterans, the Philippino Coalition, the Arab Students Association, and the support of the Chinese Cultural Club. With this support, PSA should have a very bright future in CCSF politics.

When Galvan was asked about the future of PSA, he said "As long as there is a necessity for change, there will always be groups like the PSA who will rise to protect the rights of the people."

The PSA has many major goals, such as the student control of the Bookstore, investigation of campus police, as well as establishment of a free legal clinic for students with legal problems.

Academically, the PSA would like to eliminate the English Co-op Test, which it feels holds many students back from pursuing their academic endeavors. "Also, the curriculum of the ESL program doesn't offer lab for its students," Juan said, "and every effort will be made to have an effective program."

All interested students can get involved in student government by participating in committees such as: Publicity, Finance, Curriculum, Student Review Board, Student Health Advisory Board, Faculty Relations, and Works of Arts. Contact Galvan at the Student Union Building, Room 106, Mondays and Wednesdays from 12 to 1 pm.

Essentially, it will be Juan Galvan's goal as A.S. President to "give direction and keep student government at CCSF unified."

Professor Emeritus Eckert Eulogized Last Week

William J. Eckert, founder of the commercial art department at City College of San Francisco, was eulogized at memorial services held at the Spangler Mortuary in Los Altos on Wednesday, February 14. Mr. Eckert died of a stroke last Friday in Los Altos.

When he retired in 1963, the students and faculty established the William J. Eckert Scholarship for City College students who aspire to careers as professional artists.

Chancellor/Superintendent, Dr. Louis F. Batmale, and President Harry Buttimer attended the memorial services accompanied by a delegation of faculty and alumni.

Concerning the services Mr. Eckert rendered as a member of the City College faculty, Dr. Batmale said "The respected reputation of our City College of San Francisco is due in very large measure to the fine work of our early student body, faculty and administration. The name of William Eckert is prominent among those pioneers.

He was among the first to travel the now well-established path of leaving a successful professional career to share his technical competencies with students.

He founded what was then called the Commercial Art program. Ample testimony as to the fruits of his labor is found in the prominence of our present Art Department and in the many successful practitioners of art who graduated from our fine City College program."

Women's Clinic Dispenses Health Needs, Information

"There are still a lot of women who are sexually active who don't use contraceptives," says Barbara Cabral of the Women's Clinic. "We feel like 'The Creature' constantly saying 'use contraceptives', but it's important." Fran Gage, also of the Women's Clinic, added, "We saw 11 unwanted pregnancies last month."

The Women's Clinic was established to care for all women's health needs. Besides dispensing contraceptives, a doctor does pelvic exams, pap smears, VD testing, and vaginitis treatment. Both the Women's Clinic and the Student Health Center do pregnancy testing, problem pregnancy counseling and, if desired, abortion referral. Ms. Cabral related, "We try to help the woman look at the consequences of whatever decision she makes."

Both women urged that women who think they may be pregnant get a test as early as possible, because, Ms. Cabral explained, "if the woman wants an abortion, it's much easier, both physically and emotionally, to have an abortion early than late." Ms. Gage added, "Too many women wait to have the test done because they don't want to make the decision—they want their alternatives limited."

The Women's Clinic is held Wednesday afternoons from noon to 3 p.m. in S-350. Any woman wishing to use the Clinic can make an appointment through the Student Health Center in S-192.

Supervisors Press For City's Help To Serve Viet Nam War Veterans

The Board of Supervisors, under the urging of Dianne Feinstein, unanimously passed a resolution urging full city support for educational and employment programs to assist Vietnam veterans.

The resolution requests that Mayor Alioto appoint a Citizens Advisory Committee for Vietnam era veterans.

Feinstein stated, "Because of the cessation of hostilities in the Vietnam war and consequent troop withdrawals there has been a critical need of assistance to Vietnam era veterans with respect to educational and training programs available."

She concluded that the Veterans Educational Incentive Program of the San Francisco Community College District, together with other organizations dedicated to the welfare of Vietnam era veterans, is pursuing its primary objective of encouraging unemployed veterans to further their education and find meaningful employment. Nevertheless, it is essential that the entire community join in a concentrated effort which will insure that today's veterans receive adequate financial assistance, jobs, emotional and social adjustment.

The resolution urges the Civil Service Commission to structure its recruitment and procurement techniques in such a way as to extend every opportunity for meaningful employment.

The Citizens Advisory Committee's objectives will be to initiate and participate in programs which will focus public attention to the many critical problems of Vietnam era veterans of San Francisco; to assure greater dissemination of information concerning opportunities and services available; and to assist in the establishment and maintenance of full cooperation between city and county and veterans organizations.

Gary Tom, VEIP director, confirmed the resolution saying, "A selected advisory committee would be able to coordinate the many services for veterans. The committee could establish communication between veterans agencies and organizations which would provide a continual exchange of up-to-date information and perpetuate inner action and understanding between different veterans groups."

The VEIP is sponsored by the San Francisco Community College District and funded through a federal grant by the Emergency Employment Act. The program provides 200 part-time jobs for Vietnam era veterans who wish to attend the City College of San Francisco or one of the San Francisco Adult Schools.

Funding for the program ends June 1973. President Nixon's cut in Health, Education & Welfare funds leaves the future of many programs in question. Unless the City and County of San Francisco gives financial support for these programs many people will be forced to apply for welfare. Participants in these programs, while paying state withholding taxes, will not be eligible by law to receive unemployment compensation.

"PADRE" — Father Wilton Smith of the Newman Center greets Associated Students President Juan Galvan.

Newman Center Extends an Invitation

If there is one goal of the Newman Center, located at 210 Phelan Ave., Father Wilton Smith related it best: "We are trying to build a greater Christian consciousness on this campus."

Fondly pet-named "Padre," the soft-spoken gentle man with a plaid woolen shirt over his "collar" is commonly seen walking around on campus and conversing with students.

When asked about activities, Smith responded with a moment's thought: "We have camping trips, parties, visits with neighborhood shut-ins, hospitals, and St. Elizabeth's Home for Un-Wed Mothers."

Also on hand was Newman Center secretary, Vickki Ballardo, a member of the Center since Fall '71.

Ms. Ballardo pointed out that there is a real need for the Newman Center. "The campus can be impersonal and students here are able to grow on social, spiritual, and civic levels to become aware of what Christian love is all about."

Smith then added, "The Newman Membership welcomes everyone who is interested in meeting more people and learning more about the Christian Community, and to visit the Center and participate in its programs."

Anyone who wants to visit the Center is in for a treat. Father Smith gives very interesting tours. It should be added that although the Center looks like an ordinary house on the outside, it is indeed, not so ordinary on the inside. Upon entering the "house," one feels like they are in much more than a house. They have entered a family home.

As usual, Father Smith said it best: "I would love to see more people here during the day. We have a great thing here and I'd like to see more people take advantage of it."

The invitation is open.

Looking Back:

1963 -- It Was a Very Good Year

Just ten short years ago at City College, these were some of the stories that were making headlines in The Guardsman.

Bill Silver was elected as President in an election in which only AS card holders were eligible to vote. But then, in a previous special election in which only AS card holders could vote, it had been decided to keep voting rights only to card holders themselves.

Thirty Hotel and Restaurant students took over major positions at the St. Francis Hotel for a day. Hotel positions from managing director to pastry chef were taken on by fourth semester students who worked side by side with the regularly assigned hotel employees. The check-out rate for that day was not reported.

A college poll revealed a general apathy and ignorance about Student Government and its purposes. (Has the college really changed?)

A campus police officer attacked a speeding car on Phelan Ave. by jumping in front of the auto and smashing a rear window as the car swerved to avoid hitting him. The driver of the car called the city police, who in the end, cited the driver for speeding and failure to comply with a (campus) officer's instructions. (They sure don't make them like they used to.)

The Rams basketball team completed a 13-1 pre-season record. This year's team seems to be keeping up.

Coach Roy Diederichsen believed his tennis squad was potentially the best since 1948. (And Coach Dierderichsen is still on the job.)

There was actually a Sophomore Ball at the St. Francis Hotel with a penny-a-vote candidate elected king and queen. (White socks with black loafers, no doubt.)

The Shack (general hang-out and mini student union) was closed after vandalism during the Christmas vacation. Most of the reasons for the closing of the Shack were centered around the fact that "students here cannot police themselves."

Ah, yes, 1963 was a very good year. And the flat-top haircut was still in. Butch Wax, anyone?

Editorial:

US-Preoccupied With Violence?

Violence—is it as All American as motherhood, apple pie, hot dogs and baseball? Is it a part of our way of life that we have learned to accept? Or is it an inherent part of man's nature?

You can sell a lot of products to people by using or including violence. But you only anger a few people with its use.

Society's attitudes towards violence seem to have taken on a Jekyll and Hyde position. On the one hand we are appalled, but on the other we are curious, interested, and even demanding to see it.

While most of us are sickened with the descriptions and pictures of the horrors of Vietnam, we are the same public that twice paid to see The Wild Bunch.

Our dual attitude towards violence is expressed by Paul Krassner in The Realist: "In (the film) Harold and Maude, we are skillfully manipulated into unashamedly guffawing at the same bits which would horrify us in a different context: hanging, hand-chopping, drowning, self-immolation."

The Godfather with it's violence and bloodletting stirred a good sized ripple of opposition to violence and yet it may become the biggest money-making picture in history.

What is the fascination that makes a family (on Mother's Day yet!) park their car alongside the highway and walk up to view the twisted metal and the bodies of a head-on automobile accident that occurred just minutes before.

Even some of our leisure time is dedicated to viewing violence in sports. Has the football field and the boxing ring of today replaced the Roman gladiator pit of the past?

In a recent survey, ice hockey fans said that the most exciting part of the game is the brawls which occur between the teams.

Violence sells books, films and newspapers. In all the media, in fact, violence has been given to us in steadily more and more graphic details and we have learned to accept it.

Has the public become desensitized and therefore accepts violence; or is it that man has always seen that striking out at others is an inherent reaction, and the viewing of violence part of man's inherent curiosity?

If man were considered just an animal, he could accept violence. But man is an intelligent creature. Yet violence is a way of life, of policy, and of fascination.

YES, SHE SAILED AWAY, (But She Has Our Permission). The former Dorry Coppoletta and her new husband, Marco Hellman, are honeymooning aboard he 98-foot sailing yacht, "Lamadine," somewhere in the Caribbean. Dorry, Journalism Department Chairman at City, is the widow of Dr. Joseph Coppoletta of Piedmont, who served as Navy Captain in the medical corps. Mr. Hellman, who has served as Vice-Chairman of the Board of Directors of Dean Witter and Company, was also recently widowed. The new Mr. and Mrs. Hellman will return to their Pacific Avenue home in San Francisco about March 1st. Dorry will be back at her desk on or about that date.

La Raza Offers Help for Latinos

"Many things need to be done, but participation is starting to look good." These are the words of Edwin Lugo, chairman of La Raza Unida, the Latin students association here at CCSF.

The purpose of La Raza Unida is to help Latin students at CCSF in any way possible. This is accomplished through social activities, adequate representation in student affairs, a book and free lunch program, and promotion of culturally-related activities. La Raza Unida is presently becoming involved in community and political action with the Mission Coalition organization.

In the area of social activities, La Raza has four dances and a raffle planned this semester.

With more representation of Student Council and Board of Governors' meetings, La Raza hopes to have a bigger voice in the hiring of teachers, counselors and administrators; and the setting up of relevant curriculum changes.

"There are about 20 students on the active membership and we're trying to get as many students involved as possible" stated Chairman Lugo. "But with the cutbacks in money by the college a lot of Latino students are dropping out because of lack of financial assistance." There is money available at present for books and free lunches. Latino students must apply at Bungalow 6, the "drop-in center" for La Raza Unida.

There are no requirements for membership; only that students should be interested and attend the meetings on Tuesday at 11 a.m.

Malcolm X Remembered

February 21 marks the eighth anniversary of the assassination of Malcolm X, perhaps the greatest organizer of his generation.

Malcolm's mission was to free Black people from obvious prejudices, social and economic.

He was born in Omaha, Nebraska May 19, 1925 of a mulatto mother and a Black father, the Reverend Earl Little.

MALCOLM X — "No one can take away the credit he deserves."

Malcolm's destiny was written for him at a tender age. His father, who spread the teachings of Marcus Garvey's "Back to Africa" doctrine was brutally murdered by white lynchmen. Malcolm recalled, "he was attacked and then laid across some tracks for a street car to run over him."

Unlike Dr. Martin Luther King who preached and lived non-violence Malcolm advocated not violence and not "turning the other cheek" but protecting thy self by any and all means necessary. As a result he was called a hate monger and other names by some but the logic of his beliefs remained.

As people shout "Power to the People, Black Power, I'm Black and I'm Proud" and other such slogans they should also realize that Malcolm is one big reason they do. The great orator told Black people to stop being ashamed of their color because of untruths that had been spread and that they were believing.

Before Malcolm began his crusade through the ghettoes Blacks were confused about their identity and their potential because of stereotypes heaped on them since the first slave ship ride.

There is no measuring how much impact Malcolm had on Black youth. "The Autobiography of Malcolm X" alone was cause for changes in the thinking of young Blacks.

The autobiography was a required reading for students on the junior high level and above. Everyone could tell when Malcolm's word had spread because it was commonplace to hear someone quote him.

A well informed man, he had only an eighth grade education but he taught himself brilliantly. He said he wouldn't advise it for anyone else because what worked o him might not work for someone else.

Often Malcolm stated how he would like to have finished school if his busy schedule would have permitted. He recognized the importance of having a good education. One of his major contributions that is overlooked is the fact that his influence got many dropouts to get back in school or self-educate — whatever was best for the individual.

All in all, Malcolm got Black America together. And like everybody else who ever attempted the same, Malcolm was felled by assassins' bullets during a speech at the Audubon Ballroom.

Today the Black Muslims may try to make it sound like Malcolm X never existed. But they or no one else can make away the credit he deserves.

QUESTION: What Is Your Definition of Masculinity?

Dave Giorgi—Physical Education.
Masculinity is long hair and what you want to do. It is not to be chauvinistic but to grow physically as well as mentally. It is to be in a centerfold.

Paulette Pittman—Anthropology.
Being straightforward, honest and carrying yourself so that you project a good image is masculine. It is not too flashy of a dress, walking with your head held high and a nice bright smile.

Valerie Hastings, Nina Canavarro, Sue Reichert—Art.
Masculinity is a man who is sure enough of himself to be what he is. It is recognizing woman's femininity and respecting her womanhood. A man who isn't concerned about his masculinity is masculine.

Walter Wotman—Psychology.
Masculinity is to be able to grow hair in abundant numbers. It is to maintain the upper position in all relationships and to be able to know which ones do and which ones don't.

Francine Wong—English.
Masculinity is acting, being and knowing you're a man. It's not asserting your "maleness." I think it's just being true to your own nature.

Richard Garcia—Elementary Education.
Masculinity is an oppressive term used to categorize and separate one human being from another. It's just one of society's pigeonholes. I prefer to be a human being.

Winterland:

"Superfly" Doesn't Get Off Ground

In the January Winterland concerts it seemed that the top billed groups didn't show as well as the supporting acts people did or didn't come to see.

Everybody knows that Winterland was packed to the seams because Eric Burdon and War was there and not because of the Elvin Bishop Group.

Nevertheless, the Bishop group got the audience worked up to a frenzy and was called back for three encores.

War dressed in their mod L.A. clothes and mood were stiff and didn't get the loud cheers that they have in the past.

Second billed Tower of Power was a hard act for Curtis Mayfield to follow because Mayfield came half-cocked.

On record Curtis plays with string and horn accompaniment in addition to his quartet. But in his first Winterland engagement all he had backing him was a rhythm guitar, bass and drums.

Tower of Power, East Bay Grease as they're sometimes referred to, played like they were at a big party. Along with good jazzrock they played a number of selections that made them famous like "Down To The Nightclub," "Bump City" and "You're Still A Young Man."

Although Mayfield and group have won many fans through the years and more recently hit it big with his "Superfly" album, he was uninspiring. It seems that the band has gotten all the mileage it can out of its old reportoire and it's time for some new material from them.

Grant Awarded to Opera Program

A grant by the National Opera Institute has been awarded for the second year to the Merola Opera Program in support of its 1973 summer program.

In recognition of the Merola Opera Program's continuing development of young American talent, the Institute's $19,000 award will go to provide ten weeks of subsistence, plus travel allowances, for the professional singers selected from the finalists in the thirteen regions where auditions are scheduled for the 20th Annual San Francisco Opera Auditions. They will be from February 28th through May 19th, with a first time audition in New York.

In addition to the subsistence awards, participants will have the opportunity to compete for four awards in the grand finals in San Francisco in June, and at the summer's end, for two additional prizes.

A fully-staged opera, as well as a public concert by the finalists, at the San Francisco Midsummer Festival in Sigmund Stern Grove will be the featured performances. Two other performances will be presented at the Paul Masson Mountain Winery in Saratoga.

Participants will spend two-and-a-half months in San Francisco training under the supervision of Kurt Herbert Adler, general director of San Francisco Opera, with members of his staff and other specialists.

At the conclusion of the summer performances, the participants will be considered for engagement by the San Francisco Opera, Spring Opera Theater, and Western Opera Theater.

Athletic Programs Defended

With the recent election controversy surrounding the athletic department's funds, people have been arguing the program's merits, perhaps without really knowing enough about it.

People against the program often ask: "Why should the students have to pay for the program?" This is only half true. The funding is a joint venture between the students and the school district.

The Associated Students pay for the team's transportation, lodging, and the game officials, plus approximately half of the injury insurance. The school district pays for equipment, supplies, entrance fees to meets, tournaments, etc. and the other half of the insurance.

The reason the students gripe, according to athletic director Ernest Domecus, is because "they don't have enough money to keep up with their end of the bargain." He also feels that the program is badly under-funded. He very emphatically stated that, "everyone that criticizes the program doesn't take the time to investigate it."

Since fan support and interest is a major key to a successful athletic program, and with interest at City at an all-time low, Domecus says, "the answer lies in better communication." What the program needs is a public relations man, he says.

Domecus calls the program "a vehicle to further one's education, plus it encourages students to come to school."

He and the other coaches not only have to coach, but also act as counselors.

According to Domecus, "it gives a chance to gauge oneself." Also since a large majority cannot qualify to go to a four-year school, it gives them a chance to display their abilities and hope they can further their education.

"The most important thing is for the person to get his degree and be able to make his own decisions," states Domecus.

This perhaps is the key in understanding the program.

The students can make or break the program. It's up to them!

Maryland to Ban Lead Birdshot

As a result of "continued foot-dragging" by the federal government, the state of Maryland may lead the nation in outlawing the use of toxic lead shot in waterfowl hunting.

Maryland Natural Resource Secretary, James B. Coulter, has announced that the state is seriously considering a ban of lead shot used in waterfowl hunting for the 1973-74 season.

The ban is being considered because of an annual estimated loss of three percent of the continent's waterfowl.

Ducks, geese, and swans feeding along heavily hunted marshes and lake bottoms frequently swallow the lead pellets fired from shotguns along with seeds and grit.

The toxic lead shot, which is absorbed by the blood stream, paralyzes the birds' organs and causes birds to starve to death even though food is plentiful.

Massive waterfowl die-offs due to lead shot poisoning have been reported for well over a century. Last year on Maryland's eastern shores, at least 4,500 geese alone were found dead or dying due to lead shot indigestion.

A test held in 1968 by the Bureau of Sport Fisheries and Wild Life study demonstrated that soft iron shot is suitable for waterfowl hunting.

However, the Department of Interior may be waiting for the results of testing being conducted by Winchester-Western at Nilo Farms, Illinois. The test is expected to last all winter and is patterned after the 1968 BSFW study.

"Chicks" Can't Play — Sez Who?

A ruling permitting girls to participate in sports previously taboo to them was tested for the first time in Southern California recently. The contest ended in a walk-off which is a new ending for a basketball game.

San Bernardino Valley College had lost their last five games. Their season's record was five won, 15 lost. Before the game with San Diego City College, Ms. Palmer and Ms. Ferguson worked out with the San Bernardino squad. At first the team did not like it, but at half-time the players wanted the girls in the game to start the second half.

With a little over three minutes left in the game, San Bernardino was ahead of San Diego 114-85, apparently because male members of the team did not want to look bad in front of the two girls, Ms. Palmer went into the game.

The San Diego coach called time out and asked his players if they wanted any further embarrassment. They did not, so they walked off the court, and did not return.

Omega Issues New Info Booklet to GIs

Allied Servicemen's San Francisco branch, Omega, has initiated a program to inform San Francisco veterans of the benefits available to them.

Recently, Omega compiled all state and federal benefits in a 10-page booklet.

These catalogs, as they are called, were distributed to veterans having their unit level recorded by V.A. counselors during class registration for the spring semester.

California's area director, Robert Hughes, the originator of this program, developed the idea for these catalogs from a veterans orientation booklet sent to him by another branch of the ASM at Newark's College of Engineering in New Jersey.

Omega began this project last November by sponsoring a two-hour seminar on veterans benefits. This catalog is the second stage of this program to inform veterans.

Hughes feels that these catalogs, which advise veterans they should join the ASM club to help it lobby for greater veterans benefits, will boost Omega's membership by 50 per cent.

In the future, Omega has a Northern California veternas conference scheduled for March 22, 1973.

Seventeen representatives from 60 Northern California colleges have already pledged to attend this conference which will feature California Senator Alan Cranston, chairman of the Senates' Veterans Affairs Committee.

The conference's purpose is to discuss political aspects of VA benefits, to set up a communications system between northern California veterans clubs, and to form an alliance to unify lobby action on pending state and federal legislation.

Frazier Wants Return Match With Hard-Hitting Foreman

Some things should be left as they are meant to be, but former heavyweight king, Joe Frazier, who was pummeled into oblivion, wants another crack at George Foreman's newly acquired title.

Recently, Smoking Joe appeared with athletic celebrities at a press conference designed to raise funds for children of US servicemen who are POW's and MIA's.

He admitted that the Jamaican massacre at the hands of Foreman was premature but the end wasn't near.

"I was prepared to be defeated but I didn't expect it to come so soon," he said.

Expected to be a more exciting fight than the Ali-Frazier match of not too long ago, it unfortunately was not. Though again both undefeated contestants were matched with a no-return clause and a huge tax-free commission in the balance, it proved to be about as exciting as the recent dosage of rain in the Bay Area.

Like the myths of David and Goliath, with two god-like bombs in the punishing fists of the 1968 Olympic Champion, George Foreman humbled the reputed "machine" of the boxing world. It was a sight unbecoming a fighter of such status.

Here was Joe "Smoking" Frazier, conquerer of all who knew what boxing meant, being shoved, battered and just plain out-classed by one who he was going to make into mince-meat.

The obvious came into the picture and wasn't dwelled upon too deeply; Joe Frazier was finished not only in the title bout but in his career.

In 4 minutes and 35 seconds, the duration of the fight, his lack of size and shorter punching reach of 5 inches cost him. His once proud resistance to heavy body punishment had waned.

In his place came into focus a bigger man who, unlike his predecessors, had a gentleness, a compassion for other things besides what people constantly bicker about — like money.

As Foreman puts it, "I must treat everybody good and when it is time to return the title, I'll give it up smiling."

Some say that Muhammud Ali, still considered the champ by many boxing fans, will, when given the opportunity, make sure what Frazier proposed to do.

With one who seems even larger and more believable than life, it doesn't seem likely. Big George is now really the "unstoppable."

He is on top of the hill and with all the marbles. Though maybe not endowed with the boxing finesse Ali possesses, he is, as of now, just as formidable. Blessed with pure power and ruggedness that even survived the blows of Frazier, it is unlikely that Muhammad, being seven years his senior and obviously slower, is going to stop Foreman.

If Joe Frazier ever does make it back up, he'll have to take the advice given aspiring fighters and "wait for an opening."

Say AHHHH!

The Dental Assisting class is offering tooth X-rays at no cost.

One important thing is that the X-rays taken at school can be presented to any dentist. Normally it costs around $30.

It is perfectly safe to have X-rays taken at CCSF because all work done is directed by an experienced instructor and all the equipment necessary for protection from X-rays is used.

The sign-up sheet is posted at room S-143 F. Signers will be contacted.

Jewish Club Opens to All

At first, it looks like an obscene poster. A second glance at the newest City college poster tells what is happening.

Hillel, the Free Jewish University, is now into the third year at CCSF. Rabbi Doctor Roger Herst is once again the director for Hillel at this college.

Hillel is a non-profit organization depending on donations from the Jewish community and students. Herst said "Right now we have a relatively small group at CCSF. But through word of mouth and these posters, we hope to reach all the students, Jewish or not."

Herst has been at Hillel for four years and has taught classes in Jewish history and mysticism. Rabbis Segal, Frankel and Lipner make up the rest of the adult faculty. However, Herst pointed out: "This is a student organization. We need your help to make this work."

Hillel offers a number of courses at CCSF, USF, and the Free University designed to enlighten students on Jewish culture, ideas and history. The courses range from 'Sexuality in Judaism' by Rabbi Segal to "Judaism and the Jesus Movement" with Alice Naumoff.

Some of the activities now planned are Shabbat Dinner and Oneg Shabbat every third Friday of each month. Retreats and bike trips are also scheduled. Student volunteers are needed to fill the vacancies for chairmen and workers.

The current semester schedule of the Free University is February through May, 1973 or Shevat-Nisan, 5733. For further information, contact the Hillel at 190 Denslowe Drive or call 333-4922. The CCSF Branch meets in A310 every Tuesday, 11-12. All students are invited.

Food -- Not Enough To Go Around

When walking by the campus canteen or driving by the corner grocery store, think how lucky it is that they are there. A lot of people don't have the luxury of a corner grocery or other such places to buy food.

Recently thirty South San Francisco High School students lived on what each person in the world would get if all the food were distributed equally—one meal a day. The food consisted of one cup of rice, one cup spinach and six ounces of dried milk which equals 266 calories.

The students started out their fast by seeing a film called "Child of Darkness Child of Light." The movie showed a young girl eating the foot of a vulture which was infested with flies.

At the end of the 72 hours "The Joy of Cooking" was shown. The students then made a dash for the nearest store.

While driving by the cornerstore, think of what some of the other people in the world eat.

USMC Recruiters Encounter Stiff Opposition from Vets, YSA

Last Friday several dozen students held a demonstration by the Ram in front of the cafeteria. The reason for the demonstration was the presence of two Marine Corps recruiters who had a table filled with books and pamphlets relating to USMC careers.

The men, Captain Larry A. Cooper and Sergeant George A. Hobbs, (looking like the Marines' finest in the traditional blue and brown uniform with spit-shined shoes) were affable and smiling, looking forward to another day of routine duty. Around noon, members of the Student Mobilization Committee and Young Socialist Alliance began to arrive.

The demonstrators, most in their early twenties, began chanting "Marines off campus!" and marching around the recruiters, who were talking to some younger students.

Sgt. Hobbs was informed that the demonstration was scheduled to get larger. When asked whether they were planning to stay, he said, "Hell, yes we're staying!"

The consensus of opinion among the council was to stop the demonstration by passing a resolution banning such recruiting activities on campus.

Vester Flanagan, Dean of Student Activities, stated that The Student Council had no jurisdiction to stop the activities of the recruiters and that that decision rested in the powers of Dr. Harry Buttimer, CCSF President. Flanagan offered to move the recruiters to Career Guidance, inside bungalow 401.

Attention was then called to the presence of the City College Vets, who had arrived on the scene at the demonstration, (building the crowd to about 100).

The veterans had locked arms and formed a circle around the recruiters while members of the YSA and SMC chanted, "Marines go home, Marines go home!"

Tom Csekey, spokesman for the veterans, read a prepared statement to the Marines saying that their presence was an "insult" to the 4,000 veterans on campus and that "this demonstration should serve as a warning to all other military recruiters."

Csekey went on to say that the City College Vets "will not tolerate" any such efforts in the future.

Dean Flanagan appeared in the crowd and announced that the Student Council had begun its debate on the matter in the Student Union Gang Room.

He then escorted Capt. Cooper and Sgt. Hobbs to the security of his office. The demonstrators then filed into the council meeting.

The council heard statements from the veterans that they wanted the Marines off campus. Juan Galvan, student body president, told them the recruiters would be moved out of the area to Career Guidance. The vets voiced disapproval of the idea and said they would demonstrate until the Marines had left. The council then voted unanimously to ban "any and all further recruitment activities" from the campus.

After the council meeting, Galvan met with the Marines and informed them of the Student Council's decision.

Smith Hall Extension

CCSF Continues to Expand

BUILD WE MUST — Hotel and Restaurant student (above) takes time out from lunch as workmen (right) bang away at the new H & R extension behind Statler Wing. (Photos by Gerald Louie)

City College of San Francisco seems to need more and more rooms as the number of students and courses are increasing.

The construction at rear of Statler Wing will not become a high rise building with many floors as many students expected it to be. It is just an expansion and remodelling of Smith Hall.

"Many more of the existing buildings will be remodelled and be expanded to fulfill the needs of the departments," said Mr. Victor B. Graff. He is an Associate Director of Facilities and Planning Department.

Adding to his explanations, Mr. Graff also outlined, "the remodelling and expansion of Smith Hall will include rooms for a larger library, and on the lower level, an expanded food service and Front Office laboratories.

In the upper level, Hotel and Restaurant counselling office, the faculty dining room, and refrigeration spaces are being remodeled and relocated. In addition to that, he said, an office for project "Feast" is being built.

Most of these rooms will be used by Hotel and Restaurant Department.

Remodelling and expansion of Smith Hall will have nearly the same appearance in structure as that of its East side. Mr. Graff explained that the process of this expansion will cost approximately half a million dollars. This money comes from the budget and from City College Foundation.

Mr. Graff didn't hide the fact that the real problem is money. "We can't build new buildings if we don't have the money. And that is the reason we are trying to remodel and expand the existing buildings," he stated.

In a two-year period, expansion and

CRIME ON CAMPUS:

Robbery, Shooting In Cafeteria

Crime at City College? Theft of bicycles, typewriters and other items of value found around City College are not uncommon, but last Friday the cafeteria was the scene of an armed robbery and shooting.

About 1:10 pm, February 23, Smith Hall's "Ramble Inn" was held up by a lone gunman. After taking an as yet undetermined amount of cash, he ran through the cafeteria towards Statler Wing, chased by an unidentified former H and R student who was visiting his brother at the cafeteria.

Following the suspect through the east door of the cafeteria, the former H and R student missed the panic bar on the door; his hand went through the glass, but he was not seriously injured.

A student standing nearby the door to Statler saw the suspect turn and fire his gun; apparently to frighten off any would-be pursuers. At this time, Ken Craig, a former City College policeman, ran to Cloud Hall to alert the police. "After doing that," Craig commented, "I saw a crowd of people (H & R students) chasing him down through the parking lot behind the Student Union towards the gyms so I began to chase him also."

By this time police were at the scene along with the H & R students and chased the suspect into the archery field. Lt. Ken Adair, involved in the chase, was following the suspect into the archery field when, "I saw four or five people throwing rocks at the suspect apparently to dislodge the gun from his hand," quoted Adair.

"At that point the suspect turned around, dropping the money; I noticed that he had his gun raised so I dove for the ground and fired three shots over my head. The H & R students ran for cover and I put out a call for assistance. The suspect ran towards the 280 freeway overpass and jumped a retaining wall. I lost sight of the suspect at Marston and Circular Avenues."

Police from Balboa Station and the SF police helicopter were also on the scene but could not locate the suspect. Out of $120.00 cash taken, $44.10 was recovered, along with parts of the suspect's clothing. Even though calm has now returned to the cafeteria many fear it COULD happen again. Eight years ago student council decided to remove the uniformed policeman from the cafeteria area. The recent robbery might because for the student government to reconsider that decision.

Alleged "Waye Of Repression:"

Communists to Picket Israeli Consulate

The CCSF Revolutionary Communist Youth (RCY) will demonstrate tomorrow, March 2 at 12 noon at the Israeli Consulate to protest alleged suppression of political dissenters in Israel.

The demonstration, at 105 Montgomery St., will take the form of a "legal informational picket line," according to RCY President Sue Miles.

Ms. Miles explained the reasons for the demonstration: "The response of the ruling class of Israel to the renewed upsurge in militancy on the part of the Israeli working class has been a wave of repression directed against left-wing organizations beginning with arrests of members of the Red Flag, The Anti-Zionist Organization, and the Revolutionary Communist Alliance (Struggle)

RCY will demonstrate under the slogans: "Defend the Israeli Militants," "For the unconditional defense of the left against bourgeois repression!," and "For international working class solidarity!" The Communist group is inviting all organizations and individuals who agree with their slogans to participate, "under their own banners if desired."

BBC Films CCSF Aftermath of Vietnam War

A British Broadcasting Company film team were recently the guests of the City College Vets, an on-campus veterans fraternity. The group will be part of a TV documentary called, "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," BBC filmed part of the CC Vets regular Frida-noon meeting.

Frank Smith, BBC producer, was asked why he was taking an interest in the CCSF Vets. He replied, "The BBC is making a long documentary on the effects of war now that the American involvement in Vietnam is ending. The CCSF Vets will be part of the film."

Highlights of the film center around a war widow, whose husband was killed in Vietnam, a POW's wife whose husband hasn't returned,the Vietnam Veterans Against The War in Washington, Congressman Pete McCloskey, a West Point graduate and an unemployed veteran here in San Francisco.

The film is scheduled to be released in England by the end of March. It is not known yet whether or not it will be shown on American TV.

School Improvement Money Allocated

Proposition 1, the $160 million bond act voted into action last November, has taken effect with the sale of $15 million in capital outlay bonds which will be used to build or equip Community College projects.

This first use of funds allocated by Proposition 1 was overseen by Ivy Baker Priest. For sale were Community College bonds along with $15 million in bonds for health and science facilities at the University of California.

Other bond sales will be scheduled after July 1. This rate of release was determined by review of the State Department of Finance and the Chancellor's Office. They figured that $15 million would last the Community College system until the end of the fiscal year.

Proposition 1 is designed to provide for construction, site acquisition, and equipment in the 69 Community College districts throughout the state.

$43 million worth of Community College capital outlay projects were approved in the 1972-73 state budget; an additional number of projects are being considered by the 1973-74 Legislature.

States Fight US "Legal Abortion" Rule

State governments are moving with extreme caution to implement the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling giving women the right to obtain abortions.

Women seeking abortions are still being referred to such states as California and New York where abortion laws were already liberalized before the court's ruling.

The anti-abortion forces, caught off guard by the liberal ruling, are trying to marshall support for a constitutional amendment to prohibit abortion. They may ask the President for an executive "order of noncompliance" with the ruling.

The Supreme Court on January 22 stated that the state could have no voice in a woman's decision to have an abortion during the first twelve weeks of pregnancy. In the second trimester, the state can only impose medical regulations to protect the woman's health.

The court held that the state could prohibit abortion to protect fetal life only in the last third of pregnancy.

Since the ruling, at least 18 states have introduced or are working on legislation to bring their laws into conformity with it.

However, the Virginia state legislature has rejected such a bill. In at least five other states, authorities have supported the old restrictive laws.

In some states official reaction has served to delay implementation of the court's decision.

In other states, anti-abortion legislators are formulating bills intended to stem the expected demand for abortion.

These bills would include tight restrictions on the grounds for abortions done in the second trimester, and some would require doctors to report the names of all women having abortions.

LOOKING BACK:

Let's Bring Back the 50's?

The old yellowing pages of the February 1953 Guardsman held forth these stories:

Instructor Phyllis Haley taught a course in psychology on television station KPIX, titled "Know Yourself Better." Viewers could listen and then take two midterms and a final and hopefully earn one unit of college credit. ("Touch that dial and you flunk!")

A "deferment test" for male students was going to be given to those students who wanted to be given occupational deferments from the draft. (The majority of "dodgers" then were probably in school or in Brooklyn.)

To inspire enthusiasm for the college basketball team, a college hour rally was to be held in the auditorium. "At press time the Student Council had not yet voted on whether this rally will be open to everyone or just to members of the Associated Students."

From the Associated Collegiate Press, we quote: "Student deferments may not be here to stay," according to Lewis B. Hershey, Selective Service Director. "The time for action is almost here," says Hershey. "Now that the drafting of fathers looms as an imminent necessity in the not so distant future, we certainly must look toward the colleges with something more than an appraising eye."

"Thirty diamond enthusiasts met for their first meeting." Simply translated, that means the baseball team held their first meeting for a player count.

A blasting sports editorial criticized college basketball teams for seeking headlines with outlandish styles of play, recruiting better players, and publicizing high scoring players, probably at the cost of winning all their games.

Just remember . . . you're living tomorrow's memories today, so don't blow it!

Violence on Campus:

Teacher "Mugged" In Classroom

Last Thursday night, Jack Muny, part-time instructor from John O'Connell, was robbed and beaten on campus

According to the Chief of Campus Security, Mr. Muny was alone in his classroom grading papers, when an unknown assailant walked in and punched him in the mouth. At that time another person of unknown identity came in and took his wallet and keys and stole his car.

College, UC Master Plan Attacked

A bipartisan State Legislative Report recently stated that the California 1960 Master Higher Educational Plan discriminated against the poor, minorities and older people.

The "master plan" includes the University of California, State Universities and Community Colleges. Currently UC takes most of its students from the top 12.5 percent of California high school graduates. The State Universities take the top third, while the Community Colleges take all high school graduates. Presently California's colleges can admit four percent of students who lack the grades to qualify for admission. The Legislative Report recommends that the percentage be increased from four percent to 12.5 percent.

The report advises California Colleges to counsel prospective students instead of using a hard-sell technique. In order to counsel more prospective students, it was suggested that counseling centers be established throughout the state, especially in remote areas.

Suggested in the report was a commission of citizens to act as advisors for the State Colleges, and inclusion of students on college boards (as non-voters).

The final recommendation was for the Governor to appoint board members from a list provided by prominent citizens. This list would not have to be approved by the State Senate.

Financial Aids Cut At UC

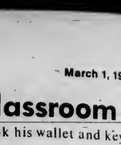
The University of California at Berkeley is faced with a serious problem which could force thousands of students to leave school because of federal cutbacks in financial aid.

The cutbacks would affect both undergraduate and graduate students. Currently one third of the undergraduates get aid. Graduate students face cuts in fellowships and training grants. The cuts amounted to more than three million dollars.

The university's Public Health Department stands to lose $80,000 in grants. The foreign language department will lose money for 300 students and twelve teachers.

The Nixon budget eliminates $820,000 in grants for 970 students and 2.4 million in loans. This means that students would be forced to go to banks for money (with interest rates at seven percent).

Nixon's new plan provides an increase for needy students but there is much "red tape" involved. The plan would provide one half of students costs up to $1,400 a year but this means new forms to fill out which have not been printed yet.



For Fall '74 students the forms would have to be out by May of this year with a filing deadline of October 1973.

Students won't be the only ones affected. Lawrence Laboratory in Livermore might lose 210 employees as part of a cutback by the Atomic Energy Commission because of existing and possible cuts in their budget.

QUESTION: "What is Your Definition of Femininity?"

"Sil" Silvestri—Pre-Med

My definition of femininity is Albert B. I have always had trouble keeping beautiful women off my back because of my tremendous resemblance to Joe Willy Namath.

Lynne Nishio—General Education

I guess describing the nature of female existence. Actually, I see the female as one of the polarities which characterize the nature of all phenomenal existences. It is relative to masculinity. Men are men and women are women.

Marco Pollacchi—Mathematics

Taking a bubble bath, scared of bugs, legs, breasts, perfume and smooth skin are all feminine. I think good thoughts about women. I am not chauvinistic but the only thing men cannot figure out is women.

Vita Rivers—Medical Record Technology

Every woman knows she is a woman. She should be able to do what she wants to do.

Darilyn Broskui—Pre-Nursing

I go along with the stereotype role that a girl supposedly acts out in society. I think, contrary to popular belief, the feminine role is the backbone of youth in society.

Mabel Gong—Nursing

I am not for everything in women's lib but I do agree with some of their points. The idea of being able to do everything a man can do is not being feminine.

DRAMA:

"Les Blancs" Scheduled for CCSF Stage

Les Blancs was Lorraine Hansbury's last play before her death at the age of 34. The play is about a struggling African nation trying to overthrow the white minority domination.

"This is an excellent, highly emotional play with good characterizations and superb technical aspects." Les Blancs ("The Whites"), has a large cast of both black and white actors, male and female.

The third CCSF production of the current theater season, Les Blancs is under the direction of Bob Frierson. "The technical aspects of this play are difficult but I am sure the advanced drama production class will do an excellent job."

"The cast is a rather large one: of different proportions, depending on the size of the rebelling mobs. Right now I am looking for extras to come on stage to shoot guns at everybody."

The play is scheduled for the weekend of March 30-31, and the first weekend in April (6-7). Anyone interested who wants to be an extra can contact the director in the CCSF Theater Arts Building everyday between 2 p m and 5 p m

Film

BERGMAN — "Knows how to get the most out of his cast." Erland Josephson and Liv Ullman (above) play husband and wife in Ingmar Bergman's Cries and Whispers.

Bergmans "Work of Genius"

Cries and Whispers, Ingmar Bergman's new film, recently opened its premiere engagement at the Surf Theatre. It is already critically acclaimed, winning four New York Film Critics awards, including "Best Picture."

The story is frankly simple but of course the film is not. But brevity of the story helps to give the film an even pace that occasionally explodes only to burst gently.

The story after all gives the impression that it is only a vehicle, one with integrity of course, for Bergman's plans. The star is really this reunion of forces that have made Bergman famous as a filmmaker.

The main characters are female, bringing together past "Bergman" actresses Harriet Anderson, Liv Ullmann, Ingrid Thulin and Kari Sylwan. All give outstanding performances proving again the well known banality that Bergman knows how to get the most out of his cast.

Also figuring in this reunion is Cinematographer Sven Nykvist who has worked on most of Bergman's films. The photography is pristine, formal as a lens can be. Most of the transitions go through a dissolve to a blood red screen. Red dominates the colors of the film prompting one to suggest a new category of Roger Corman Red.

There are all the usual startling revelations of life, death, anguish and everyday existence, women and love too.

Each of the main characters, have their "stories" told through a series of flashbacks and an evolving present that has its lapses as well.

Reflection is the main activity of the women in the film. Only the maid has a clearly established task. The surviving sisters are shown in dramatic flashbacks with their husbands but the latter only enter the present at the end.

There is a spectacular self-mutilation by Ingrid Thulin and a believable attempted suicide by Liv Ullmann's husband. Other than these high points of action (there is also the realistic death of Harriet Anderson) the women have gathered in their family estate to attend to the end of their sister's lingering illness.

Roger Corman in an unusual coup has bought distribution rights. More famous for the Vincent Price horrors, Corman has gone outside his normal range of products to get this "art" package.

From all sides Cries and Whispers is being called a work of genius. Its run at the Surf Theatre will continue through the first two weeks of April.

Record Review:

Yusef Lateef - "Proof of Consistent Artistry"

Through the years Yusef Lateef has been consistently making good albums and his latest Hush 'N' Thunder positively reasserts his artistry.

Always taking a different approach, Yusef works with various artists to achieve different moods in Hush 'N' Thunder. Among them drummer "Tootie" Heath, pianist Ray Bryant and guitarist Cornell Dupree.

In addition, the J.C. White Singers add that gospel flavor to "His Eye Is On The Sparrow" and "This Old Building."

Hush 'N' Thunder is a wellbalanced album that has many faces. "Come Sunday," the opening track is the outstanding classical offering on which Yusef plays tenor sax with accompaniment by Kenny Barron on cello.

Four other tracks, "Destination Paradise," "Prayer," "His Eye Is On The Sparrow" and "This Old Building," are drummerless (but the beautiful music up front provided by organist Al White and Kenny Barron on piano makes the absence go unnoticed).

If I didn't have Hush 'N' Thunder already, I'd go get it.

RECORD REVIEW:

Elton John-Diversity And A Few "Lemons"

With the release of his fifth album, Elton John shows us that even a guy who wears bermuda shorts and jumps on pianos can't be all that crazy.

John's long rise to fame started in the summers of '70 and '71 during the hard rock drought that brought to fame James Taylor and Cat Stevens among others. After an obscure first album, Elton hit the charts with a pair of really beautiful recordings.

Your Song and Tumbleweed Connection were albums of melodical love songs out of which Your Song and Country Comfort emerged. It established him as one of the leading music makers of the 70s.

Madman Across the Water was his experimental album; big on the charts, low on the ratings. The heavy orchestration took away any traces of Elton's stage act that was vital to the excitement of the album.

Honky Chateau was the album that really thrust John into superstardom and one of the leading record sellers in the business. It broke the AM teeny-bopper stations and every kid on the block knew the words to Rocket Man.

Don't Shoot Me I'm Only the Piano Player is John's most diverse album. There are touches of the past, some real lemons; others remind you of Tumbleweed Connection and some are never before heard rockers.

Some of the better numbers like Elderberry Wine, Texan Love Song and Daniel are up to the standards expected from John. Have Mercy on the Criminal sounds like one of the better numbers from Madman. Most of the others like I'm Going to be a Teenage Idol and High Flying Bird are in the style a la Honky Chateau, except for Crocodile Rock which is a moving rocker but played to death by the radio stations.

Anyway the album is enjoyably listenable, although I know that the man could do a bit better if he really tried. If you really dig the man, it's worth the bread; if you never heard of him, Tumbleweed Connection is still your best bet.

Laney Forces CCSF Into Playoff for League Championship

"Halloween" came early to City College cagers last week. It was a treat for the full house of spectators but a "trick" in the end. Against arch-rival Laney College of Oakland, the Rams blew a thriller in a loss of 60-58.

With but seven seconds left, trailing only by a bucket, all that mattered was placed in the hands of forward Flash Atchan. But under the pressure both from Laney and the crowd, fumbled the ball away on an in-bound pass at half court and lost the game.

For the Rams, it was a game that meant a lot even though some signs indicated otherwise. An emotionally draining ordeal, it was all too evident in the glum silence found in the Ram dressing room at game's end. "We didn't want to get into this situation, but now we have to win the last two remaining games," said Carl Franks, assistant to Coach Phelan.

Fourth-ranked in the junior college circuit and posting a 10-1 record prior to the Laney game, one more victory would have cinched a berth in the state championship.

But the heroics of Phelan and his players were in vain. "We came so close that even as lousy as we played later, we only lost by two," Phelan stated sadly.

FLASH ATCHAN — "Fumbled."

It would have been a victory of extreme significance, as it was the game which would decide who would dominate the play-offs, though in the end nothing was settled.

But for Flash Atchans, the game's final outcome was about as significant as a taco in a desert. Against the much taller Eagles, with a fighting effort on both ends, Atchans floated over the top of the rim like a crusading cougar to wrestle away many important rebounds. Throughout the second half, he kept the game alive with his inspirational play when teammate Bob Pruitt was shut out defensively.

"I'm sure my lack of rebounding hurt us," said Pruitt, usually the City's stalwart defensive. "But you can be sure we are going to beat 'em bad the next chance we get; and that's a promise!" At this stage of the season, one wouldn't want to argue.

"The Flash" did offset his later error with 12-point production and a game high tally of nine rebounds. Placing the blame on himself, however, he wasn't one to take praise.

From the onset, it was a game that would have its rivalries. But nobody counted on the officiating being biased. On many occasions, questionable calls by the refs were made (not in City's favor). To top this, even obvious goaltending calls were "swept under the rug." On one occasion, guard Dave Smith (high scorer with 16 points), had to look twice to see if his opponent was called for the infraction and not he.

BOBBY PRUITT — "Vowed revenge"

The situation at this point is tight but if the Rams are anywhere as sound as their record indicates, they will make it to the state championship yet.

Special Report:

What's Wrong With the Bookstore?

Many students claim, for one reason or another, that the Associated Students Bookstore is a "big rip-off" and several of the faculty are convinced that whatever their problem with ordering textbooks, the bookstore is to blame.

Newly-elected Associated Student Body President, Juan Galvain, favors having the Associated Student Body "take over the total operation of the bookstore."

Charges and counter-charges regarding the business practices of the bookstore have gone on for years. Five years ago an investigation concerning charges of nepotism and mismanagement was instigated against the bookstore. Alleged irregularities broke down into three categories: hiring and staffing policies, business practices (i.e., pricing), and quality of service.

Accordingly, most of the malpractices alleged to have been committed by the bookstore were corrected. A committee was formed to survey bookstore policies. The committee, with English Instructor Ray Early as Committee Chairman, meets regularly with the bookstore manager, Richard Main. The committee report on its findings to the Academic Senate and to the Student Council.

Bookstore manager, Main, who has been in the business of buying and selling books for nearly forty years, states that "The committee is a waste of time, because all they do is rehash material that has already been discussed."

MANAGER — Dick Main

Main believes that the bookstore is at a disadvantage because CCSF is the largest Northern California junior college which has the smallest bookstore. He personally orders 70 percent of all required texts at CCSF.

"The prices that students pay for their new books are set by the publisher and not by us," he continued.

"The bookstore is in operation for the benefit of the Student Body. It is obligated to pay forty to fifty percent of its earnings to the Associated Students for the next fifty years," he stated. The bookstore is non-profit and therefore pays no Federal Income Tax.

Main added he would like to be able to aid students in the matter of textbook costs. "If only we could sell our new books for used and knock off a dollar or so there," he said, "But we couldn't do that because of the trouble that it would get us into with our publishers."

Instructors and students alike bemoan the problem of not getting books on time. Main explained that it is mostly the fault of instructors who add or drop courses in the middle of a semester and don't inform the bookstore. This results in overordering or shortages causing higher overhead costs. The bookstore management is in part responsible for problems of supply he admitted.

Citing his reordering system as quite efficient with regard to reprint schedules and the various out-of-stock and out-of-print dates; Main went on to say, "The system for supply is as nearly perfect as we can make it."

Others, including faculty members, have blamed many of the continuing problems with the bookstore on the archaic and overly-rigid laws governing the city bureaucracy: "The problems of communication between CCSF administration and the City-regulated Associated Students Bookstore are the result of the too strict laws governing City bureaucracy," explained Ed Duckworth, instructor in Physics-Astronomy, who began the investigation of bookstore policies five years ago.

remodelling constructions will be done on most of the existing buildings on campus Mr. Graff stressed, "We are going to remode the three existing Bungalow 200 series to become a Health Center; this costs $76,000 with six to nine months before the center will be ready."

He added "The whole Science Building is going to be remodelled starting this summer, and will be finished by Fall '74. This is being done by two-thirds of the existing budget; one-third comes from Proposition 1 (community college construction bonds passed at the last November election)."

In addition to this, there is a plan by Facilities and Planning Department to remodel two more Bungalows (400 series) for a Radio Technology laboratory.

He also mentioned that most of the buildings on this campus were designed by Mr. Milton T. Pflueger who is an architect.

Asked about the proposed Cloud Hall East extension wing, Mr. Graff concluded that the design is still in Sacramento for approval by the Chancellor and the Legislature's Finance Committee.

The A.S. president told Capt. Cooper that the Student Council wasn't trying to limit their freedom of speech.

"However," Galvan said "the presence of the Marines aroused the anger of many veterans who had been in combat in Vietnam and whom had not yet recovered from the trauma their ordeal had left them with."

Capt. Cooper replied, "We recruit at UC Berkeley and never have had any trouble. Free speech should apply to everyone."

Dr. Buttimer was unavailable for comment, but later this week, John J. Brady, administrative dean of student welfare, remarked "This sort of thing happened before about two years ago. The Federal government threatened to cut off funds if City College limited free speech."

Dean Flanagan was asked whether or not the demonstration might have been averted if he had consulted the Student Council beforehand.

"I suppose," he replied, "I should have asked the Council's permission, but the Marines have recruited here before and nothing happened."

VOLUME 76, NO. 3 CITY COLLEGE OF SAN FRANCISCO MARCH 8, 1973

First Black CCSF President Dies

Freddie J. Hicks, Jr., the first black student elected president of Associated Students at City College, died in Washington, D.C., after a long illness with meningitis. He was 33.

A native of Houston, Texas, he was raised in San Francisco. In 1956, he was student body president of George Washington High School.

In May 1958 Freddie Hicks defeated Don Smith (317-268), 32 percent of AS card holders voted. Hicks and Smith were the only candidates for president (the fewest candidates since 1952).

Both Hicks and Smith campaigned for more student parking, reduced prices for Muni bus car tickets, and investigation of the possibility of having a student union building.

Graduating from the University of Tucson in 1964, Hicks continued his education at William and Mary law school in Williamsburg, Virginia.

At the time of his death, Hicks was a trial lawyer with the Public Defenders Service in Washington, D.C.

The son of Freddie and Maggie Hicks, Sr., of San Francisco, other survivors include his wife, Barbara, and two children, Carlton and Darwin, of Alexandria, Virginia.

Services were held February 26 at St. Dominics Catholic Church in San Francisco, followed by burial in Skylawn Cemetery, San Mateo.

Student Parking Still A Problem

As many students know, finding a parking space in and around campus is like trying to find the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

The situation has gotten so bad that many drivers are parking in bus and no-parking zones just so they can get to class on time.

"As of this date we have issued approximately 1,400 parking permits," stated Police Chief Gerald DeGirolamo. "However we estimate that there are only 1,100 parking spaces in and around campus." Chief De Girolamo explained that not all cars come to school at the same time.

The heaviest use of parking facilities comes between the hours of 9 a.m. and noon. It's common knowledge that finding an empty parking space at that time is almost impossible.

Chief De Girolamo also urged all motorcycle riders to use the areas specifically set aside for motorcycle parking. (The campus police started tagging

Arabs, Jews Debate Issues

Ian Lustick, spokesman for the Radical Jewish Union at Berkeley, spoke before the first mutual gathering of the Arab and Jewish dicussion classes at CCSF recently. He discussed the "legitamacy of the two separate claims in the Middle East."

"Both claims are legitimate and should be respected, but to argue the different claims would be useless. Instead we should try to solve the differences in a logical way."

Lustick listed three alternatives: (1) One nation would take all the territory in question; (2) Bi-nationalism—One nation ruled by two peoples; or (3) Partitioning Palestine into two separate entities.

Quick to point out the faults of the first two plans, Lustick said of the first alternatives: "It has been calculated that by 1990, including immigration of Jews and the high Arab birth rate, Israel would be 53 percent Jewish and 47 percent Arab. In other words, annexation by Israel would lead to bi-nationalism."

"However, bi-nationalism is hopeless. Belgium, Switzerland and Canada have tried it and now have an underlying threat of potential disaster. The attempts of this idea to join religious groups in one nation have resulted in both bloodshed and genocide like in Northern Ireland and Nigeria-Biafra."

The third alternative, which Lustick (and most Zionists) accept, is partition. The third plan makes for a separate Israel and Palestine. "Palestine would get the Gaza Strip, the West Bank of the Jordan River and eventually Jordan itself. This is the only logical alternative left to Israel," said Lustick.

The debate and discussion by Arabs and Jews, though tense at times, was generally calm and orderly. However, the six Arab students at the lecture disagreed with Lustick. As one put it: "A partitioning of Palestine would be considered racist by us. Since most all Americans agree with the partitioning plan, then let them allow the Blacks to partition part of America. It is the same analogy."

Another Arab student put it another way: "I would like to meet Jews and be their friends. I have lived in the Middle East for five years and I think we could learn to live with a bi-national Palestine."

The Arabs and Jews, although diametrically opposed, had the courage to meet and air their differences. Both have active organizations at CCSF. The Arabs meet in C-219 and the Jews meet in A-310 every Tuesday from 11 a.m. to 12 p.m. Both want every student, Arab and Jew alike, to come to their meetings.

One Arab student said: "We do not want to hurt anyone, we just want to talk and air our differences. That is all."

Counselor Raps Student Ignorance

One of the most important things that students get from their counselors is a plan for a program of study based on their interests, abilities, and needs.

Dr. Joseph Jacobsen, Chairman of the Counseling Department, emphasized that the number of students assigned to each counselor is small, so "counselors are able to do in-depth counseling with their students."

Enrollment for 1972, according to Dr. Jacobsen, was less than had been anticipated, but he has no idea why this happened. Because of the smaller enrollment, students can spend more time with their counselors to set up their programs.

The Counseling Department has a staff of 26, seven of whom are from the minorities. Staff members work as a team on different projects to give more service to students, Jacobsen explained.

William Fischer, a counselor, says students seem to forget the responsibility of being familiar with their catalogs.

"Many students do not adequately prepare for their appointments with their counselors; only a very few students are familiar with their catalogs and with some students it's like pulling teeth," he added.

Students who are self-programmed, should be aware of filing dates for transfer to State colleges and universities.

"It's to the students' advantage to arrive at an early decision on a major. It saves time, and helps students choose necessary courses for their goals," Fischer stated.

The Counseling Department is open every week day from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

New CCSF Head Cop Faces Campus Crime

In a surprise move, the Community College District announced a staff member as appointee to fill the vacated position of Chief of Security for CCSF. Previously all campus Police Chiefs were students.

"I don't know why it just happened" stated Chief Gerald DeGirolamo. "Maybe because as students their other obligations took time away from them."

Chief DeGirolamo previously was in charge of the Building & Ground Patrol. He majored in Criminology here at City College. He also held the post of captain of institutional police at SF General Hospital for eight years.

As head of the 35 member campus police force, Chief DeGirolamo will be responsible for the protection and security of CCSF both night and day. To provide better protection, Chief DeGuolamo has requested funds to hire 20 additional Building & Grounds patrol men.

At present there are only four Building & Grounds patrolmen available. With the additional men, Chief DeGirolamo hopes to provide around the-clock protection for CCSF.

In this fashion Chief DeGirolamo hopes to prevent any future incidents such as the recent night mugging and beating of an instructor.

"Safety is our number one concern," said Chief DeGirolamo. "Safety for students, faculty, and staff. Vandalism goes hand in hand with thefts. There's not that much we can do about it right now. It happens: things like broken windows, stolen class materials, destroyed plants and auto tampering."

Chief DeGirolamo estimated that vandalism "ran in excess of $10,000 a year, but that's a low estimate. Our major problems right now are thefts, vandalism, and parking, but not necessarily in that order."

THE FACTS PLEASE — Guardsman reporter Doug Pon interviews new chief Gerald DeGirolamo.

Drugs on campus wasn't a major concern of Chief DeGirolamo. "Drug use isn't overt; there's some marijuana, but nothing serious."

At present the main concern of the Police Department is processing all the parking permits. "This takes up about a month of our time to do all this," said the new chief.

Speaking about the image of the campus police in the eyes of the students, Chief DeGirolamo said, "It's important that we (the police department) have a voice on this campus. The Student Council has ostracized us and that's not right!"

"I would like the students to give us complete cooperation in the parking problem," Chief DeGirolamo said. He stressed the importance of abiding by college regulations pertaining to parking and put special emphasis on motorcycles.

"There are three areas set aside especially for motorcycles and students should use these for their motorcycles." (The three areas are the parking lot in front of the Educational Services Building, the F and G parking lots by the Arts Building, and the parking lot by the Women's Gym.)

Chief DeGirolamo has no "special plans" for this semester, he just hopes that it will "be a very smooth semester."

Editorial:

Newsman's Right to Sources

Recently, the president of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, Sanford Smith, stated that arrests of newspaper reporters for not revealing their sources is a threat to freedom of the press.

Smith feels that reporters will be afraid to print information because of possible arrest. The American public has a right to be informed, yet should arrests of reporters continue the public might get its information only from the government. This in effect will be like "big brother is watching," a la 1984.

The public should have access to the truth, yet a person on trial has the right to a fair and impartial jury. This is why in certain cases juries are cut off from news concerning court trials.

William Farr, in an effort to keep the public informed, printed a story during the Manson trial which said that a possible prosecution witness had heard one of the defendants in the case confess to the murders. The trial judge asked Farr where he had gotten his information. Farr refused to give the name of his source and was arrested.

The judge was worried that the jury might see the story but it never did. Farr stated that if the jury had not been sequestered the story would not have been written.

The right to a fair and impartial jury and the public's right to be informed must be upheld. If a sequestered jury is not sufficient, another method must be found.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Ms. Zipse:

As a former student of Dr. John E. Booher, I especially appreciated your fine article in The Guardsman about his upcoming retirement.

In addition to being a superb teacher and a wonderful man, Dr. Booher exhibited an enthusiasm for organic chemistry that influenced me greatly.

And now, twelve years later, I am trying to practice on my own students what Dr. Booher imparted to me.

I wish him a very happy and healthful retirement period. Thanks again.

(Editor's Note: The Guardsman is sent regularly to colleges throughout the nation. The retirement article was written by staff reporter Margeurite Zipse.)

Editor, The Guardsman.

I am writing to you on behalf of the Women's Action Committee on campus as a faculty advisor. On March 8th a two-hour program is planned in the Little Theater in honor of International Women's Day. A guest speaker, art show with slides, and panel discussion on the status of women are planned. We know there is considerable interest in the Women's Movement on campus because of the surprising number of students who signed up for the WAC at registration. However, communication on this campus is practically non-existent and we badly need publicity to acquaint the campus with the program we have planned for March 8th.

Role of the Movie Critic—A Parasite?

"Criticism is parasitical" said Rolfe Peterson, movie and theatre critic for TV Station KPIX and the Bay Guardian. "You live off other people's creativity. However, I am not ashamed of being a critic. I just like to eat!"

Peterson spoke on critics and their place in society as part of the Thursday lecture series at CCSF recently: "A critic teaches the public about symbols—what they are and what they mean. A critic has to be a public censor and can be a consumer guide."

The Channel 5 regular spoke on the ability to influence not only the public but also the directors and actors: "A critic can educate not only the public, but the producers, directors and actors too."

The method a critic uses to review a play or movie is different from one time to the next. "I go to be entertained; I write my critiques after the performances. I never take notes, I want to relax and enjoy it if it is enjoyable. Another thing a critic has to do is not only say the good or bad, a critic has to say why he liked it or not."

Peterson is rather wary of the "fickleness" of youth. He related stories of critics that disagreed with the young people and were replaced. "The critics are scared to death of the young people. Unless you go along with youth, you can be replaced by a younger man. Kilm has become the plaything of the young people."

"Because of these youthful tastes, our 'permissiveness' has snowballed. Now everyone and everything goes in a movie. However, a critic should never consider pornography as an art form. I am not against showing pornography. I thought A Clock Work Orange was excellent. Whether it is an art form or not is still being argued."

ROLFE PETERSON — KPIX movie and theater critic talks with students after his lecture.

Peterson had some tough ideas about Director William Ball and the ACT Theater. He said "ACT could be great if Ball would spend less time on pageantry and more time on the acting of the leads. Again, this is personal taste, but then this is the only thing a critic has to go on. For instance, I hate dialogue—especially when the actors change the meaning of the words by bad emphasis. This happens all too often in ACT."

The Peterson lecture was the first of the Spring semester lecture series at CCSF, March 8, the series will celebrate International Women's Day. All lectures will be held every Thursday in the Little Theatre or E-101 from 11 a.m. to noon.

AAC Criticizes President Nixon

At a meeting of the Association of American Colleges, President Nixon and the Association were criticized.

Nixon's action for cutting down on aid to college students was bitterly opposed by the educators. The cuts ve come through the budget for federal aid for private campuses.

The President has also vetoed educational appropriations; as a result, college enrollments are decreasing.

The media, according to the American Colleges have not been informed. The Association takes the blame for not keeping the media up to date.

It was proposed to also inform legislators so that they might help out colleges through political action where possible.

LOOKING BACK:

WWII and Swing-Time Era

1943. World War II. Much of The Guardsman was devoted to what was happening to students because of the war.

The first group of students in the Enlisted Reserve Corps were called up for induction into the Army. Pre-medical and pre-engineering students were given deferments only to the end of the semester and then were required to join other ERC reservists in the Army. The number of candidates in the student elections was reduced by the call-up of student reservists.

Baseballer Joe Di Maggio's salary went from $50,000 a season to $50 a month when he quit the game and joined the service.

In a column called "Platter Chatter," dedicated to the "swing classics" of the day, the language describing records included: "takes the cake," "spun on wax," "style of warbling," etc. The recordings then were the favorites of the "jive-lovin' students who listen to their favorites over a cup of java." And who could ask for more than the vocals of Sinatra and the Pied Pipers!

The letters-to-the-editor column had one student telling what the student body wanted to see in The Guardsman. "We want more local color, more doings of the students, more club news, more gossip, more everything," cried the letter writer. (The assignments have just been given out!)

Quote from the sports page: "Five ruthless characters are responsible for all the bent backs, haggard espressions, and extreme fatigue around the college. These characters of which we speak are none other than the men's gym instructors." All this had to do with a new body-building course offered by the gym.

The story continued "After the one-half hour of work, the men were so exhausted, that the gym teachers had to undress, bathe, and dry the poor misguided gymnasts." Such personalized service is hard to find nowadays!

Butterfield, Bloomfield, Bishop:

Dynamite Blues Reunion

Though the marquee boasted the "usual" Winterland weekend concert (featuring Bloomfield-Butterfield-Bishop) it didn't tell the whole story.

The "usual" was Bill Graham's three-act show featuring Mike Bloomfield and Friends, Paul Butterfield and Better Days and the Elvin Bishop Group. At one time, about five years ago, Bishop and Bloomfield were sidemen for headliner Paul Butterfield in the old Butterfield Blues Band. Since that time they hadn't appeared together.

The concert began with Mike Bloomfield and Friends but, due to the crowds your notetaker arrived when they were leaving the stage, unfortunately.

The Elvin Bishop Group got right down to business. Immediately asserting their presence, they kicked off with "So Fine" (an oldie that's not worn out yet.)

As often as they're around town the Bishop group is still one of the most lively and exciting. They always have some new material to offer.

By the time their second number "How Long" was being played, all eyes, ears, and bodies were properly attuned.

The Elvin Bishop group is so strong it is hard for any band to follow them. One thing's for sure: they can take anybody's show. It would be interesting to see how things would go for some of rock's high paid "super heavies" if they could have the "honor" of following them.

After their set they returned for two encores and probably would have played more but Butterfield had to have his turn and the jam was still to come.

Paul Butterfield and Better Days was welcomed by avid followers old and new. They responded by clicking with an instrumental blues that started slow and ended with a wallop. They got the cheers for that one but their next few numbers slowed the adrenalin flow down a bit.

When Butterfield gave the audience something it could relate to things were smooth again, onstage and on the floor. He took up the slack by playing some of his newest material ("Broke My Baby's Heart" and "Walkin Blues"). From then on Butterfield and Better Days played up to expectations. Showing off some of his new discoveries Butterfield got into some free form music.

The unusual happened after the regular show was over. Mike Bloomfield and Elvin Bishop came back onstage to join Butterfield. By this time enough people were worn out and they went home. (As a result it was easy to sneak up front by the speakers.)

You couldn't tell that it had been five years since the last time the Old Butterfield Blues Band was together. Bloomfield's rhythm, Bishop's leads and Butterfield's harp and vocals brought back many musical memories.

Maybe they ought to get back together, like the original Byrds recently did, and put a new album out.

After the old Butterfield Blues Band had gassed the crowd, they let guest musicians have their turn. Appearing in guest spots were organist Merl Saunders, guitarist Ralph Walsh (another former Butterfield understudy) who sounds something like Hendrix and B.B. King combined, and surprisingly, Boz Scaggs.

Many thought they'd never see Scaggs in a Graham-produced show again after the row they had in the film "Fillmore." Scaggs and Graham were really coming down on each other while the film crew was shooting the flick. Apparently the hurt feelings (pride if you will) are now forgotten by both.

Graham was smiling when Boz came on as if to say "welcome back" and Boz was all teeth testifying that "it's good to be back."

Borrowing Mike Bloomfield's guitar, Boz got everyone in the mood with a couple of his hits, "She Makes Me Feel So Good' and "Somebody Loan Me A Dime."

In between the guitars were "crying for mercy". They probably hadn't felt that good in a long time.

FREE SPEECH RADIO—Bert Thomas, one of the numerous "Third World" people involved in KPFA's programming, prepares a Marathon presentation.

Radio Free Berkeley In Need

A radio station that was born out of one-man's visionary goals for world-wide pacifism is undergoing a major struggle with a less appealing but far more tangible situation—the reality of stringent financial needs.

KPFA (94.1 FM) is in the midst of an intensive fund-raising marathon, a traditional and vital financial event for the "First Amendment" station. The marathon was initiated on March 1 and will continue until a projected $88,000 in listener pledges has been secured.

Lewis Hill, a peace activist and conscientious objector during World War II, responded to the devastation and human wreckage strewn in the wake of the global turnoil by determining to establish a broadcasting outlet "to help found and preserve peace in the nations of the world."

The idealistic Hill, also motivated by the belief that all public institutions she'd be voluntarily supported, received donations of equipment and funds and instigated his media ideal in Berkeley in the mid-40s. KPFA went out over the air for the first time in 1949 under Chairman Hill's supervision.

Since its pacifist origins, KPFA has remained a listener-supported institution that centralizes its emphasis on free speech through broad community appeal and access. Programming policy is derived from this First Amendment emphasis and the FM station's format accordingly includes set shows and productions with a good deal of free broadcasting time left available.

"By producing all of our programs locally," states KPFA's General Manager Roger Pritchard, "we are able to serve segments of the community ignored by most commercial stations—Third World, Women's, Occult, Classical, and Avant-Garde culture."

The station's programming has included air time for tapes concerning various current topics sent in from foreign countries, a reading of the entire novel War and Peace, a weekly Third World news show and additional cultural programs, as well as live KPFA studio performances by musicians, groups and individuals of both fame and relative obscurity.

Attempting to realize the free speech and community access ideals has proved to be an unprecedented and challenging venture. Depending on the staff (the paid staff is very small, augmented by a strong central corps of about 100 volunteers) emphasis will shift over a period of years from political to cultural, always held in balance by the constant staff debates and hassles that result from trying to consistently actualize the doctrine of the First Amendment.

In order to remain free from the restrictions and format manipulations that can occur with paid advertising, KPFA derives its financial support totally from the community.

Pritchard explained the necessity and the implications of the ongoing marathon: "People don't realize that in order to keep programming as free as possible, we don't take grant money or support from business or government for operating expenses. Our funding comes from the community we serve in the form of subscriptions or donations. Our listeners have to realize that without their financial support, we just won't be here anymore."

The marathon will be featuring radio highlights as well as special events including an open Amateur Day on March 11; guest appearances by Allen Ginsberg and other celebrities, and several hours of programming devoted to a particular topic (March 8 features 20 hours of women's format).

For information concerning any aspect of the marathon or KPFA radio, contact Ellen Dubrowin or Alan McKittrick at 848-6767.

KQED Presents Two Ecology Series

KQED'S "NATURALISTS"

The Naturalists, a series of profiles of four Americans who were the forerunners of today's ecology activists—Henry David Thoreau, President Theodore Roosevelt, John Muir and John Burroughs—debuts Sunday (March 11) at 8 p.m. on KQED, Channel 9.

The four personalities were chosen because of the impact of their lives and works. Our system of national parks, monuments, forests and bird and wildlife preserves were largely the work of Muir and Roosevelt. Thoreau and Burroughs emerge in these portraits as more "intellectual" naturalists—finding in nature the means of understanding the interrelationships of all living things.

The first program will focus on Thoreau.

"EARTHKEEPING"

An unusual nine-part ecology series called Earthkeeping begins on KQED, Channel 9, on Sunday, March 11, at 7:30pm.

An examination of the interaction of human life and the surrounding environment is blended with the irreverent comedy of Chicago's Second City satirical theatre group.

Earthkeeping opens with Greenbacks, an exploration of how the green world of nature has been converted into hard cash with the assistance of a highly productive, and polluting, advanced technology.

Other shows in the series are:

Little Big Land, focusing on unplanned growth and its effect on natural systems and resources;

Sodbusters, examining anachronistic approaches to today's use of natural resources;

Megapolis, exploring the problems of burgeoning cities;

City Life, depicting the social life of the city;

Help Yourself, a look at the relationship between each person and the world.

Frazier Comes off Bench; Sparks Rams to GGC Title

Let it be said that if it weren't for Ray Frazier, City College of San Francisco wouldn't be headed for Los Angeles.

With City sluggishly climbing out of a scoring lapse and trailing by 54-49, Frazier like a crusading warrior stuffed

Ray Frazier

Greg Johnwell

in an all important bucket which sparked the way to a decisive win over Laney College by the score of 70-60 at the Chabot College campus.

All week long, Coach Phelan had been preparing meticulously and it was justified. Laney stood in the way of the Ventura State Championship, a ritual that Phelan coached teams have visited nine of 11 years.

At game's end and amidst all the celebrating and "slap fives" among players and fans alike. Phelan, obviously elated at the outcome, described it as "just plain fantastic."

But the jubilation of being "back on top" couldn't have been more true to life or louder than in the locker room. It seemed almost as if New Years had come early.

One of the contributors to the humbling of Laney, last year's Golden Gate Conference Champ, was guard Greg Johnwell, who paced the team with 14 points. Atop of all the laughing and hyena-like howls of his teammates, he happily described the Ram cagers' attitude even when it seemed like the cause was lost.

"We got down and we didn't give up. Even when we were 10 (points) down, we knew we were going to L.A."

Coming out of the half-time lead of 36-30, City saw Laney outscore her 22-12. Stymied by the zone press and just plain confusion, the Rams could find no way to retaliate.

At that point a resurgence was needed which came in the form of Frazier. Fast-breaking, and pumping in 17 of his 21 points, and high scorer for City, the tide of momentum changed. And it couldn't have come at a better time.

Dave Smith

Darrell Jackson

with the mumble of stall just on the tip of the tongue of Laney's coach.

It was at this point that Frazier broke loose and layed in the bucket that sparked the Rams to the sweetness of victory.

Said Frazier of that vital bucket, "It was a bucket I had to hit. They played rough but it didn't matter, we were winning."

On the ensuing play, a slithering pass to forward Darrell Jackson who scored on a lay-in, was fouled in the process and completed the three-point play to give City the lead for good.

With Frazier leading, the Rams scored 15 straight points unanswered.

Despite the Laney's height advantage, the Rams committed only 10 team fouls to Laney's 22.

A tight game, in the first half both teams weren't taking any chances. Playing diliberate ball and setting up, kept the scoring at an even keel throughout the early goings. It wasn't until barrages by Rams Dave Smith and Johnwell from 20 feet out did the game move pass one of conservatism.

Laney's guards, Tyree Foster and Vernon May, the Stalwarts of their offense, kept them close with precise marksmanship the first half

Baseball Team Has Plenty Talent, Boasting "Best Pitching" In Years

There is only one way to describe the talents of the 1973 CCSF Baseball Team: "Pitching." Coach Domecus says it's the best pitching he's had in years.

The list of pitchers is headed by the No. 1 draft choice of the Oakland A's, Mike Norris. Joe "Big Daddy" Dutto will be throwing for the Rams besides playing the outfield.

PRO PROSPECTS — Mike Norris and Tharlo Johnson

Another "Ace" who looks promising in pre-season is Rene Marifuch. Then there is the "clean-up crew" (Tom Deyencenzi, John Grazioli, Rich Blake, and Phil Weidinger), who sometimes come into the game when the bases are loaded and none out, to "put out the fire."

It was once overheard in a Union Street pub, "If you don't score there's always tomorrow night," but there will be "no tomorrow" when the CCSF hitters come to town.

Leading the barrage will be Tharlo Johnson, Don Lyons (a draft choice of the Baltimore Orioles), Pat Sabia, Rich Zerga, David Giogi, Gerald Criswell, Bill Bisbane (the 26-year-old pepper pot), Dave Castigtioni, Whiff Collins, Dave Dealba, Keith Farlow, Bobby Jackson, Ron Weaver, Steve Cailo, and Yancy Derringer.

All in all, it should be a big year for the Rams, with the major competition coming from College of San Mateo, which has won the league championship four straight years. Perhaps it's about time for the Rams to share in the wealth.

All home games are played across the freeway at Balboa Diamond. The Rams hope to see you there.

Fast Floundering Seals Falling Apart

Hockey fans in the Bay Area can start to find something that has more excitement than following the California Golden Seals. For example, wait for the Oakland As first home game, plan a vacation, or just wait for "next year."

One thing is certain however, they won't be going to the Stanley Cup playoffs in Oakland this year.

The Seals are currently mired in the cellar of the Western Division with the second worst record in the entire NHL.

There are three reasons why the Seals are where they are. (1) Players that were counted on this year to lead the team, have defected to the rival WHA. (2) The Seals have one of the worst farm systems in the NHL. (3) The Seals are one of the youngest teams in the league.

The new World Hockey Association probably hurt the Seals the worst of any NHL team. They had thought they had a strong nucleus for a successful team in the person of such people as Bobby Sheehan, Tom Webster, Gerry Pinder, Wayne Carleton, and Paul Shmyr. People of this caliber and experience are not easy to replace.

If Charlie Finley had opened his wallet and been a bit more generous, the players would have stayed and the Seals would probably have ended up in the playoffs.

The farm system the Seals have is one of the poorer ones around. Their farm team in the AHL, the Baltimore Clippers, is (you guessed it) in last place with the worst record in either division.

Their other farm team in the Western Hockey League (Salt Lake Golden Eagles) is currently in first place. The only problem with that is the league is made up of older players that will never go to the NHL. This is hardly the place to develop young players.

But the biggest reason why the Seals are having such a tough go this season is because they are such a young team. Inexperience such as the Seals have can only be cured by more and more playing time. Twenty-two year old Gilles Meloche is one of the finest young goalies around. With more experience he may well become the best goalie in the league, that is, if he doesn't become battle worn and shellshocked first. Facing 50 shots a game isn't conducive to a long career in hockey.

Other young stars of the future include possible rookie-of-the-year Hilliard Graves, hard-hitting defenseman Bobby Stewart, and 20-goal man Joey Johnston.

The Seals only hope for the future is to keep and develop the players they have. This may take some time, by then the Seals may not have any fans left.

National Organization of Women Seek to End Lesbian Repression

A National Organization for Women task force voted recently to make lesbian causes a top priority.

Ms. Sidney Abott, who conducted the task force meeting on "sexuality and lesbianism," described this as the equivalent of a merger of the women's and gay liberation movements.

The statement, adopted as a primary goal of the 400-member task force said: "Since freeing lesbians will free all women from sexual stereotypes and will be courageous, historic and long overduc, be it resolved that NOW makes civil rights for lesbians and positive attitudes toward lesbians a top priority. NOW's legal defense fund will use its financial resources to fight these issues in the courts."

Ms. Abott said the task force will lobby in Congress and the state legislatures for laws prohibiting descrimination against gay women in housing, education, employment, credit and finance, wills, insurance, tax benefits, social facilities, public accommodations, child custody and access to medical facilities.

cars and motorcycles as of March 1.)

There have been plans in the past to alleviate the parking problem, but as yet nothing definite is scheduled.

Mr. Vic Graff, in charge of Facilities and Planning for City College, told of some proposals concerning the parking problem. "There was an idea of opening the second resevoir but," Graff stated, "I haven't heard anything from the City Water Department in some time."

Another proposal was building a second deck to the present parking lot. "However," Graff said, "that proposal has been on the board for consideration for the last ten years."

Whatever the solution and whenever it finally comes, for the present it would appear that students must continue to suffer through the early-morning "parking-lot roulette" if they drive a car to school.

Opera Club Seeks New Members

Young culture-hungry patrons of the opera are busy drumming up support for the recent organization of Students for Opera. A direct result of the project is developing opera patrons of the future.

Last fall the San Francisco Opera Guild created the College Opera Association (the formal name of Students for Opera). At the moment there are 17 member campuses in the greater Bay Area with the hope of some eight or ten more additional members in spring.

The main purpose of Students for Opera is to give students a chance to attend the major fall season of the San Francisco Opera, as well as Spring Opera Theater, at reasonable rates. Last fall the guild underwrote a six-opera season for $15.

World's Fuel Running Out?

"Man has evolved by manipulating his environment" professor M. Hubbert of U.C. Berkeley claimed at the conference on "Energy and Our World: The Coming Crisis."

In the highly embellished affluent-looking Gold Room at the Fairmont Hotel, some 300 spectators and professional people gathered to scrutinize the facts indicating a "fossil fuel" crisis.

What is the crisis and when will it begin? According to Professor Walter Mead, Senior Economist of the Ford Foundation Study on Energy, its a demand that can't be filled. A crisis such as this involving natural gas is occurring in New Mexico right now.

How long will this crisis last? Research Geologist M. King Hubbert explained that the real crisis will begin approximately during 1978 and continue to worsen from then on.

What is being done to combat this problem? New technological means of developing energy are being designed to supplement fossil fuels.

The main thrust of development is in the area of nuclear energy. The U.S., which leads the world in consumption of energy, is in fourth place (after Russia, France and England) in this area of development.

Thermal conduction, (the use of hot springs as a source of energy) is "small potatoes," according to Senior Geologist Hubbert.

The futility of thermal induction evidently went unheeded by the Pacific Telephone Company, who are building a thermal induction plant at Geyserville.

Utilization of the most abundant source of energy, sunshine, faces different problems.

The plants, which are too expensive, do not face scientific problems as much as architectural and economical ones. Certain aspects of the solar plants are too hard to construct at a feasible price.

Nixon Cuts:

Children, Working Mothers to Suffer

The big switch is on from the Great Societies' welfare programs to "revenue sharing, bringing some catastrophic repercussions to local child care programs.

"Nixon Cuts"

New federal guidelines will eliminate the rule permitting private organizations, like United Crusade, to donate one quarter of the cost for child care, thus leaving the other three fourths to be paid by the federal government. The 3-to-1 ratio of federal payment brought in with the Office of Economic Opportunity (OED) program is now out.

During a speech before 5,000 working mothers and children protesting the Health, Education and Welare Dept. financial cuts. Assembly Speaker Bob Moretti asserted, "The state needs day care centers for 650,000 children. There is room for only 45,000 now, and Nixon wants to reduce that number by 35,000.

As assemblyman Moretti pointed out, 35,000 children will be released from California's federally funded day care centers by the new rule which stipulates that mothers applying for child care must earn less than 133 percent of $253 (or $337.33) monthly.

Administration Quizzed on Marines, Cops

Student government is protesting the authority of the Campus Police and Dr. Buttimer's veto concerning military recruitment on campus.

Recently the student government requested that the Administration appear before the Student Council. After postponing one such meeting, they met with the council and heard their complaints.

Council meetings are usually held in the Gang Room of the Student Union Building but was moved downstairs to the Lower Level for more space.

The meeting came to order with questions directed to Gerald DeGirolamo, Chief of Campus Security. DeGirolamo was asked to define the activities and jurisdictions of the Campus Police. He declined comment saying that new policies were being drafted. When asked when these new policies would be made known, he said, "I don't know."

The Chief of Campus Police was also asked who authorized arrests made on campus to be sent downtown to the Hall of Justice. He said that the President, Dr. Buttimer, had authority to do so. When asked if he (DeGirolamo) obtained such authority, he said that he does.

DeGirolamo was questioned about the recent arrest of a Chinese student on campus. He was asked if the Campus Police had consulted Dr. Buttimer on the matter. He replied, "I met with him the following day."

Attention was drawn to the fact that the Campus Police were supposed to consult the Administration before any such arrest was made and that the Administration was the deciding factor.

QUESTION AND ANSWER — City College administrators meet with students to discuss policing and recruitment practices at special Student Council meeting in lower level of Student Union.

The Student Council passed a resolution that the charges be dropped and a letter be sent to the District Attorney requesting the charges be dropped. The Council allocated a two hundred dollar fund for the student's defense.

Lee Leland, council member, asked Dr. Buttimer whether or not there would be student input into the new policy guidelines of the Campus Police. He told them to wait and see the new policy first.

Questions from the audience were directed to Dr. Buttimer about his recent veto of the Student Council's resolution banning further military recruitment on campus. He replied, "There are two issues involved here; one, the right of free speech, the other, is the matter of the federal government cutting our funds if we limit such free speech."

Phil Bazell, spokesman for the CCSF Veterans, responded to his statement saying, "The presence of military re-

Safeway Boycott:

Imperial Valley 80 % Tainted?

"Not only is Safeway continuing to sell 'scab' i.e., non-Union lettuce but the lettuce that Safeway and other Bay Area Supermarkets are selling may be dangerously contaminated by pesticide," stated Glen Risdon of the CCSF student volunteers for the United Farm Workers Union.

An article in the March 8 issue of the Chronicle confirmed that indeed, dangerous lettuce has been found in the supermarkets.

The article went on to say that "the lettuce is from the Imperial Valleh crop and has only been found in small quantities."

Risdon and other student volunteers for the Farm Workers Union warn that the situation however, "may be much worse." He continued, "We are immediately concerned with the effects of 'Monitor 4' (an organophosphate pesticide) on the farmworkers and their families and, on the consumers," he added, "who may have been exposed to as high a concentration as six parts per million." Risdon explained that the legal tolerance level is one part per million. Risdon believes that perhaps eighty percent of the Imperial Valley crops have been contaminated to some degree by organophospates.

Glen Risdon

The Farmworkers Union is continuing the picketing against Safeway in order to effect a positive change for the farmworkers and their families, the resistance of Safeway to the demand of the farm workers must be broken," stated Risdon.

Spokesman for Safeway maintain that the continuing controversy over 'scab' lettuce involves a dispute between unions, with the farm workers caught in the middle.

Risdon recalled that efforts by CCSF students had kept 'scab' lettuce out of the campus cafeteria and he added that he would, "like to see more of the same spirit."

"We request students to come forth, to hold meetings at their homes, to solicit donations, construct placards and man the picket lines," he added.

Mental Health, Drug Use:

Survey Reveals "High Risk" Population

The student body of CCSF has been termed "to be a high risk population from the public health viewpoint." This assumption comes from a detailed questionnaire study done at City College in 1971 and reported recently in an article in the San Francisco Chronicle.

The study was published in the American Journal of Public Health by Judith Carey, former CCSF Student Health Nurse now at John Hopkins University, and Dr. E. Lance Rogers, director of the City College tutorial program.

The Chronicle article summarized Ms. Carey's findings: "Illness is widespread among the group; severe emotional upsets have afflicted nearly half the students; nearly one-third have serious contemplated suicide, and drug use is heavy in a significant fraction of the student body."

Dr. Rogers, who did the statistical analysis for the study, indicated that it has to

Engineering Instructor Dies from Stroke

Ralph O'Neill, an instructor in the Engineering Department, died suddenly from a heart attack on Friday, February 16.

O'Neill had been a member of the faculty since the fall semester of 1968. In addition to being considered an excellent teacher, he represented the faculty as a member of the Executive Council of the Academic Senate.

He received his BA at the University of California at Berkeley in 1959. He was a licensed architect and a licensed general contractor in the state of California.

O'Neill began his teaching career as a part-time faculty member at Monterey Peninsula College in the fall of '67 and Cabrillo College in the spring of '68. He was a member of the California Teachers Association.

Mr. O'Neill's competencies were architecture and construction, technology design, and engineering drawing.

Mrs. O'Neill has agreed to a Memorial Scholarship in her husband's name for students majoring in architecture or engineering.

He is survived by his wife, Samantha, and three children, Ralph Jr., 14; Missy, 13; and Cathy, 8. Funeral services were held on February 19 at Our Lady of Angels Church, Burlingame.

Arab Club President Blasts Zionism

Among other activities the CCSF Arab Club recently elected a new president, Riyad Musa. According to Musa, "The Arab Club is mainly concerned with the continuation of our Middle East culture, rather than questions of a political nature."

When pressed however, Musa did reply regarding the crisis over Palestine; "Essentially," he explained, "in Palestine, it is the Palestinians and the Jews against the Zionist Jewish State." He continued, "Zionism is a racist ideology. In reality," Musa added, "the Jews are our friends."

Other Arab students who are usually found to be occupying the "Arab Table" at the student cafeteria, among them Mefleh Tiaj, observed that, "Most of our discussions these days are political." Tiaj explained, "Considering what's happened back home, Arab students are now most interested in educating American students as to the true nature of the Zionist treachery."

Tiaj especially deplores what he and the other Arab students termed "the biased reporting of the Western news media in favor of Israeli aggression." He continued, "American public opinion has been poisoned by the Zionist propaganda." He explained that many Arabs see Zionism in terms of "an international conspiracy, which," he continued, "among other evils, has subverted much of the world press."

Mental Health Program Expanded

By late 1969 Gerald Amada had arrived at a vocational crossroads branching off in one direction towards practicing in a private clinic, and in the other to establishing a mental health service at San Francisco's community college. His decision favored CCSF.

"I saw City College as a place in particular that was right for this service. Needs were so glaring that I felt sympathetic to the situation — I felt I could accomplish something."

Three years later, Amada's choice (now in the role of Administrative Director to the campus mental health service) and his determination have been well realized. The CCSF Mental Health Service, sparsely recognized or utilized by students themselves, has been selected by the American Psychiatric Association-National Associa-be assumed that the students who took part in the survey were telling the truth since the students were requested not to identify themselves, so there should have been no reason to falsify answers.

Disease, Drugs, Sex, Suicide and the City College Student

Fifteen hundred students in the Health Education classes and in the Economic Opportunities Program at CCSF were given the survey. The sample of those surveyed proved related to the entire student body on such standard variables as age, sex, wealth, and race.

A series of answers to questions on morbidity (disease) rate, (if students have or ever had a specific disease), produced this table:

Disease or condition	All students (percent)
Tuberculosis	3.6
Epilepsy	1.7
Diabetes	1.2
Heart trouble	3.6
Asthma	10.7
Hepatitis or infectious mononucleosis	4.3
Nervous breakdown	3.8
Major surgery	13.9
Major orthopedic problems	6.7

If sudden illness struck the student, 18.6 percent said they would go to a private physician. Almost 23 percent indicated they would go to a hospital clinic and seven percent said they would go to a free clinic.

To reach medical aid in cases of sudden illness, 50 percent would go by private car, 13.5 percent would have an ambulance take them, and 4.3 percent replied they wouldn't know what to do.

Frequency of drug use was broken down as follows:

Marijuana	Male	Female
Never	45.7	56.9
Once only	13.1	12.4
Once a month	11.1	11.7
Weekly	16.4	13.5
Daily	11.3	2.9

Amphetamines	Male	Female
Never	70.6	78.3
Once only	6.5	4.6
2-5 times	7.3	6.1
5-10 times	2.3	2.4
More than 10 times	11.0	6.3

Psychedelics	Male	Female
Never	76.6	86.7
Once only	4.7	3.5
2-10 times	6.8	4.9
10-30 times	3.2	1.3
More than 30 times	6.5	1.5

Hard Narcotics	Male	Female
Never	83.6	90.7
Once only	2.8	2.8
Twice	7.3	3.2
Two times a week	0.7	0.1
Daily	3.0	0.8

63.5 percent of the men and 72.1 percent of the women stated that they never use drugs, suggesting that apparently some students do not believe marijuana is a "drug."

By projecting these figures on the total 1971 school population, it can be said that 390 males used "acid" more than 30 times and that 240 students were using hard narcotics daily.

The responses of the students to the question of "frequency of worry over sexual problems" were:

Frequency	Male	Female
Never	40.5	39.4
Seldom	23.6	22.6
Sometimes	25.1	29.2
Often	4.2	3.1
All the time	4.5	2.2

It was found that the very rich (more than $701 monthly income by the study's definition) and the very poor (less than $166 monthly income) were more concerned with sexual problems then those in the middle incomes.

The small percentage of those that "worried all the time" over sexual matters was broken down into race. It was found that Orientals worried less than average, Latinos (Spanish surname) about average, and Blacks and non-Spanish Caucasians rate themselves as being in this category more than average.

The question was asked: "If you were female, unmarried, and pregnant, what would you do?" The following table is the percentages to the proposed solutions:

	Male	Female
Have the baby and keep him/her	30.7	57.1
Have the baby and adopt him/her out	7.3	9.6
Have a legal therapeutic abortion	14.6	23.9
Have an illegal abortion	2.8	1.4
Use home remedy (attempt self abortion)	2.3	1.3

As for the method of birth control that was favored by women, 42.5 percent preferred the "pill," 12.9 percent would use "mechanical means," "chemical means" accounted for 3.6 percent, while some type of "home remedy" would be used by 0.6 percent.

Almost 37 percent of the females answered with the choice of "None" or "never thought about it." Whether this percentage indicates sexually active females not using any form of birth control or those not needing any contraception because they are not sexually active, or a mixture of both, was not made clear.

Students asked what they did if they ever seriously thought about committing suicide reflected these choices:

	Male	Female
Seek help and, if, tell anyone	5.8	5.3
Decide you didn't have the guts to do it, and forget it	8.8	16.1
Attempt suicide	2.7	3.9
Do nothing about it, just keep thinking about it	11.5	10.6
Never thought about it	63.0	60.4

Only 48.7 percent of the men and 39.7 percent of the women reported they never had a severe emotional upset or crisis. "These statistics appear to indicate a group in greater need of help than is usually reported in college populations," states the report.

The summary of the survey further stated: "The primary purpose of this study was not to provide answers or to estimate the students' self-response interpretation of questions but to attempt to evaluate how the students perceive their health needs and status and what actions they would take under certain conditions. Results indicate the student body to be a high risk population from the public health viewpoint."

Mr. Jerry Amada, Director of the Mental Health Services, believes the needs and problems (of CCSF students) are comparable to other urban school populations in the country and that the figures reflected in the survey "are not unique" and, "not an overestimate in comparison with other urban school areas."

"The increasing number of students that come into the Mental Health Services Office (S-190) does not mean that a greater percentage of the school population is in need of help, but that more and more students are finding out about the services available and are coming into the office. There is an under-utilization of the health services available at the college," says Mr. Amada. "But once students find out about the services, they do come in."

Amada had reservations about the Chronicle's article: "Nowhere in the article did it say that the Mental Health Services are helping the students with their problems and that an attempt is being made to cope with these problems."

The survey (on which the Chronicle article was based) does mention that mental health services are now provided at City College, that a comprehensive student multi-service center is being planned and tested, that short-term crisis services are provided, and if it should be required, referrals are made to various community mental health centers.

He also wishes that there were other figures (in the study) from urban areas to compare CCSF with other colleges.

There are many services available for City College students at the Student Health Service, including: birth control, counseling, pregnancy testing and counseling, individual and group therapy, consultations aid for handicapped students, various health need booklets, brochures and pamphlets.

QUESTION: "What Do You Think Should be the penalties for returning draft-dodgers?"

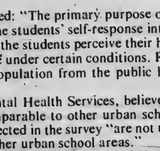
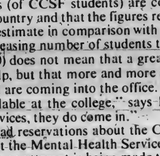
Glenda Graham—Criminology

There shouldn't be a penalty. I don't know why not; there just shouldn't be a penalty!



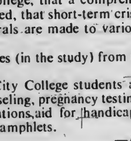


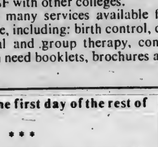
David Kono—Psychology

They should be let-go, because if they have a good reason for dodging the draft they shouldn't be penalized for it.

Coronette King—Accounting

I don't think there should be a penalty. If a man doesn't want to fight against another man, he shouldn't have to.





Robert Charbonneau—Bilingual Ed.

None because there are many penalties for being 20 and that's only one of them. It's not very pleasant living in exile, even in your own country and most of them are. We're in a very strange war-time.

Kathi Low—Special Ed.

I don't believe they should be penalized. If they don't believe in what they're fighting for, they shouldn't be penalized.

Thomas Csekey—Printing Tech.

I don't think there should be a penalty at all! Secondly, they should get the Congressional Medal of Honor for refusing to participate in the oppression of people around the world.

Innovative Health Program Explained

tion of Mental Health as one of the nation's top eight or nine most innovative college health serices.

Although Amada was the original administrative head of a service that now has nationwide notariety, the inception of the mental health program at City College took place prior to his arrival in January, 1970. The campus's public health nurse at that time went into the San Francisco community and secured two grants to initiate the program, when it became evident that many students seeking her help had problems that were clearly psychological rather than physical. The manpower available to respond to that ever increasing need was non-existent.

With the assurance of funds and the practical beginning of the program, two agencies—The Westside Mental Health Program and the California Medical Clinic for Psychotherapy—became co-sponsors of the pilot service and have continued their sponsorship through the present.

"What this (sponsorship) essentially means," explains Amada, "is that we operate under their administrative umbrella. We are responsible to those agencies for the quality of service we give the students."

Present operating grants are supplied through four sources including an unprecedented annual funding program of $30,000 from the Community College District for the 1973-74 academic year. Funds are almost exclusively used to maintain staff salaries and services offered through the CCSF Mental Health Program.

In early 1970, the service's staff included five part-time mental health professionals and by September of that year a unique training program was added to supply another vital dimension to the overall mental health service.

The current service revolves around eight senior staff members and five trainees who are students presently involved in mental health graduate programs at Berkeley and San Francisco State University.

The highly selective program entitled, Field Placement Setting, is an integral part of the CCSF mental health service and gives priority to minority graduates who are experienced and have excellent qualifications and academic creditation. The eight-member senior staff emphasizes a multi-ethnic scope to represent the campus's diverse student population; it draws its personnel from various disciplines including psychology, social work, rehabilitation and psychiatry.

The staff and trainees are involved in five major outlets that constitute the CCSF Mental Health Service as a direct response to the needs that are present on campus. These include individual services for a student, group services which are more formal, regularly scheduled meetings and sessions, and the Rap Center, a non-commital service designed against a drop-in setting.

The two auxiliary programs revolve around outreach services or any contact with students that does not fit into the category of formal psychological treatment, and consultations with faculty and administrators to establish a deeper understanding of student concerns.

Amada is concerned with students' lack of exposure to and use of the Mental Health Service. As part of a continuous reformation and re-evaluation of plans for this service, he has been visiting classrooms to maintain personal contact with students on campus.

"I don't delude myself into thinking we're reaching all the students who need it," Amada states, attributing a large part of the problem to publicity and public relations. Out of a class of thirty, he estimates that only about five students may already know about the Mental Health Service.

Despite the communication drawbacks, there has been an 83 percent increase in student use of the health service over last year. A knowledge gap as well as the pressures and stigmas attached to using the services are gradually diminishing; student credibility is slowly approximating the acclaim given the CCSF Mental Health Program by nationwide organizations.—Diane Merlino

Looking Back:

The Founding of City College

"The Emanon," August 1935:

Going back 10 years for this column reveals the first issue of the official City College newspaper.

This also marked the founding of CCSF. The campus here on Phelan Avenue did not exist. The first classes were held at the University of California Extension at 540 Powell and at Galileo High School which is still at the present location.

After two issues, the name for the newspaper was changed to its current title, The Guardsman.

In this first issue the stories dealt mainly with introductions to the student body about all the aspects of City College.

The first president of the college was A.J. Cloud, "a Lincolnian, homespun sort of fellow who has been so busy in his 35 years in the public service that he has never had time to look out for himself." (So now you know how Cloud Hall got it's name.)

A Friday night informal dance was scheduled to "break the ice" and "melt all stiffness" at the prospect of the opening of classes. Admission was free to AS card holders, 25 cents stag, and 50 cents for couples.

In an informational column, "What you should know about your junior college," an initial enrollment of 2,000 students was expected. The largest enrollment in the U.S. at this time was at L.A. Junior College with 5,000. A yearly savings of $250 was expected by parents who were now able to send their children to a junior college in San Francisco and not outside the city limits.

The school colors and the name for the varsity teams were selected by contests. College yells and songs were also left to the imagination of the students. Oh yes, to qualify for the award if his suggestion was selected, the winner had to secure a five-dollar advertisement for the newspaper.

Louis Conlan was the Rams first basketball coach. Dr. Conlan later became President of City College from 1949 through 1970. At present he is a member of the Community College District Board of Governors.

The entire schedule of classes was listed on one page of the newspaper (approximately the size of two pages of the current Guardsman).

It was noted that it would take a student 18 and one half years if he wished to receive a grade in every subject. But the existence of such highly motivated students was admittedly considered "rare." —Alan Whiteside

Women's Day Lecture Fights Sleepiness

March 8, 1938, was the first National Women's Day in the USSR. Now, 35 years later, A Russian holiday has come to the CCSF campus. March 8, 1973, has been designated International Women's Day in America.

The lecture-presentation started 25 minutes late. Scheduled as the main speaker was Evelyn Reed, noted anthropologist (and advocate of women's Liberation).

Presented instead were three women speakers who read from prepared texts in monotones inclined to put the audience to sleep. The speakers, (who never really identified themselves) spoke on the Abortion Rights Victory, Minority Women's Liberation and Women's Liberation in underdeveloped countries.

"Women's lib is gaining in all the corners of the world and even in the backward nations and lands. Headlines in the Christian Science Monitor, Washington Post and several other newspapers have pointed to the Women's Lib movement growing in the world —places like Brazil, Pakistan, the Arab countries and other underdeveloped nations of the world," the first speaker observed.

The Chicano Women's Lib movement is gaining in this country also, as are other minority women's movements. The Chicano spokeswoman said, "Minority women, whether they be Black, Indian or Chicano, need their own type of national union to handle their specific type of oppression. Right now, blacks and chicanos are being pushed around and oppressed by the American ruling class forcing them to work for low pay under poor conditions to make even an attempt to live in this country."

The discussion, after the three speakers had their say, dealt mainly with the family unit, contraceptives, abortion rights and the free women's clinic on campus.

"We are not trying to take away the family unit; I think it will dissolve by itself with no real help from us. The original idea for the family unit was a means to further the oppression against women, forcing them into the role of breeder for the nation," replied one of the speakers.

Several ideas and comments on abortion were offered at the meeting. "Some doctors will not tell you what method they are going to use in your abortion"; "Some states have just ignored the Supreme Court ruling on abortion forcing the women of that state to go underground for their abortions"; "The new legislation by the State Health Board has nothing at all to do with abortion operations or procedures."

The audience (approximately 45 women and five men) received the speakers and their ideas with mixed feelings. Some were extremely interested, others were bored and waiting for Evelyn Reed.

Reed arrived an hour late and looked rather tired when she walked in. (Perhaps she was listening to the monotone voices of the three speakers and fell asleep beside the door.)

Alleged Racism:

SDS Chapter Plans Campus Campaign

Mention the name, Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), and instantly a picture of long-haired radicals concealing bombs comes to mind. However, this isn't always true as demonstrated by the CCSF SDS.

The CCSF chapter of the SDS is currently planning a campaign against certain theories which the SDS consider "racist." These theories are allegedly similar to Professor William Shockley's theory of genetic inferiority.

The campaign they plan for this campus ties in with the national goal of exposing all such teachers who teach these alleged racist theories. The main push will be to expose and attempt to change the curriculum of these teachers.

Last semester the SDS was involved in helping the Farmworker's Union in their campaign in defeating Proposition 22. The SDS also was responsible in changing the brand of lettuce used in the school cafeteria.

The SDS was recognized last semester by the Community College and is officially a campus organization. Last semester the SDS numbered 16 members but as President Bill Hankin said, "The organization has to grow before we can help students."

Hankin went on to state, "We have an ad campaign planned and have asked teachers to sign a petition against these racist theories. We need much more discussion on this matter though."

The CCSF chapter is a member of the regional committee comprised of chapters at Cal Berkeley and Cal State University at San Francisco. "There's been a steady growth in the last year," Hankin explained. He stressed that all interested people are welcome to join the organization.

On the subject of the current campaign Hankin said, "We would like to see students and teachers support us on this." He wouldn't disclose exactly what plans the organization had for the campaign but he promised things would soon change.

Ecology:

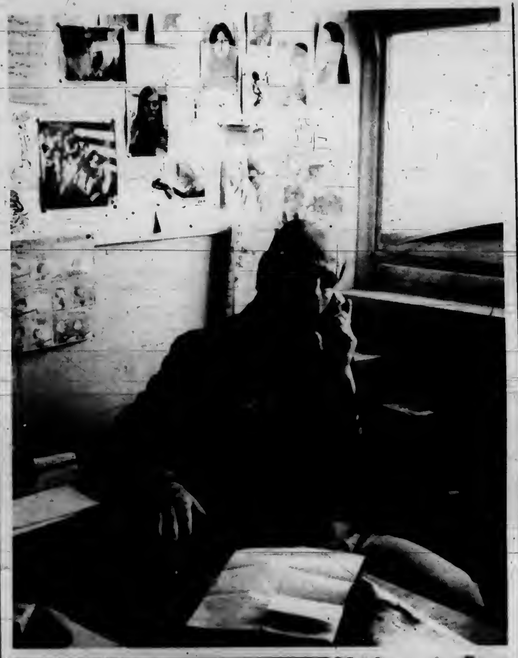
Phillips Slams Clean Air Act

Phillips Petroleum Company recently circulated a pamphlet claiming that standards set by California's Air Resources Board make more realistic demands on petroleum companies, auto makers, and consumers than the Federal Clean Air Act does.

Citing "consumer cost" as the main fault in the federal law (to be enforced by 1975) they went on to state that the "17 percent of 1968 emissions" limit would be sufficient to achieve desirable air for everyone.

Phillips emphasized the "5 percent of pre-68" federal standards would only create higher automotive costs.

Phillips also claimed that California's 17 percent limit would permit auto makers to use thermal reactors instead of catalytic converters that are now being used by Detroit.



Thermal reactors equipped with lead traps would eliminate extensive fuel refinement, the Phillips Company alleged.

Current methods of emission control, which were called "the wrong way" by a recent government study, have been also criticized for their increased refining needs and fuel consumption. Hence, for higher fuel and auto operating costs.

Many "refined" fuels, Phillips asserted, cause widely advertised pinging and stallouts, in addition to the need for larger engines that produce less horsepower.

The net effect of this increase in fuel consumption has allegedly been disguised by Detroit (which increased the fuel tank capacity of its newer cars).

PROGRESSIVE IDEAS — Unafraid to change with times, demands and needs Don Peterson (Top) and the Experimental College offer an alternative to regimented teaching methods. (Bottom)The Experimental College lobby is multi-faceted, sometimes used for meetings. Students use it on this occasion for lounging on a cold, gray day.

Experimental College:

Educational Alternatives Offered

During a recent Guardsman interview, Don Peterson, faculty coordinator, and sponsor of the CCSF Experimental College, stated, "Students and teachers often forget the fun and joy that learning can be, the whole matter of being curious, having an imagination and making discoveries."

He went on to say, "During the process of obtaining grades and credits, leading to degrees and licenses, one often loses his intrinsic motivation for learning. Teachers often get so wound up in giving grades and working on standards of how to give grades to groups of students, that they often forget the real purpose of learning."

Peterson said that it was on this bias that the Experimental College was founded. "To give the students, as well as the faculty, a renewal of the spirit of learning; to give them the opportunity to learn more and to see themselves operating on their own inner-motivation."

The Experimental College was founded during the fall semester of 1967. A steering committee made it possible for persons interested to organize study groups of their particular interests.

During the peak of its activities, the Experimental College was offering a large number of workshops and study groups. It made it possible for the advent of services such as the Student Advice Center, Draft Counseling, the Day Care and the Tutorial Center. It was helpful in organizing the La Raza Unida, Free Gay Students Association and other student organizations.

At present, the Experimental College houses the CCSF Veterans, the Womens Action Group, the Free Critic newspaper and the Arab students Association.

It also furnishes an informal setting where anyone can come to talk and relax with their fellow students and faculty. Two huge bulletin boards supply information relating to events on campus and the community.

The Experimental College is currently running a film series along with a series of lectures. Workshops and study groups are few, but subject to future interests. It is also offering technical advice and some financial assistance to any new group or organization which might need help.

The interview with Don Peterson was to acquaint students and faculty with the existence of the Experimental College and the possibilities it may have for those interested in supplementing their future education.

The Experimental College is located behind Cloud Hall in Bungalow 5.

Interview:

Big Business -- Involved in Community Problems?

Crocker National Bank executive C. Michael Shaw says "You must do what your conscience dictates" when it comes to helping others.

Shaw, vice president in charge of marketing at Crocker, is also active in various divic and community organizations, ranging from Chairman of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce to board member of Junior Achievement.

His involvement with the Little Jim Club of Children's Hospital has been only as "an advisor to that mad group of women" Shaw insists. However, for the last several years he has also made available to this group the branch at One Montgomery Street for the annual Mardi Gras evening which has raised thousands of dollars for the hospital.

Having been exposed to children with birth defects in a ward at the U.C. Medical Center "tore me to shreds", admits Shaw who has three healthy sons of his own. This experience led to is involvement in the March of Dimes and ultimately to his present position as local chairman.

Shaw's community involvements extend to in-depth recruitment of minorities at his bank. He believes that minority hiring has to depend on businesses, an not on the government. However, what the "minorities' needs and wants culturally" Shaw admittedly doesn't know. He thinks that in the past the feeling was "why rock the boat?" of the status quo; but recently the minority community has brought it to his attention and to the bank's that the boat needs to be rocked.

Shaw, who lives and works in the City, often finds himself discussing with suburbanite friends the possibility of a commuter tax in San Francisco. He claims to have no fears of the Manhattanization of this City. He confesses that he has mixed emotions about closing all legal tax loopholes, but thinks that maybe the commuters should help ease the city dwellers' tax burden.

Although Crocker Bank doesn't support any political party, Shaw has supported the Republican party financially as well as a voter. Despite the fact that he is "not in favor of any kind of bombing," Shaw supported Nixon in the last election because he believes that "Nixon surrounds himself with the most capable men in the country."

Born in England, Shaw received much of his education in the United States. He attended City College of San Mateo and went on to obtain his degree in business administration at the University of San Francisco. During this time he began his job as messenger boy at Crocker in 1949.

His interest in writing has continued through the years. When he has the time, he is addicted to writing romantic short stories which usually find their way into the waste basket when he rereads them.

Divorced for several years, Shaw finds "being single quite dull." He is making plans to be remarried in early March.

A busy life keeps Shaw involved with the community and his fellow man.

—Leslie Thomas

BANK EXECUTIVE — Guardsman reporter Marguerite Zipse discusses big business involvement with Michael Shaw. Shaw's community involvements extend to in-depth recruitment of minorities carried on at his bank.

From the Registrar:

Do You Know Your I D Number?

To avoid chaos in the registrar's office and confusion for the students, the administration asks all students to memorize their I.D numbers.

Precision in identification numbers deletes numerous mistakes in regular and pre-registration.

Kenneth Castellino, formerly a teacher, is now in charge of registration.

The number of students enrolled at City College is growing. In 1972 day and night students enrolled numbered 20,426, almost doubling the attendance of 1965.

However, the ratio between men and women has not considerably changed. In 1972, there were 56% men and 44% women. In 1965, there were 61% male students and 39% female.

Because of the large enrollment at CCSF, accurate I D numbers have become an absolute necessity for the Registrars' Office.

Home Economics:

Men Need Household Know-how Too

Higher male enrollment in Home Economics classes is an "indication of current interest in matters regarding the home," believes instructor Sandy Nager.

"Also, it's because of economic necessity that men are becoming more interested in the trends in clothing fashions," she stated. "Fashion designing is a very lucrative field," she added.

Two male students, Ken Gary and Don Hall, commented on the Home Economics sewing course as "relevant" and "very enjoyable." Both men intend to become fashion designers. They applaud instructor Sandy Nager as "a very helpful instructor."

According to Nager, "We've never had any males who've dropped the course because they were dissatisfied doing women's work. On the contrary," she added, "Our beginning class has enrolled more males this semester than ever before."

Veterans Sponsor New Film Series

A new film and lecture series will begin at CCSF Thursday March 22. This new series will examine man and oppression, ranging all the way from student-campus relations to international relations.

The first film, entitled Wildcat At Mead, examines the wildcat strike by black workers at the Mead packing plant in Atlanta Georgia. The film explores the poor working conditions the men were forced to work in and what the workers did to improve conditions.

Along with the film there will be a speaker that has been working with the strikers at the Farah's garment factory in Texas.

The film will be shown in V 114 at 11:00 a.m., March 22.

CCSF Veteran Tom Csekey, 27, a spokesman for the organizations sponsoring the series, said that they plan to show one film a month with a speaker presented with each film.

Several organizations are sponsoring the film series, among them are CCSF Vets Association, La Raza, and the Arab Students.

This student film committee is planning films that explore the student struggle, and a film that looks into the Palestinian Guerrilla conflict.

"We would like students to realize their own struggle," Csekey explained, "and find out that many students are having the same struggle."

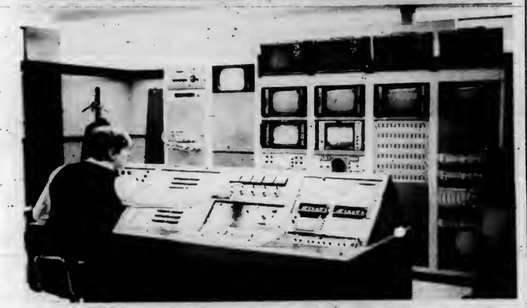
COIL: A Unique Student Service

The Center of Independent Learning (COIL), founded in the fall of 1968 by Deans Jules Fraden and Jack Aldridge, helps make it possible for students to cover subjects on their own even without the help of a tutor.

COIL is funded by the CCSF budget as well as federal funds. According to Becky Woodward, COIL's supervisor, last year's budget was a "very small" $2500.

The center has a vast supply of resource material on subjects ranging from Physics to Political Science.

COIL recently moved from its old location C-305 to larger quarters at the south end of Cloud Hall library. This was due to increasing use of the facilities, and the need of better venilation for the computer terminals. The Department of Public Works constructed the new area. COIL, which is staffed by students, is now ready for business and plans to offer more and better services.



Materials can be checked out on a two-hour or overnight basis. The center is open every day from 8 am to 5 pm.

Thousands of CCSF students have used COIL's materials and found them to be very helpful in terms of either better grades or increased knowledge.

Everything you Wanted to Know About the Broadcasting Dept.

The Broadcasting Department at City College offers a cross section of courses designed to acquaint the future broadcast enthusiast with all facets of the industry. Recently, The Guardsman conducted an interview with Phillip K. Brown, head of the radio department.

Q. What exactly is offered in the Broadcasting Dept?

A. We offer a variety of classes in the dept. There is a beginning 'survey' class, a broadcast speech class, a class on the social aspects of broadcasting (how broadcasting effects us all), audio production, announcing, a non-dramatic writing class, a series of television production classes, and the three classes that operate the radio stations.

Q. What courses are necessary to enable a student to work with the facilities?

A. First of all, everybody has to take the beginning survey class (BCST 21), after that you can take the audio production class (24). These are the two necessary classes. In 24 you start to handle the audio equipment. From there, you can go into the station, announcing, or the T.V. classes. All of these courses let you get your hands on the equipment.

Q. Student-wise, how large is the dept?

A. We probably have a total of somewhere between 120 and 150 students in the various classes.

Q. Where does the station get the records that are played on the air?

A. We get some from record distributers just as any other radio station does and we belong to a couple of record services, where for a certain amount of money, they send us all their new releases in a certain category of music for the entire year.

Q. Has the station been plagued with the untimely rip-off? How much of a problem is there with security?

A. So far we've been pretty lucky especially in the station. In the station about the worst problem is that once in a while a student will rip off records. Recently, the department suffered a loss of about five to six thousand dollars in stolen equipment. A couple of sony color TV sets were taken, some black and white sets, audio tape recorders, and some test equipment.

Q. What is the biggest problem that you've had with student management to date?

A. For the past several years I think I've been very lucky with my student management and I've been very pleased with them. Probably the biggest problem, (and it doesn't happen very often) is the problem of the student having to take some kind of discipline against one of his friends. Being a manager is not always the easiest job and sometimes friendships just don't count.

Q. How is the job market in the broadcast industry?

A. The job market is extremely limited, especially in this area. The S.F. Bay Area is now considered to be the fifth largest market in the U.S. and so everybody wants to come here. That makes the competition pretty tough. The best place for people starting in is to go to the smaller rural areas to gain experience.

TWO GENTLEMEN

When Two Gentlemen of Verona first appeared, its author, William Shakespeare, was still a young man. The exuberance of youth permeated his comedy.

That same quality has been injected into the Civic Light Opera's current production of Two Gentlemen at the Curran Theatre for a seven week run starting March 20.

The music written by Gali Macdermot of Hair fame with lyrics by John Guara ranges all the way from Rock to Calypso.

Very much in tune with the 1970's Two Gentlemen has an extraordinarily versatile setting and imaginative costuming, including a multi-racial cast which has received good notices in other cities.

Tickets are available at the CVL Box Office on Geary for most performances.

Jazz Sampler — Intro to the New Music

Energy Essentials is a special three record set billed as a "developmental and historical introduction to the new music."

A jazz sampler of this size and selection is certainly unique among record products.

Apparently a clown is the best "introduction to the new music" because they picked one to write the liner copy. The author freely admits he is neither musician or critic but rather an "appreciative technocrat." (A what?)

Stephen Davis takes the credit for the writing but one wonders why it took Rolling Stone (with whom Davis claims association) several months to finally review this jazz package.

The list of artists seems as complete as one record label can get and only Impulse can claim such an impressive list of jazz artists. John Coltrane naturally leads the rest with four selections including the unusual Leo that he recorded with his wife Alice and which she overdubbed with new material after his death. The other three Coltrane selections have all been slightly edited.

All other musicians have one number each for their representation. They are worth listing here: Alice Coltrane, Pharoah Sanders, Ornette Coleman, Sonny Rollins, Eric Dolphy, Archie Shepp, Albert Ayler, Charles Mingus, Cecil Taylor, Freddie Hubbard, Michael White, Max Roach, Charlie Haden, Oliver Nelson, Marion Brown, Elvin Jones and Jimmy Harrison.

There is a lot of potential technical criticism of the album, especially in regard to the cuts that have been edited but allowances must be made for such an ambitious sampler.

The liner notes (alas, we must return to this "introduction"), are obsessed with giving the new music a unifying religious perspective. It's a waste of time. The unity of this music is definitely in the listening. Davis goes to great lengths to name religious titles for each of the major musical talents. Thus Cecil Taylor is explained to the new listener as a "Mad Monk," Eric Dolphy the "Shaman," Coltrane the "Transformer," and "Saint" Sanders the "High Priest of open-ended Energetics," ad nauseum.

It would have been much wiser to drop the whole concept of "energy essentials." A sampler that must of necessity, due to the complexity and diversity of the music, be an almost random selection, is not "essentials." The energy needs no journalistic translation. This is music, remember?

But the record fulfills an important function nonetheless. The three records are a more than adequate introduction to jazz in themselves. Certainly though, it cannot claim to be a "developmental and historical" introduction. Such things can't really be sold. But it can suggest where to purchase one's essentials: Impulse Records, Inc.

Record Review:

Steely Dan – Soft Rock Group Here to Stay

Let's get it straight right off that this ain't no "here today, gone tomorrow" AM group. These guys are for real and are going to be around for a long time.

Steely Dan's "Can't Buy a Thrill" is an exceptionally fine first release. The album has already produced one mammoth hit single and another is on its way.

Steely Dan is part of a new generation of rock bands in the same musical terms as "America" and "Eagles," bypassing ear-shattering "heavy" hard rock in favor of softer more melodic tunes.

The six man group sounds amazingly like Crosby, Stills and Nash and an even similar likeness to Neil Young's and Stephen Stills' solo albums.

Led by bassist Walter Becker and keyboard man Don Fagan, who compose all of the groups' material, the band produces a crisp new clean sound that is going to catch on fast with the record buying public.

There's not a bad cut on the album. "Do It Again" is their smash single and "Dirty Work" is getting heavy airplay on the FM stations. "Midnite Cruiser," "Reelin' In the Years," "Only a Fool" and "Kings" are all outstanding cuts. But there are no really high or low points on the album as each cut blends in with the other leaving behind a most complete and satisfying recording.

"Can't Buy A Thrill" is a beautiful piece of recording by a band that you're probably going to be hearing a lot from in the near future.

Record Review:

Number One Effort Demands Attention

As well as being the name of a new group, One is also the name of their first album.

The album can at first be greatly disliked because it is not the "driving" kind. It demands the attention of the listener, something that's not always fully given by the kind of music audience One will be presenting themselves to.

One is a better album if it is started on side two. Right away on "Three Songs"—the best cut on the album—One works out their version of California rock with great success.

"Three Songs," a 10:09 cut, begins with a tight drum and bass introduction with the whole band sneaking in and building a wide openness they all share. The second movement mellows down to One's wordless songs of moans and chants and finally heightens in the third movement and lets the trip end somewhere in outer space.

The trouble with One is that it doesn't have a definite direction. True they are still in search of how they wish to eventually sound, all of which they experiment with on their maiden album.

Hopefully they don't want to sound like they do on the two cuts that bomb. "Free Rain" and "One of a Kind" just don't make it, whether for waking up to or going to bed by.

But how much can you really expect from a new group? One will be a good group and perhaps their next album will reflect what they show only in spots on their first one.

Three good cuts out of five after all, really isn't a bad average.

Sleuth — An Adept Seducer

"Unfortunately we live in an age when people don't listen to films anymore. Even to extravagant gibes. They stop and they look, but they don't listen. They've become accustomed to being attacked through their eyeballs. Directors today are eyeball rapists." So says Joseph L. Makiewicz whose latest movie Sleuth has won Best Play Tony Award for the 190-71 Broadway season.

Mankiewicz's movies are a lot like his name—complex, exotic, difficult to spell out, easily misconstrued and a little long. As an adept seducer, Mankiewicz woos us in Sleuth through the route of intelligence rather than passion. That he can perpetuate this seduction, primarily through the verbal message, for two-and-a-half hours is nothing short of a miracle.

There are a number of elements which assist Mankiewicz in this feat not the least of which are Laurence Olivier and Michael Caine. Sleuth is a two-character movie despite the fact that other characters are constantly alluded to.

Olivier's performance enhances Anthony Shaffers' witty, intelligent script. Caine, seeming to realize there is no way to act over or around Olivier, gives a restrained, and understated performance which neatly complements Olivier's extraordinary range.

Mankiewicz is a master of elegant action—visual dynamism resulting from the effective movement of the actors, from an unobtrusive but graceful moving camera, and most importantly in Sleuth, from an extremely creative tension between the nature of the characters and their relationship to the environment in which they find themselves.

An unusually rich effect and one that is preeminently cinematic is the sum of the efforts of Mankiewicz, playwright /scenarist Shaffer, and production designer Ken Adam.

Photography Director, Oswald Morris, won an Academy Award for his work on Fiddler on the Roof. The movie Sleuth was filmed entirely in England.

It is the story of an eccentric author of murder mysteries who invites a young man to his home to implicate him in the real-life execution of his weirdest plot. Like the murder mystery genre it parodies and perpetuates, Sleuth relies in a large part on a series of surprises, a suspense tale wrapped around a comedy.

Sleuth is adapted from a stage ply script by Anthony Shaffer. While there are significant changes in dialogue and action in the movie version, the play script provides source for contrating the medium of theatre with the medium of film. Both are worthwhile seeing if one has the opportunity to do so.

Violence on a Wild Southern River

Deliverance is one of those films worth seeing more than once. Four men take a weekend canoe trip down a very wild southern river.

The two main characters are played by Jon Voight and Burt Reynolds. Voight's role is very sensitive and Reynolds looks his part so well that he is fascinating to watch.

The photography is exceptional, with stunning close-ups of the men shooting the rapids. Their faces, with mixed feelings of joy and fear, concentrated on the furious water.

Floating downstream, excited by the countryside, they imagine themselves as pioneers; at night they are fearful in the darkness; and they squabble with each other. But yet there is a feeling of camaraderie that grows among them.

Deliverance is based on an excellent novel, of the same title, by James Dickey (who plays the sheriff in the film). Although the film is pared down to the action in the book there are heavy symbolic overtones to the story.

The river: water, symbol of man's unconscious, represents the dark, unexplored side of a man. Violence too is part of this unfamiliar terrain. Ultimately the journey is into one's own mind.

This is blue-grass country and a beautiful soundtrack winds thru the film lulling the viewer when suddenly violence strikes. Men with guns, lawless, mean and strange. By comparison the wild river seems rather tame in the face of human violence. Violence is people imposing their will upon others—using force or stealth.

Violence could be dropping a bomb on someone's house. It could also be merely stealing their books.

This capacity for violence is apparently within everybody. Generally, this is repressed by the system of priests, police and prisons. An individual is expected to control his violent emotions or be censored by society.

Deliverance is a film about what happens away from the system.

Live Rock:

BIG Stevie Wonder a Hit Too!

Ten years ago a 12-year-old blind black boy made a major appearance on the Ed Sullivan Show. The song he sang was an instant hit—Fingertips.

Today the now 22-year-old man is a superstar—his name is Stevie Wonder, and the hits are many—the latest (on his "Talking book" L.P.), Superstition.

At Winterland on Saturday, March 3, Wonder showed how he became the superstar he is. It's seldom that one encounters a star who can sing, play piano and organ, electric bagpipes, and drums, (not to mention the guitar) and do it all well. It is hard to see Stevie play and still believe that he is blind.

The hits were pouring out one after the other and the audience letting go with chants, applause, footstomping, etc.

Highlights of the show were a ten-minute drum solo and a twenty-odd minute version of his current AM hit, Superstition.

The show was almost a medley of all his hits: For Once in My Life, Blowin' in the Wind, My Cherie Amour, and a new song was introduced—You Were My First.

This song was slower and the audience was able to rest their heads and feet.

Also on the bill were the Persuasions,

HITMAKER — Stevie Wonder

the rockin' rollers from the late fifties and early sixties.

Many in the audience were thrilled by nostalgia at the sounds of The Chain Gang, but their hit of the evening came when they brought people up onto the stage to help sing background on In the Still of the Night.

A new group, Lexington, had people cheering and going wild. The boogie is still alive in San Francisco and Lexington is almost sure to become a big group.

Last but not least, the lights were tremendous. The audience "oohed and ahhed" like children on their first Fourth of July. The color had such a kaleidoscopic effect that at times it was downright hypnotising.

Baseball:

Mariluch Fans 15 in League Opener

Striking out fifteen batters and allowing only four hits, Rene Mariluch hurled the CCSF Rams to victory over Merritt T-Birds, by the score of 7-3. The opening game of the 1973 Golden Gate Conference was cold and overcast and threatening to pour.

The game had already been postponed once the day before and after the Rams went off to an early lead, they were hoping to play at least 5 innings (the league rule states: if the game goes 5 innings and rains, it's declared a complete game.)

Mariluch, who pitched 9 innings, had ample support from Rich Zerga, who garnered three hits, one a lead-off double, and catcher Dave Castiglioni, who smashed out two hits and played a fine defensive game behind the plate, shooting down two T-Birds at second base. Castiglioni and Mariluch managed to totally intimidate the featherless "birds" from Oakland, except for a two run homer by short-stop Glynn Hewitt.

A letterman from last year's team, Zerga shows promise of being one of the most productive lead-off men in the league.

Today the 15th of March, the Rams play visiting Foothill College at 3:00, at Balboa Diamond (across the freeway) and Saturday, the defending champs for the last four years; College of San Mateo at 11:00 a.m.

For those of you who are interested in watching fast, exciting baseball, the 1973 edition of CCSF Baseball is truly worth getting behind.

Nixon Cuts Hit Day Care Center

Nor will the new regulations allow any funding for educational programs like Head Start, thus affecting 19,000 California children in preschool programs.

State School Superintendent Wilson Riles called the pre-school cutbacks "counter to the challenge in Nixon's inaugural address, 'Ask what you can do to help yourself,'"

"The net effect of Revenue Sharing will put most working mothers, who are working to get off the welfare payrolls (with the help of child care), right back on them" This evaluation was made by Ms. Dedondes, a working mother.

"When that happens I'll be right back where I was 60 days ago—on welfare," she said. "I can't afford a sitter. They charge about $25 a child a week." (Ms. Deslondes works for $1.65 an hour). "Even before I got my job, the welfare worker told me not to go to work unless I could get the children into this kind of center."

Results of Cuts

The Mission District's Child Care Consortium, which is only one of many Mission organizations, has four day care and one preschool centers that are threatened by the cuts, plus a battered-child pilot program.

The "battered-child" program, which gives many children a new lease on life, will die, (like approximately one out of 12 battered children) under the Revenue Sharing Plan, one welfare mother claimed.

Courts, which function rather like parole boards over the parents, can force accused parents to attend this center as an alterantive to losing custody of their child.

Lana Sherfield, a member of the board of directors for Mission Child Care Consortium, claimed that some doctors will not report many borderline cases to the courts, unless there is such an alternative to a sentence, a record, and removal of the child from the parents' custody. (Even though the parents are reported, in many cases, they go free because of a lack of evidence.)

At the Center for Battered Children two professional welfare representatives work closely with children and parents trying to decondition their brutal habits.

CCSF's Day Care Center

City College's center will be indirectly affected by the cuts when students start coming in after being turned away by their neighborhood day child care centers.

Because the child care center is being funded by City College, the federal cuts won't create any direct adverse effects.

"Nevertheless, the center is currently suffering from a lack of funds and is understaffed and short of space," said head teacher Madeline Wild.

The fall '73 student government cut back the center's budget 20 percent.

The day care center currently has nine workers, two of which are teachers and the rest students on the work study programs. They take care of approximately 90 children a day

These students may also be adversely affected by the federal cuts since the seven work study personnel are federally funded and therefore subject to the Nixon cutbacks.

In addition to the previously mentioned problems, the Child Care Center has a four-hour limit. Madeleine Wild, the afternoon child care instructor explained, "There is a four-hour limit for parents because a state law requires that there be a rest area and lunch facilities for children staying longer than four hours a day."

Lecture Series:

U.S. Policy Failure in S.E. Asia

Dr. Mark Manchall, a political science expert at Stanford University, spoke at CCSF campus on the "United States Foreign Policy in East Asia."

"Our foreign policy is related to internal policy. Although many people think of capitalism as a God-given way of life, there have been significant differences in the thinking of people recently. I believe the Bay Area residents are highly advanced in their thinking about what is going on here and around the world," Manchall stressed.

The last couple of years American foreign policy has been based on the islands. Japan, Taiwan, the Philippines, Vietnam, and Cambodia are some of the places we are still very much concerned with. Manchall related this concept to the United States involvement in building military bases and trade investments on these islands.pened to be due to the fact that the US observed the success of China not only as one of the world powers, but also as an advanced nation in its economy.

He also called the Vietnam war "a defeat to the US. It is a surrender any way you see it. And because of the US inclination toward East Asia, continents like Europe, Africa and South America were forgotten for the last few years, if you have been watching the mass media."

"All politics seem to hinge on China, now both our nations have agreed to have diplomatic representatives. Another aspect in the US policy is the emergence of Japan as the dominant economic power; and despite the US policy, the Japanese have been building a lot of investments in South East Asia," he emphasized.

Manchall listed Marcos's Philippine dictatorship and the neutrality of India and South Korea as indications of a "policy failure" by the United States in South-East Asia.

"We've been gambling here and there, but it looks now that we're going to give up the game, for there's nothing left to gamble on," he stressed.

Manchall finally stated that "the US is now returning to a traditional spirit in her foreign policy by performing secret agreements. A concept of 'great powers' seems to influence the future policy of this country," he concluded.

Administrators Quizzed by Students

cruitment on campus is a very emotional issue. Most veterans on campus objected to serving in Vietnam and seeing people being ruthlessly killed and disfigured. When they come home it takes them a long time to recover. After they get it together enough to go to school to prepare themselves for their future and see military recruiters on their campus, it is a very shocking thing to them."

A veteran from the audience remarked that the recruiters have an office just on the other side of the street. "Why do they have to come here?" he asked.

Another reply was that the recruiters were scheduled to be in the men's gymnasium and that if they had not been in the Ram Plaza the demonstration might have been avoided.

Dean Hillsman said that was his fault and Dr. Buttimer agreed. "So in effect, what you are saying is, that the administration was at fault and this whole matter might have been avoided," stated a Guardsman reporter.

Dr. Buttimer replied, "That is so."

The administrator announced that they had to leave the meeting.

Other actions the council approved was a motion to put the issue of military recruitment on the ballot to be decided by the students. Another motion was to have two campus police direct traffic at the crosswalk on Phelan Avenue, between the California Bookstore and the Educational Services Building.

ing of the Arab and Jewish discussion classes at CCSF (see The Guardsman, March 8).

The debate, though "calm and orderly" (with more meetings scheduled for the future), failed to establish any firm ideological meeting ground for the opposing factions. Accordingly, Arabs feel insulted by mention of a partitioned Palestine; as one Arab said during the debate, "As an analogy, why don't you Americans let the Blacks partition an area of the U.S. for themselves?"

Dr. Joseph Jacobsen, (Foreign Student Adviser) agrees that the Arab Club, organized in 1968, has recently become more political: "Once the Arab students wanted the whole show in Palestine," he continued, "now they are striving for equal rights for their country." He added, "The Arabs once were interested mainly in parties and dinners."

Firing Protested: Students Plan Strike March 28

The firing of a young, black, psychology instructor set the scene in the battle for students' rights to participate in the evaluation and employment of their instructors.

The teacher's dismissal comes at a time when new evaluation methods are being planned. The Rodda Act, passed last year, requires such measures be taken. The Academic Senate voted against a proposal giving student input into the new procedures being proposed.

Last week, Jo Ann Handler, a contract employee in the psychology department was fired. The order came from the San Francisco Community College District Board of Governors.

Under specifications of the district's employment procedures, a contract employee is one who enters employment with a probationary period of one to two years.

After the specified time has expired, the employee is evaluated by a personnel committee consisting of five members of the department. The results of the evaluation are submitted to the president of the college with a recommendation for approval of disapproval.

The president weighs the committee's recommendations and sends his decision to the Board of Governors who have final authority.

Ms. Handler's firing met the disapproval of most of her students. Many reacted angrily. When the time came for her personnel committee's final recommendation, a group, of approximately 50 gathered to testify in her behalf.

Handler was represented by an attorney and was allowed to introduce testimony in her behalf.

Three teachers testified that they personally saw no basis for most of the charges. Ms. Handler introduced a supportive letter from Grogory K. Sims, a part time lecturer and clinical psychologist from UC Berkeley. The personnel committee also heard testimony from eight to ten students.

After deliberating for 17 minutes the personnel committee arrived at a decision — five against with one abstention. Dudley Yasuda, chairman of the committee refused to give a decision.

After the committee made its recommendation, Ms. Handler gave her reac-

YSA Supports Wounded Knee Indians

In support of the Indians at Wounded Knee, South Dakota, a rally was held March 14 at City College. The two main speakers were Steve Gabosch of The Young Socialist Alliance, and John Small Mountain, an Indian.

According to an 1868 treaty, the Indians own the land at Wounded Knee and the rest of South Dakota, stated Gabosch. Also "no whites are permitted to occupy the terrority without consent of the Indians." Gabosch mentioned that "every treaty that the Indians have signed has been reneged upon by the United States government. He urged that people write the Department of Justice and their Senators to protest the treatment of Indians.

John Small Mountain talked about the start of the American Indian Movement which started in Minnesota where Indians were being "manhandled by police." (Indians would be at a bar, and the police would arrest them on the way from the bar to a taxi.)

John spoke of "Indians in schools who would be handcuffed and beaten for speaking in their own language." He called for people of all religions to "pray to their god to get this country back to the original ideas in the Constitution." The rally concluded with a statement by Gabosch that "the United States had no business at Wounded Knee."

The Women Behind 587-7272

Most students have never seen them, and probably never will, but without the pleasant voices behind telephone number 587-7272, City College would probably collapse.

Emily, Mary, Kerry and Ellen, the switchboard operators, upon observation, resemble fishermen tangling with more octopus tentacles than they can handle. The big board is a mass of lights and trunk lines. Enclosed in a small room, these ladies, capable and well-trained, receive calls like "What's the weather like today so I know what to wear?"

Trained by TPC, (The Telephone Company) the diplomatic foursome must always be congenial to the outside world even when callers refer to Dean Billwiller as Dean BillWiller or Mr. Larry Franceschina as Mr. Francis China.

"Some," laughs Ellen, "even think the title Dean is a first name."

In 1963, there was only one old fashioned switchboard with 60 different trunk lines. Now ten years and four new modern boards later, the operators are still receiving calls for the City College Laundry or the City of Paris!

"We don't have time to feel cooped up; we're always so busy," announces Ellen; but Kerry, on the other hand, enjoys her lunch breaks outdoors.

The four totally professional PBX operators are on duty from 7:45 am to 5 pm daily. They cheerfully face the big switchboard and answer approximately 2,200 calls per day which they route to the 400 telephones on campus.

What do the ladies with the "voice with a smile" do when they receive the inevitable obscene call? They disconnect!

Emily, Mary, Kerry and Ellen know the important job they have at City College and years of experience helps them to never lose their sense-of-humor or their cool. Emily says, "Believe it or not, we really do enjoy working at City College!"

Anti-Marcos Rally Gets Results

CCSF President, Dr. Harry Buttimer, today confirmed that last Thursday's protest action by the Philipino Coalition, "was an influencing factor," in his decision not to meet with Trinidad Alconcel, Consulate General of the Philippines.

"The last couple of days (prior to the meeting) we've been working on different calendar arrangements," he continued, "which made the meeting inopportune at this time." Buttimer said that a meeting may be scheduled in the future. When queried as to why the meeting was arranged, he replied, "We have a large concentration of Philippine students here and the Consul General is interested in the Philippine studies program."

Having received advance notice of the proposed conference, the CCSF Philipino Coalition rallied in front of the Ram to protest.

According to Dominic Gomez who represents the Coalition at the Associated Student Counsel meetings, "We called the demonstration to protest the meeting because we are opposed to the continuing dictatorial policies of President Mareos' martial law regime in the Philippines." Gomez said that thousands of students and workers have been imprisoned without the right to a speedy trial. "And," he added, "without United States support, martial law could never have been declared."

"We believe," Gomez stated, "that Counsel General Alconcel's purpose here is to spread the ties of support in the U.S. for te Marcos regime."

Another spokesman at the demonstration, Joe Tolero, said that US corporate interests amounting to two and a half billion dollars are what account for US support of the Marcos government. "Of the billions invested in Philippine corporations," he said, "only a paltry $387 million goes back into the Philippine economy as a remittance," he claimed.

Tolero continued, "With US backing Marcos declared martial law in order to maintain his political dynasty. Marcos," he added, "was exposed in his treachery by Senator Quintero who claimed he (Marcos) tried to bribe Constitutional Assembly members, after the ploy to run his wife for the office of president failed to win support."

"Public opinion in the Philippines is rapidly turning against Marcos," added Tolero.

Marcos' term in office was limited by the Constitution so he suspended it (the Constitution).

PHILIPINO REPRESENTATIVE — Domenic Gomez: ". . . without US support, martial law could never have been declared."

"The Philippines has never had the right of self-determination, in fact," he continued, "the first My Lai was in the Philippines. In 1896 during the ten-year war against US colonization 600,000 persons died."

In a dissenting view, one Philippine person said that "Even in America, it is not safe on the streets at night." He continued, "We are not free here, we are prisoners of fear; and so it was in the Philippines until Marcos controlled the rampant lawlessness."

"My relatives in the Philippines write to me," he added, "that they feel safe to go out in the streets now, without fear of being molested."

Missionary Blasts P.I's Martial Law

Reverend Bruno Hicks, a Franciscan Missionary, who worked with sugar laborers in the Philippines for ten years, was the speaker here on campus recently, sponsored by the Philippino Coalition and Philippine Studies Department.

"I wasn't told any reasons why I had been arrested and deported. I didn't say anything for I knew there had not been any justice in the Philippines after the martial law became effective," Hicks stressed.

Hicks had been jailed and finally deported for criticizing the Marcos administration. Besides his mission in the Philippines, he had worked in radio stations helping what he calls "very committed and oppressed" people.

"In the past two years democracy seemed to be the dominant concept in the Philippines. However, everything was turned upside down when Marcos declared his martial law," Hicks outlined.

He continued, "With the martial law, the movement toward establishing more political parties stopped. Many people were arrested; over 30,000 people demonstrated for their rights. Freedom of organization, political expression, free news media and magazines, are all out!"

Reverend Hicks believes that if any Communism develops in the Philippines it is only because of Marcos' policy. He criticized the Philippine press for "it is not reliable," he said.

The basic problem of the Philippines is the domination of its economy by foreign investors. The land is fertile and has abundant resources. However, "Since the Spanish-American War, a few big countries, mainly the U.S.A., have been controlling the economy," he emphasized.

Continuing, Hicks also said, "I believe 95 percent of the Philippines' economy is being smuggled out by the over 800 foreign corporations which exist in the country."

tion. "It's obvious I'm being railroaded. I'll fight it to the end!"

The Student Council, who sat through the proceedings, was outraged by the committee's findings. The next day they met with college president, Dr. Harry Buttimer. They asked him if he would reconsider the case if new evidence were introduced. Buttimer refused, saying no such option was forthcoming.

Gene Mead, Chairman of Behavioral Sciences department, made an appearance at the Student Council's next meeting. Asked if orders had come from a higher authority for a quick and immediate evaluation, he said, "No that is not so." Could he be quoted on that remark? He stated, "Yes, you may quote me."

Later it was learned that if a decision hadn't been reached by March 15, Ms. Handler would have been hired automatically with permanent status.

At press time, the students, with support from student government, were staging an informal picket demonstration in front of the Educational Services Building.

The Student Council is calling for a general strike March 28 to protest lack of student input into the evaluation, hiring and firing of their instructors. Students feel they have the right to a say in such matters since they are the ones affected by the education they receive.

Juan Galvan, Student Body President, called for all students to support the strike." Your education, as well as the future it holds, is at stake. It is your responsibility to take an active role in determining your education."

Socialist to Speak on Nixon Strategy

SPEAKER – Syd Stapleton, Staff Coordinator of the National Peace Action Committee, will be on campus March 23.

Socialist lecturer and writer Syd Stapleton announced last week that he will speak at CCSF tomorrow concerning, "Vietnam and Nixon's World Strategy."

Stapleton, 27, who was one of the organizers of the January, 1973, "March of 100,000," in Washington, D.C., declared a challenge to Dan Segal, former Student Body President of the University of California, Berkeley, and any "interested persons" to debate him on the sagacity of Nixon's policies.

Stapleton is currently touring the Western, outhern, and Southeastern states, lecturing on what he claims is "Nixon's continuing policy of keeping the war going in Vietnam." Stapleton is also the author of a pamphlet detailing Nixon's political history and record in office – Making Richard Nixon Perfectly Clear.

Letters to the Editor

WAC Replies

Editor, The Guardsman

This reply is in reference to the article published in the last issue of The Guardsman, on International Womens Day, and on the Teach-In we had at City College.

We in the Womens Action Committee feel that the article is a direct slander of International Womens Day, and on the Womens Liberation movement as a whole.

International Womens Day was begun here in the United States. In New York City, there was a fire in a garmentworkers factory composed predominately of women and children, many people were killed and seriously injured. A strike was called on March 8th, one of the demands being an end to child labor. March 8th has been commerated around the world as an International Working womens holiday.

The first part of the Teach-In was a panel of two women Merci Frankel and Elen Netlebeck (sic). Merci spoke on why chicanas and Black women should support the womens movement. Elen Netlebeck (sic) spoke on the abortion Rights Victory, and the struggle that needs to be waged to ensure the implementation of this Supreme Court Ruling.

The second part of the Teach-In was devoted to a talk by Evelyn Reed a Marxsist Anthropologist who spoke on the origins of Womens oppression, she related that womens oppression began with the rise of private property which in turn caused the rise of the nuclear family. She was well received (as were all the speakers) and there was a long discussion, there was a reluctance from the audience to break up, but owing to the fact that the organizers of the Teach-In could only acquire the room for two hours, we were forced to end the discussion.

We of the Womens Action Committee state that this article was full of erroneous facts, and encourage all women to attend the next meeting on Thursday, March 22nd at 11 a.m. in bungalow 5 to find out more about us.

Drop in College Youth Forecasted

The Census Bureau last week forecast a dramatic drop in the number of college and high school students by 1985 because of a declining U.S. birth rate.

The special census dealt primarily with young persons 14-24 years, the group born in the so-called "baby boom" after World War II.

The number of college-age youths (18-21) is expected to drop from a 1980 peak of 16.8 million to 15 million by 1985. The 1972 figure is 15.2 million.

A similar downturn is forecast for the high-school-age group (14-17) from a 1975 peak of 16.8 million to 14.3 million by 1985. The 1972 figure is 16.4 million.

The median age of Americans has gone up a notch the past year, from 27.9 years in 1971 to 28 in 1972, reversing a downward trend that started in the 1950s.

American youth, the report said, totalled 42.4 million in 1972, or 20 percent of the entire population. This compared with figures of 27.1 million and 15 percent in 1960, an increase of 58 percent in 12 years.

But the high birth rate period is over, the report said, with American couples now getting married later and having fewer children. It said the average number of births expected by women 18-24 was 2.3 last year, down from 2.4 in 1972 and 2.9 in 1967.

QUESTION: What's Your Biggest Complaint about City College?

Joel Snyder—Behavioral Sciences

Bureaucratic bull—. Too many administrators. If any action is to be taken it has to be on the part of the individual student, once students are made aware of the fact that without them this school could not exist.

Marc Rosenblum—Ornamental Horticulture

I don't have a complaint. I'm happy with my instructors, I'm happy with my schedule. I found the school very cooperative when I needed financial assistance. The financial assistance the school made possible enables me to stay here.

Phyllis Quon—Physical Ed.

My biggest complaint is the teaching. It's worse than in high school. They treat you like babies, they lead you by the hand. They keep tabs on you, it should be more like SF State.

Terry Chan—Pre-Pharmacy

I don't know. I don't have a complaint, I haven't been here long enough. The scheduling is pretty bad though.

Clarissa Williams—English

No complaint really. The walking up hills to class is the most difficult of all. That's about it, though.

Cherie Driver—French

When you come in here they give you a number and classify you! I don't like that at all.

Missionary Blasts P.I.'s Martial Law

Hicks has been working mostly with the Negro (as known in the P.I.) on the sugar plantations.

"I don't like martial law. What is really needed in the country is not more policemen, but a drastic change in land reform. The United States supports the martial law, for its investors are protected by Marcos' policy," he added.

"I saw people in the country earning 25 cents a day. I have seen a 50 percent unemployment situation in Manila. I suggest priority should be given to build the economy of the poor rather than to spend millions of dollars in building up martial law policy," Hicks added.

He also stated, "The general circumstances that caused the Vietnam war seem to prevail also in the Philippines. As long as the United States supports Marcos by sending military aid, there is a big chance the Philippines might become the next Vietnam," Hicks predicted.

Record Review:

Vinegar Joe - Gimmick Rock from Ol' England

Another rock group named "Joe." Not Jo Mama or Jo Jo Gunne but this time Vinegar Joe from Manchester, England, and starring a leggy female singer named Elkie Brooks. (One can almost hear the record company executives: "If they see their name in the record racks, they'll buy it, right? Doncha remember when all the Peggies' boyfriends bought "Peggie Sue" and when all the Donnas ran out and bought "Donna." Weeeelll, just how many Joes do you figure there are in America?")

Atlantic Records must think Vinegar Joe has a lot of potential. They're sending promo copies of their first album Vinegar Joe along with the new, second album Rock 'n Roll Gypsies, which is why you're reading one review of two albums, in case you wondered. Anyway, it does give us a chance to see how they've evolved between records.

VOCALIST – Elkie Brooks

Joe seems to be receiving the all-around red-carpet promotional treatment. Slick press releases (emphasizing Miss Brooks' sex appeal: "pulsing away on stage in a skirt split to the thigh") not to mention some really expensive-looking album cover artwork. With this kind of attention from their American distributor, you're almost certain to be seeing/hearing Vinegar Joe somewhere in the near future. The radio spots and full page ads in Rolling Stone will probably be rushed out by the time you read this, in fact.

OK, so what does the gimmicky name, slick promotion, and artsy packaging have to do with the music? In Vinegar Joe's case, at least, it all turns out to be symbolic of the group's sound on record; imitative, gimmicky, just a trifle toooo slick.

On the first album (named after the group), the problem was that the band couldn't quite seem to decide who to imitate. On "Ride Me Easy, Rider" Elkie attempted some Tina Turner style funky-sexy-black vocals: Unfortunately she just sounds like a young English girl doing Tina Turner imitations. (In an interview, Elkie was quoted: "I hope I look as good as Tina when I'm her age.")

Elkie sings the line "Who's gonna fuuuurow your fields?" stretching out the syllable and pronouncing it as if it didn't belong with "furrow" at all, but with the guttural "u" sound in the good ol' four-letter word. See what we mean about gimmicks? Sure they'll grab your attention maybe the first time you hear it on the radio, but they do get old, (faster than you can flip the record over, in fact).

"Circles," written by vocalist/rhythm guitarist Robert Palmer, sounded like an attempted imitation of the Airplane's sound back on Surrealistic Pillow. The pseudo-psychedelic mysterioso poetry lyrics and the saccharine-sweet vocal duet don't quite make it anywhere near the musical altitudes occupied by the Airplane, but sort of flop like a soggy french-fry. The warbly, echoey guitar, supposed to conjure up images of rippling brooks, just sounds like warbly, echoey guitar. Like the ripply Miss Brooks herself, it's not at all unpleasant, it's just not exactly esthetic, either.

As on "Never Met A Dog" the group did manage to build up to some Delaney and Bonnie-style all-out-boogie climaxes, with all the assorted backup musicians wailing away. At least here some real excitement got generated, although it came from the flashes of blaring horns and some electronic chiming sounds, not to mention what sounded like a flute, or could have been a moog synthesizer. By the time things get this loud, who can tell? When the dubbed in horns and electronics are the best part of an album, it really makes you wonder what happened to the band!

Looking Back

1935 - The Good Old Days Were Less Costly

The Guardsman, 1935—in the beginning:

Thumbing through the first issues of the CCSF newspaper (when it was called the Emanon) provides an interesting look into the past.

At that time, the school paper had advertising. The cost of many of the items advertised makes one wish for the return of the "good old days."

A "first string(?) pleat-back men's suit" was selling for only $25. Those "smart-looking Scotty brogues" could be yours for $3 and a "goodlooking shirt with button-down, side-spaced collar," was priced at $2.

For the well-dressed woman, Roos Brothers offered "a lightweight wool suit smartly priced at $12.95." Those "tricky sports oxfords" graced the feet for only $2.95.

To complete herself for her weekend date, Sue Brooks Beauty Salon offered the coed a special shampoo and "fingerwave" for 75 cents.

Of course, students could not live on education alone. Across the street at Charlotte's Tavern, the student could lunch for only 35 cents.

Also offered at Sue's for the multilingual student was a "French conversation with your haircut" with Monsieur d'Alby. Fifty cents in any language.

If you don't like the name "Rams" for the varsity teams, the student body in 1935 turned down such other popular names as: The Caballeros, Lombards, Presidians, Pioneers, Anzans and Grenadiers.

This newspaper might not have been The Guardsman; other possibilities were: The Commodore, The Pioneer, The Gaucho and The Seagull.

"I haven't been so set up in a long time," were the words of CCSF President Cloud. At the request of one member of the football team, a class was reopened. This team member was to be the only student and President Cloud the instructor.

Film

A Different Kind of Love Story

An interesting film, Heartbreak Kid, is currently playing at the Empire Cinema and the new Royal Theater.

The plot is one which shouldn't be shared beforehand because it would give away the whole story. But it can be said that it is a very different kind of love story, and is indeed worth seeing.

Heartbreak Kid is the winner of two Academy Award nominations – one to Eddie Albert and the other to Jeannie Berlin. Both deserve the nomination and probably the award itself.

At first, the viewer wonders if Eddie Albert is to fit into the story at all since he does make a belated appearance. But once he does, the viewer becomes aware of this actor's truly fine talents.

Cybill Sheperd is the sexy "Coppertone commercial" type around whom the plot revolves, even though she, too, makes a late appearance in the film.

The comedy should be seen, if not for Miss Berlin, then just for the sheer mystery of the plot itself.

KQED Presents A-New Series

KQED Channel 9 has begun a 13-part BBC dramatization called The Roads to Freedom. The series is based on a series of three Jean Paul Sartre novels exploring the search for personal and philosophic freedom in an increasingly mechanized and dehumanizing world.

The story centers on several characters, especially Mathieu, a young professor who confuses freedom with a reluctance to commit himself to any relationship. Daniel, a witty but self-loathing homosexual, and Michelle. Mathieu's mistress.

The conflicts and tensions between the characters develop against the backdrop of the threat of fascism, which plunges Europe into war and alters the lives of those in Daniel's circle.

Dramatized scenes of the political intrigues of Hitler, Chamberlain and Daladier, and still photos from the era, recreate the mood and times.

Norris and Johnson Pacing Undefeated Ram 9

San Jose City College baseball team might know the way to San Jose but they were totally lost when it came to facing the CCSF Rams, on March 8 at Balboa Diamond.

Mike Norris and John Grazioli combined to pitch a 2-hit shutout. Norris supplied the clutch hitting with a single in the 4th inning with men on 2nd and 3rd (it's called winning your own game). Shortstop T. J. Johnson and 1st baseman Don Lyons helped pad their averages with two hits a piece.

The secret to a balanced team is a good bench, and Grazioli showed just how tough the Rams reserves are. He came in the game after Norris retired in the 5th inning. He pitched hitless and scoreless baseball for the remainder of the game to preserve the victory.

For the third game of the season, on March 13, the Rams traveled to the foot of majestic Mt. Diablo to play the vikings from Diablo Valley Junior College. It was well worth the scenic drive, as the stickers from the city completely destroyed the offerings of the Vikings' pitchers, collecting 13 hits and winning 11-5.

Again it was T. J. Johnson and Mike Norris who provided the power by each collecting three hits. From this writer's viewpoint (on the CCSF bench) these two players have the five essentials needed to be superstars. They both can hit with power, they can turn on the speed around the base-paths, they have strong arms, and can field their position.

Tom Devencenzi got his first start of the young season by pitching a respectable game for seven innings. But it was Phil Weidinger who came out of the bullpen (it was named after Chief Sitting Bull). to do a fantastic job of relief.

It's been said that the students of City College are totally apathetic towards Inter-Collegiate sports. But it's also been said Everyone loves a winner and sport fans, these men are winners. Show a little enthusiasm folks; you only live once!

State Tourney:

★★★★ Basketballers Third Best in California ★★★★

Time is the enemy of all who are conscious of it (and have a deadline). But it killed City College of San Francisco last Friday at Ventura.

The Rams, one of the best running teams in the Ventura State Championships, failed to score on the Vikings of Long Beach in the early goings. Its result—one that the Rams will remember for some time—they lost by the score of 67-58.

Trailing the better part of the game against the taller Vikings, it wasn't until just three minutes were left that City College made their most serious bid and asserted that they deserved to be third ranked in California.

Under the guided shooting of guard Ray Frazier who scored 13 points, the Rams rolled on back after trailing as much as 10 points in the second half.

On the ensuing play, after teammate Darrold Jackson layed in an important bucket closing it to 60-54, Frazier stole the inbound pass but was fouled desperately trying to score.

But, as held true throughout the game, the Rams couldn't buy a bucket for love nor money. One had to wonder if maybe the rims were greased.

Making only one of a two-shot foul proved no more significant than the one-on-one situation that guard Dave Smith missed with only 1:41 left. The rest, well—that's history.

"If we had made the two one-on-one situations, we could have, with any luck, won," Coach Phelan later said.

The Rams were guilty of only making 50 percent at the charity line. Obviously it was a determining factor in the game's outcome.

"We practiced," Phelan added, "but we were erratic. We had good shooters on the line, but they didn't drop." But by the same token he felt that the Rams should have set up and worked for shots. "We should have exercised more patience in shooting."

WHOOPING IT UP — at the state basketball tournament in Ventura were (foreground) Lance Burton, Arlene Carlino, Bruce Clement, (background) trumpeter Mike Calabreze and saxist Lloyd Sugamana.

It was a game that saw the Rams stone-cold in the opening minutes of the game. It wasn't until with 13:15 left in the first half did guard Johnwell pop from outside.

All the while the hulking Vikings ran off nine unanswered points Viking center Floyd Heaton, a 6'6" giant, who scored 14 points and brought down 10 rebounds, blocked off the inside shot.

"We were too keyed up," Phelan admitted. "It was the pressure. We had opened with a zone defense but we had to go back to a man-to-man defense."

Rebounding, speculated to be in the Vikings' favor was, as they accumulated three more with the final count 42-39 in their favor. But it was through their efforts and fortune that they were able to capitalize by getting the second shot and scoring. It was especially true in the second half when they almost blew the game wide open.

The problem of fouling hurt City as the Rams got into foul trouble early. It especially hampered the play of Flash Atchans who many say make the Rams move. Fouling out in the second half, he could have been more beneficial in City's last minute surge on court than hailing his teammates on the bench.

The season is now over but City is the champ of the Golden Gate Conference and has retained the third place ranking in Northern California.

Perhaps Coach Phelan summed up what was almost the perfect season. "Nobody gave the players a chance to achieve but I hope that I have as hard working a team next year."

—Lester Chang

Fans Longfaced From Defeat, but Phelan Inducted To Hall

The City College basketball team, after having kicked the lining out of Laney College by the score of 70-60 (at the Chabot campus) earned the right to participate in the state playoffs in Ventura, California. The Rams played good ball; but overall they came out third in the state.

The first game for the Rams was against Santa Ana College. Ram guard Dave Smith was high point man of the evening with Darrell Jackson and "Flash" Atchan doing a fantastic job on rebounds. With 5 minutes 29 seconds to go in the game, Santa Ana tied the Rams at 48. City then came out with their version of the fast break to go on to victory with a final score of 52-51.

The second game left many sad faces on the CCSF students and players who made it to Ventura; when the team was defeated by Long Beach City College, 67-58.

The loss consequently put the Rams up against College of Marin in a contest for third place. Defensively the Rams played flawlessly. One of the highlights of the evening was to watch Dave Smith keep a tight guard on his brother Len who is a 6'3" guard for Marin.

In the last 42 seconds the score was tied at 59, thereby taking the game into a five minute overtime period. The Rams dynamite center Bob Pruit came into the overtime from the bench red hot. Pruit, handling the ball like a pro, pulled the Rams in the right direction, sparking them to a 69-61 victory that finished Marin for the year.

Another honor for the City College team was the induction of coach Sid Phelan into the Coaches' Hall of Fame. The award is presented every year by the California Coaches Association. This year they chose Coach Phelan. Phelan is the first to win the award while still an active coach. The award was presented to Phelan during half-time in the Compton-Long Beach game. (Compton went on to win the State Tourney, 72-70.)

A final victory party was given for the team at Mr. D's on Broadway. The party was sponsored by the Bayview-Hunter's Point Mothers Club. After the introduction of the team members, the Rams were presented with a cake and a trophy.

Vets Cancel Demo; Rap to VA

Recently San Francisco veterans cancelled a planned demonstration against the Veterans Administration. High rates of unemployment, late arrival of checks and alleged insensitivity of veterans needs were to be the themes.

The demonstration was called off when the VA agreed to meet with representatives of veteran's groups.

Veterans groups from City College, San Francisco State, University of SF, Vietnam Veterans Against the War and veterans throughout the Bay Area were scheduled to participate.

Organization of the would-be demonstration was credited to the City College Vets. The CCSF Vets are an on-campus organization who have been involved in numerous efforts to improve the welfare of veterans.

"Many veterans do not have jobs. A lot of them have been evicted from their homes. Many haven't the money to buy their books, food or transportation. So you can see what a high drop-out rate there is," said Chris Brown one of the veteran's spokesmen.

The Vets had a conference with City College President, Harry Buttimer, who has expressed concern for their situation. He agreed to talk to the VA to see if a meeting could be arranged to avoid the confrontation. The VA had earlier refused such a meeting, but with Buttimer's assistance one was finally held.

Wally Wells, CCSF Dean of Veteran Affairs, and Gary Tom, director of the CCSF Veterans Educational Incentive Program, accompanied the veterans to speak in their behalf.

The veterans complained about the length of time it took for the VA to act on their problems.

The VA countered their complaint citing the overload of cases and recent cut-backs in funding.

Chris Brown, one of the veterans said, "I have been in school for two months without receiving my checks.

Counselor Helen Huffman Dies of Cancer

A member of the Counseling Staff since 1948, Helen Huffman died February 25 after a long fight with cancer.

According to Dr. Jacobsen, head of the Counseling Department, Miss Huffman gained international notice several years ago, when on a tour through the USSR. While traveling around the country, the Soviet police lost track of her for several days, and did not relocate her until she arrived in Moscow. At the time, her disappearance caused quite a stir worldwide because the Russians were not known to make those kind of mistakes.

She is survived by her niece, Elizabeth Jones, of San Francisco.

A memorial student loan fund is being initiated in her memory by her colleagues to provide small emergency loans to students.

$1,263,000 Remodeling Scheduled

Associate Director of Facilities and Planning for CCSF, Victor B. Graff said today that what may be, "the largest remodeling in the history of higher education in this state," will begin June 1 on the Science Building.

The money for the project, $1,263,000 (the lowest bid) was awarded to the Arnst Brothers Construction Company, a San Rafael firm, at a recent meeting of the CCSF District Board of Governors.

According to Graff, "The main purpose of the remodeling is to update all science facilities in the building and get everything else out of there."

"We are shooting for completion of the project," he continued, "by the end of the summer of '74."

"The Science Building," Graff noted "is a very solid structure. It exceeds earthquake standards and was built right after the Field Act, which established earthquake standards in 1935."

'Free Critic' Staff Gets It Together

At a recent Free Critic policy meeting, the staff and other interested persons discussed what could be done both to improve the Critic and most importantly, to ensure that publishing deadlines are met.

The Critic, a "forum for student ideas and opinions which affect the campus," has not been published since December of last year. According to staff member Richard Hourigan (who has called the meeting,) "The Critic is not operating now because of its past structure."

Critism of the Critic ranted from allegations that the paper, "lacked diversity," to charges that it didn't allow adequate representation of student views."

Student editors got together the discussion at a meeting following the discussion and formed committees to carry on the operation of the newspaper. Editors and co-editors include: Don Borgstrom, Neal Godaveria, Allen Pinto, Richard L. Hourigan, Ellen Brotsky and Lee Leland.

The Critic is currently accepting contributions from any aspiring writers, artists and organization.

Diego Rivera: Controversial Mural Finds Home at CCSF

The most valuable art work on the CCSF campus, located in the lobby of the Little Theatre, underwent restoration last January. Valued at $120,000, it is artist Diego Rivera's largest and perhaps most controversial work.

"The mural represents the art forms of the South blending into the mechanization of the north," said Emmy Lou Packard, in charge of restoring the noted work.

"The dominant figure is the curious painting of the wood machine figure. The figure depicts the southern hand of labor and the machine of labor blended together," said artist Packard.

Originally painted in 1939 at the Golden Gate International Exposition on Treasure Island, it was always intended for the CCSF campus. "Timothy Pfleuger, architect of City College, originally commissioned Rivera to paint the mural for $1,000 including expenses," stated Packard.

"Several controversies arose before and during the six weeks he took to paint the mural-fresco. For one, the Exposition frowned on having a declared Trotskyite painting at an American fair. It took both Pfleuger and several participating fellow artists of the fair," said Packard, "to convince the Exposition administrators to hire him."

"There was also some talk about the material and content of his painting. It

'Grassroots' Campaign: Petitions Propose District Supervisors

Perhaps sometime during the last month you have noticed a small blue table near the flag pole, or someone has approached to ask you to sign a petition. The petition is for a proposed charter amendment for the district election of San Francisco Board of Supervisors. The organization circulating the petitions is a new CCSF club, the San Francisco Grassroots.

Signatures

Dave Lyons, a CCSF student, and president of the campus Grassroots, has approximately 30 students circulating petitions; they have collected over 4700 signatures on campus.

According to Lyons, 37,000 city-wide valid signatures are needed to have the charter amendment placed on the ballot. To do this the organization that started the petition, Citizens for Representative Government, has set a goal of 50,000 signatures to be collected by April 9. At present 28,000 have been turned in.

District Election

Last summer, the Board of Supervisors were asked to put this charter amendment on the November ballot. Instead they placed a powerless "policy statement" with five district alternatives on the ballot.

"Currently, Supervisors are supposed to represent the whole city," said

NSA at Berkeley—Professor George M. Williams, general director of Nichiren Shoshu of America Academy and editor-in-chief of the group's tri-weekly newspaper, World Tribune, sponsors his fourth U.C. Berkeley seminar on the "life philosophy of happiness."

Buddhas in Berkeley?

Nichiren Shoshu - Key to "True Humanism?"

There are buddas in Berkeley, "Potential buddas" that is, according to a recent lecture on Nichiren Shoshu's life philosophy presented by Professor George M. Williams at the U.C campus across the bay.

In an informal atmosphere, emphasizing simple and laughable daily life experiences, Professor Williams described that, "Buddha actually means an individual's indestructably happy human life. Therefore, true Buddhism or Nichiren Shoshu is actually the key to true humanism."

"Humanists are revolutionists in a very revolutionary semantical sense. We have tried violence and bloodshed for thousands of years," Professor Williams stressed to the 160 students attending Berkeley's fourth NSA (Nichiren Shoshu of America Academy) seminar. "We are sick and tired of trying to change the outside. The final and most important revolution is the human revolution."

Human revolution Williams described as an individual positively changing the condition of his own daily life accomplishing every goal and dream through the practice of Nichiren Shoshu Buddhism. Chanting Nam Myoho Renge Kyo comprises the fundamental basis of this practice.

The lecture covered the historical background of the Nichiren Shoshu philosophy and various theoretical terms and concepts, but the intent was to impress the students with the day-to-day practicality and benefit derived from chanting.

Explaining that, "Heaven and hell are not external phenomena but exist within every person's life depending on the present situation and environment," Williams stated, "Your observation of outer phenomena depends on your condition of life."

NSA Seminar presentations began in late 1968 and since that time Williams has given over 80 lectures at universities and colleges throughout the United States. While there are formal Student Division organizations on many campuses, the major means of relating the life philosophy of Nichiren Shoshu is through informal, open discussion meetings held nightly at various locations within every major city.

There are approximately 25 active members of NSA at CCSF, and over 200,000 throughout the United States.

Chinese Culture Club :

Is "Yellow Power" A Myth? What CCC Isn't Doing

Due to it's large membership the Chinese Culture Club (CCC) has a reputation among the other campus organizations as one of the best organized and most powerful of the student organizations on campus. This myth was dispelled however by two members of the CCC, the vice-president and student council representative.

Vice-president Peter Wong said, "We have about three hundred members in the organization but actually most join just to belong, not to participate. Most of them think that City College is only a temporary stop for them."

Newton Lee, student council representative, stated, "Most Chinese students are passive and not involved in actually running the organization. Involvement is very limited."

The CCC has been in existence for about two years and is a coalition of two former groups. The present CCC is made up of the old CCC and the MHS, a socialist-oriented group.

Lee went on to further state, "The only power the CCC has is that the members vote in a bloc. There's not much inner conflict."

Present activities that the CCC offers to students are Oriental martial arts classes of two different styles. There is also a picnic planned for the Easter vacation.

Occasionally the CCC offers a cultural activity. Last semester there was a Chinese classical music show presented on campus and Chinese films are shown from time to time. There is a film planned to be shown on April 26.

On the subject of community involvement Lee said, "There is no group involvement, only individual action. Sometimes the channels to the community are not open to us."

"We need manpower to run programs and just keeping this place (CCC headquarters) open takes a lot." Lee referred to setting up and running programs similar to those of La Raza.

Wong and Lee explained that traditionally most Chinese students are apathetic and "just concerned with their studies." They cited the example that just recently the CCC received funding from the college for the first time.

Lee said, "It's the first time that we have ever gotten any funding because, it's the first time anyone from CCC asked."

Asked whether the CCC will support the student strike Wong explained, "I don't think too many people will go on strike. If our members don't go on strike, there's nothing we can do about it." He went on to say that the CCC might support the strike but he wasn't sure of it.

Wong stated many times, "Most Chinese students are just concerned about their studies." That statement seems to say a lot about the CCC and the Chinese students here at City College.

Student Union A Health Hazard

If you plan to visit our $550,000 Student Union in the near future, you had better bring along a hard hat!

Some time back it was reported that the Student Union Bldg. was in the process of literally falling apart. Rapid deterioration of the building (due to shoddy construction) was left unchecked.

After some reinvestigatio, it has been found that the water problems have been solved, but nothing has been done to fix the danger of the falling ceilings or the doors which do not open or close properly. Still perilously hanging up there, more pieces of the ceiling have slowly continued to fall.

Even with the ever-present danger of being hit with these heavy tiles, students still sit in those areas where large sections of the ceiling have already fallen.

Also it has been found that a fire exit door on the lower level will not open. The door has been jammed for a few months now.

Until action can be taken, students should be warned that entering the building may be hazardous to their health. The priority of repairs to the Student Union should be number one since it concerns the safety of students.

Lecture Series:

National Parks "Quota System"?

Dr. Roderick Nash, the wildlife speaker at the March 15th Lecture-Concert Series, began his presentation with a quote, like a fire and brimstone preacher.

In this case it was a taped wolf's cry, not a line from the scriptures.

As the lonely howl filled the darkened College Theater, the audience was asked to imagine they were crouched on a plain, listening to the cry of a stronger fiercer animal.

"This fear, if your imagination is strong enough to recreate it, is probably the force which caused our evolution," the Associate Professor of History theorized.

After the tape recording was played, (which began with one wolf crying out, then many more), the audiences attention was directed to a slide projected picture on a screen in the middle of the stage.

A half moon picture of the earth loomed in the blackness of space. Dr. Nash called it, "Spaceship Earth."

"This picture," he then claimed, "had a major effect on many intellectuals of our time."

"It made them think of how frail the Earth really is. And thus bloomed many hackneyed phrases like the Buckminster Fuller one I just used," said Nash.

With the aid of the two following slides, both of crowded recreation areas, Nash pointed out how rising population growth has made a tragic irony out of the saying, "I'm going out there to get away from it all."

The next slide was of a Daly City housing tract, to which Dr. Nash applied a biblical adage about how too much building can cause us to forget what homes are for.

With each of the following slides, Dr. Nash illustrated and explained how man became "disoriented to nature," and how with the disorientation, simple transgressions made by man became massive and oppressive to nature.

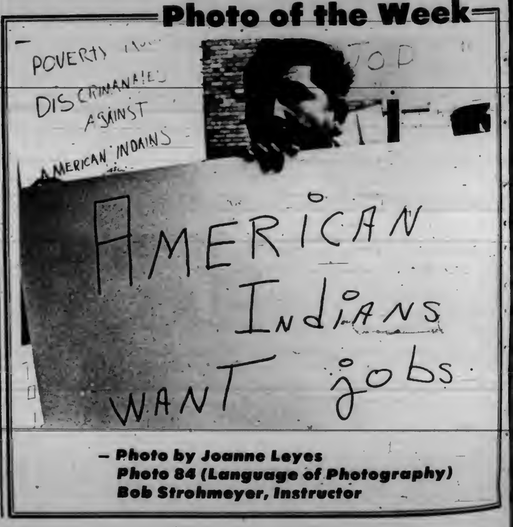
The next topic of discussion was the Grand Canyon. Dr. Nash claimed that," The natural beauty of the canyon and the Colorado River's brute force could be used to again humble man to nature."

"When I'm here," the summer river-guide for the Grand Canyon National Park Service said, "I have a habit of turning rocks, or mounds of earth into gods, like the Indians used to do."

"This is not such a bad idea," he said countering the crowds reaction of amusement, "because if everyone thought of hills or trees as gods, they might think twice before contouring it or chopping it down."

"John W. Powell," said Dr. Nash (as the topic changed to a picture of the river from the canyon wall) "was the first white-man to travel down the Colorado River."

In 1968 Dr. Nash was the 500th person to make the adventurous journey. Now approximately 500 people shoot the rapids monthly.



"This is bad for a park, because when more people show up, things like new parking lots are made to accommodate them," he said.

As a smog-filled picture of bumper to bumper traffic in Yosemite Valley filled the screen, Nash claimed that "Parks then lose their purpose and become motorized ghettos."

This is why Dr. Nash recommended that a quota system should be used by the park service. "The regulation of people attending parks at a given time will help preserve our wildlife areas," believes Dr. Nash.

Student Govt. Criticized.

Editor, The Guardsman,

It is generally assumed that upon entrance to a community college the student has achieved a certain degree of adult maturity.

Yet, the 15,000 member student body of City College is presently being represented by a student government that rivals that of a third grade class in its lack of maturity, responsibility, and democratic process.

The absence of any order during the meetings of the student council is appalling. Council members gain attention by shouting louder than anyone who happens to be speaking at the moment.

Any type of parliamentary procedure, even in its most rudimentary form, is non-existent. In a recent meeting, votes were taken on motions that were stated simply as "I move what he said." "What he said" amounted to an unclear, confusing oratory.

Examples of the irresponsibility of the council are frequent and blatant. Recently, a measure was introduced to pay the legal fees for a student who was arrested for assault on campus.

When told that this was the second arrest of the same student on charges of assault in two years, and that to take such action would violate the student constitution and be illegal, the council responded by stating, "We can do whatever we want!" Words like that normally come from the mouths of babes, not adults in positions of responsibility.

However, the most vicious crime of this council is their total disrespect for the democratic process.

Speakers who dare offer dissenting viewpoints are shouted down and ridiculed, without an answer to the charges given by any member of the council.

As Councilman Lee Leonard, past editor of the "Free" Critic, stated in the council meeting of March 19, "We (the council) don't want any dissent, it leads to conflict." It is a mystery how democracy can function without any dissent.

By their actions it is clear that democratic actions are not the ideals of this council. Important committee appointments are made, not on the basis of experience or qualification, but on the basis of friendship with one or more of the council members.

Budgets, clearly the most important aspect of any government, are not to be granted on the basis of need, but on the basis of acceptable political ideology.

The council has already vowed to eliminate the intramural and athletic budgets; yet, neither of these groups has been called to defend their financial needs, nor has the council given any reason for this action.

The student body of City College is being represented by a small circle of friends.

It is the job of the student body to end the dictatorship of the present regime. Tomorrow may be too late.

Feminist Criticize Picture

Editor, The Guardsman:

This letter is in response to your front page display of three pairs of female legs as one of the 'the joys of spring,' as stated in the March 22 issue of the Guardsman.

As a woman and a feminist I find the use of these aforesaid legs as totally irrelevant, unnecessary and insulting.

Furthermore, I find it difficult to understand the necessity of exploiting another human being in order to enable one to enjoy these so-called 'joys.'

There are too many other issues deserving the space used for this photo, ie; child care, the student strike, discrimination on campus, etc.

Why not use this space to make the Guardsman a more relevant, interesting medium of communication?

Golda Gets Slammed

Editor, The Guardsman,

Last week Golda Meir, the prime minister of Israel, came to the U.S. asking for more military aid for Israel. She wants $565 million.

That's about $50 million more than last year; now stop and ask yourself what she wants the military aid for?

Well she wants it to kill more innocent refugees who are (children, women, and old men) unarmed. Or does she want the money to shoot down another civilian airplane, like she did two weeks ago, and kill 106 who got lost in the air. Or does she want it to destroy more and more factories, and school yards, in Egypt as she did the last 3 weeks. $565 million sounds like a hell of a lot! It is! Do you know what $565 million would do here in the U.S.? (1) It could be used to eliminate the ghettos; (2) It could be used to get people off welfare; (3) It could be used for better housing; (4) It could be used for ecology; (5) It could be used for defense; (6) It could mean lower taxes.

I could go on and on telling you what the U.S. could use the money for. That is why Nixon cut on defense, on the U.S. budget, and child care centers. Nixon was elected by the rich, powerful Zionists who work here in the U.S. Let me go back and explain what Israel would do with the money.

It would buy new planes, artillery and most of the money would go to the pockets of the Zionist leaders. And it would mean higher taxes. Why should we, the tax-payers, have to pay our own hard-working money for some other country's aid?

So I urge you to please write your congressman to reject this plan. And keep the U.S. dollars where it belongs — here in the U.S. and for the American people only.

Sincerely,
Elias Shamieh

QUESTION: "How Should Students Figure in the Hiring and Firing of Teachers?"

Jack Dokey—Faculty
Students have a role to play in that process. They have an opinion to be considered. I don't know exactly how, but their opinion has to be considered in some way.

Jacqueline Pinkins—Pre-Med.
If students are satisfied with the procedures of the instructors, I feel the instructors' evaluation and duration of term of instruction should be solely left to the vote of the student body.

Dr. William McInerny—Faculty
Students should have some input, but not dictatorial powers. I don't think they should be in the same position as the faculty. They should be heard, but their judgment should not carry as much weight as the faculty or administrators.

Henry Hatcher—Faculty
Students shouldn't figure in the hiring or firing of teachers. I don't think students have the credentials or the qualifications to judge teachers. They haven't demonstrated their abilities to do so.

Carol Ferguson—Pre-Nursing
Whatever the faculty proportion is should be equal to the students proportion. A variety of students should be selected from various departments throughout the school. Especially the students from the department in question.

Rich Gressmann—Mechanical Engineering
They shouldn't figure in the hiring of the teachers. If they have complaints about the teachers they should have a voice for their complaints which could lead to the firing of the teacher if severe enough.

Scholarship Notice

Editor, The Guardsman

I am writing to you on behalf of the students at CCSF who might be interested in applying for scholarships being offered by the World Affairs Council to their annual Asilomar Conference in Monterey on May 4-6. The subject of the weekend seminar is New Realities of Power in Asia and it will have as participants well-known figures in government, business and education.

This is an excellent opportunity for CCSF students to come into contact with such people and to attend along with students from other colleges in the Bay Area, seminars, addresses, and panel discussions in beautiful surroundings.

Any students who may be interested in applying may contact me at C-334-F (extension 169). The deadline for applying is April 9th. Thank you very much.

Yours sincerely,
Dr. Virginia McClam

Poison Food?

Mr. Lloyd Ackermann, The Guardsman:

Sorry Lloyd, but I am not at all moved by your article, "Food Not Enough to Go Around."

Come on, are we really "lucky" that the campus canteen and grocery store are there? What do they sell in these places? Poison. Coffee, cakes, sodas, which are all overpriced and damaging to our health. How many more years are we Americans to consume such plastic "food." Any you pointing out how there are so many hungry people in the world so we can feel "lucky" (instead of "mad") is empty, senseless and damageing journalism. These words are heavy Lloyd, I know, but I'm tired of standing in line at the canteen so as when my turn comes I have the choice of any poison I desire. Is there any difference at the grocery store? No. And the cafeteria is no different. Ever have lunch there? I must admit, sometimes it seems to be balanced. And those portions ? They are only half of what they were last year, at the same price.

Why don't you write an article on healthy food and tell us why there is none here on campus or most places. Or talk more about those undernourished South San Franciscans. You know, that cup of rice, cup of spinach and six ounces of dried milk may not be such a bad diet for some people. Let's face it Lloyd, America is Fat while millions are starving. Why? Maybe we need more journalists to tell us the real story.

District Elections

Editor, The Guardsman:

Presently, the Board of Supervisors are elected on a city-wide basis. It's both confusing and difficult to choose a supervisor when there are between 30 or 40 candidates on the ballot.

A group called Citizens For a Representative Government feel that the people of San Francisco are not properly represented.

We feel San Francisco is composed of many distinct communities, each with it's own problems and needs. And that the community should choose representatives, someone who both lives within and understands his community.

It is hard to believe that the present Board of Supervisors can understand and deal with all the community's problems, particularly when they have chosen not to even live near them.

After all, to be an expert on everything, is to know much about nothing.

Students can help by signing and circulating the petition, pick them up at the Student Union Building, Room 206.

The deadline is within a few days, so please hurry.

Library Rules Disregarded

Editor, The Guardsman:

As a student of CCSF I am angered frequently by the total disregard of "silence" rules in the library. Many of us have days when we must have some quiet concentration on a given theory or concept to prepare for a class. Unfortunately our library sounds more like a playground. Couldn't we have "quiet guards" patrolling in the library?– Dan Lampear

CCSF Chapter:

Sierra Club Makes Policy Shift To Support Oil Unions

In a recent publication of the national Sierra Club the organization, in a major policy change, came out in support of oil, chemical and atomic workers' unions.

These unions are seeking to secure provisions in their contracts (through collective bargaining) to ensure environmentally safe working conditions.

"The Sierra Club," according to CCSF Sierra Club faculty advisor Carter Baum, "has gone from wilderness preservation only to questions concerning the total environment. We are interested in educating people concerning greater public involvement in the urban environment and non-renewable resources such as the San Francisco Bay," he explained.

Sierra Club membership totals 140,000 in forty-two chapters, located mostly in the Western states.

CCSF Sierra Clubbers are listed officially by the San Francisco Bay Chapter under Conservation Subcommittees.

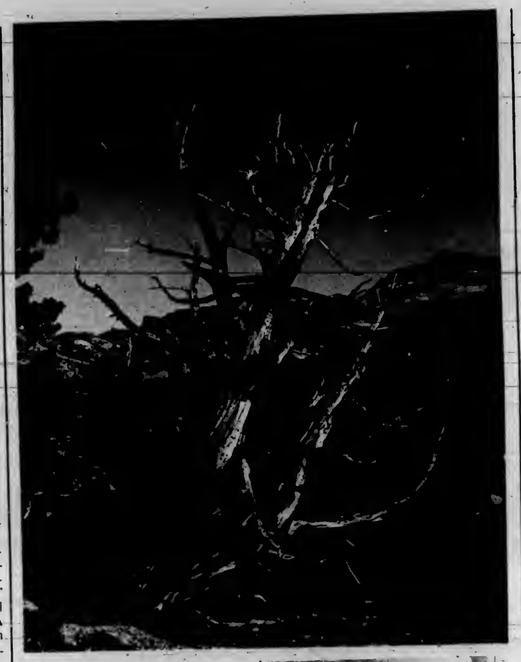
Sierra Club activities include: weekend trips of cross-country skiing, snowshoeing, mountain climbing and, "support for conservation-related causes," according to a club spokesman, Bill Stephen, "such as: The People For A Golden Gate National Recreation Area, The Coastline Initiative, or Proposition 20," he said.

"The aim of the CCSF group," he continued, "is to enhance the awareness of students as well as the community to the urgency of active participation on conservation issues."

George Caldwell, CCSF Student Representative for the Sierra Club, is currently working with junior groups to "get them interested in the environment." He explained, "No dues are required for membership. We ask only that members participate in club activities. Caldwell added that in order to qualify for Associated Students funding; "we need more members."

"In the past," he explained, "the Sierra Club has been called elitist, and that is why people are hesitant to join." He went on, "We want to spread the Sierra Club philosophy which is respect and consideration for our natural environment, which is not at all elitist."

Members may volunteer for the Sierra Club's Inner City Project, "whereby," according to Caldwell, "outings for underprivileged youngsters are organized and supervised by student volunteers." The project is similar to Operation Share (a volunteer program, designed to aid scholastically underachieving youngsters in the community). "Both programs," he added, "help youngsters develop a better working knowledge of the world."



"However," explained Caldwell, "in the past, we've had to discontinue Inner City programs because of disciplinary problems with some black youngsters." He continued, "We request mature blacks from the BSU and from the community to volunteer as leaders so we can reinstate this program."

Business at the club's last regular Tuesday 11-12 a.m. meeting included a plea from Horticulture major Pete Brannigan for student volunteers to assume the duties and responsibilities for CCSF's recycling program. "Which," he explained, "is faltering for lack of student involvement." Brannigan, graduating this semester, said, "I hate to see the truck that Coke Bottling Company donated two years ago for the recycling program going unused for the lack of student interest."Roger Brannigan said that he can be reached at the Horticulture department by any students willing to assume the extensive duties involved in the project.

An award-winning ecology film was shown at the meeting. Farallon Light was made with the cooperation of the Point Reyes Bird Observatory. The "lyrical" color documentary has some fascinating footage of the Farallon Islands' ecology and focused on U.S. and Russian financial interests in the islands, which resulted in extinction of the once plentiful fur-seal colonies.

Ecology:

Environmental Issues May Lost to Energy Needs

At a time when federal lawyers are demanding the repeal of obstacles preventing the operation of the Alaskan crude oil pipeline, gas rationing, the dispensing of gasoline in prescribed quantities by ration cards, may be a reality for many Americans living east of the Rockies.

Since Research Geologist King Hubbert explained at a recent SF conference on energy, that there could be a fossil fuel shortage by 1978, there has been evidence that the fossil fuel shortages have begun in minor scale.

East of the Rockies, the supply of gasoline is down 24 million barrels from last year's supply.

The Office of Emergency Preparedness detailed the gasoline situation after Massachusetts Representative, Silvio Conte, said he understood the government is already printing ration cards for use this summer.

An Office of Emergency Preparedness spokesman said that "there are several alternatives in a contingent plan and that rationing would be the last alternative."

But a day before Margaret Mead claimed at a Berkeley news conference that "Nixon is abandoning the job of solving environmental problems," the Senate Banking Committee voted President Nixon the power to ration if a crisis arises.

And the following day, acting chief of OEP, Darrell M. Trent, warned that, "The conflict between energy and demand and environmental protection poses some tough policy decisions."

Trent also claimed that the U.S. is dangerously dependent on foreign countries for its oil supply."

"About 28 percent of the oil used in America is from foreign origins at a cost of $4 billion a year. The cost could rise 60 percent by 1985 and the annual dollar drain would be approximately $45 billion," he said.

Senior Economist, Walter Meade, who spoke at the previously mentioned energy crisis conference, prophesized that, "By 1980 to '85—it appears to be a certainty that 50 percent of our oil will come from abroad."

During the Energy Crisis conference luncheon, one authority claimed, "Since most of our crude oil supply will be coming from the Middle East, the United States needs for oil may alter our foreign policies."

During the previously mentioned news conference with Margaret Mead, she claimed that, "Practically no research is being done on solar energy, and that is clearly the direction we have to go."

Most environmentalists agree with the woman anthropologist because sunlight is a non-polluting source of energy.

CCSF Bike Clubbers Want More Members

The CCSF Bike Club, located in the lower level of the Student Union, is looking forward to increasing its membership. Due to the location of the club, many people do not know it even exists.

Sue McCabe, president of the Bike club, states, "The rainy season has cost us some membership but now that the rains are probably going away I feel that we will expand. We want to increase our membership so that we can get more people to help watch the bikes."

Formed a few semesters ago, the bike club has no dues, but numerous activities. "Bike outings, summertime bike trips and information on the best shops are part of our activities," McCabe explained.

"But to make the club function we need members. Just bring a bike with a heavy lock and chain and someone will be there to guard against rip-offs. And if you can, you can volunteer an hour of your time between classes to help watch the bikes."

The bike club is open every day until 6 p.m.

seems that several people objected to his use of Hitler, Stalin and Mussolini on an American painting," stated the artist.

"Another thing that ired the public during the fair was the presence of armed guards around Rivera. The guards were stationed around the painting because Rivera's close friend Leon Trotsky was assassinated and the Exposition officials were afraid of any repercussions against Rivera."

The mural contains scenes of famous inventors and of prominent liberators of the Americas, as well as several scenes from Rivera's favorite movies.

"This is his largest painting and considered his best," offered Packard. "Rivera was commissioned to do another two to four paneels for more than $120,000. However, he never started the second job due to poor health and marriage problems."

"One unfortunate thing about the present condition of the mural is that it is full of fine hairline cracks and would fall apart if it was ever transferred again," sighed Ms. Packard.

The mural was originally planned for the library but because of construction problems, it went into storage until a large enough area was built to accommodate it.

Upon the completion of the Arts Building in 1964 the mural was moved to the Little Theatre. It was then that it was discovered a subsequent move would destroy it forever.

"It is valued at $120,000 but it is priceless of course because it can never be truly duplicated in size, content, meaning or style," concluded Packard.

BART Will Be Completed By September

After two decades of harsh visual disruptions and factual incongruities; the Bay Area's problematical transit prodigy, BART will become a joyously anticipated—albiet belated—reality this September.

When the undetermined fourth phase date arrives against a festive backdrop of city-wide celebrations and ceremonies, all 34 depots in the revolutionary 1.4 billion dollar transportation project will be in full operation, including the Balboa Park Station near the CCSF campus. The complete BART system, covering 75 miles of surface, aerial, and underground-construction corridors, will be in service 20 hours every day of the week.

Because the entire operation of the high-speed BART trains (routing, starting, stopping, and opening and closing doors) is accomplished without the touch of a human hand through a highly advanced (and revamped) automatic control system, there is an excellent chance that the BART lines will be right on schedule . . . a startling discontinuation of the "Continuing Saga of BART," subtitled "With a Little Effort, You Too Can Miss Every Projected Deadline."

The Balboa Park Station was constructed with CCSF student patronage, as well as that from the surrounding urban community, specifically in mind.

Located on Tara street between Geneva and Ocean, its design boasts several unique features: there is a structural emphasis on an "open sky" concept, with the 700-foot long station part surface and part subway. BART's Balboa offshoot cost over one million dollars, a sum almost justified if the projected 14,350 daily passenger trips by 1975 become an actuality.

Supervisors by District Petition

Lyons, "that's 710,000 people. A congressman doesn't represent that many people. Under the proposed tax amendment, San Francisco will be broken into 11 neighborhoods of approximately 65,000 people with one Supervisor elected from each neighborhood."

One big advantage for the district election amendment is money. During the last Supervisorial election (November, 1971), the average amount spent by winning Supervisors was almost $70,000, double the money spent by Supervisors in 1969. With Supervisors campaigning only in the district they live in, instead of city-wide, less money need be spent. According to Lyons, this should lessen the impact of special interest in financing campaigns.

District election of Supervisors should be a big plus for minority groups also explained Lyons. In the past minority neighborhoods have had to depend on support from outside their own neighborhoods. In every election this support has failed to develop, and all minority candidates that were not appointed first by the Mayor have lost in elections.

"In fact," said Lyons," 75% of the Supervisors who have served in the past ten years were first appointed by the Mayor. A mayor can appoint his friends or his brother-in-law, Mike Driscoll."

With the proposed charter amendment, if a seat becomes vacant a district-wide special election is held. "And district elections are inexpensive," Lyons stated.

Grassroots

CCSF Grassroots is an offspring of a city-wide organization that is currently working for district election of Supervisors.

The Grassroots organization evolved out of the last election, and is made up mostly of former McGovern volunteers. Lyons went on to say, "We want to be sure that the unique political stronghold which emerged in San Francisco during the last election does not wither away."

Grassroots is a non-partisan organization, working to make local government more responsible to its citizens.

Besides working on the district election amendment, Grassroots also organized rallies and a march to help defeat Proposition 22.

In the future, the Grassroots will be initiating a ballot measure for San Francisco-financed child day-care centers.

Live Rock:

Smokin' Doobie Bros. Outrock Steve Miller at Winterland

When you cheek the paper to see who's playing at Winterland, sometimes you can't believe Bill Graham has put two or three top bands on the same program.

Sometimes the evening is too good to pass up. A recent weekend concert was a good example.

The evening opened with Doctor Hook and the Medicine Show. This is the group who (after singing about it on record) finally got its picture on the cover of Rolling Stone.

During their set, they preceded each song with general stage silliness and introductory raps. The audience cheered approvingly each time the rap included the word mother ------.

Doctor Hook and band pranced and flapped around the stage while doing country-western through rock 'n roll.

When they stayed closer to CW, the band sounded distinct. But the closer the band came to R'nR, the more they fell into the great mass of unintelligible bands that merely produce noise with a strong beat.

A barbershop harmony version of "Happy Trails" closed the set. When back on stage for their encore number, they confessed, "We don't know any more songs." But one more number was somehow pulled from the Doctor's bag and everyone was happy.

A group that seems destined to headline Winterland, The Doobie Brothers, opened up strong with their hit number, "Listen to the Music."

Playing numbers from their newly-released album and more familiar ones from their fine Toulouse Street album, the Doobies kept Winterland moving throughout their entire set.

If you ever thought about faulting the Winterland sound system, you've probably been blaming the wrong people. The Doobie Brothers proved that by their musically sharp, vocally clear set.

You can hear the difference between the top bands and those that come across strictly as decibal shakers. Most top bands (usually, but not always the headliners) have a clear, distinct sound. Other groups have vocals you can't understand and a sound in which you can't pick out any of the instruments.

The Doobies final number, an extended version of "Jesus is Just Alright," had the audience bobbing and clapping in rhythm with the song.

Their encore number was another rocker which ended in strobe lights and the setting off of smoke bombs. In this case, when you saw smoke, you already knew you had seen the fire.

With the Doobie Brothers preceding him, it seemed that Steve Miller couldn't miss. But, a better thought Could Steve Miller keep up?

Miller opened alone on 12-string acoustic guitar. It didn't seem like the right thing to do following the rockin' Doobies.

But Miller's selections (Kow Kow Calculator, Going to the Country, Seasons, I Love You) were up tempo enough not to completely break the high-charged mood.

The sound system proved itself by filling the arena fully with Miller's 12-string.

After his solo, Miller was joined by his three-member band. The band got into some new rock, some old Steve Miller rock, and of course the blues. All of the rock numbers contained a blues influence so even these were somewhat restrained.

Living in the U.S.A. was the number that finally got everybody off. The band went through Livin' and then came back for a four number encore which included, Space Cowboy, Stormy Monday, and Crossroads.

It took longer for the Miller band to get the audience "up" than it did for the Doobie Brothers. But once there, each band didn't let anyone down.

In retrospect, it was the Doobie Brothers who stole the show. If you could call the bands musically "equal" then it probably was Steve Miller's longevity that made him the headliner rather than sheer superior talent.

—Alan Whiteside

MR. SPACE COWBOY - Otherwise known as Steve Miller, just couldn't keep up with the excitement generated by the Doobie Brothers.

Coming up from Bill Graham:

March 30-31, Frank Zappa, Foghat, Winterland.
March 31, Neil Young, Linda Ronstadt, Oakland Coliseum.
March 31, John Denver, Berkeley.
April 6, Santana, Bobby Womack, Winterland.
April 7, Yes, Poco, Winterland.
April 8, Santana, Bobby Womack, Berkeley.
April 13-14, The Kinks, Dan Hicks and His Hot Licks, Winterland.

A Nostalgia Trip With 'The Divine Miss M'

Bette Midler, perhaps the hottest thing to hit the music world since the rock 'n' roll of the fifties, came to Berkeley on March 15 and it's doubtful that she will soon be forgotten.

Also known as "The Divine Miss M," Midler camped, sang and joked with the audience for a memorable hour and a half.

Her opening reminded the writer of Shirley Temple's "little girl frown," when she began her hit, "Friends."

When Bette sang, "And I am alone, there's no one here beside me," she did indeed seem much alone.

Other all-time hits of the evening included "Uptown," "Do-Run-Run," "Do You Want to Dance," "Do You Love Me" and "Your Love Keeps Lifting Me Higher."

The hit from the forties, "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy" had the audience in hysterics.

Slower tunes included John Prine's heart-rending "Hello in There," and "Am I Blue."

Bette also showed her talents at comedy. She's a great one-line artist. Just the way she would say "for sure" would have the crowd in an uproar.

The choreography was fantastic. Midler was all over that stage camping in between songs and verses.

Special attention should be paid to 17-year-old Barry Manlow, Midler's pianist. This man is going to go places also.

Overall, the show rated an A-plus. Midler's back-up trio of lady-of-the-evening clad "chicks," helped set the mood.

Miss M began in the Baths of New York City and has certainly come a long way. Although still virtually unknown, she will be big "for sure."

'Deep Throat'—A Night At The Skinflicks

With all the publicity its been given, it seems that whether "good" or "bad," one almost has to go see Deep Throat out of sheer curiosity.

The New York City high society people have gone down to see it. (The movie was busted as obscene in that same city.) Hollywood stars are reportedly showing it privately in their homes and the lines at the San Francisco theaters showing it are getting longer all the time.

Anyway, our night at the porno theater went something like this:

The movie doesn't start for over a half hour and the line outside is over 250 people long. The 800-seat theater is full. inside so the management counts tickets to make sure the patronage exchange is about even.

Those waiting in line are mostly, but not exclusively, under 35 years old. From freak to straight, (and everything in between,) the line is not of any particular social group.

People arrive in cabs, Cadillacs and VWs. (One car with New Jersey license plates lets off four people.)

The line is mostly made up of men, but about one third of the line is escorted women. And most of these women and their dates are dressed to look as if they just came from an expensive restaurant.

First movie on the bill is Teenage Fantasies. Young, fairly attractive men and women describe their sexual fantasies. Then we get to see them acted out.

Almost every form of human sexual expression, (except homosexuality,) is shown; in close-ups and in color. (Sorry we can't go into more explicit detail, but we think you can imagine.)

Technically speaking, the movie rates an OK for color, sound, dialogue and editing. (Though sometimes in the editing positions somehow become reversed.)

The film tries to be humorous and succeeds about half of the time. But then again, who really comes to listen to the dialogue?

Next shown were the coming attractions. (To this viewer, the funniest thing all evening.) Though probably meant to be serious the previews of the next films came across as a pornographic satire of normal coming attractions.

Hot and heavy porno paperback dialogue was continuously used to tell us what we could expect to see in these films. There's really no use in seeing these movies now since we saw all the best parts in the previews anyway.

The most outrageously funny use and timing of the 1812 Overture at certain moments in the previews was perhaps the funniest moment of the evening.

And now to the main attraction, the reason for all the fuss and the presence of about 800 of the curious.

Deep Throat was made for the purpose of showcasing the unique talents of it's leading lady, Linda Lovelace. Ms. Lovelace has what the title implies and uses it to express and fulfill herself sexually.

Aside from that, Deep Throat doesn't even meet the standards set by it's co-feature, Fantasies.

It does have an original music score with suggestive lyrics and like Teenage Fantasies strives for humor, but technically (sound, color, dialogue, editing) it's pretty inferior.

Linda is a pretty girl and so is the "nurse" in the film. The doctor is a good looking (Mark Spitz) type. But the others in the film look as if they're stag veterans of the past 10 to 15 years or some other type of undesirable character.

If you've never seen pornography, you can go to this "socially accepted(?)" blue movie, learn what happens when a girl's clitoris is where her tonsils ought to be (does Scientific American know about Linda?) and then forget about seeing any more for a long while. There has to be a more rewarding way to blow three dollars!

The Multi-Musically Inclined Seals & Crofts

Seals & Crofts, a new folk duo with a recent hit Summerbreeze, came to the Berkeley Community Theater on Thursday, March 15.

The two multi-musically inclined men, accompanied by Bobby Liting on Bass Guitar, began an interesting evening with a "nice piece of jazz" and finally wound up with some "country-rye square dancing music."

The Audience went mad clapping, stomping, and dancing along to the music. The two received a long standing ovation not to mention the hog calls, inspired by the fine country piece.

The second duo, England Dan and John Corley, seemed to be very much like the headliners, if not as good. It's possible that such folksy-country duos represent the latest new trend in rock.

The show was worth viewing and we can look forward to hearing a lot more from these two duos in the future.

Vinegar Joe's Second:

Who Really Needs An English Cold Blood?

Vinegar Joe-Rock'n Roll Gypsies
Atlantic Records.

Rock 'n Roll Gypsies, the second album, by Vinegar Joe is more danceable, less gimmicky and generally has more commercial potential than their first. There have been personnel changes, of course; though Elkie Brooks, Bob Palmer, and lead guitarist/songwriter Pete Gage (Elkie's old man, apparently) remain the core of the group.

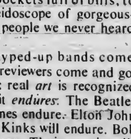
Gone here are a lot of the excess horns and electronic schticks. Also, Joe has finally decided just who to imitate: Cold Blood. (Though the cover photo of the delectable Miss Brooks looks like nothing so much as an Ike and Tina Turner album.)

The band has now apparently settled into an all-out blues-boogey groove, with an occasional slower song written by somebody else. (Their version of Jimi Hendrix's "My Sweet Angel" makes good use of his fantastic lyrics and guitar progressions.) John Mayall's old drummer, Keef Hartley, helps them throughout by laying down a strong basic beat.

This record sounds fast, loud and good for dancing right off. It starts your toe a-tappin' all right; but it's only when you actually start to dance to it do you realize that they're still not together or tight enough for you to really loosen up and get into it, like with a real Cold Blood boogey song.

Judging by their coverage thus far in the rock press, Vinegar is probably a lot of fun to watch on stage. They'll probably be well-received on tour, get some air play and good reviews, and even sell some records.

Record reviewing is a strange gig anyway. (Not only might something sould good to me and bad to you, but it might even sound good to you on say, Pioneer earphones and yet sound bad on your parents' Magnavox console). We do, however, require some sort of prebriefing before flying off to Tower Records, hot little pockets full of bills, to gaze at the kaleidoscope of gorgeous-looking LP's by people we never heard of; now don't we?



Gimmicky, hyped-up bands come and go. Record reviewers come and go. But let's face it: real art is recognized eventually, and it endures. The Beatles endure. The Stones endure. Elton John will endure. The Kinks will endure. Bob Dylan will endure. Their music will sound good five years from now; ten years; perhaps forever.

Vinegar Joe will make a splash, but it's doubtful if they'll sell that many records (maybe some fish and chips?), at least in California. Who really needs an English imitation of Cold Blood, anyway, when we still have the original article around to listen to?

—Paul Snodgrass

"Wide Appeal:"

Les McCann-Combines Soul, Jazz Rhythms

Les McCann — Talk to the People
Atlantic — SD1519

Les McCann has been around for a long time. His records have enjoyed a relative degree of success. What has gotten McCann this level of success has been, for the most part, his personal appearances. On stage McCann has the ability to make the audience feel at ease —even welcome. Less has also been very instrumental in bringing Roberta Flack to the forefront in modern music.

This album typifies the mood of his live performances as well as the fire that is present between the musicians. The album is not jazz per se; it is more characteristic of the path that a group like The Crusaders (nee the Jass Crusaders), as well as people like Lonnie Smith, Johnny Hammond and Lou Donaldson are taking. The realm in which this music really falls is "soul-jazz."

The distinction between soul-jazz and regular ol' jazz is the freedom which the musicians themselves enjoy while playing the music. The structured lines of the tunes on this album gives the keyboard an opportunity to riff because it is the main solo instrument, others in the aggregation must be content to keep a very definite time.

All of this is not meant to detract from the album: what McCann has done is to combine the finer elements of the soul-jazz technique with some very good side men.

Side one opens with "What's Goin' On," Marvin Gaye's classic. The mood opens rather placidly, with Les straining to get all the beauty that the Fender Rhodes Electric Piano will give. On tunes like "Shamdaing" and "North Carolina," the group jams mostly with simple progressions that allow the listener to "get into" the music whatever his musical background. The album is rounded off by the more mellow things like "Let It Lay" and Stevie Wonder's tune "Seems So Long." The most powerful track is the spiritual "Talk To The People." Les McCann is a very good lyricist with the ability to communicate street philosophy with uncanny poignance, as demonstrated by his biggest hit, "Compared To What." "Talk To The People" is appealing because it has a very wide range of appeal; if you can snap your fingers, and nod your head in rhythm, then the album could have you develop callouses on the fingers and make you extremely dizzy, but at least you can "Talk To The People."

Hot Rumors:

Beatles Back Together Again?

The Beatles, (all four of them) are supposedly in Los Angeles for a recording session.

The story appeared last week in the San Francisco Examiner in Marilyn Beck's syndicated gossip column. Rumors have been flying around ever since in various television and radio stations in The City "confirming" the story.

However, Capitol records, the Beatles recording label, has a strict "no comment" on the whole matter.

The article claimed that Ringo Starr arrived in Hollywood last week to record and that George Harrison and John Lennon were sitting in to help him out.

Further rumors were reported that the trio actually did get together for a recording session and the master tape would be sent to Endland where the fourth Beatle Paul McCartney would add his own voice track.

The article further stated that Ms. Beck's own reliable sources reported that McCartney didn't settle for a long distance involvement, but "slipped quietly into town" to join his brother Beatles at the recording studio for a full-fledged recording reunion.

Also, Yoko Ono, who was allegedly so instrumental in bringing about the original split of the Beatles, was nowhere to be found. Furthermore, it is rumored that John and Yoko are on the verge of calling finis to their marriage.

"Muzak Junkie?"

Roger Powell-Cosmic Trip Into Mysticism

Roger Powell—Cosmic Furnace
Atlantic Records—SD 7251

Roger Powell looks like a clean kid. And judging from the pictures of him surrounded by impressive electronic hardware, he is also an industrious fellow.

But who is Roger Powell besides the author of this new album Cosmic Furnace? Unfortunately the liner notes are bare of historical detail and we must infer the details from his music alone.

After listening to Cosmic Furnace, anyone with even a marginal awareness of contemporary music would have to conclude that Powell is in reality a psychedelic "Cocktail-Lounge" organist who stirs his grapefruit drink with a Krishma stick.

This record of his venture into the studio is an unusually pure example of Post-Dick Hyman electronic ragtime with Powell's own contribution of sub-psychedelic idocy added to boot.

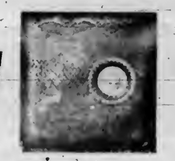
The spiritual kernel of the album is Powell's alleged ability to synthesize and reconstitute the sounds he hears internally. The resultant music is just tiresome electronic chatter spiced with lifeless programmed percussion.

His "mysticism" is only day-glo deep. Apparently, Roger Powell and his precious inner vibrations are the Cosmic Furnace of the title. But this is no time to joke about energy shortages.

Finally an album for the Blind! Powell says, "The True and Original Source of all this energy remains a general mystery. This is music for those who can best see with eyes closed." Why limit one's perception while we're in this cosmic perspective? This record is for those who listen best with their ears elsewhere.

Perhaps we're too hard on Powell. Certainly there are extenuating circumstances one should consider before passing sentence.

For instance (and this is the author's suspicion), Roger Powell may once have been a "Muzak junkie." (It would not be the first time such a case has been discovered.) Quite possibly he acquired his habit the summer he spent working in a department store in order to pay off his electric piano.



Still, one mustn't overlook the possibility of foul play. We do live in dangerous times and the fiercely competitive music business is not that far above the terror-afflicted public. Someone, perhaps a common enemy of the "primordial pulse," might have sabotaged Powell's Alpha Wave headset, tampering with it just enough to throw off his "authentic" vibrations.

Roger Powell may have an album to his credit but the ARP Synthesizers are already programming their revenge!

—Ken Sitz

"Visual Approach:"

Raunchy Rock And Circus Theatrics

Alice Cooper - Billion Dollar Babies
Warner Bros. Records

The Alice Cooper band is perhaps the most influential innovator on the American rock scene. They have incorporated their raunchy music within a visual approach to rock that has made them one of the hottest rock and roll bands in America today.

Whether you like their music or not is really beside the point. Take a closer look and you'll see that these guys started what everybody else is now trying to imitate (i.e., T. Rex and David Bowie, among others).

They've created a new excitement in rock that not only provides the listener with the music but a stage show that, even Ringling Brothers couldn't match.

Their new album Billion Dollar Babies, which became a million seller the day it was released, follows their three previous gold albums Love It To Death, Killer and Schools Out.

But unfortunately, unlike their three previous recordings, Billion Dollar Babies relies too much on the visual aspects. Unless you've seen Alice Cooper in concert, you'll probably have a hard time imagining Alice playing with his pet boa constrictor while shouting out the words to Sick Things.

Although Hello Hooray, Raped and Freezin', Elected and No More Mister Nice Guy are the straight rockers expected from Alice, the rest of the album consists mostly of cuts that play more of a part in Alice's theatrics than his musical considerations.

Thus the album is kinda disappointing when compared with School's Out. Perhaps it's gotten to the point that there is more emphasis placed on their theatrical stage show than their music. Anyway, the album might still be worthwhile getting just to read the lyrics!

On The Dope Front

(from the Bureau of Narcotics & Dangerous Drugs Bulletin)

A NICKEL CAP? - This unique nickel was given to Detective E. P. Oldham of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs by a North Carolina Sheriff's Office. According to Det. Oldham, the nickel was spotted while booking a suspect in a narcotics case in Winston-Salem. Said Oldham, "The nickel didn't sound right when it was put on the table with the rest of (the suspect's) change. A closer look revealed that it was hollow and that inside of it were two dosage units of MDA (an amphetamine), apparently for his own use."

Will Walton Join The Pros?

How often in our lives are we treated to view certainty where there is no deviation, or change of plans because of external forces?

If you watched the idiot box last week, you couldn't have seen a better example of it.

In Pauley Pavilion, the UCLA Bruins (or should we say Bill Walton) laid to rest any second thoughts that USF or possibly any other team is a threat to their dynasty.

Though USF employed a stall type of offense, a sagging defense with three Dons clinging to Bruin superman Bill Walton and a half-time lead by one point; the outcome of the affair was never in doubt. Coach Wodden's team won as usual.

Anyway, there was a lot of talk about the other talented players of the team, like Keith Wilkes or little Tommy Curtis, who sparked the Bruins. But the "co-stars" of this year's team somehow don't seem as impressive as say when Sidney Wicks, Curtis Rowe and Henry Bibby teamed.

Invariably, Bill Walton, the wonder boy of collegiate basketball stole the show.

He is a player many players aspire to be. The agile hulk has outlived his usefulness, at least in the college niche.

Walton is a human being, generously endowed with all that makes great basketball players.

He has the agility and quickness to be out of position for a rebound and yet slide back to suck up the ball defensively or tip it in for two over the outstretched hands of his opponents.

His ability to block shots with ease bears semblance to yesterday's hero Bill Russell.

And to top this, he is the ideal of every coach. He is aggressive and overpowering but always keeping his composure and not fouling.

There has been talk of Walton advancing to the pros on a hardship case. It is an offer that he should reconsider and not be troubled that he will no longer be an asset to the Bruins' domination.

It would be to his disadvantage if he joined the ranks of the ABA. With Spencer Hayward gone, just about the only basketball player worth noting, leaves only Artis Gilmore to test Walton's prowess.

But the biggest question confronting would-be "pro-stars" is just how well will Walton fare against men who make a living off of a game he seems to thoroughly enjoy.

In the NBA he would be just waiting to be proven. Big men of the team like Wilt Chamberlain and Nate Thurmond and even behemmoth Bob Lanier would really be taking on the "newcomer."

And if he should be picked up by some obscure team like the Philadelphia 76ers, just how well would he complement the team's tempo.

Take, for example, the case of Jabbar. Without the help of playmaker Oscar Robertson, the tallest player in basketball, Jabbar probably wouldn't have emerged to super-star status so quickly.

With Walton's set of gimpy knees and a bright future in basketball, coaches of both collegiate and pro status wait to see which road he will take. Will it be to the pros or back to UCLA for a final year?

Bay Sportscasters Blast Teams Too Much

Sportscasters and reporters are an odd lot. One week they're applauding the efforts of the local heroes, and the next, it would appear they're trying to lose their job. Then there are certain reporters, who, no matter what happens are all too quick to criticize the team or athlete.

This seems almost the rule in any sport that one chooses. Several examples come to mind right away.

One is the way the press and news media treated Muhammad Ali (the true champ) after his victory over the surprisingly strong English champ Joe Bugner. Minutes after the fight, the criticism came pouring in.

"Ali's too old, he's slower than he used to be, and he doesn't have a knockout punch." All these comments seem strange to say about a man who just scored a unanimous decision in a 12-round bout.

Other such criticism is often aimed at the Golden State Warriors. When they record an impressive victory, some headlines read "Barry Sparks Warriors Win" or "Nate, Cazzie Destroy Cavs," etc. But when they lose to good teams such as Milwaukee or the Lakers, they almost always get "the short end of the stick."

And usually the man to bear the brunt of the criticism is none other than the so-called "savior" of the Warriors, Rick Barry. This was the year that Barry was supposed to lead the Warriors out of the wilderness and to the NBA Championship. The trouble is, as the old saying goes, one player does not an entire team make.

Barry is an impressive, if not awesome, basketball player. But Barry is only human, and when he has a bad game or isn't playing up to par, or the team hits a rough stretch, the critical comments come hot and heavy.

But the "Pan Of The Year" award must go to KCBS sports reporter Jim Steck. He's really a put-down artist extraordinaire. You could call him the "Don Rickles of the radio dial." But Steck differs from the rest of the sportscasters in one respect. He doesn't just criticize one man or occasionally the team, but always the whole team and even its owner! That team happens to be the Seals, and their owner is the incomparable Charlie O. Finley.

Steck has a running battle every morning on his radio show. In describing them, he uses lines like, "the silly stupid Seals lose again," or "Charlie Finley lets everybody in for half-price, and even at that, nobody wants to see them."

Now let's face it, the Seals aren't an NHL power, but they're improving with experience. Certainly they have enough problems without Steck or anyone else putting their two-cents in.

As for Charlie Finley, he's a lot of things, but he does try his damndest to please the fans with his colorful uniforms and clever promotions. He also has enough problems with the Seals plus getting all the "A's" signed for the beginning of baseball season.

So sports reporters and sportscasters lay off the players! Constructive criticism of any kind is appreciated. But taking potshots and "dropping bombs" on athletes is just plain uncalled for; it has no place whatsoever in sports.

Ram Win Streak Snapped at Four; Embarassed by San Mateo 13-1

With a fastball that looks like it must travel over a 100 mph, and a curve that drops at least a foot, it seems to opposing ball players that it's virtually impossible to get a hit off pitcher Michael Norris.

Foothill proved no different: Mike allowed only 3 hits as the CCSF Rams baseball team rolled to another impressive victory; 8-2. It was the team's fourth victory in a row without defeat.

Duces were running wild for Rich Zerga as the centerfielder stroked two hits, (one a double) scored twice, stole two bases, walked twice, and to complete an all around excellent game, drove in two runs.

Timing in baseball is the name of the game, and Bill Brisbane was right on cue as he laced a hit "up the middle" in the fourth inning, scoring two runs to break the game wide open.

For Norris it was the second victory of the season, and ended up with an impressive 15 strike-outs.

San Mateo 13-1

This is what the Rams accomplished at Balboa Diamond on Saturday March 17:

Nothing.

About all that can be said for them is that they showed up and nobody fell over the bat rack.

The rest of it was pretty awful. College of San Mateo racked up 13 hits and tromped on our boys 13-1.

Going into the game both teams had identical records—four wins and no defeats. The game left the Rams shaking their heads and saying "Wait till next time."

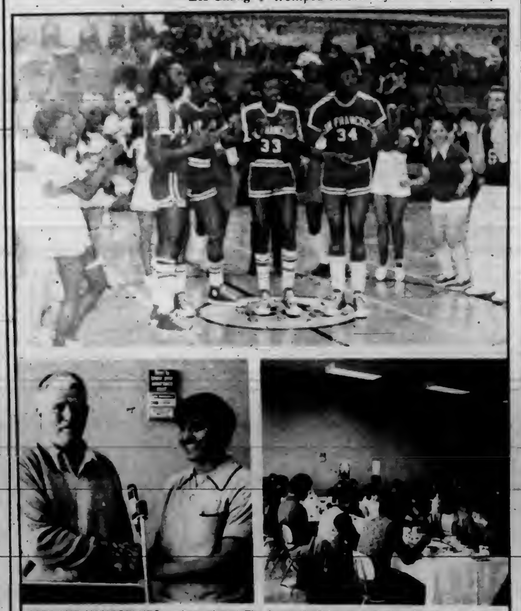
CCSF 13-7

Joe Dutto, who's making a comeback to college baseball after four years in the Air Force, was "flying high" against Chabot, as the Rams broke their one-game "losing streak" with a 13-7 victory.



Joe homered over the centerfield fence (385 ft.) in the second inning with a man on. This got things rolling, for in a second, the Rams had themselves a fine time scoring six runs.

Mike Norris, won his third start of the season pitching almost perfect baseball for six innings. Chabot only managed one hit off Mike as he was his usual amazing self, striking out 13 hitters before tiring in the sixth inning.

Chabot was happy to see Mike go, because they scored seven runs off the "clean up crew" to make the game look respectable. "T.J." Johnson broke out of his slump with a smash over the left field screne in the eighth inning. Also hitting the ball with consistency was Don Lyons and Dave Castiglionli, each collecting two hits.

It's nice for the Rams to be back on the winning side again.

No Ram Hoopsters On All-State Team

Right is right when guard Al Forney of the state champion Compton Junior College is named the Player of the Year.

But how is it right for City College of San Francisco, third ranked in California, not to be represented on the All-State basketball team.

Forney, who led the Compton Tartars to the crown, averaged 17.7 points a game. It may not sound like much, but without a doubt, he is the spark-plug in a team that boasts the state championship.

However as one scans the roster of the All-State team your eyes suddenly becomes entrenched in one niche of the paper. You read that a player named Will Garner of Marin College is also included.

Though Marin wound up 4th in the Ventura Championship, it was the 6'4" guard who actually carried them there. A good shooter, ball handler and rebounder, he'll be back next year.

But as things go, the Rams did qualify three in the All-League team in the Golden Gate Conference.

Those that made it to the second team were: Flash Atchans, the Rams leading rebounder; guard Dave Smith, a freshman from Balboa High and leading scorer for City; and guard, Ray Frazier.

The latter's case is one of note as he was the swing-man and never really opened a game at a starting position. He however made his contribution in this year's climb back to the top in the late goings, always coming in cold, but scoring plenty in a hurry.

It almost worked in City's semi-final game against Long Beach with Frazier scoring 13 points in a final ten-minute surge.

But luck just wasn't with the Rams this year—maybe next year.

Veterans Cancel Demo, Rap to VA

Your office told me not to expect them until sometime in April."

One of the directors of the VA took his file number, left, and returned ten minutes later to inform him that he would be receiving his checks soon.

The VA told Dean Wells that if his office would complete the veterans enrollment papers promptly, they could be receiving their benefits a month sooner.

Gary Tom, VEIP director proposed that a liason between City College and the VA be established. The liason team could be financed by the school's work study and VEIP programs. It's purpose would be to establish better communication which might alleviate some of the problems that plague the Veterans Administration.

Also proposed was a San Francisco Community College District "sounding board" on veteran affairs to air grievances.

The VA agreed to support the proposals but when the vets asked what they could specifically do to help, the VA said such details would have to be considered at a later date.

The Veterans Administration agreed to another meeting in the future, although no date was established.

Student Strike:

Handler Charges Racism, Sexism In Evaluation Policies

by Alan Whiteside

The March 28 student strike organizers had hoped for students to strike their classes in an attempt to close the college, but settled for a picket line and rally at the Ram in front of Smith Hall.

The strike was in protest of the firing of psychology instructor Joanne Handler and the "lack of student input" into the hiring and firing procedures (exemplified by the firing of Ms. Handler).

By 11:30 Wednesday morning about 35 persons in the strike line were circling in front of Smith Hall. An equal number of supporters were gathered around the Ram and its benches.

The strike line occasionally broke into a chant of "Boycott classes, support the strike."

Over the open michrophone at the Ram, various speakers urged other students to support the strike or explained the reason for the protest.

The strike line then broke off and began to circle the campus to explain the protest and gain further support.

As the strike line was coming out of Cloud Hall at the sundial, an argument between a male student passing out strike literature and another male student erupted into a fight.

While other students and an instructor, Eugene Mead, attempted to separate the two students, a crowd quickly gathered.

Most of those gathered urged the two students not to fight, but one person was heard to shout, "Let'm go," as if to let the fight continue.

Ms. Handler herself then appeared upon the scene saying "This is a racist school, fight racism and sexism!" (The fight was between a black student and a white student, though no racial remarks were heard from either student during or after the fight.)

Bill Hankin of SDS shouted to those gathered, "Don't listen to these provocateurs (who are) paid by the administration to disrupt this rally. Watch out for provocateurs." Hankin later implied that the "provocateurs" were San Francisco police officers.

After the incident the rally filtered back down to the Ram.

A.S. President Juan Galvan told this reporter that he was informed by another student that two History instructors announced tests in their classes immedi-

Lack of student input into City College's teacher evaluation program was the theme for last week's student strike and boycott of classes.

The strike was viewed with much confusion and many different reactions from students and faculty. Most were uncertain about the reason for the strike. Many thought the strike was to protest the firing of Jo Ann Handler, while others said it was to call attention to the part student should play in teacher evaluation.

Supporters of the strike claim it was a success; critics say it was a failure. Juan Galvan, student body president, stated, "The strike might have been considered a failure if everyone had been expecting a large turnout; however, if the purpose of the strike was to draw attention to the fact that there isn't any student input into teacher evaluation, then the strike would have to be considered a success."

Coverage of the strike and events leading up to the boycott appeared in the campus newspapers and radio stations, also on several occasions in the San Francisco Chronicle and the news program of KPIZ channel 5.

An on-the-spot check made in ten classrooms revealed attendance to be down ten to 15 percent.

At one time during the day, a crowd estimated to be 400, gathered around the speakers forum. Some were there to watch and listen; others were there to picket.

The strike was peaceful except for one incident. A scuffle broke out between three white students and one black who was passing out leaflets supporting the strike.

There were some complaints of class disruption when the more vocal strikers went through the halls calling for students to boycott their classes.

The strike came to an end after Jo Ann Handler, the psychology instructor whose contract was not renewed, and supporters from the strike went to City College President, Harry Buttimer's office to voice criticism of the college's evaluation procedures.

Ms. Handler claimed that prior to the strike she had been offered a deal. She stated, "I was approached and told that if I could call off the strike, someone would politic in my behalf to get me rehired." Asked to elaborate, Ms. Handler refused saying, "Now isn't the right time!"

Councilwoman Renounces Strike

The Associated Students voted to call a strike for March 28 to protest the exclusion of students in teacher evaluation procedures.

Endorsed by various campus groups, including Student Council, the strike was in support of fired Psychology instructor, Jo Ann Handler, who was not re-hired at CCSF after a faculty review board recommended her dismissal.

Student Councilwoman and Teacher Evaluation Committee Chairman, Terri Barbieri, decided to renounce her CHAIRMAN — Terri Barbieri previous support of the strike: "The reason I resigned my support is because I believe that the essence of the strike became distorted."

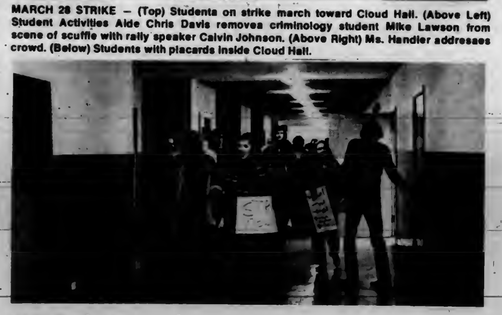
Ms. Barbieri continued, "Jo Ann Handler was made the focus of the strike rather than the reason announced by the student body president. The reason given for striking," she asserts, "was a lack of student input into teacher evaluation."

Barbieri believes that, in voting with the rest of student council for the strike, she "reacted to the situation on an emotional basis," she said, "without thinking of the possible consequences of what a strike could entail."



Barbieri admitted that she had time to reconsider and, "after I'd acquired more information, I came to the conclusion that the strike wasn't really necessary."

"In retrospect," she said, "the administration has been responsive to student input"; she added, "We (the Associated Students) have never been refused."

"Even though we voted to strike," she went on, "I don't think we realized the magnitude of the work involved in organizing such a strike," she added. "It's like striking against midterm grades before midterms."

Co-ed Still Critical:

Pedestrian Hit by Speeding Auto

A CCSF co-ed, Carol Hannum was struck down by a speeding Volkswagon as she left campus last Friday.

Witnesses on the scene said that the victim crossed the north-bound lanes of Phelan Avenue and was heading towards the Reservoir from the main steps of the Science Building when she was hit by a red Volkswagon. The car had changed lanes to go around a stopped vehicle.

"I thought he was going to hit me, but he swerved and hit the girl in the crosswalk," a female witness at the scene said.

Carol Hannum who lives on 534 48th Avenue, was taken to Mission Emergency Hospital, which reported her condition as "very critical."

She sustained multiple head injuries, and presently remains in the Intensive Care Unit of San Francisco General after undergoing surgery.

A member of the CCSF Traffic Committee, Barbra Cabral, who notified Miss Hannum's mother, urged that students cross the street in less arbitrary fashion.

The driver of the vehicle was identified only as a nonstudent.

ASM Conference:

Cranston Addresses Vets, Urges Unity

The Allied Servicemen Northern California Veterans Conference began with an address from Senator Allan Cranston, who urged vets to unite.

The Chairman of the Senates Veterans Affairs Committee, admitted that he wasn't always interested in Veteran's affairs, though he is a WW II veteran himself.

"My involvement began four years ago with the forming of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee."

"But from the beginning," he added, "I was appalled by the treatment veterans received from the Federal Government."

At first it was hard to make Congress realize the veterans' problems, but the Senator with the help of his Washington Aide, Jon Stienberg, gained support for veterans' aid.

Now the problem with veteran legislation isn't getting the bills passed by Congress, but getting the passed legislation funded by the President.

The liberal Democrat followed his accusation by listing five of his bills, whose funds have been impounded.

The President, of course, claims that these spendings on Vietnam veterans are inflationary.

Nevertheless, Cranston urged the Colligiate Veterans gathered at the Northern California Veterans Conference to "unite," and to affront the President as a common force.

On his end of the veteran problem, Cranston is filing suit to test the Constitutionality of the Nixon impoundments, and he is sponsoring a bill that would make impoundments without congressional approval; illegal.

Instructor Denounced by Gays

Dear Editor,

We, the members of the Free Gay Student Association, do not support Ms. Joanne Handler. We know for a fact that she is herself a racist, sexist, and a fraud.

Several of our members have been in her classes and upon more than one occasion she has expressed anti-gay attitudes in her classes.

In one of her Psychology of the Minorities classes, she completely ignored the issues of gay and other minorities and talked only about Black People as a minority. It should be added that this was not a black studies class. Also, there were three openly gay students in this class.

In another class, she used a gay student as an example of perverse psychosis. And completely denounced this student to the extent of his dropping the class.

Again, upon another occasion, a gay student and his lover went over to Ms. Handler's house to help work on papers. Handler received a phone call and began denouncing "fags." When the two students were leaving, she is quoted to have said, "Goodnight, Fags!"

Now, we don't feel that Ms. Handler's race, nor her sexuality is an issue in her being fired. We have more cases, but we feel that three is enough at this point.

We are also glad to see her go and hope that she gets the psychiatric help which she definitely needs. If by some unfortunate chance, she is reinstated at City College, we will have no choice but to hold a boycott ourselves, if the campus and students refuse to listen, then we will have to contact our sisters and brothers from the gay organizations comprising the Gay Students Council of California to call for an all-out strike across the state.

We hope that you are listening. The Gay Movement is still going strong and when we have to, we will show our unity and strength.

Traffic Controls at Fault?

On March 30 I was upset and outraged to see a student run down by a car in the crosswalk on Phelan Ave. across from the Science Building.

Anyone who has to cross Phelan on a daily basis realizes the lack of traffic control; this is a serious omission.

Todays occurence should serve as ample evidence that the present cross walk system is hopelessly inadequate.

A traffic patrolman, or signal light may not be 100 per cent effective, but if we continue without any preventive measure, it is inevitable that variations of what happened today will be endlessly repeated.

There has been previous awareness of this problem, and in its light, today's incident is inexcusable.

Some form of action must be taken.

Editorial:

Evaluation—Who's More Competent?

Is the student really the new "nigger"? Whatever the world-wide implications, students at CCSF may feel relieved to know that their station has yet to fall below that of "the least competent group on campus."

Those were the mimeographed words last fall of a Sociology instructor who tried to convince his peers that students here (because of low academic status) didn't deserve an active role in faculty evaluation procedures.

Such rhetoric was the antecedent to a faculty election that actually endorsed an evaluation proposal which, if approved by the Governing Board, would leave the student with virtually no voice (maybe a token whisper) in the hiring and firing of the community's most essential public employee.

Ideally, when the city's college district hires educators, it should be for the optimum benefit of the citizens who might utilize the available educational services. If a student isn't representative of higher education's noblest stock, the implicit right to meaningful participation in judging the effectiveness and desirability of a community college faculty still stands.

Although there haven't yet been any reports of teachers who require students to jerk off after every lecture, the need to remind faculty and administration just who, the vital ingredients of their livelihood are and how much power we can wield must not be overlooked in this revived age of apathy (which could be said to have begun the day Jerry Reuben moved into his commune).

For our own student government, it took the firing of a controversial psychology instructor to motivate sufficient concern on the teacher evaluation issue.

Just four weeks ago Student Council resolved to draft an evaluation procedures proposal that would include proper student participation.

But the regressive plan (i.e., there's no mandatory, uniform student input) voted for by the faculty has had four months now to gain enough publicity as the more "refined" plan. However, any substantial changes in it (i.e., more significance alloted to student opinion) would require a highly unlikely vote of approval by the faculty.

Also, the instructor-oriented proposal is slowly being sold to the Governing Board by some of the sharpest politicos in SF education. (Aside from heading five CCSF Social Studies departments, Dr. Lee Dolson, the plan's author, is former president of the Classroom Teachers' Association and currently a member of the Board of Education.)

The only channel that the students and community have at their disposal to the Governing Board (which must adopt bi-yearly evaluation guidelines by September), is a widespread show of public support (writing letters, forming committees, anything) for effective student input.

Incidentally, in terms of earning prestigious Ph.D.'s, for better salaries, most of CCSF's instructors are themselves "students." (The darkey who doesn't have to work in the fields anymore...?)

Faculty Adviser Raps Radio Staff

Four City College students showed last week that not all the students on this campus are apathetic.

Last week, Mike Greene and three associates went to the Broadcasting Department to protest what was termed "unbalanced programming." The students who were listening to the closed circuit radio station KCSF in the Student Union Building complained that the music did not reflect what the people there wanted to hear.

"When the radio station is on, and playing all that rock, nobody listens," exclaimed Greene. "I am not against rock music, I just want to hear a greater balance in the sounds." Greene and his contingent had a conference with the radio station's faculty advisor, Phillip K. Brown. This meeting resulted in the four individuals confronting the entire radio staff with their complaint.

Mr. Brown was sympathetic to the student's plight. He informed the students that records of all types are available to the d.j.s for playing on the air, but the choice of which records are actually played is up to the individual disc jockey.

After a slight reprimand to the staff, Brown admonished them to be more broad-based in their selection of music.

Experimental College:

Bread Baking Class Offered

To see what they are learning a few devoted students spend their spare time exploiting their talents through the Experimental College.

One of the basic beliefs of these students who exchange their knowledge in Experimental College classes is to establish the concept of "coming together," and share wisdom with each other.

Paul Godsey, a Hotel and Restaurant student at CCSF, will be handling the "Bread Baking Class," beginning on or about April 7.

"I started a few years ago working with people for a better society. And I found out that many people were concerned about getting nothing but air out of the bread they buy from supermarkets," Paul stressed.

"The bread baking class might not be confusing to people, as it may sound strange. Its objective is to give more knowledge of baking pure and long lasting bread," he added.

"You don't have to put any chemicals in it to make the bread good, if you know the secret of making bread with a natural taste.

"If bread is baked in the proper way its natural nutrition can provide us with vitamins. It's the baking style that determines the nutritional outcome of the bread," Paul emphasized.

The bread baking class is offered with no charge, however students may have to take their own flour to the classes. Six students can take the class at one time.

According to Paul, four class meetings may enable the student to bake "finger licking" bread.

He also suggests rye flour as a natural preservative. "It has a tendency to keep the bread fresh for a longer time," he says.

Paul hopes that students can save a lot of money by baking their own bread. Furthermore, "home-made bread has nearly all the percentage requirements of essential food substances," he concluded.

The idea of having nutritionally better bread may sound good to many people, as the meat prices escalate.

Those interested in the new Bread Baking Class should call Paul Godsey at 285-9547 for more information.

QUESTION: What Do You Think of Women's Lib?

Scovil Allan — Pre-Forestry

I think it's great. I eat it for breakfast every morning. But seriously I'm behind it and I wish I knew more about the subject.

Shirley Blatch — Pre-Nursing

I think it depends on the subject and the position the woman is applying for. I'm not against it but it depends upon the job the woman wants. I just can't picture a woman as a mechanic.

Lovonne Ottens — Art

I think some of the things like pay should be equal for both sexes. But I don't think that everything should be equal. I like being a woman.

Rod Manlo — Pre-Med.

I think that women have gotten less rights than they deserve. It's good that they try to get equality but the means and methods they use are ineffective.

Lennon Malik — Photography

I don't think Women's Lib relates to black women. I think black women and black men should have one liberation for both sexes.

Brenda Wilson — Social Work

To a certain extent it's good. However a woman shouldn't play a man's role, she has her own life to live. Women's Lib is kinda stupid though.

Neil Young and Surprise Guests—"Too Loud"

With a new band, new songs, and a couple of surprises, superstar Neil Young made his long overdue return to the City before Winterland's adoring rockfreaks in a special Wednesday night show March 21.

Burnt-out, semi-deaf Winterland regulars trotted into the echoing area to discover a newly- revamped sound system. Rather than piled up on each side of the stage blocking the view, most of the giant speakers are now suspended Woodstock-style on tubular scaffolding.

The more energetic rock worshippers found themselves with nowhere left to dance, since the dancefloor on the right of the stage is now apparently relegated to equipment storage.

Supporting act Linda Ronstadt and her new band had a rough job entertaining the young folk awaiting their idol Neil. (Those who were in LA in the middle/late sixties will remember Linda as the vocalist with the Stone Ponies.)

She's always had a good voice and pretty face (which always helps out on the album covers) and judging by the way she sounds with her new group, Linda might be headed back into the bigtime. (Now if she could just make the cover of Rolling Stone . . .)

Linda's current sound is decidedly countrified rock; with the usual required dash of bluesy riffs to keep it from sounding too much like the Merle Haggard/Buck Owens stuff. (As with the reaction to Dylan's last few albums, Young-Record-Buying-America doesn't seem quite ready for all-out "shitkicker" music yet.)

Besides a good handful of competent longhaired country musicians—including an unknown but super-smooth steel guitar player, Linda is backed up vocally by two other willowy young country ladies; giving an overall sound not unlike Joy of Cooking or Alice Stuart, but fuller and more diverse.

Ms. Ronstadt and friends' stage presence is marred a bit by their stance at the microphones, which makes it look like either their shoes are nailed to the floor or else all three girls are paralyzed from the waist down. (Maybe their Wrangler bluejeans are too tight.)

The crowd grew impatient during an overly-long intermission (two Roadrunner cartoons followed by a half-hour of "We Want Neil!" catcalls.) At last an announcement was made: There was to be no flash photography during Young's set, or he would refuse to play.

Canada's answer to Bob Dylan is notoriously shy of such visual-distractions (there was no light show, either.) In LA in 1967 with the Buffalo Springfield, Neil was always yelling "Turn off that damn strobelight! Turn it off!"

Wearing his customary bluejeans and plaid lumberjacket-shirt Neil shyly walked out and sat down—to a roaring, screaming ovation. His first three numbers, "Sugar Mountain", "I Am A Child", and "Tell Me Why" were done solo on acoustic guitar: Neil's high reedy voice the perfect complement to his hypnotic guitar strumming.

The crowd then cheered each member of the "all-star" band as Neil brought them out: Jack Nietsche on piano, Johnny Barbado on drums, Sam Keith on steel guitar, and Tim Drummond on bass. They followed Young softly through acoustic versions of "Old Man" and "Heart of Gold" (both crowd-pleasers) then turned up the amps as he put on his arrow-shaped electric guitar for "The Loner", one of his hard-rock numbers.

Apparently the sound system was set for Neil's acoustic numbers; as soon as he went electric, everything got too loud. Young's scratchy, squawky electric guitar style is grating enough without turning up the wattage to spine-jarring levels.

Three new songs, "Time Fades Away", "L.A.", and "Don't Be Denied" will probably become the usual two or three top-40 singles off Neil's new album. The latter two are autobiographical accounts of his youth in Winnipeg and his later "Sunset Strip period" with the Springfield.

"I'd like to bring out two good friends o mine," said Neil sipping from a paper cup, "Graham Nash and David Crosby!" The audience reaction was what you'd maybe expect if he'd said "Bob Dylan and Jesus Christ" (If Steve Stills had walked out next, Bill Graham would have probably needed the National Guard to stop the frenzied throng crushing forward towards the stage.

With Nash (really playing?) on acoustic and Crosby on electric rhythm guitar, the three wailed into "Look Out Joe, You're Coming' Home," another Young number off his new album (this one's about POW's.) On "Are You Ready for the Country?" Neil took over Nietsche's seat and played some surprisingly good piano.

C, N & Y did some nice harmonizing on "Cinnamon Girl" though of course the guitar breaks (with Young and Crosby blazing away at each other) were so loud it made you head feel like one of the overworked transistors in Neil's fuzztone.

The crowd had been yelling out "Southern Man!" all night and they finally heard a long, long version of it as the encore.

As Young's last shrieking chord died away all three said their goodnights and left the stage hugging, obviously not to return. Even so, younger elements of the audience kept cheering, whistling and stomping for a good twenty minutes before giving up and heading for the doors.

Because of the sound system's volume, the acoustic set was probably the most enjoyable music all evening; yet most of the crowd didn't really seem to mind the excess noise. But then it's just possible that superstars like these could get standing ovations playing "Yankee Doodle" on police siren and kazoo (through 100,000-watt amplifiers.)

Ecologist Claims Terms Not Understood by Laymen

Professor Hunter Thomas began his lecture on Zero Population and Zero Economic Growth by saying today's pollution problem has two "prongs."

"Over-population, which has become a household phrase, is the first, and Economic Growth is the second prong."

Thomas then claimed that neither of the precise definitions of these words is highly understood.

"Zero Population doesn't mean no births, it only means that the birth rate should match the death rate, thus no numerical population expansion."

"And Zero Economic Growth, when mentioned, usually elicits a fear reaction.

"The capitalists feel it will cause economic stagnation, but our economic system, like every other system on this earth, is made up of finite materials, so what's so bad about having a limited economy?"

Thomas then switched the topic back to the "population" aspect of the pollution problem.

With the aid of some figures he predicted that the world's population would double in 28 years.

In an effort to explain how man will be affected by over-population Thomas asked the rhetorical question: "What do I expect from life? I expect," he said answering himself, "an adequate diet, adequate housing, and adequate clothing, though I expect most os us has too much clothing."

In addition to the material comforts mentioned by Thomas, he added, "A feeling of security and an optimistic view of the future."

"However, with the coming of greater industrialization and consumption of finite materials, the availability of such items as food, housing and clothing might become limited."

Thomas gave evidence by citing computer experiments made by two scientist brothers named Meadows.

They constructed a "model world" showing five main factors of today's world for the purpose of finding out how much longer we can continue to consume materials in this manner.

The computer claimed that, "The Ecosystem will collapse in the middle of the next century."

"What people must realize is that the Earth is made up of approximately ten million different living things, and that each species of life is to some extent dependant on the other.

"All ecosystems have checks and balances, and man has violated his," Thomas concluded.

Co-ed's Teamwork Wins For CCSF

The CCSF Volleyball teams once again proved their skill by beating the teams from West Valley College. On March 20, both the Women and Coed teams took on WVC. The CCSF team, scheduled to play first, took a little while to warm up as evidenced in the first game's score of 15-5. However, they got everything together with the help from their coach, Mrs. JoAnn Hahn, and displayed teamwork with winning scores of 15-4 and 15-2.

There were several exciting plays, such as spiking by Linda Lee and serving by Barbara Callan and Joan Borghello.

Other members of the team are: Barbara Hattori, Barbara Montague, Chris Zagorewicz, Maggie Lorenz, and Pat McConihe.

Following the Women's match, the Coed team bounded out onto the court and played an extremely exciting match. A great deal of teamwork was involved along with spiking, blocking, recovering and serving. Scores were 15-10, 3-15, and 15-6 with CCSF the winning team.

The team consisted of: Brian Clearwater, Diane Nagura, Paula Hocker, Robert Ruzette, Barbara Montague, Linda Lee, Jayesh Patel, and Lee Cordner.

NBA Basketball:

Big Bill Is Coming

When watching UCLA's Bill Walton play, one can't help but feel sorry for the teams that have to play against him.

It just isn't his ability to put the ball in the basket that makes him great: it's a combination of things. Take for instance, his great enthusiasm. This is a hard thing to find in sports nowadays in the age of the super-priced athletes.

Ever since the "hardship rule" came into being (the rule states that a player the NBA feels has a definite hardship can be drafted before his senior class graduates), a lot of college players have by-passed their senior year for a shot at the big money. Even "Big Bill" was tempted with a $2,000,000 offer from the Philadelphia 76ers. (But who really wants to play in Philadelphia?)

Another great asset of Walton's is his defensive ability. He just simply intimidates his opponents under the hoop. His great leaping ability, often overlooked, is perhaps the key to his great success.

Many call the big redhead the best big man ever to play college ball. That may be true, but Nate Thurmond, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, and Wilt Chamberlain would certainly argue that point.

The only thing that may hamper Walton from having a long and great career is his knees. He has tendonitis in both knees. An hour before every game, he must put hot packs on both knees. Then for an hour after each game, he must put cold packs on both of them. His knees are becoming almost as well known as Joe Namath's, in fact.

Only time will tell just how "great" Bill Walton will be. He won't really get a fair test until he plays against some of the celebrated "Big Men" of the NBA. But with any luck he should pass those tests with flying colors. So look out Nate, Kareem, and Wilt! Big Bill is coming!!!

Baseball:

CCSF 9, "Just One Step Behind"

In the longest 3 hours 30 minutes and coldest till of the year, the CCSF Rams baseball team held out for a 15-7 victory over Merrikt College T-Birds. The game was played in Oakland but it felt more like Siberia.

It was a slugfest from the beginning, as Rich Zerga, the hardest man in the league to keep off the bases (with a batting average at .378) walked, Dave Castiglioni sacrificed him to second base, next batter up; Don Lyons, sliced a double to left-field, scoring Zerga. Lyons, who should go high in the June Pro baseball draft, continued his torid hitting with a single, double, and a triple and raised his batting average to .381 and lengthened his hitting streak to eight games in a row.

T. J. Johnson, one of the most feared hitters in the league, showed why, as he laced a triple to left scoring Lyons from second base as the Rams jumped off to an early 2-0 lead. Merritt came right back with three hits and a run in the bottom of the first inning to close the lead to one run.

After a scoreless second inning, Lyons started things off in the third inning with a hit; the pitcher made an error allowing 'T. J." to get to first and another by loading the bases with a walk. This set the stage for Rene Mariluch's three-run triple, clearing the bases.

But this was just the begginning, for in the fourth inning the Rams exploded with five runs, climaxed by third baseman Dave Giorgi's first homerun of the season. At this point, the score was 10-1 and the Rams seemed to "lighten up" but the T-Birds came right back with four hits, including a homerun, to close the score 10-5.

In the eighth inning, the "City Stickers" erased any doubt about who was going to take home the bacon, as Craig Brisbane got a lead-off single, Super Stopper John Graziola singled, Zerga also singled, and Lyons came through with a triple to end the madness.

Besides Lyons, Zerga and Castiglioni also had three hits a piece to help pad their averages a bit.

As mentioned before, "Super Stopper" Grogiola was dynamite coming off the bench, collecting two hits and pitching 4-3/3 inning of scoreless baseball, striking out nine hitters and allowing only two hits to the low-flying T-Birds while posting his first victory of the season.

Extra Innings:

Eagles Score Over Rams

The conditions for baseball were ideal, the setting was San Leandro, the date was March 22, and the opponents were the Laney College Eagles. The heads-up play of Laney and the Rams' misfortunes were enough for the Eagles to pull off the upset of the season, 4-3 in ten innings.

In the first inning, Rich Zerga flied out, Graig Brisbane drew a base-on balls and Tharlow Johnson cracked a long drive to the fence in left center. Brisbane, trying to score from first base, was nailed at home plate by a perfect throw from the left-fielder. This was a prelude for things to come.

In the third with two outs, Johnson stroked a single to left, then stole both second and third; Mike Norris walked and stole second. The Rams were threatening to break the game wide open, but it wasn't to be, as the next hitter, Joe Dutto, smashed a long drive to left center.

And out of nowhere, the center-fielder made a head long dive to catch the ball, robbing Dutto of a double and holding the Rams scoreless.

However the Rams had their bright spots as Mike Norris hit a 425-foot shot over the left-field fence for his first home run of the season. T.J. Johnson had two doubles and a single in five at bat.

The game was tied after nine innings, and had to go into extra innings. In the tenth inning the Rams were retired easily and Laney came to bat. Dutto had been pitching for the entire game (and doing a great job) when in the tenth he walked the first hitter (a cardinal sin in baseball); he was sacrificed to second base. An error and a walk loaded the bases, and the stage was set for a clutch single to left field by Tom Morgan (brother of Joe Morgan of the Cincinnati Reds).

Here's hoping the Rams are not destined to remain just one step behind.

RALLY – Students gather at the "Ram" last Wednesday to hear speakers in support of instructor Jo Ann Handler.

Handler Charges "Racism"

ately after strike supporters had been in the classes explaining the protest, apparently so students would not leave class for the strike.

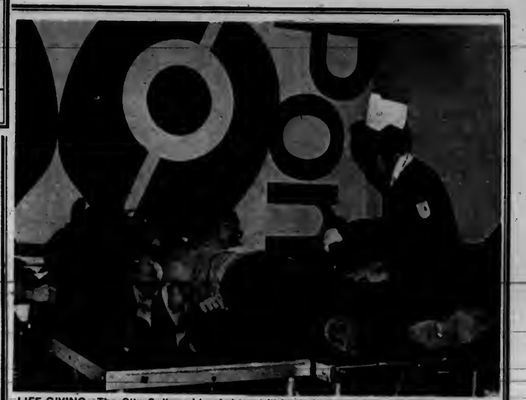
Galvan at the time did not know who the specific instructors were.

Ms. Handler took the open mike at the Ram and said that the real reason she was fired was racism. "The prime factors were racism and sexism, but mainly racism," she stated.

She said the evaluation committee thought she was too student-orientated and that she didn't put up with all the "petty" faculty business.

Handler then called for student unity in support of the strike and all the reasons for the protest.

When asked if any teachers informed him that they were not meeting with classes (in support of the strike), Dean Ralph Hillsman replied, "Not to my knowledge."



Ms. Handler however said she believed that two teachers besides herself did not meet with their classes to show support for the strike.

Some students supporting the strike were not at school and that was one reason, felt Ms. Handler, that the rally was not larger."

As the weather became chillier, the rally was moved to downstairs in the Student Union.

Wounded Knee:

Oglala Spokesman Fears "Massacre"

A well-attended gathering at the La Raza Bungalow last Tuesday heard a spokesman for the Oglala Sioux Nation claim that: "The US Government is planning another massacre at Wounded Knee."

Speaking in solemn tones, a youthful Gaylon Pahdocony denounced the Government's attitude toward the Wounded Knee defenders. "The Government doesn't want to negotiate; he stated, "They (the US Government) want to phase us out; they have denied us our religion, our language and they have always tried to destroy our culture."

Pahdocony said that the Oglala Sioux want to be recognized as a sovereign nation while negotiating with the Government; "though the government is working for it's own gain," he added, "We're trying to get their attention to force a Senate investigation of tribal council members."

Pahdocony explained that any investigation "Will show that tribal council members are not working for the welfare of the tribe but for their own personal gain."

The speaker described how tribal council members have operated in the past, "driving around in Cadillacs and trying to bribe voting members."

Pahdocony told the La Raza gathering that the real news of the plight of the Wounded Knee Indians is not getting out, "Our appeals to the public for support are being suppressed by the Government," he said.

He went on to describe the critical situation at Wounded Knee as "a no man's land," in reference to the series of barricades extending from Rapid City, South Dakota to Wounded Knee. "The government's best men are manning the barricades; they are armed to the teeth; they have armored personal carriers and machine guns," he added.

The Sioux spokesman explained that the only way of getting in or out of Wounded Knee is across country; "No one is going through those barricades. Wounded Knee is a 'no backing down' situation," he added.

Regarding the takeover of the Bureau of Indian Affairs by Indian activists earlier this year, Pahdocony complained that, "The US has clouded the issues. The Government publicized damage reports to the building when the real issue was their cutting fifty million from the hundred million federal budget for Indian schools."

"The Government felt that we were

Galvan Counters Charges Of "Slipshod" AS Govt.

In response to charges of slipshod and "irresponsible" management of student government from former A.S. President Bruce Bosso in a recent Guardsman "Letter to the Editor," current president Juan Galvan defended the efforts of this semester's A.S. representatives in a recent interview.

"The student government at the present time is doing what it considers on some grounds important," Galvan assured. "I think the present Student Council would welcome the opportunity to compare itself with the accomplishments of previous student councils."

Also, on the subject of a possibly illegal vote to allocate $200 to the defense of a student charged with assault, Galvan reminds anyone who asks that he vetoed the appropriation before it could be reviewed.

Student Government, Campus Brass Gather to Discuss Issues

Administration, faculty and student government representatives met and informally discussed some of the issues affecting CCSF for two hours last week.

The meeting, held in a classroom-size theatre in Statler Wing, according to Student Body President Juan Galvan, "Is the first meeting between all parties representing student input into CCSF Administration policies."

Galvan continued, "We met recently with the District Board of Governors too," he explained. "As an outgrowth of that meeting we expect to be conferring with the administration and faculty on a regular basis."

A key issue at the meeting was: how widely should confidential information about instructors (who are being evaluated) be disseminated? Dr. Buttimer responded to the query from Student Council member Willard Rolen who asked, "Is it a violation of the existing CCSF charter when members of the Instructor Evaluation Committee discuss the case outside committee of instructors who are being evaluated? Rolen alleged that violations of confidentiality with regard to the Handler case had occurred on two occasions to his knowledge, "in the halls and at student council meetings."

Dr. Buttimer replied, "A key issue in the teacher evaluation process is to whom or how widely, should confidential information about teachers be disseminated. He added, "It is both a moral and a legal issue." He continued, "at present it would be a violation of charter provisions to disclose any information."

One council member charged that campus police are disturbing the spontaneity of student activities by appearing in large numbers at dances and gatherings. Vester Flanagan, Dean of Student Activities replied to the charge, "It has occurred on occasion that the campus police have congregated in one area during a student activity." He continued, "this is contrary to policy, and they have been remonstrated about this; however," he added, "The campus police are human too," he went on, "they are my responsibility and I will not have a campus policeman ripped off in a situation where violence might occur."

Galvan also announced that he's had several complaints about the English as a second language program: "Several Latino and Chinese students have complained to me that the ESL program is not adequate," he stated. "For example, Chinese students who are interested in Physics are finding it difficult to keep up with their studies because of reading difficulties." Juan went on, "People have told me that it would be good if we (ESL students) could have even one hour a day specially reserved for us in one of the various languagelabs on-campus." "T. Dunnean Hall who is on the ESL committee responded, "We've recently talked about getting new standards together for the ESL program.

"Juan's idea is fantastic: the main idea is to get more space and equipment," she explained. "The only way to get ESL students involved is to expand the language lab facilities."

and new developments are in the offing," Dr. Buttimer also announced that a "big" ($50 or $60 million) November bond issue for new campus construction would go a long way toward alleviating the classroom and activity space problems that beset us." —William Korosec

Teachers Request Salary Increase

The Community College District's board of governors heard a variety of requests for salary increases last week from four groups representing the district's 650 teachers.

The City College Academic Senate urged a 5 per cent cost of living increase and a salary increase of 10 per cent.

The American Federation of Teachers Local 2121, asked for a 5-1/2 per cent cost of living increase.

The California Teachers Association urged a 5-1/2 per cent increase across the board.

The Adult Occupational Faculty Senate proposed a 7-1/2 per cent cost of living increase pointing out that salary increases are automatic.

All four groups also asked for a $15,000 group life insurance plan covering all faculty members.

Representatives of the groups will attempt to work out some form of compromise plan with district officials prior to May 1, date of the next scheduled governors' meeting.

Riles Predicts A Bright Future For State Schools

California Superintendent of Schools Wilson Riles said in a recent speech that he sees "a bright future" for education in the state, but at the same time "current discrimination problems" have to be taken care of.

Riles rejected the George Orwell 1984-type of society where people to people relationships are not stressed. Riles feels that "Human beings and their relations with themselves and others are important."

"Also a medium will have to be found between people and technology." Riles thinks that "there is a lot to be done in the field of human relations."

Some of the current problems have to do with discrimination of groups of people. For example, "Blacks are the last hired, but among the first to be laid off or fired.

"Chicanos are treated in the same manner. Also they have little chance for job advancement."

Riles noted that there is no woman as chancellor at any of the nine University of California campuses, nor a woman president at the 19 state college campuses, or the 96 community colleges. (CCSF does have a woman dean.)

According to Riles, any school administrator who discriminates (against women or minorities) is "not worthy to be in a position of authority."

Blood Drive Saves Lives

"The main purpose of the blood drive is to save lives on campus," said Ed Lew, coordinator of the CCSF blood drive to be held at Statler Wing on April 25, 26, 27.

In the past, blood donated by students has helped save lives. The first blood drive in Spring of 1968 saved the life of Ken Knight, a CCSF student who needed blood for a kidney transplant.

Response from students has been very good in the past. The last Blood Drive collected 540 pints of blood. CCSF once collected 1,500 pints of blood—the world record is 1,700 pints held by a university in Australia.

"Blood costs $40 a pint and if a person gives blood, he and his family is protected for one year," Lew stated. "The donor can also transfer the blood credit (up to eight pints) to a friend."

Lew outlined the procedure that a donor must go through. "It takes about 30-45 minutes for the entire process. It starts with a medical interview and a review of your medical history. Then a nurse takes one drop of blood and analyzes it right there. If the blood is acceptable then you will be led to a couch and one pint of blood is drawn from you."

"The needle they use doesn't hurt; it's just like the needle they use when they give you a shot. It's primarily a psychological thing."

Lew added, "Donors will receive a service pin at the end and we will also give prizes out to donors. It's not an incentive to give blood, but as a symbol of appreciation."

Who can give blood? Anybody over 18 years of age who doesn't mind giving up a pint of blood. (The average male has 12 pints of blood in his body and the average female has 10 pints). —Doug Pon

"WHAT PAIN?—Although there's a lot to get excited about, (needles, nurses and people,) students took it calmly during last year's blood drive.

"Continuous Momentum" at Careers Center

The first impression of the CCSF Career Guidance Center is one of continuous momentum. Even at times when no students are using it, there is activity of some kind.

In her relatively quiet office, Barbara Thomas, Career Guidance Counselor, explained the bustle. "Every day there's new material coming in, so we're constantly revising our data. If information is old, we don't want it. We have to stay current and accurate."

Some of the reference material is college catalogues. These contain information on undergraduate and graduate schools, both in and out of California. Some files contain a broad range of facts, including accreditation information and whether or not a school is approved for veterans.

The fastest changes, however, concern present and future job opportunities. Current accurate facts on career opportunities in any specific field, duties of specific jobs, and labor market information are always available to the interested student.

A new feature since last semester is a series of tapes on how to find a job. (How to present yourself, how to handle difficult questions,) and how to keep a job once one is acquired.

Ms. Thomas enthuses, "It's a dynamic program, not static. Every day the labor market is changing. We have to stay both comprehensive and accurate."

The Career Guidance Center also uses the testing office to help a student determine career aptitudes and interests. Ms. Thomas declares, "What I'm really trying to do is to turn students on to themselves and their values, as related to their careers. Career choice is tied very closely to a person's whole self-concept. If a student gets himself or herself together careerwise, everything he or she does takes on more meaning." She added, "The more students establish career goals, the less drop-out problems we'll have."

Interested students can drop by Bungalow 304, behind the cafeteria, for more information.

The awards, ranging from $25 to $100, were given to encourage engineering students to undertake studies in the College's air conditioning and refrigeration curriculum.

Students receiving awards for Spring 1973 are: Rusch DeLong, Wesley Wake, and Eugene Leung ($100); Jonathan Cosbie, Solomon Lee ($80); Daniel Cherveny, Mamad Kadreebux, Sidney Ku, Area Pappas, Louis Pietrelli ($60); John Feikert, Mohomed Jabri, and Joseph Moussa ($40) and Guillermo Ortega ($25).

CCSF faculty members Donald Bryant, William Felzer, and Roy Anderson (who are also ASHRAE members) nominated recipients and determined the size of the awards.

Library Swings

The library is a real swinging place but people don't realize it," states Acting Director of Library Services, Iole Matteucig.

The CCSF library tries to keep up to date on everything in education and supports the curriculum and teachers.

The Higher Education Act of 1965 authorized grants to institutions of higher education to assist and encourage them in the acquisition of library resources. For the fiscal year of 1972-73, City College library was supplemented by $58,935.

The money was used to build up the audio-visual collection (C239), to buy new films for all the different departments, tape cassettes and film loops for the listening center (C249), and additional microfilm.

The grant provided the CCSF library with back issues of periodicals, some dating as far back as the 40's. The library subscribes to approximately 600 magazines or periodicals. A computerized list gives all the necessary data on these periodicals and is available in the library. Reference books, such as encyclopedias, are also provided by the grant.

An application for a grant of $5,000 for the fiscal year 1973-74 was approved by the Board of Governors.

The grant, if awarded, would be used for continued strengthening of the book and microfilm collection. It will in large part be used to build the non-book media collection, notably enlargement of the film library and audio tapes collection.

The library also wants to build its microfiche collection. These are cards of film (as opposed to microfilm rolls).

Part of the grant will be used to purchase an indexing service for the Health Department which includes the latest material on health.

From the grant, the library could also buy resources supporting the new curriculums such as Labor Relations and Legal Assisting.

Under the Higher Education Act of 1965, the grant application for the fiscal year 1973-74 is submitted in order to develop more comprehensive resources for use by the college community.

The library is continuing to grow for the benefit of the students. Mrs. Matteucig encourages everyone to pick up the free booklet, "Library Tips," available in the bookstore or library.

getting too smart," he added, "about the reality of being an Indian in America."

"When we went to Washington," he continued, "they told us OK, occupy the Bureau of Indian Affairs building," but they didn't tell the BIA guards, who subsequently beat several of our people and that is why the barricades went up," he explained.

Pahdocony believes that there is a growing Indian movement in the US, which he described as "essentially religious." He continued, "We Indians are experiencing the spiritual revitalization of our oppressed brothers and sisters. We believe in God, Jesus and our own religious heritage." He explained that daily religious services are being held at Wounded Knee and the defenders there are not allowed to drink; "Wounded Knee participants are told that there is no drinking and that if you aren't Indian to abstain (from alcohol) for at least a week. If you can't then you aren't Indian enough to participate at Wounded Knee."

Pahdocony explained that support for the Indian cause is mostly directed through the United Native American Church; he asked that supplies, food, clothing and money be delivered to the Wounded Knee Aid Center, 330 Ellis, (Glide Memorial Church).

He called for a letter writing campaign to influence law making.

La Raza also announced that they are accepting donations of money food and clothing for the Wounded Knee defenders, which can be taken to the La Raza Bungalow.

Performing Arts Program Revamped

City College's time-honored approach of departmentally categorizing and offering courses included under the umbrella terminology of 'The Performing Arts' is undergoing a refreshing alteration.

Chairmen of the dance and drama departments, as well as various faculty and students from the subject area involved (dance, drama, music, film, t.v. broadcasting, etc.) are co-ordinating efforts under flag-bearer Madeline Mueller to swing away from the existing isolationist mentality toward an integration of all the performing arts areas.

Current unpolished plans for unifying the departments will result in expanding performance opportunities and publicity methods on campus, as well as extending them into the community. The thrust for change will also serve to establish the most contemporary art form, or the multi-media approach, as a functioning part of CCSF curriculum.

According to Madeline Mueller, Chairwoman of the Music department, the organized move to bring the Performing Arts departments into a state of harmony and exchange was marshalled in by students' impromptu, albiet sporadic attempts at integration: "It's being done already, its just how to do more of the same. Student interest and student ability is there and thats what we're going on."

An integration area of focus already functioning includes the respective merging of the dance, drama, and engineering departments with the electronic music lab for faculty use. A tentatively scheduled Opera Workshop (by nature a multi-media outlet) and a proposed summer course offering combining the performing arts areas of dance, music and drama delineate futuristic trends. The campaign for community involvement has been launched into operation with the pre-scheduling of UC Extension and McLaren amphitheater for two CCSF presentations.

The actual mechanics of involvement in and of the community is, as yet, nebulous. Along with entertaining thoughts of a community mailing list in the publicity aspect of the expansion movement, Madeline Mueller has put in an administrative request for a citizen's Advisory Council.

A major concern that cannot be circumvented in integrating the Performing Arts courses and expanding their scope and impact is the problem of lacking facilities. But the relationship is primarily one of cause and effect, and since one of the major reasons for refusing funds has been because the various departments were small and isolated, an expansion of courses should see an expansion in monetary grants.

Open meetings concerning the new movement towards a more comprehensive Performing Arts department at CCSF are held every week at 2:15 in A145. All interested students as well as anyone who is planning a presentation, performance or project and needs suggestions or instruction in any of the performing arts, is encouraged to attend.

Dance Show Arrives Here

A community-oriented performance group, The Dance Spectrum under Carlos Carvajal's direction will present a display of their work in the CCSF theater today at 11 a.m.

The program will consist of Carvajal's "Shapes of Evening," a classic ballet for 3 couples, with music by Debussy. This ballet depicts in choreographic form the unfolding and closing of a lotus, and ranges in mood from dreamy to ecstatic.

Also on the program is "Trisagion," by Tance Johnson. "Trisagion" means "hymn of praise" in Greek; and is danced by a female "earth figure," who struggles to rise, and a male "air figure," who relates to earth with empathy and to heaven to assist the earth figure. The choreography is a study in asymmetrical designs relating to haroque has relief and stained glass windows. A third probable inclusion on the program will be "Tango," by Carvajal, a spoof of the twenties for one couple.

Election Commissioner Kent Says A.S. Prez Used "Illegal" Means

On March 14, Associated Students President Juan Galvan and his student council filled a vacated council seat by "illegal" means, according to Election Commissioner Kevin Kent.

"My rules and guidelines covering those elections," states Kent, "were clearly violated by Galvan. He and the student council, the same people elected by those guidelines, blatantly ignored the section that requires any vacancy to be filled by those candidates next in line on the official election results."

"The person chosen to fill that 15th seat," Kent asserts, "never even ran in the eletions." Galvan aced out those people who did run for office but lost because they placed 16th or further down the list. I put that rule in there so that this would never happen."

Although Kent is certain that it was unfair, "I can see why he (Galvan) did it. The next eligible people on the list were from the rival Good Things For City College party, not from Juan's Progressive Students Alliance. The next eligible candidate, Robert Jones, should be on the council right now."

When asked whether the Election Commissioner had filed a formal complaint with Vester Lee Flanagan, Dean of Student Activities, Kent said "Yes I have but so far the Dean has done nothing about it."

After contacting Galvan, the A.S. President replied, "Those rules do not apply to us now. They were recognized only by last semesters' council."

Kent said afterwards that even though they were recognized by last semester's council, these rules were "intended to cover the Spring 1973 council elections which Galvan and his party were part of. They disregarded those rules so that they could further stack the council and keep outsiders like Robert Jones, who is a member of another party, from taking his rightful seat on the council."

Asked if the post of Election Commissioner is now a meaningless title he replied, "Hell, it couldn't be any more meaningless. What good is an election commissioner if he just watches the polling booths? They don't need a commissioner for that. If council is going to make up their own rules, then the job I have should be abolished. Or worse yet, abolish the whole student government."

Special Report:

CCSF's "Substandard Readers"

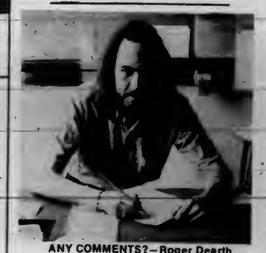
by William Korosec

Edward Kloster, Chairman of the English Curriculum Committee spoke out in the December 7, 1972, issue of The Guardsman, "for an expanded reading program and better Reading Lab facilities." He explained, "to better serve the needs of the campus."

In the December issue, Kloster criticised the education system whereby, "many of our students weren't taught to read properly and were passed from gradeto grade, partly because of administrative and instructor indifference. As a consequence" he stated, "they can't read here."

Kloster also said in the December issue that he believes that because of the large number of poor readers, "the reading situation at CCSF does not correspond to the national norms both because of the higher number of foreign students here, "to whom," he continued, "English is a second and perplexing language, and the many students who lack the basic reading skills," he added.

Kloster went on to say that according to the results of a recent survey of reading programs in Northern California junior colleges, "our reading lab, in terms of space and equipment, is by far the worst. However," he continued, "in terms of results, our program, which is classroom oriented, has obtained equally good results."



Kloster had a few good words to say about CCSF's Counseling department. "We are very pleased to see a response from the Counseling department." He explained that a recent survey showed that two-thirds of the students who are enrolled for reading courses were advised to do so by their counselors."

Kloster said that he believes reading courses should be made mandatory for poor readers at the time of their enrollment. He said that required enrollment in reading courses for poor readers would help those students who were not mature enough to follow the advice of

A Union for Quiet Or Noisy Students?

Editor, The Guardsman,

I guess you can consider this both a question and a complaint: Who is responsible for the student union?

My point is this—when I go to the student union, I do so in order to relax, study or maybe read. If you've been in the building lately it is obvious it is impossible to achieve any of these goals.

I have lately talked with several other students who confirm my impression, and who evidently feel as I do.

Don't get me wrong, I like music, socializing, et al, as much as anyone, however, the student union represents an exaggeration of these practices.

I may come off sounding prejudiced by what I am to say; I don't mean it that way.

Various groups seem to vie to see who can talk loudest or make the most noise, others compartmentalize the top floor by dragging chairs into circles, etc. And, of course, as anywhere, many seem not to care that the floor and tables resemble a most promising garbage dump.

Question: Cannot the union be divided so that those who wish to study, rest, etc., can do so upstairs relatively undisturbed while those who desire noise, conversation, the Juke box, radios, games, can enjoy themselves in the larger downstairs? Even now, the upstairs is noisy anytime; the music bo is playing even if all is quiet upstairs.

I just think there are enough students at CCSF who desire a place to relax without all the present attendant revelry of a carnival.

Some may retort by stating, "There is a library."

Have you recently tried to study there? It too is extremely lax in its effort to establish some sort of decorum necessary for study.

Really, I guess my basic gripe is this: if people enjoy conversing, cannot they do so in relatively low tones so as not to disturb others.

Or, is it fair to say that most just can't give a damn.

I realize there are many at CCSF who do not care whether they study or not; however, more probably, a majority do!

Another "Leg" Complaint

Editor, The Guardsman,

I too was shocked by the sexist trash you printed on the top of your March 22 issue. You come on with pretty sentiments about spring and then illustrate them with a picture of three transvestites. I don't get it.

Indeed City College is a liberal campus and likewise the Guardsman is up-to-date, but next time you run a similar picture let's have it of three women (i.e. six legs).

Insulted,
Henry Jane Morgan
(please just print my initials if you publish this letter.)

Athletes and Council

Editor, The Guardsman

This letter is in reference to the Student Council Meeting of April 9, 1973. During this meeting, the question of Associated Students financial support of the City College athletic teams was discussed.

I wish to object to the conduct of various supporters of the athletic teams during the Student Council meeting mentioned above. First, these supporters of the athletic teams packed the meeting, making it extremely difficult for the Student Council to function or for those in the audience who opposed them to have a chance to speak. If these athletic team supporters are sincere about City College politics, they should have been coming to Student Council meetings all semester. They have not.

Secondly, the athletic team supporters stated that the Student Council does not represent the students of City College and thusly should not be making the decision for students on this matter. That is wrong. Council meetings are open, and the council was elected in a democratic election to represent the student body. Thirdly, these athletic team supporters twice made remarks against the funding of the CCSF Free Gay Students Association. If they are against this funding, they should state so at Finance Committee meetings. I feel these supporters of athletic teams are unsure of their own sexuality, so must besmock gay students. The students of City College don't need the machismo of the athletic team supporters I saw at that Student Council meeting!

Some Mid-East Questions

Editor, The Guardsman,

I would like to respond to a letter you had in The Guardsman in which the Middle East was discussed. In the letter it said Israel wants to kill the refugees. If Israel wants to kill Arab refugees she has over a million within her borders to choose from. She could have long ago accomplished that end without buying arms from the U.S.

Is it of any interest to you (the letter-writer) that the Arab countries persecute and kill their Jewish citizens, today as in the past? Is it of any interest to you that Arab countries receive huge sums of money from the U.S. for arms? Do you care to know that the Russians give, not sell, but give, arms to the Arabs. Are you aware of the fact that there are 100,000,000 Arabs and only 2,500,000 Jews, a ratio of approximately 40 to 1. Did you cry over the Lod Airport massacre? Were you upset over the Munich assassinations? Did you protest to the newspapers when the Belgians assured the Black September terrorists that their charge de' affaires in Kartoum wasn't a Jew and therefore shouldn't be killed?

I suppose you have done none of these things. You don't put much value on Jewish life or pain—do you? Well my friend look again, the price has gone up; up far beyond your wildest imagination.

IRS Tax Computer Awaits Your 1040

This is the time of the year when people make last minute arrangements to file and pay their income taxes. It can be painful and agonizing to put the check in an envelope to mail to a regional IRS office. That office is the first stop for a tax return.

The regional office does not check closely for errors or "cheating"; that job is done by a "super-computer" located at Martinsville, West Virginia, known as the Martinsville Monster. This computer stores all the information that each taxpayer sends in, including W2 forms, dividends and interest.

If a taxpayer decides this year not to file a return, yet one was sent in last year, the Monster will make note of this. (Failing to file a return can turn out to be expensive.)

The computer looks closely at each individual's deductions. It also examines each individual's past deductions. Then it compares them with other people who earn approximately the same income. If current deductions don't appear to be in proportion to income the computer will become curious.

If the monster does find something unusual, the individual filing the return might be asked to send in information which would show how the figures on the return were reached. The second way (not so pleasant) is when an IRS auditor calls for the purpose of a personal investigation.

Good luck everyone!

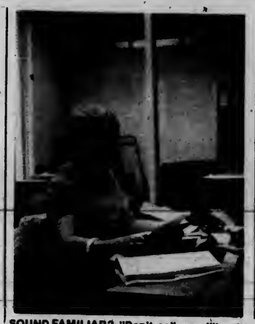
Profiles: Ringing and Buzzing Through the Testing Dept.



Testing, testing, testing! No, we are not in broadcasting, but on the second floor of the Educational Services Building, Room E204.

Here you will find two very capable and busy women, Marge Wintermantel and Pat Pack. The phones are ringing constantly, people streaming in and out every few seconds, accompanied by the steady buzzing of an alarm time-clock every few minutes.

Wintermantel, Senior Testing Technician, has been in the Testing department (now known as Guidance Service) since 1957. Widowed, with two children to support, she went to work after her husband died suddenly of a heart attack. Her first jobs were with the State, Laguna Honda, and later, Hoover Junior High School.

When she first arrived on the City College Campus, Wintermantel was one of only 25 clerical workers. She loves her work in the Testing department, but because of the regulation on retirement for city employees, Marge, who celebrated her birthday recently, is retiring to Walnut Creek to enjoy a life of leisure.

She will have time now to fully enjoy her grandchildren and to pursue her many interests. Among these interests is her organ playing course on which she intends to concentrate more intensely now that she will have more free time.

SOUND FAMILIAR?- "Don't call me, I'll call you" is the feeling Marge Wintermantel gets when testing students in her daily routine.

While in the Testing department, Wintermantel was in charge of giving placement tests twice a year for 18 Saturdays... March through August for Fall registrants, and November through January for Spring registrants, usually from 8 a.m. - 11:30 a.m.

In 1972, the number tested in Spring was 2281; in Fall, 5421. Students from the San Francisco public schools are tested first, then the San Francisco private schools, with the general public following. This last group includes adults, veterans, out of town and out of state, as well as foreign students.

"In the early days of the Testing department there were two manually controlled machines for tests," Wintermantel explains, "which meant setting and correcting individual tests, feeding paper into the machine, listing scores, etc. Now the computer purchased in 1967-68 does most of the work, making one week's work into a few hours. But then there are more students to be tested now than back in those years," she continues.

An aside from the usual seriousness of purpose in this department was a freak accident which occurred some ten years ago when someone dropped a coke bottle in the testing machine and put it out of commission. This resulted in the purchase of the new computer machine which in time proved its worth many times over.

Last semester the Testing department gave tests to the Evening Division for the first time; two nights in January were set aside for these tests which procedure will be repeated in August. Until this time special tests were administered by the Evening Division.

Senior Clerk Typist, Pat Pack, has had diversified jobs throughout the campus, the last three years having been in the Testing department. She and Marge share the same hobby—organ playing. "I'll sure miss Marge around here," sighs Pat.

Financial Aids Office - Still Good for $$$

Financial aid funds are still available for Spring 1973 for those students who qualify for loans and grants.

Students who have inadequate financial resources to meet their educational and living costs while attending City College can apply for assistance.

Many students drop their classes because of financial needs. The primary reason for the Financial Aid Program is to provide financial assistance to students who, without such aid, would be unable to attend the college.

UNTYING PURSE STRINGS—Chairman of F.A. office Juanita Pascual.

Mrs. Juanita Pascual, in charge of the Financial Aids Department, emphasized that approximately 1500 students now get aid in forms of loans, grants, and/or employment.

"Our main concern this time is not to get the money, but to reach needy students and let them know that financial aid is still available," Pascual stressed.

"The administration of federally funded student Financial Aid Programs at CCSF involves an allocation of approximately $1,300,000 this year," Pascual stated "We have enough funds to aid more students for Spring semester and for Summer 1973."

"If a student has financial problems, a certain amount of money is offered to the individual for the semester or the academic year," Pascual said.

"Due to the fact that we must follow the federal guidelines, the processing and analyzing time used to take about forty-six weeks. However," she added, "At present the processing time has been cut down to about one or two weeks."

In selecting students to receive financial aid, the Department places primary emphasis on "financial need." Satisfactory academic progress, however, is a prerequisite to renewal awards.

When asked about how much money is left, Pascual responded, "Although I cannot get the exact figure now, I believe we have enough funds left to give to the qualified students."

According to Pascual, more staff has been assigned to aid students in filling out their applications.

Needy students should make an appointment at the Financial Aids Department to fill out applications and financial statements while funds are still available.

The Financial Aids Department is located at E109 and is open every weekday 9 - 11:30 a.m. and 1 - 3:30 p.m.

QUESTION: "What are you doing about the meat boycott?"

Marie Becker - Business

I believe if they were planning on boycotting meat they should have done it 90 cents ago when the prices were half-way decent.

Michael Hughes - Criminology

I don't think it affects me because I don't buy that much meat. It probably affects our parents more. I feel that an organized boycott could work.

Debbie Barnett - Pre-Pharmacy

My mom hasn't bought meat this week. We have it in the freezer but we haven't been eating it. The things we have been eating are fattening like macaroni and pancakes.

Nick Liuzzi - Business

Meat boycotting isn't affecting me personally because there are several female acquaintances that are giving me a helping hand to beat this. My motto is: "Don't let your meat loaf!"

Pam Grove - General Education

I think that meat prices are going up so much that anything like boycotting has to be tried. I think everyone should honor the boycott because we should do something to pull down the high prices.

Vito Garofalo - Ornamental Horticulture

Personally the meat boycott doesn't affect me as I consider myself an avid vegetarian. I would rather nourish my body with carrot juice, sunflower seeds and alfalfa sprouts.

Mr. "Better Cracks"

Instructor Authors Ecology Text

(Editor's Note: This is part one of a series on City College teachers who have authored their own textbooks. Mr. Ed Bedecarrax (pronounced "Better Cracks"), who teaches Biological Science 20, Ecology and Man, gave this exclusive interview to Guardsman reporter Kevin Kent.)

Q: What is the title of your book?

A: I'm not sure but I think it will be called "Exploring the Human Environment. It's sort of up to the Madison Avenue people. But I think it will be called that because it was the last title suggested.

Q: Has it been published yet?

A: No, not yet but it comes out in June of this year. It's published by the same people publishing World Book Encyclopedia.

it will be a soft-cover book, and will be a general ecology text, designed for the non-major lay reader and will be an unspecialized non-technical book.

Q: Is it an "ecology" book or something else?

A: I think it is an ecology book with more of an emphasis in the physical and cultural basis to environmental problems and solutions. All the fields that deal with Man now are those which are interdisciplinary. You can not function alone. A biologist can't look for the solutions unless he involves a sociologist and a politician, along with a psychologist, physicist and a geologist. They are all interrelated when we are talking about man's environment.

Man's environment is everybody. And all our interactions are affecting each other and I think that this is where things have been lacking in the past, in texts and in teaching approaches, in that you teach your limited subject matter and somehow it has no relationship to anything else.

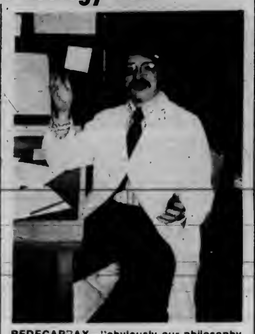
Q: When this book is published will you be using it in your class?

A: Yes, of course I will be using it!

Q: Is anyone else involved with this book?

A: Yes. Dr. J. Wang of San Jose State. He is a physical scientist, and a very perceptive man. His fields are so diverse he is culturally 'with it' in a way. His approach to the subject matter is a nice one because the idea in many Asiatic societies is that there is this interaction. Man interacts with everything that goes on in his total environment. Also working with us are two sociologists from the East coast.

Q: How long did it take you to write this book?



A: A year for the first one and 6 months for the second. Yes, I have been involved in the book that's coming out in June for about a year.

Q: Is there anything controversial in your book?

A: An expose!

Q: Yes. Something someone might disagree with.

A: No, because obviously our philosophy is so sound that no one could possibly disagree with it! It will make perfect sense to everybody! Actually: I think the thing that is different in a sense is the approach of total involvement in the environment. The three spheres I mentioned before may be the only controversial thing because I have never seen it presented in text material before, at least not in the United States. But no, there is no major 'expose.'

BEDECARRAX—"obviously our philosophy is so sound that no one could possibly disagree with it."

We try and stay away from that. It doesn't do any good to place blame; we are all polluters, and if I have a class which in the past has polluted a classroom with garbage they brought in, what's the difference? They are as "guilty" as Standard Oil is.

In the past there has been a lot of attempts to place blame, nothing to work out solutions. So from this standpoint we are not going to do an 'expose' or give some startling revelation but what we are going to look at is the interplay of all the environmental forces that influence man. The emphasis is on Man in this book.

Q: Do you mention anything like oil spills and who is to blame for them?

A: We mention names where it has been done. If the Santa Barbara oil spill is caused by a company, for example, it is mentioned. This is fact and you don't hide the fact that it has been done. If there is an environmental problem which has occurred and is worth mentioning, we have mentioned it.

Q: One final question. What type of closing do you have in your book, and what do you foresee for the future?

A: It's optimistic. My feeling is that if you can get people turned on, that if you can re-educate them, we can find solutions. So the book I think builds a certain optimism and hope for solutions but nothing outside the realm of possibility. Again, what I think is or was the problem in books in 1968 and 1969 was that the works were so pessimistic, and because we were inundated with people placing the blame; we were all getting depressed. Our book ends with optimism for the future that could become reality with dedication and work.

PINT-SIZE TRAFFIC JAM—The Child Care Center still needs male and female volunteers. Interested students can also apply for the student leadership program and receive credits for 5, 10, or 15 hours per week at the center. Students wanting t apply for the work study at the center for the upcoming Fall 1973(Sept.) Semester should contact Sue Davis, Madeleine Wild or Barbara Norisse at Ext. 463 or Bungalow 7.

Godfather Only Second Best

The movie that outdid Gone With the Wind at the box-office has suffered a fate crueler than death. On the evening The Godfather was supposed to sweep the boards in the movie industry's coveted Oscars, it got what a film of that caliber deserved—"a kiss of death"—by the film industry.

Back in early 1972, the advance publicity for Godfather was outstanding. It was built up as the most daring film in recent history, surpassing even Elizabeth Taylor's bomb, Who's Afraid of Virginia Wolfe. However, despite rave reviews of Brando's acting, Coppolla's direction, and technical aspects, it fell flat on its proverbial face.

The downfall of the Godfather can be seen after a second or third viewing. It is true that one is overwhelmed by the cold realizations and daring aspects of the film in the first viewing. The second time around, little details become obvious in this multi-flawed production.

The editing, especially in some of the violence scenes, is sloppy in parts. The directing is weak especially during the closing scenes. The emotional level falls flat except for the violence. All in all, it didn't really deserve the Oscar for the best movie of 1972.

On the other hand, Cabaret, which won the Oscar for best Actress by Liza Minelli, best supporting Actor by Joel Grey, and best direction by Bob Fosse, sort of sneaked in the back door.

The advance publicity was minimal and the reviews were non-emotional. But despite these adversities, Cabaret rose to become the film of the year according to the movie industry.

Cabaret is beautiful, entertaining, practically technically perfect and deserving of every award it has received. The directing is flawless; the editing produces some real beauty and flows perfectly; the acting, the emotional levels, sound, lighting, cinematography, etc., all were blended together for an excellent film. It is truly a once in a lifetime movie.

Oscar night produced its usual camaraderie and fellowship with twangs of nostalgia and momentary surprises. Most moving by far was the tribute to the late Edward G. Robinson.

It has become almost traditional for at least one person to refuse his or her Oscar and this year was no different. Marlon Brando refused his Oscar for best actor and sent Sacheen Littlefeather to tell why. A Sioux Indian, she said: "I do not mean to intrude on the ceremony but Marlon Brando has sent me with his reason for refusal." She went on to say that the plight of the American Indian in today's society was the reason Brando refused the coveted award.

Another surprise was the "best song" Oscar. It went to "The Morning After," theme from The Poseidon Adventure.

Cabaret won a total of 11 Oscars, Godfather and Poseidon, four apiece and Limelight won three Oscars.

It is amazing how one film can win the Oscar in almost every category and yet not win best film. How can Cabaret be the best of everything but not in overall and vice-versa.

This was a year of nostalgia for the film industry. Every film winner besides Butterflies Are Free and Poseidon took place in the dim past. Moviegoers are looking back to the 'good ol' days. It is ironic that most of these movies presented them not as "good" but as tragic. Just as viewers look back today, the viewers of tomorrow will probably look back to now in search of lost memories and the 'good ole days.'

BAETA Allocates $145,000 to KQED

The Board of Directors of the Bay Area Educational Television Association has just allocated $145,000 for the development of minority and community produced programs to be aired on KQED Channel 9, it was announced today by Caroline M. Charles, BAETA Board Chairman.

The new project has been given the working title of "Open Studio Television."

KQED has commenced discussions with the National Association of Broadcast Engineers and Technicians in the hope of implementing the planned programming this spring.

If the details can be worked out, the programs will be produced in the station's facilities by community groups, organizations and individuals within KQED's coverage area. The station will bear the facilities costs.

Hopefully, applications for "Open Studio" program production can be accepted sometime in April. Participants will be selected according to criteria set up by a special Board policy committee which will include community advisors from the area served by Channel 9. Both individual programs and series will be considered with minority applicants, organizations and interests being given special attention in accordance with the Association's affirmative action policy.

Selection will be made according to such criteria as community interest, community usefulness, community access and balance (including balance of minority interest and productions) in the Channel 9 schedule. Preference will be given to programs produced in a live format and all programs will e required to satisfy FCC rules and regulations.

Sha Na Na - Resurrecting The Sounds of the 50's

Sha Na Na has become one of the most popular bands to ever hit the stage. Unfortunately, doing successful live concerts brings in very little money compared with record sales. And up until now, Sha Na Na hasn't sold many records.

The qestion was how to caputre their stage show on record. Their first L.P. Rock and Roll is Here to Stay was a studio disaster. Their second recording simply shalled Sha Na Na was half "live" plus a surprisingly fresh side of Sha Na Na's own country-rock originals. Their third album The Night is Still Young was a mellow mixture of old and new tunes that was barely noticed by the record buying public. Even though their second album was partly live and at least captured a glimpse of the group's stage act, it wasn't until their newly released double live album The Golden Age of Rock and Roll that the band finally put on record what concert audiences have been hearing and watching for years. Recorded in San Francisco at Winterland, the album contains 29 super "oldies but goodies."

The reason Sha Na Na is a popular stage group, is that they not only play old rock and roll songs better than any other group around, but they even play rock and roll numbers better than the original artists.

All your favorite oldies are recorded by the band which includes souped-up versions of "Yakety Yak", "Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin On", "Get A Job", "Jailhouse Rock", "Rock Around the Clock", "Tears On My Pillow", "Shake, Rattle 'N 'Roll", and "Blue Moon" to name but a few.

I suspect that this will be one of the most popular party albums around town. And if you've never seen the group in concert, the action photos on the jacket will spark your imagination. And you can take it from there.

Zappa Can Still Freak'em Out

Frank Zappa and the Mothers of Invention played for their devoted fans at a recent Winterland concert.

Unfortunately, his fans only filled half the Winterland Auditorium.

One's suspicions were aroused, when, arriving 45 minutes late for the 8 p.m. showtime, the parking lot next to Winterland was almost devoid of cars.

Either Zappa and his band were going to be playing to the youngest, non-driving crowd on their tour, or there was going to be acres of open space and empty seats inside the auditorium. The latter turned out to be the case.

The opening band was Ruben and The Jets. This band is an offshoot band of the Mothers and plays 50's rock 'n roll. (Arriving late, all that can be said is that they play loud and the audience applauded their approval.)

An English band, Foghat blasted out a set of hard driving rock 'n roll.

Playing with a strong bass guitar, Foghat's is good dance music. (Sorry, but any more details were lost as this reporter and friend danced through the set.)

It seems that not many people know how to dance anymore. Only about 20 persons at the back of the auditorium were dancing during Foghat's hour-long set.

Probably a good kick in the ass, let alone a good rock 'n roll band, couldn't get the audience moving. Most seem content to stand zombie-like in front of the speakers or shiver and shake in place.

And now, Frank and the Mothers:

If you remember a bizarre-looking Frank Zappa and his equally bizarre-looking band from their past concerts or albums, they're all changed now.

Frank is now well trimmed and his band is not trying to freak out anyone with their looks anymore.

Frank now looks like the gentle soul he probably always was anyway.

After checking out each instrument, Zappa was ready to conduct (without baton) and play.

Trying to describe Zappa's music for this reporter is a little difficult for one not an ardent fan; perhaps "progressive-jazz-rock" comes close to a proper label.

Rhythm is just about non-existent. Instruments weave in and out of each song, seeming to each play their own melody and beat.

The songs might be thought of as "free-form," each member of the band breaking in and putting down his own rhythm. But Zappa's songs are not really free-form, but in fact incredibly intricate. Each is written just as you hear it.

It was once reported that Zappa and his band spent close to nine months readying just one song for their concert appearances.

The majority of the audience really got into what Frank and the Mothers were playing. Every so often there were plaintive shouts for rock 'n roll but this was a night for the fans of Zappa's esoteric music only.

There is also something new at Winterland: a videotape machine.

Now on the screen above the back of the stage, projected in 20 foot black and white, is the action taking place on stage.

Two cameras at the sides of the stage now bring your favorite musicians to the giant silver screen.

If it's possible to sharpen up the picture a bit, this new idea will go over bigger than it was received this night. Let's hope Graham keeps it.

And since it is a tape machine, intermissions now feature previous acts that were filmed. This night a previously taped Ravi Shankar concert was shown.

For those who want strictly hard-drivin' rock 'n roll, save your nickels and dimes, buy some ear plugs, shine your shoes and be prepared to have your skulls blasted when Humble Pie and Slade come to Winterland in May.

SAM RUSSELL—"Perhaps the teenagers...will become his followers, because that's where he's comin' from."

Records:

Sam Russell-Successful Writer Turns Singer

Sam Russell's background in music is impressive. At age eight he started singing in a Tennessee church and in between he was following stars like Little Richard and Frankie Lyman back to their dressing rooms and hotels.

Sam had been with many groups but none of them ever really got to the top. It wasn't until he met Dr. John, for whom he was a background vocalist, that his career took a turn for the better. It was Sam who penned "Zu Zu Mama" for the Dr. John Night Tripper album.

Sam and Irv Hunt, his partner from way back, heard a rough dub of "Put a Little Love In Your Heart" and were given the chance to arrange and produce the song for Jackie DeShannon. The production was a success and as a result Sam and Irv got more production work and along the way continued writing for Jackie also.

But just writing and backgrounding for other artists wasn't enough for Sam, so he joined up with the new Playboy Records as a recording artist in his own right.

Any way it goes Sam won't have to worry about work for he'll surely hit all the Playboy Clubs on the circuit.

But frankly, Sam isn't really ready for the big time yet. Nobody's lyrics are that clear, but Sam's low voice make his impossible.

Perhaps the teenagers, the same ones who are still in love with Al Green and dig War's all-day music will become his followers because that's where he's coming from.

He may sell a few records because his stuff is commercial-sounding, in the tradition of Marvin Gaye, Curtis Mayfield, etc. But one of these is enough. There's no need for two.

Sam, you're a good songwriter: stick to it!

Records:

Macondo - Latin Rock And "Feel-Good" Music

It is not intended that Macondo, the group, or the record of the same name, be categorized as relating to an ethnic sound because it will limit what kind of following these musicians will have.

Though five of the seven member group have Latin names and the Latin influence is apparent on some of their tracks, it does not dominate or appear in every track on the record.

Do It To Me and Can't Make Love Alone are the most distinctively Latin sounding numbers written by the group. There is one other track called Cayuco written by great Latin musician Tito Puente that rounds out the ethnic presentation by Macondo.

Then they also get into straight rock, space-out and feel-good music.

Sometimes they give the same impression as Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young or Procol Harum (on Why and Wishes.)

Although they sometimes do sound like other people they're not trying to do imitations. It's just where their music went to. They wrote all but two of the ten tracks on this first album.

Macondo is a better-than-average first album. Side one is tireless: no bad cuts at all. Side two isn't consistently as good but it too is better than average.

It took five or six listenings to do an honest review but the conclusion after two weeks of spread-out listening: Macondo has made a good debut album, perhaps as good as any they will make, if they happen to follow the pattern of so many other groups.

'Scoop Day' at CCSF a Success

Good food and good music were the prime offerings of Scoop Day held last week at the lower level of the Student Union Building. It was sponsored by the Student Health Service and the purpose was to acquaint students with the different organizations on campus.

The turnout was good and the heavy sounds of the band, Mega, soon had people up and dancing. The Latin food sold by the La Raza organization was a definite hit with those present.

"This was an opportunity for all organizations on campus to be recognized by students of City College," said Edwin Lugo, La Raza chairman. "It was pretty successful."

Even if not all the campus organizations were present those students that were there had a good time. —Doug Pon

Second-Billed Beefheart Strictly Not Second Rate

Captain Beefheart and the Magic Band came to San Francisco's own Psychedelic Dungeon, Winterland, the 23-24 of last month.

The Captain, also known as Don Van Vliet, was added to the bill just a week before the show, playing second to the pop-mystic super group, the Mahavishnu Orchestra.

(Mahavishnu will be dealt with at greater length in a future review).

The Captain is on a national tour following the release of his new album, Clear Spot last December. He has chosen a guitar band format for his current music and its a tight combination indeed.

The band is essentially the same group from 1969, with the addition of Orejon (Roy-Estrada) on bass and a "mystery guest" who wasn't identified but probably was Alex St. Claire, one of the original Magic Band guitarists from 1964. Zoot Horn Rollo played his searing glass finger guitar and his sound sometimes dominated the other instruments (with the exception of Don's voice.)

Rockette Morton switched off bass and rhythm guitars and supplied most of the background theatrics.

Ed Marima's percussion was light and precise. He made his own contribution to the limited theatrics of the show when he almost relieved his bladder on the audience. "He does that every time he hears 'right on,' " Beefheart informed the titillated crowd.

But the theatrics had only a small part to play. The music, the same both nights, was carefully selected to give a historical perspe tive to Captain Beefheart's music.

Starting with a blues jam initiated by Zoot Horn Rollo the band went into "Mirror Man," a song from their beginnings in 1964. They went on to play songs from all of their albums including the "hits" from Clear Spot.

The compositions from Trout Mask Replica were a special treat. Both songs, "Steal Softly Through Snow" and "Sugar and Spikes," were done as instrumentals although they appear with vocals on the album.

Don Van Vliet's voice was incredible as expected and his harp playing was powerful. The show was relaxed between numbers and Beefheart didn't have much to say to the audience except occasionally in answer to a few isolated hecklers.

Undoubtedly, Captain Beefheart is reaching a new and much wider audience with Clear Spot and the current tour.

Ali's Broken Jaw Poses Questions

History books may now record two versions of "the shot heard 'round the world." One, obviously, would be referring to the start of the American Revolution, and the other may be the punch that broke Muhammad Ali's jaw.

In round one of that March 31 fight, Ken Norton not only shattered Ali's jaw, he also shattered the possibility of a $6 million Ali-Frazier rematch.

Twenty-eight year old Norton, formerly a sparring partner for Joe Frazier, went on to win a split decision over the helpless Ali.

After going 11 rounds with the painful jaw, Ali said before surgery, "I couldn't fight. I couldn't move my head because of the pain. He (Norton) won the fight. I'm just sorry I couldn't fight."

Ali's trainer followed up that statement by saying, he proved what I've known all along, he has all kinds of guts? How can anyone question his courage!" Trainer Angelo Dundee continued optimistically, "After all, Muhammad wasn't knocked out, and it was a close fight."

Dr. Gary Manchester, who wired Ali's jaw, said, "I personally don't understand how he could have gone 11 rounds with that much pain."

On the other side of the ring, however, Norton and his trainer Eddie Futch combined to rap the 31-year old champ. Futch said, "I definitely feel Ali has gone back, but I've been saying that all along." Norton added, "He (Ali) was very fast with his hands, but afoot he wasn't. He didn't have a punch at all."

Is Muhammad Ali washed up? Ken Norton answered, "He's not washed up, I just beat the man. When a reporter put the same question to Dundee, he replied, "I think you're a jerk!"

Is this the end of the rainbow for Muhammad Ali? Don't bet on it. He has too much pride to quit on a sour note. Sources close to the ex-champ say he is to begin training again in about two months, and should be ready to fight not before three or four months later. If this is true, knowing Ali, his first bout would probably be a rematch with Ken Norton.

their counselors and, "who subsequently might dropout."

Chairman of the English department, James E. Cagnacci, stated in a recent interview that the "philosophy" of the English Reading department is that students recognize they have a reading problem and "be willing to volunteer for the various reading courses available."

Cagnacci said that 60% of CCSF students are reading below grade level "and," he added, "50% of those are severe reading problems."

Can something be done to redirect poor readers to the reading courses? "Our testing department picks up about 85% of the poor readers through the Co-Op (Placement) tests, and of the remainder, 3—5% of the poor readers are the responsibility of the Counseling department to direct to the reading courses," Cagnacci said.

"Part of the problem with dropout students is that students haven't really been made aware of the reading courses available." He explained, "We can't get our hands on the poor readers. Part of the problem," he continued, "is a lack of publicity to the counselors about the reading program, and also involved is the quality of the feedback that we get from the Testing department.

Ecology:

World's Tallest Trees In Danger from Erosion

Soil erosion caused by nearby logging operations is threatening the life of the world's tallest tree.

Dr. Edgar Wayburn, a Sierra Club member, who is behind the campaign to protect the unnamed 367 foot giant and the other large trees in Humboldt County's Redwood National Park, urged the Interior Department to acquire more land around the preserve.

He and Michael McCloskey, executive director of the Sierra Club, told a news conference that the Interior Department had finally released scientific studies of the park's fringe areas.

"These scientific reports substantiate what we have been saying for the last five years," zwayburn said. "The park is in deep trouble because of erosion and logging around it," he stated further.

In creating the 58,000-acre park in 1968, Congress drew a narrow, worm-like corridor along Redwood Creek near Orrick, a Humboldt lumber town, to protect the tall trees which stand on flat land.

Now, however, erosion caused by a lack of vegetation and rainfall, is choking Redwood Creek and causing it to rise over its banks.

There is a serious threat that the clogged creek could cut a new channel across the flat area of the park, thus loosening the soil and causing the giant trees to topple.

Galvan Replies

Though he admits not having seen the bulk of constitutional by-laws student government is obliged to work under (apparently no one has been able to find them all), Juan emphasizes a degree of effectiveness achieved through certain necessary political relations.

"The Student Council is doing everything it can to establish communication with the Governing Board, administration and faculty, which I believe is very essential in trying to get anything done. In the past," claims Galvan, "this was never done."

Assessing an encounter with the Governing Board not long ago, the chief student officer remarks, "We were well received and given a lot of respect; all the council members showed up."

Finally, Galvan denies that the council is committed to draining the athletic department of all appropriations, as some have alleged. "We're trying to find new sources for financing the athletic budget. We have not made a vow to cut them off from any funds."

Black Woman Wins Top Prize in South SF Beauth Contest

"I wasn't satisfied with second runner-up," says Tina McKnight. "I wanted the top."

And she got it! Tina Celeste McKnight, a CCSF student, is the first Black woman ever to be elected Miss South San Francisco.

In June, Ms. McKnight will enter the Miss California contest. If she wins that, she will go on to the Miss America pageant.

Ms. McKnight is a tiny, lovely young woman with a very level head. She wants to be a fashion designer, and plans to use the scholarship money from this contest, and any others she may win, to go to USC and eventually to a school of design.

"The scholarship money was what motivated me to enter," declares Ms. McKnight. "Miss America can win $10,000 in scholarships." Also, she revealed, "I'd like to be famous with my designs someday, and beauty contests are a good way to start."

Ms. McKnight entered the contest last year at which she placed as second runner-up. She blames racism on the part of the judges, who weren't professionals, for the fact that she didn't win. She says, "I was bitter. I've lived in South San Francisco since sixth grade. I didn't think they'd judge me on my color."

MISS SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO – Tina McKnight.

"This year," she continued, "the judges were professionals from the Miss California pageant. I think that had a lot to do with my winning."

Ms. McKnight had a lot of support in her decision to enter the pageant. "I had Black friends who had entered and lost," she explained. "And they all wanted to see if I could do better."

She then added, "The emcee of the pageant, who also presided last year, said that if I didn't win this year, he'd never emcee another pageant."

Tina McKnight still wants the top. Looks like she might get it.

Student Council Supports Strike Against SHELL Working Conditions

A resolution requesting CCSF Student Council endorsement of the strike against Shell Oil Company was passed at the April 25 Student Council meeting.

The resolution, in support of the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union, to obtain environmentally safe working conditions, was submitted by CCSF Sierra Club student representative George Caldwell, proposed by Bill Lang and seconded by Lee Leonard.

Caldwell told the Student Council meeting that Linda Morse, coordinator for the Medical Committee For Human Rights spoke at the regular Tuesday 11-12 meeting of the CCSF Sierra Club. "She outlined the case against Shell as being the seventh largest oil company, and the only one not to have agreed to demands (concerning working conditions and safety) by the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union."

Caldwell said that the CCSF Sierra Club group supports the workers, "who should have a say about their working conditions;" he continued, "The workers are righteously on strike to get better working conditions, their duty is not to leave working conditions up to 'big brother' Shell.

Ms. Morse and Caldwell announced that literature and bumper-stickers are available through CCSF's Sierra Club group. "Active student participation in the strike against Shell is requested," they said.

Guardsman Editor Wins Third Place JACC Writing Honors

Marguerite Zipse, Managing Editor of The Guardsman, won journalism honors for CCSF with the third place award in the State for on-the-spot news coverage. Marguerite competed with 60 writers at the recent State Journalism Association of Community Colleges convention.

The prize winning news story was an interview with Bill Farr, Los Angeles Times reporter, who was jailed for not revealing his news sources when covering the bizarre Manson trial.

Six City College Guardsman staff members, Marguerite, Denise Forese, Seymour Kebede, Andy Maker, Paul Snodgrass, Alan Whiteside, and adviser, Dorry Coppoletta, flew from San Francisco to Los Angeles via PSA on Friday morning, April 13.

Guardsman staffers arrived at the Ambassador Hotel in ample time to take in the JACC orientation ceremonies conducted by Leo Garapedian, Convention Chairman, and Roger Graham, Faculty President. Welcome addresses were given by Dr. Leslie Koltai, Los Angeles Community College Chancellor, and Mayor Samuel Yorty.

The first afternoon on-the-spot contests were newswriting and editorial writing, as well as on-the-spot sports writing.

ODD COUPLE – Mayor Sam Yorty and "ex-convict" Bill Farr addressed the annual college press convention in LA, April 13.

Bill Farr was the keynote speaker for the newswriting and editorial writing, while Sam Gilbert, adviser to such UCLA athletes as Bill Walton, Lucius Allen, Kareen Abdual Jabbar, was the featured speaker for sports writing.

After the contests, dinner followed in the Sunset Room of the Ambassador. Walter Karabian, Southern California Assemblyman, was the guest speaker and presented trophies to the mail-in contest winners.

An on-the-spot news feature interview with Walter Karabian followed the presentations.

WINNER – The Guardsman's Marguerite Zipse came back from LA with Third Place in on-the-spot newswriting.

Student and faculty meetings were held during the course of the evening and on the following morning.

Various workshops were held on Saturday morning as follows: news photography; newspaper reporting with Charles Donaldson, L.A. Times reporter; public relations with Craig Altschul, National Director of Public Relations of the YMCA; mass media news with NBC TV Anchorman, Jess Marlow and NBC newswriter, Rick Marks.

There were also workshops for the following: magazine photography; print media advertising; wire services with Paul Finch, L.A. AP Bureau Chief, and UPI overnight manager, Terence McGarry; magazine with John L. Dotson, L.A. Bureau Chief for Newsweek, and Wayne Wargo, L.A. Times Calendar Magazine editor.

Sports publicity workshops featured Frederick Claire, publicity director for L.A. Dodgers.

An elegant banquet on Saturday evening in the Embassy Room of the Ambassador topped off the Convention with the presentation of on-the-spot reporting awards. Marguerite won her prize before 600 journalism students and their advisers representing over 60 colleges in the State.

Newly elected Faculty President, Steve Ames of Merced College, and newly elected Student President, Sue Mooney of Chabot College, were introduced to the assembly before the end of the ceremonies.

Airport School:

CCSF "Air Force" Acquires Jet Fighter

The CCSF aircraft technology school, located at the San Francisco International Airport, has a new addition to it's fleet of aircraft, a jet trainer fighter.

The new jet is a two-man trainer fighter with a top speed of 480 mph and a maximum cruising range of three and a half hours. It has a full guidance system with a centrifugal flow jet engine. It was flown down from Edwards Air Force Base four weeks ago.

Presently the school has two helicopters, a twin engine Cessna 310, and a trainer plane.

The aircraft aren't flown because the school has no flight insurance to protect students in case of accidents. Students learn to taxi the aircraft on an adjacent loading area.

The jet was given to the school to let students become familiar with this style plane. Students will learn how to run the engine, taxi the plane, recondition and overhaul the jet.

The school is licensed by the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) and OUTSTANDING STUDENT–Honored as a winner and receiving a cash award as a finalist in Bank of America's Community College Awards program is CCSF student Glenn Evans, a $250 winner in the science and engineering field. Presenting the award at a banquet at the Hilton Hotel Wednesday evening (April 18) is Joseph A. Carrera, senior vice president in the Bank's San Francisco headquarters.

"Handler Hearing":

Testimony Reveals the Reasons for Controversial Firing of Teacher

On Monday April 23, the Jo Ann Handler Hearing began at 33 Gough St.

First to testify was Eugene Mead, head of the Sociology and Psychology Departments.

Mead was asked about the Teacher Evaluation Procedure and went on to explain the case against Ms. Handler.

The Psychology Department decided not to rehire Handler on the basis that she has "emotional problems" and allegedly calls "racist" teachers and students who disagree with her.

"Six students pointed out individual personal attacks in front of the class," Mead stated.

"Also, upon several occasions, she has been tardy to her classes . . . by more than a few minutes," he continued.

P. J. Doyle, Hearing Officer, asked Mead for a direct-observation testimony, pointing out that these were complaints by other individuals.

"Miss Handler has never been able to attend department meetings, although notified of these meetings in advance," replied Mead.

When asked why Ms. Handler was hired, Mead explained, "I was impressed by her youth. I was impressed that such a young woman could reach her position at such a young age."

After going over the teacher evaluation more carefully, Mead pointed out particular examples.

"The Teacher Evaluation must be signed by the teacher being evaluated before it can be turned in. Ms. Handler refused to sign it because she disagreed with it," he explained.

The fist evaluation was not available but in the second evaluation, Mead wrote, "Miss Handler seems sensitive to criticism." In a third evaluation, his opinion changed because of her constant tardiness and her attitude had not improved.

Next to take the stand was Psychology instructor and Teacher Evaluation Board member, Donald Griffin.

Griffin began by stating that he has participated in two previous evaluations of Ms. Handler.

The hearing was interrupted when a contributor to the Free Critic, William Hankin, began shooting photos and using a tape-recorder.

After Griffin protested being intimidated by cameras and tape recorders, and after Doyle threatened to dismiss Hankin along with the Guardsman reporter from the hearing, the camera stopped clicking and the recorder was put on the table with Attorney Childs's papers and the hearing resumed.

Griffin continued, "I felt that she (Handler) was running a Psych 23 (Psychology of Minorities) class as a Black/White confrontation group . . . I didn't feel that this was positive race relations."

In his evaluations, Griffin was highly critical of Ms. Handler. His criticism was centered around tardiness and unstable relationships with students and other faculty members.

Griffin also claimed that upon a particular occasion, Ms. Handler called a student a bitch. "I expressed that such behavic. was unwarranted," he stated.

During cross-examination, Childs asked Griffin about the expression of homosexual fantasies in classes. "Is homosexuality relevant to Psych 23?"

"I feel that homosexuality is relevant to us all," replied Griffin, "and such fantasies, as well as heterosexual fantasies, as well as feelings of racism, should be encouraged in some psych classes. Not all . . . have the right element of trust."

Later, City College students stated their side to the Hearing Officer.

Letters to the Editor

(Editor's Note: Letters must be typed, double spaced, with wide margins to facilitate typesetting instructions. Due to space limitations, subsequent to this date no letters longer than 250 words, or one page, can be accepted.)

Mr. Editor:

The letter you had in your last issue about the Middle East was nothing but bull.

Mr. Letter writer I don't know where you get your information from, but we the Arabs don't kill or harm Jews, we live with them like our own brothers. We have lived with them for many centuries until the state of Israel was created. But the Zionist and the Imperialist who stole our land we will fight them until the last drop of blood is gone from our body.

You (letter writer) said that there are about a million arab refugees within Israel's border. Tell me where did they all come from? They didn't voluntarily move out of their homes, but they were kicked out of their homes by the Blood thirsty Zionist. Do you know that every day the Palestinians are being kicked out of their homes, and the European and Soviet jews are taking over their homes?

The Palestinian Guerrillas are fighting for freedom and liberation of their homeland. Now about the Munich tragedy, did you know that the Palestinian Guerrillas held the Israeli athletes for more than 24 hours without harming them, but as soon as they tried to leave the country the German police tried to ambush them, and the order to ambush came from Moshe Dayan who was there watching it all happen. He lets his own people die instead of freeing some Palestinian prisoners held in Israel. All the Guerrillas were trying to do is free their people from the Zionist aggressors. The Palestinians are fighting for a national liberation to create their identity on their land. You said that the Soviet Union gives arms to arab countries for free, but you don't know that the Soviet Union supports the Palestinians in words, when it comes to military aid it backs out.

Well Mr. Letter writer do you know that the only goal the palestinians are interested in is to have a progressive democratic state in Palestine in which Christians, Moslems and Jews can live and grow and fight together against Zionism and Imperialism, without this goal there will never be peace in the Middle East. Sincerely, Abu Hanna

Editor, The Guardsman:

On March 5, 1973, Sen. Case (R-N.J.) and Sen. Proxmire (D-Wis.) made the following announcement concerning the report from the Nixon administration on "the bill for foreign aid" incurred by U.S. taxpayers for 1972.

The U.S. government "paid out" $11,343,900,000 in grants and loans for military and economic aid to foreign governments in the U.S. fiscal year that ended June 30, 1972, and also provided almost $5 billion in insurance and guarantees. Of these totals

($16,343,900,000) Israel received 1/5 of 1%. Israel received $171 million in loans. The senators said that the grants and loans in fiscal '72 totaled $5,274,800,000 in military aid and $6,069,100,000 for economic aid. In addition, various agencies of the government guaranteed and insured $4,910,200,000 worth of loans and investments to foreign countries, and turned over military facilities to foreign governments worth $631,200,000. Most of the grants and loans went to South Vietnam, Thailand, and Laos. Military aid to Jordan totaled $104 million; Iran $118 million; Lebanon $10.2 million; and Turkey $152 million dollars.

In 1973 Israel was promised $300 million in military purchasing credits which must be paid back within a certain time period and 215 million in economic aid.

These are the facts, they are a matter of record.

Israel requests and receives an infinitesimal drop from the mind-bending sums the U.S. gives to the rest of the world. Denying Israel's request for aid would not solve America's internal problems. Stopping all foreign aid would keep America out of the power game. No one gives up power, no matter how high the price.

If people have hate for Israel let them speak of it directly. Don't fool us into believing that your concern is with America's internal problems. We recognize such anti-Israeli and anti-Jewish statements for what they are. Such as been our education, such as been our experience. —Nick V. Scavone

QUESTION: "What do you feel should be the penalty for violent rape?"

William Korosec—Journalism

The punishment should be equal and not vary from state to state. Offenders should be separated from society for therapy, except in cases of murder when, subject to the desire of the victims survivors, the murderer should be put to death.

Bayard Fong—Biological Science

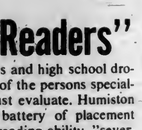
Marriage. If certain things occur in the aftermath of the rape then the penalty should be marriage. After all, fixed marriages work in China.

Carolyn Peterson—Physical Education

The penalty depends on the condition of the rapist. If he is violent, then he should be put into an institution to get him out of the way.

Jabbar Ho—Gymnastics

It's a crime. The rapist should go to prison. He knows the penalty beforehand. It's not right, it's inhumane. He knows the consequences. He shouldn't be given a life sentence though, say only 20 years.



Doris Custodia—Radiological Tech.

The penalty should be to kill them. Punish them in the worst way possible. Much of it depends on what the existing penalty is.

Katherine D'Angelo—Early Childhood Education

I am more concerned about the reasons a man commits rape than the penalty. It would seem more effective in the long run to study the motives for rape. I don't believe in the death sentence or any drastic penalties. Hopefully we can develop effective criminal rehabilitation.

Special Report:

CCSF's "Substandard Readers"

Nationwide, "ninety percent of the 700,000 students who annually drop out of school are classified as poor readers," according to a recent survey mentioned in one of our local newspapers.

These persons are actually handicapped, because in terms of job performance, the ability to read often makes a critical difference.

At CCSF the reading program is probably somewhat better than the national average because at CCSF separate credit reading courses are offered to poor readers, whereas some other junior colleges integrate their reading program as part of instruction in subjects which reading skills apply.

It must be concluded that the criteria for evaluating any remedial reading program should be nothing less than academic success.

Fred Humiston, Associate Dean of Guidance Services, said of CCSF's Testing department, "We get people with a tremendous range of abilities and backgrounds." He cited foreign students and high school dropouts as some of the persons specialized testing must evaluate. Humiston said that the battery of placement tests evaluate reading ability, "several levels in order to meet the specialized needs of students in different courses."

"Many students feel threatened by any kind of test," he continued, "but what they fail to realize is that we must be able to evaluate their range of abilities so that they can go at their own pace and not get in over their heads academically. The whole purpose of our placement testing," he concluded, "is to enhance the student's chances in college."

CCSF is an "open door" college and accepts applications for admission from high school graduates at all levels including students with lower than average academic abilities, non-high school grads who are eighteen years and older, and high school grads who flunked four-year colleges. Identification of poor readers in these groups is by testing, grades and tests from high school, and interviews with

Class of '44 Not Worth Reunion

If you are the type of person that prefers nostalgia rather than good plot and good acting, then Class of '44, currently showing at the Alexandria, is the movie for you.

Class of '44, the sequel to Summer of '42, begins with the high school graduation of Hermie, Oscy, and Benjie.

Hermie and Oscy, played by Gary Grimes and Jerry Houser, go on to college, while Benjie, played by Oliver Conant, enlists in the Marines.

Behond that, the picture becomes a bit boring and the reviewer reverted to watching scenery to avoid dozing off.

Once in college, Grimes meets Deborah Winters and her role in the picture is an interesting one.

The highlight of the picture is the tragedy of Hermie's father's death. At this point of the film, the acting does become good and heartrending.

The most touching scene is when Hermie says to Oscy, "You know, I can't remember what he looked like. What kind of son am I to have to look at pictures to remember his face?" At this point, he breaks into tears while Oscy comforts him.

The ending is also a tearjerker. After a brief break-up, Deborah Winters returns. The scene is the train depot with Grimes returning after the funeral. They embrace and it looks like a marriage will ensue in the sequel of this picture.

Again, the central figure in both pictures is Hermie and he is the most promising of the three male characters.

Live Rock:

Beach Boys Still Drawing Raves For Surfin' Songs; Not New Material

The Beach Boys are riding the crest of new popularity and a new audience.

This was evident at Winterland, when a full house of young sun-worshippers, freaks and others (including some bearded, eye-shadowed gentlemen by the stage) got off on The Beach Boys original surfin' music.

The Beach Boys have been around a long time, well over ten years. In the early 1960's, through their songs, they brought youth visions of the surfing life style, hot cars and woodys, little surfer girls and assorted women.

The Beach Boys sound (musically and especially their harmonies) has not changed much throughout the years. It is distinct and easily recognizable as the Beach Boys even with additions to the band.

The lyrics of their new album, Holland, still contain images of the California life style and closeness to the sea.

As for record sales, the Beach Boys have never equalled their early surfin' songs and their Winterland concert was mostly oldies.

Probably forgetting his surfer shirt, Bill Graham in an NHL ice hockey shirt, introduced the Beach Boys and they then proceeded to retune their instruments before opening up with "Help Me Rhonda."

They would retune and ask for louder sound throughout their set.

The older surfin' songs were by far the most popular of the evening. New material from the Holland album and songs from their past few albums was well received, but the wants of the audience were shown when Dennis Wilson asked, "Do you want to hear an old one?" The "Yea" of approval was overwhelming.

And when the band went into "Surfin' USA" even people in the balcony stood up to move with the music.

It was interesting (and strange) to find that the crowd was mainly made up of young people who were probably too young to swim when the Beach Boys first recorded. Yet they really related to the old surfing songs.

The Beach Boys must realize this and they encored with "I Get Around," and "Fun, Fun, Fun."

One wonders if it must not be frustrating for the Beach Boys to have to continually play their oldies at concerts never getting recognition for their new material.

Premier Musicians On Nat's Latest Record

The Nat Adderly Sextet
"Soul Of The Bible"
Capitol SABB 11120

This albums contains a wide spectrum and variety of black music from poly-rhythmic African beats textured against the best in contemporary "free" Jazz, to the old time spirituals.

The album was produced by Nat Adderley's "big" brother, Cannonball. Although his name is not listed on the credits on the album, the alto soloist could be none other than the redoubtable Cannonball Adderley.

The rest of the group consists of Walter Booker on bass; Roy McCurdy - drums; George Duke - piano, electric piano; Nat Adderley - cornet. Brazilian percussionist Airto Moreira as well as Francisco Centeno on bass and Nat's son, Nat, Jr. on acoustic and electric piano, make appearances on the album, although the liner notes do not indicate where the personnel change is made.

The coming thing these days, is in the production of double-album sets. This is good when one has at his disposal some extremely fine and interesting music.

The attempt to describe the Soul Of The Bible comes through in narratives by Rick Holmes. (Holmes worked with Cannonball on his Soul Zodiac album; gee, I wonder what the next "Soul Of Whatever" is going to be.) There are other vocal effects by Fleming Williams, Arthur Charma and Stephanie Spruill.

The content of the album gives cause for reflection on one's self, God(?), and others around us. Some of the narrative sounds remarkably akin to Gibran's The Prophet. The concept of fusing contemporary jazz with poetry of the same ilk, is at times very effective; at other times the mix on the album sometimes muddles the narration so that one cannot continually understand all of what's being said.

Soul Of The Bible is something new that could definitely stand some listening to for entertainment and/or edification.

First "Male-Actress":

He Could Be Bette Davis' Sister

Those who wandered over to the gay side of the entertainment world were in for a treat if they caught the Charles Pierce Show at Gold Street.

Pierce considers himself the first and only "male actress" which is more than "just a female impersonator."

The show opened with Charles doing a bit with "the living dolls," which are the bodies of dolls connected to Pierce's head. The bits included were Connie Stevens, Liza Minnelli, and Tom Jones, who finaled with a striptease.

Next Pierce came out into the audience engowned as Marlene Dietrich. The sequin gowl was beautiful, but Charles pulled a surprise: instead of going on stage, he went into the men's restroom.

After a couple of seconds, he returned with a startled, embarrassed look upon her face.

After getting on stage, and after the audience simmered down, Charles, still with the bewildered look asked, "What was Mrs. Alioto doing in there, . . . Mrs. Alioto???"

Thus began fifteen minutes of Dietrich conglomerated with Carol Doda, Carol Channing, Marilyn Monroe, et al the blonde movie queens.

Next, he appeared as Jeanette MacDonald singing, "San Francisco." In this role, he was truly beautiful and many in the audience felt it was the highlight of the show. Next came Mae West, truly the funniest of Pierce's queens.

Finally, Bette Davis came on stage and this is truly Charles's most convincing role. He could pass as her sister. Aoong with this role came a monologue involving Davis, Tallulah Bankhead, and Joan Crawford. This was truly amazing because he was able to mimic their voices to a tee.

The finale was Davis singing "Just Like a Man."

Pierce is a good comedienne and he knows how to turn a phrase and get the audience roaring. The majority of the jokes were "pro-gay" but in good taste and the straight members of the audience enjoyed the show equally as much.

Baseball

RamsUpsetSanMateo,3-1

The Rams pulled off one of the most stunning and gratifying upsets in years, 3 to 1.

The "city stickers" were up for this game, playing a team whom CCSF hasn't defeated in seven years.

In their first confrontation earlier this season, College of San Mateo destroyed CCSF 13 to 1. To top if off, they had scored 11 victories without a defeat. Incredible? Yes. Invincible? No!

If spirit and enthusiasm could score runs, the CCSF baseball team would have sent CSM completely into oblivion.

The man of the hour was pitcher Mike Norris. He was his usual self, overpowering the CSM hitters with his fast ball, and keeping them off balance with an occasional curve ball. To show just how overpowering Mike was, he struck out 15 hitters in nine innings.

When asked how he felt about the game, Norris said, "In the first inning I walked the first hitter and I said to myself, 'I can't chump out against these guys because I've got something to prove to my teammates, the scouts, and myself.' I have methods of calming myself down but I felt the tension throughout all 9 innings. I had to bear down on every hitter, and it was definitely worth it."

In the third inning Tharlo Johnson ledoff and smacked a grounder to the third baseman who threw it away at first base.

Norris stepped to the plate and promptly hit a monster smash for a triple, scoring Johnson.

Joe Dutto graciously accepted a base on balls. As he took his lead from first, the pitcher dangerously tried to pick him off. The ball went by the first baseman and Norris trotted home while Dutto advanced third base. By this time the CCSF bench was going crazy.

The pressure was too much for the CSM pitcher. He promptly threw the next pitch into the dirt, the ball getting by the catcher, allowing Joe to score from third.

When coach Ernie Domecus was asked how it felt to finally beat CSM after all these years, he replied, "great, one of my most gratifying wins, and it was nice to have them make the mistakes for once."

Important note that deserves mentioning: Don Lyons extended his hitting streak to twelve games with a single and raised his average to .390.

Incredible, yes, but no one is invincible.

Summer School:

Registration Procedures Change

The Summer 1973 Session at City College has undergone several important changes. More than three hundred day classes will be offered and some fifty-two courses in the evening. Students may enroll for either day or evening classes, or a combination of both.

Most day classes will begin on June 25 with final examinations concluding on August 3; a few selected day classes in the sciences will follow the seven-week schedule.

Evening classes (June 18 - August 2) will meet either on Monday, Wednesday and Friday nights, June 22, July 6, and July 20, or on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday nights, June 29, July 13, and July 27. The Summer 1973 time schedules will be on sale in the Campus Bookstore.

A second change will be the need for currently enrolled students to file a card in the Registrar's Office before June 1 indicating their intention of registering for the Summer Session. These cards—four by six yellow cards requiring the student's name and ID number—will be available in the Library, in the Counseling Office and in the Registrar's Office as well as in the off-campus locations where City College courses are being offered. Registration cards will not be available to the student unless his "intention" card has been filed by the June 1 deadline.

New students who have not completed the Spring semester will file a Summer application which is available in the Registrar's Office. Current students will register according to the Priority Numbers issued by their counsellors during the week of Spring finals; new and returning students will register on June 16.

The registration process will also differ from the system used in the Fall and Spring semesters. Students will sign class lists and standby lists during the registration period, but the actual enrollment in class will occur when the instructor accepts the student's IBM name card at the first class session. The transaction card system was used last Summer with success and will be used again this year as a continuing experiment.

Ousted Instructor Criticized

First to speak was a female student. She was enrolled in Psychology 1 in the Summer Session. Paula said that Ms. Handler was an average half-hour to 45 minutes late for the full six weeks.

Next was a black student whose white wife was enrolled in Ms. Handler's class.

"I'd run into her on campus and she would recognize me first. Once she came onto me and I didn't know what she was talking about. Upon another occasion, she saw me with another black woman and said, 'I'm glad to s e you've come back to your sisters'." His wife was harrassed to the point of dropping the class."

Later Albert, an openly gay student, gave his story. "I never took a course from her. I worked for her as a teacher's aide. One day, she approached me and asked, 'Dingy (that's my nick-name), is it true you are a faggot?' "

"I replied, 'No, it is not true. I am a homosexual.' 'Faggot' is derogatory and embarrassing to me."

"When she didn't call me faggot, she called me a queer which is equally offensive," stated Albert.

Albert ended his testimony by telling the Hearing Officer that Ms. Handler pushed the issue to the point of his quitting his job.

Throughout the hearing, Ms. Handler sat calmly and would laugh at some of the testimonies or shake her head in disbelief.

The results of the hearing will be published as soon as they are made public. At this writing, the hearing is still in session.

Summer Jobs:

Placement Office has Job Leads

With warm weather returning, and summer just two months away, hundreds of students will be walking the streets looking for summer and full-time jobs. The dilemma that faces many students is where to start.

The best place to start is City College Placement Office.

From July 1, 1971, through June 30, 1972, 2,512 off campus jobs were listed in the placement office, according to Dean Willis S. Kirk. 3,927 referrals were given to students. Of these, 914 students eventually were hired.

Kirk went on to say, "We estimate that during 1972-73 fiscal year, 3000 jobs will have been listed with the placement office, and 1,100 students will have been hired."

All types of jobs are listed in the placement office. The most frequent are: office skills (especially shorthand and typing), cooks, dishwashers, bartenders, waiters and waitresses, desk clerks.

Dean Kirk also estimates 50% of the students find jobs which are relevant to their educational field.

To be placed in a job by the placement office, students are screened by job counselors George Crippen and Sarah Wong. The job counselors compare the student's abilities, experience, and availability against the employer's requirements. The prospective employers, however, make final decisions.

Another source of jobs at CCSF are on-campus Work-Study and Lab Attendant programs. Work-Study students must be financially needy and obtain a financial aid clearance through the Financial Aids Office. A student also must carry a minimum of 12 units and either be a U.S. citizen or have a permanent visa.

There are 490 students working on campus under the Work-Study program, and 375 in the Lab program. The kinds of jobs in these two programs range from picking up paper around campus to typing for teachers.

"Many opportunities are available for minorities," stated Kirk. Job referrals are given on a non-discriminatory basis. Many minority students work under the Work-Study and Lab programs both on and off campus.

"We have contracts with several organizations," Kirk continued, "to employ students under the Work-Study program. The emphasis is on minority employment."

These organizations include the Social Security Administration, Mission Model Cities, the Urban League, and Chinese for Affirmative Action.

Counselors Aware of Poor Readers professionally trained counselors.

Some instructors in the English department have termed the Counseling Department "useless" because they feel counselors are concerned with only assigning students to unit quotas, and are not informed about the reading programs, or don't care.

"Reading courses are purely an elective," he continued. "We cannot compel students to take the reading courses and the requirements for Freshman English don't have to be completed until graduation. This is a completely open-door college. Any person who has completed high school is eligible to enter. Perhaps, he continued, "that is the basic flaw in our system. But beyond that," Jacobsen concluded, "everyone is entitled to an education."

Jacobsen said that English Instructors hadn't informed him regarding their specific recommendations or disapproval of Counseling department policies.

He explained, "Of course we are always open to input from the various departments," he added "We even solicit their suggestions which we realize may be pertinent. There is always room for improvement." Jacobsen concluded. — William Korosec

UNICEF to Focus on Aif for Viet Victims

While the cease-fire in Vietnam is being implemented, the United Nations Children's Fund is making plans for greatly increased assistance to the mothers and children of Indo-China who have been the most helpless victims of the war.

As in Nigeria and Bangladesh, UNICEF will focus its attention and expertise on providing urgently needed food, medical care, shelter and education for children, with special concern for those who have been maimed and orphaned. UNICEF's assistance will be coordinated with that of other United Nations agencies.

For over 20 years, UNICEF has been aiding child care programs wherever possible throughout the long conflict in South Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos. It has also provided some assistance to the children of North Vietnam, using earmarked funds contributed by the government of Switzerland and the Netherlands.

Now, UNICEF is preparing to expand existing projects and initiate new ones. Emergency supplies are being stockpiled at strategic shipping depots, ready for speedy distribution.

Special funds are needed to enable UNICEF to execute these plans as quickly and fully as possible. Contributions designated for Indo-China may be sent to UNICEF, United Nations Children's Fund, New York, N.Y. 10017.

Demand for Qualified People in Aviation

Job Force - "The aviation industry is coming out of its slump right now."

was originally set up by the aviation industry to meet the demand for qualified technicians in the industry.

One of the instructors stated "The aviation industry is coming out of its slump right now and in a few years the demand for aircraft technicians will far exceed the present force."

How can a student enter into the program? A mechanical or electronical background is required and a desire to learn is necessary.

The program involves two years of training. It satisfies the CCSF graduation requirements for an Associate in Science degree.

Women's Groups, Grassroots To Fight Child Care Cuts

With the aid of various women's groups, a campaign to reinstate child care for San Franciscans is being sponsored by the City College-based Grassroots Club.

The efforts toward universal child care became an especially important issue since the federal financial cutbacks will close down an estimated eighty percent of San Francisco's child care centers.

This threat caused the petition group to seek out various women's groups in hope that they can draw enough support to put this issue on the ballot.

Together, these groups are drawing up plans for a new child care ballot measure which will include some of the following tentative agreements:

1. Low cost day care and quality education shall be made on a voluntary basis. This means that any child can receive child care in San Francisco who needs it.

2. The existing centers shall be the basis for immediate, long range expansion.

3. The hours of the centers shall be planned to meet the needs of the parents and the children of the community.

4. Child care services shall be free for families earning less than poverty-level incomes. The remainder of the community shall pay fees according to their ability to pay.

5. Parents and teachers shall have policy controls over the hiring of administrators and curriculum.

6. The city of San Francisco shall obtain the funds for these child care centers.

Carla Roener, a Grassroots member, added to this last proposal, "The intent of this intiative is not to increase the tax burden of the working people."

A newsletter from the Grassroots Club suggested taxing large corporations earning their profits in San Francisco.

Added to the tenative agreements, the Grassroots people hope to attach the stipulation that the communities which need the child care the most shall receive it first.

Ms. Roener added this claim to emphasize the need for the previously mentioned stipulation, "There are twelve centers in the Sunset and only a hand-full in Hunter's Point. There are twenty in the Mission district and only a few in Chinatown. So we want the child care where it's needed most."

Firms To Recruit CCSF Business Grads

An opportunity for business major students finishing their two-year program either in June '73 or January '74, the first CCSF Business Recruitment Day will take place Tuesday, May 22. Approximately 38 representatives from 28 well-established companies will personally interview over 100 students for potential jobs. Such firms include Bank of America, Joseph Magnin Co., Pacific Telephone Co., Wells Fargo Bank, as well as Civil Service.

The potential job holder may ask the representatives about the selected firms' benefits and any other important aspects synonymous to any regular job interview.

Business Recruitment Day will take place from 9-4:30 in scheduled rooms and all representatives are invited to an 8am breakfast in the Pierre Coste Dining Room. It is not too late for any eligible student to apply for this opportunity. The graduates must go to S132 if they have not signed up for Business Recruitment Day.

Lecture Series:

Supervisor Rates Politics Of City's Ecology Scene

At a recent lecture in the College Theater, Supervisor Bob Mendelsohn claimed that San Franciscans' attitude towards ecology is now being reflected at local and state government levels.

Mendelsohn noted that the San Francisco Bay Conservation and Development Commission was "the first legislation of its kind", and that BCDC was "the lever that shifted the whole ecology movement into action."

An ecologicaly inactive government actually started this new trend, "by failing to meet its democratic contract with its voters," Mendelsohn stated.

Supervisor Robert Mendelsohn

To qualify his previous claim Mendelsohn used a textbook definition which states that a theoretic agreement exists between voters and elected officials thus making him the primary vehicle of the voters' wishes.

"When this failure to interact with the voter occurs, 'voter vigilantism', which can be good or bad, takes the place of inactive government," Mendelsohn said. Voters are forced to use petitions for the purpose of getting their wishes put into law rather than just writing to their elected officials.

"In the last five years there has been a change in philosophy in the Bay Area. People no longer want high rises, larger freeways, or more development," claimed Mendelsohn.

To support this claim Mendelsohn cited six local elections where incumbents were replaced by ecology minded candidates, and how a group of 'vigilante voters' petitioned for the Coastline Initiative (modeled after the BCDC) and got it passed in a state-wide election, even after the bill was killed in committee at Sacramento.

"It's time that government stops dragging its feet and starts dealing with the causes of this social frustration", Mendelsohn observed.

"Now it's evident that if the incumbents don't respond they will suffer a fate worse than death: they won't be re-elected," he concluded. —Tom Fantulin

Campus Day Care Plans Expansion

Sand, redwood, some metal and plywood are all that is needed to make 120 kids a little happier at the CCSF Child Care Center (CCC).

The Center personnel, in conjunction with CCSF architecture students, have designed a new playground for the current center. All they need is $1,000, some inexpensive materials and free labor.

"Right now, all we have is an asphalt jungle out in front of our building," said one of the aids at the Center.

"The parents are raising about $250 in bake sales, bazaars and rummages next week. We hope to get the other $750 from Student Funds, City College or any other way we can," said Suzie Davis, director of the center.

"The new playground will not increase the capacity of the center (which now holds about 30 children each hour). It will merely provide the kids with a more interesting stay at the Day Care Center," states Davis.

The $1,000 will go towards the hiring of a special playground architect. The architect will be responsible for the labor, tools, supervision and transportation of all free and purchased materials to the Center.

"The architect will probably clear about $300," the aid said," all we are paying for is his supervision on the project."

The $250 to be raised by the parents will be through child art, bake sales and a rummage sale.

"We hope to get the money by May 18 so we can start the project that weekend. We hope to finish by the following weekend with the main work," mentioned another aid.

"We are looking for people who are experienced carpenters and would like to help us build the playground," stated Davis.

All those interested in helping may call Extension 463 (B7).

Recycling Truck May Be Recycled

The truck that the Coca Cola Bottling company donated two years ago, "to CCSF with love," for the recycling program, is parked and unused; a monument to the apathy of CCSF's student body towards the recycling program.

MONUMENT TO APATHY? – City's recycling program, symbolized by the green recycling truck, has collapsed due to lack of interest

In the March 29 issue of Guardsman, Pete Brannigan, Horticulture major who had in the past assumed most of the responsibilities of the recycling program, called for student volunteers to assume those duties because he (Brannigan) is graduating this semester.

Brannigan's plea, for student volunteers for the recycling program which was faltering, "for lack of student involvement," went unanswered.

The bright green and white ecology recycling truck which Brannigan says "is for sale," is parked by the experimental college.

Brannigan may still be contacted at the Horticulture Department by persons interested in ecology-related projects.

Israeli-Arab Peace Still Possible

Israel is 25 years old this month. In those 25 years, Israel has a success story that is unrivaled in modern history. The economy has grown by tenfold; the population has increased from just under a million to over 3 million people.

The Arab countries progressed fantastically also; though their advancement has been slowed by the need to support a military machine against Israel.

However, despite the glowing achievements of both the Israelis and the Arabs, all of their resources have gone into three major wars in less than 25 years. Besides the senseless loss of lives and property, these two factions pose a threat to the survival of at least one side, if not both.

The technical know-how of the Israelis is almost legendary while the Arabs' resources are inexhaustible. If, instead of war, both sides concentrated on mutual survival problems, they would become truly a force for positive change.

Instead of destroying cities they could build a garden in their desert. Instead of common hatred, the Arabs and Israelis could develop a mutual economy that would be among the strongest in the world.

It has been said that people learn from examples of other people's actions. Therefore, the best place to start improving Jew-Arab relations is right here at City College.

Both factions on campus are strong and influential as well as a little bull-headed. Instead of constant accusations and counter-accusations, the two groups could meet regularly and discuss their views and policies. If the two groups did join hands, they would form one of the most powerful groups on campus.

It's true, this is just one campus and may appear almost insignificant in comparison to Middle East problems. However, if this group reaches a meaningful working relationship maybe other Arabs and Jews could start to listen to each other. Pretty soon word might get back that Arabs and Jews are working together here in America.

This whole process could change the standing in the Middle East. If just one group of Arabs could peacefully live with just one group of Jews, maybe somebody else will get the idea. It could happen and could start with this campus.

Letters to the Editor

Mourning Becomes ECLECTIC

Editor, The Guardsman,

The last letter in your last issue is full of the lies which the Arabs use as an excuse for their attempted policy of genocide against the Jews. During World War II the Arabs were Hitler's fervid supporters. While the Jews of Israil were fighting loyally alongside the Allies, the so-called Palestinians, for whom we are supposed to mourn, were busy marking the Jewish homes they intended to steal after the Germans arrived.

The letter writer says the Arabs and Jews lived like brothers before 1948. Tell that to the Sephardic Jews who your people treated like dogs, Mr. letter writer. In North Africa, Yemen, Syria, etc., the Arabs confined the Jews to filthy ghettos and forbade them to build homes higher than a Moslem, and engage in the same job as a Moslem.

Some 30,000 Jews in Arab countries were compelled to leave after the 1967 war because of anti-Jewish policies of the Arab governments and the savage anti-semitic eruptions of their Arab population. There are now 70,000 Jews in Arab countries who live under virtual house arrest.

A "democratic Palestine" is all a pseudonym for anti-Jewish persecution.

Dayan's action in Munich was correct to fire upon the Arab terrorists. You (the letter writer) said all that had to be done to release the Israeli athletes was to let a few terrorists free. I don't call 250 terrorists (who go around killing innocent people, to have other Munich's or Lod's,) a few. Israel's action a few weeks ago killing three leaders of terrorists groups was done to halt the killings of innocent people by Arab terrorists.

Violence Begats Violence

Editor, The Guardsman:

It must be considered of all the Palestinians that are being killed, just as many Israelis are being killed; if not more. This is a war, fighting and killing is taking place on both sides. The letter in the last issue stated that the Arabs don't kill or harm Jews, they live with them, This may have taken place at one time, but now things are different. A war doesn't enable this to happen.

Fire Truck and Flowers Idea Pays Off

SWEET SMELLS — Unable to park his fire truck on campus, Phil McManus is selling his flowers near the flagpole.

There is a new addition to the campus collection of wares for sale—Phil McManus, a fire truck and the flowers he sells.

McManus gets flowers from a friend who is a florist and totes them around on the back of a normal enough looking fire truck.

This tactic needless to say, has caught the eye of many students as well as their curiosity.

The fire truck was once woned by the West Bertran Fire Department and is now being lent to McManus by a friend for sale promotion purposes.

"I decided to do this because I could get the flowers wholesale from a friend", said McManus who hopes to support himself on his earnings from the flower sales.

So far he has tried selling flowers here at CCSF, the University of San Francisco, and California State University of San Francisco.

"I'm trying to find out in which area the flowers will sell the best", McManus said.

"I might keep using my friend's fire truck as a sales gimmick," McManus continued, "but I can't find a place to park it on this campus."—Tom Fantulin

Mail Room:

Pony Express Doesn't Run at CCSF

WHAT'S IN THE BAG? — Ken Bryant and George Spencer sort the campus mail with the assistance of Victor Dea and Ed Padilla (behind Dea).

Have you ever heard of the "talking boxes?" CCSF's "mailmen" Ken Bryant and George Spencer have.

Sometimes things in the mailbag packages "talk," such as the precious cargo arriving with live chickens, crickets, or frogs, usually bound for the Biology Department. "None have ever escaped on campus to our knowledge," claims Ken.

Located near the central stairway of the first floor of the Science Building, the CCSF mailroom is open from 8 am to 4:30 pm, however, the hours are extended beyond these; the two "mailmen" spend several hours preparing mail for distribution on campus which means all mail is promptly delivered on the same day as received.

The mailroom is not a Post Office Station, but a means for distribution of mail throughout the college. The mailroom handles special incoming mail, such as Special Delivery, telegrams, registered mail, etc., but it cannot handle the same for outgoing mail.

Mail is received once a day around 10 am after it has been picked up at the substation at Onondaga(Station F) by college truck drivers. Ken and George and two student helpers then sort the mail and make runs to the various campus buildings.

High quality service with speed and efficiency are Ken and George's motto for first class CCSF mail distribution.

"We find we are a sort of Information Booth for everyone passing through the building," Ken adds. "We even had an incident recently where a student passed out right in front of the mailroom window. We hurriedly called the school nurse and administered first aid immediately," he continued.

"Mailman John" Ken has been in charge of the mailroom on and off for the last ten years. In 1963, there were only three bags of mail a day whereas now there are no less than ten. On long weekends there might be as many as 28 bags which include packages. Ten years ago Ken had no assistant and no student help. In 1971, George came to assist Ken and has been there ever since.

In addition, five students on work-study program assist in the increased sorting and delivery of mail on campus. At present, they are: Ed Padilla, Victor Dea, Chris Mitchem, Raymond Tan, and Paul Lee.

Both Ken and George enjoy dealing with the public. Their job is one postal operation which is not dependent on the mercy of the operator of the machinery. The personal touch is their magic formula.

Lasers—A Real Boon to Man?

Russ Pasqualetti, a student aide associated with the Physics department, and currently constructing his own laser, decrys the popular misconceptions of laser beams as "death rays."

Pasqualetti became interested in Laser-technology several years ago, and believes that lasers can be "a real boon to man." "The scientific application of laser technology has tremendous possibilities in all fields." And more immediately, he believes "lasers can make physics classes much more interesting." Last semester Russ performed a "Laser Light Show," for Paul Hewett's Physics 10 class that students highly applauded.

Russ said that CCSF recently acquired ten new lasers for experiments in the labs. "These lasers," he explained, "are the helium-neon type and operate at below the minimum threshold of five mila-watts, which could do damage to the eye."

Pasqualetti, working in conjunction with various Physics instructors, is responsible for the Laser-Technology exhibit, which may be seen in the Science building at the Physics department display case on the first floor.

Exhibited are some visually provocative photos Russ made at the Palace of Fine Arts 'Exploratorium' exhibit on lasers. Russ said that the unusual effects of green and yellow 'exploding planets' were obtained by aiming a Pentax camera into a laser light beam. He warns others, "not to look directly into the laser because, "it's comparable to looking directly at the sun with the naked eye."

Other areas of laser-technology he explained involve applications of holoagraphy: "The Vatican has recently thought of using holographic means of projecting three-dimensional images of Vatican Guards to strategic locations in the Vatican palace. The projected image would be contained in special cylinders and would represent 100% of the light reflected from the original object."

Pasqualetti explained that lasers are continually being applied to new uses: at CCSF, experiments to determine light velocity are being contemplated: "Using a 5,000 watt pulsed-laser we expect to be conducting experiments for determining the speed of light in the near future and the measure of long distances to a few feet using special reflectors for our lasers like they used to study the moon."

Russ said that anyone with enough interest can build his own laser for, "$150 maximum..."

Happenings Here and There

CIVIL SERVICE CAREERS

The CCSF Career Guidance Center is sponsoring a Civil Service Career and Job Information Day on Wednesday, May 30 from 10am to 3pm in the lobby of the Educational Services Building.

Representatives from Federal, State, and City Civil Service will be at students' disposal to answer questions and distribute information on civil service careers and employment opportunities.

MOON MARIGOLDS

"The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds," the Pulitzer Prize winning play of 1970, will be presented in the Little Theater 8pm, May 25,26 and June 1,2. Admission is $1.50 general and $1 students.

FOOD FAIR

The San Francisco City College Student Health Service will present a Food Fair in the foyer of the Visual Arts Bldg. on Wednesday, May 23, from 10am to 2pm. Free samples and new food ideas will be available.

MOUNTAIN ECOLOGY

A six-week field study of mountain ecology will be offered June 25 - August 3 by the University of California Extension, Santa Cruz.

The course, "Field Introduction to Mountain Ecology", is a four-week field back-pack field trip in the Sierra Nevada mountains, and may be taken for 10 units of either upper or lower division credit in Environmental Studies.

Foreign Films Aid Language Students

Despite the allusion to "cinema for entertainment's sake" suggested in its title, CCSF's Foreign Film Festival is a serious attempt to fill some of the basic gaps inherent in any foreign language curriculum.

Since its inception in Fall '71 by Jack Essex and Dr. Gerstung (instructors in the foreign language department), the Film Festival (otherwise referred to as the Foreign Language Film Series), has striven to accomplish two self-imposed goals.

In describing the series' intent, Essex explained the direct relationship between the films and students involved in the foreign language department. Along with providing insights into the culture of the language a student is currently studying, the Festival "gives students a free film where they can measure how much they're learning."

Based on these two goals, all films are selected in one of the five major languages offered on campus (French, Chinese, German, Spanish and Russian) for the quality of the language in the movie and for its cultural content, rather than on a criteria of 'film as art'.

General community interest and appeal also play a role in selecting films since the Foreign Film Festival orients itself towards the community in a minor role.

The response to the 8pm Tuesday showings has been greater than for the 11am mid-morning runs; Essex claims the series has a continuing patronage from the general community. Yet, no overt publicity can be directed off campus because it places the showing of the film in a different category, accompanied by a rental price-hike.

All films for the academic year are rented for one day through commercial catalogs with funds supplied via the audio-visual budget. The Foreign Film Festival is presently operating on approximately $1,000 a semester, with an average rental cost per film in the area of one hundred dollars.

Landscape Awards Won by Horticulture Students

Landscape design awards totalling $1200 were recently won by students in the CCSF Horticulture department.

According to Sidney Lewin, Horticulture instructor, the $400 first prize went to Roger Robinson for his design of a pavilion gazebo for the San Francisco Heritage landmark, The Lillinthal Hass Mansion, built in 1896.

The prize-money was dispersed by the San Francisco Garden Club (from the Alice Eastwood Memorial Design Award Funds). According to Lewin, "The Garden Club has consistantly taken an active interest in CCSF's horticulture program."

Second prize was won by Einar Berg also a student in Landscape Design, 70A.

Lewin commended the CCSF Printing department for their cooperation in printing the award certificates presented on May 8 in a special ceremony.

The award-winning designs are still on display today (May 17) in the Architecture Display Room of Cloud Hall (C 205).

CCSF Music Major Lands Disney Dance Troupe Job

With no training in any of the performing arts other than that received through CCSF courses, Marsha Wong sang and danced her way straight into a coveted role as one of Florida Disneyland's "Kids of the Kingdom".

Marsha ('Cookie'), currently a music major at City, secured a summer job in Disney's southernmost domain as one of 24 members of a performing vocal ensemble dubbed "Kids of the Kingdom." The group is part of the Disney Fine Arts Work Experience Workshop, a program designed to give college level students an opportunity to chalk up performance experience in one of the Magical Kingdoms in a musical capacity unavailable in the classroom situation.

Brochures were distributed to colleges and universities throughout the nation, requesting chairmen in the performing arts departments to recommend a student for the job. After being selected, Cookie was required to compile a five minute video-tape according to specific instructions. The contents included answering several questions and performing—without accompaniment—a combination song and dance routine outlined in detail by the Disney sponsors.

All technical aspects involved in compiling Cookie's video-taped 'credentials' were handled by the CCSF broadcasting department.

"Cookie" — Marsha Wong

The Kids of the Kingdom job will span an 11 week period from June 16 through August 31 at a salary of $165 per week. Cookie's activities will encompass a daily routine of three hours spent in lab, lectures and rehearsals and five hours devoted to performing in her role as one of the Kids. The Disneyland opportunity is being approached by Cookie as an exploratory aid in deciding on her future involvement in the field of music.

Interview:

Ernest Borgnine: Villany to Comedy

What's it like to interview an Oscar winner, celebrated stage performer, and familar TV figure? With Ernest Borgnine it is relaxed, friendly, personal, informative, and most of all, entertaining. Mr. Borgnine diverted the press for two and a half hours, a remarkable performance for any actor, to publicize his new movie Emperor of the North Pole.

In Emperor of the North Pole, Mr. Borgnine gives another classic portrayal of the unscrupulous villain. Borgnine's character "Shack" has no redeeming qualities and he never smiles except in anticipation of his villainy. Mr. Borgnine considers the film entertaining, a study of violence, but not its glorification. The film is directed by Robert Aldrich and co-stars Lee Marvin. It represents fourteen solid weeks of production with two of those weeks devoted to one fight sequence. The fight is expected to make film annals as a classic in no-holds-barred confrontation.

Mr. Borgnine is also renowned for his comedic performances. McHale's Navy held top ratings on TV for four years. Besides this, his performance with Don Rickles in The Odd Couple at the Circle Star Theater in San Carlos received some of the best critical reviews given the play. Mr. Borgnine explains his success with comedy to be due to his genuine approach to the character: "You cannot inject comedy into comedy. You have to play comedy for what it is; the reality of portrayal is the source of the humor."

Marty was the picture Mr. Borgnine received the Oscar for. It was made for a tax loss and the studio ultimately spent more on publicity ($350,000) than it did on production. Marty made Borgnine a star, but financially for him it was a fluke. He received $5,000 and a seven-year contract it cost him $75,000 to buy out.

Ernest Borgnine — "Emperor of the North Pole."

Asked about his own art as an actor, Mr. Borgnine said he never played a role without using both his head and his heart. His advice to the aspiring actor is..."to go after it with all you've got—anyway, anyhow," but he tempered, "I always remember Spencer Tracy saying, 'Ernie, you're going to be a star. Just treat the people nice on the way up, so they'll treat you nice on the way down.'"

New Record:

Is Waits Better Than He Sounds on Album?

Tom Waits - "Closing Time"
Asylum - SD 5061

It's rather hard to distinguish the exact character of the album, it fluctuates between sheer boredom, and aggravated edium.

As far as I know this is Mr. Waits first album, and on this first showcase Waits writes all the material while playing various instruments and singing. His voice sounds at times like Bob Dylan during his a-tonal, gravel-gobbling period.

In listening to Waits sing, one gets the impression that he can sing a hell of a lot better than he actually does; it seems that rather he uses this un-singing for effect.

One of the strong points of the album (aside: this is probably the only one) is the lyrical content. From reading the lyrics which were thoughtfully printed on the record sleeve, one gets the impression that Waits has seen his share of "fire and rain," and that it's gotten the best of him. The songs are, however, poignant, incisive, and quite Dylanesque.

Tom Waits sings songs of sadness and depression: "Midnight Lullaby," "Ol' 55," "I Hope That I Don't Fall In Love With You," "Closing Time," and "Lonely."

Apparently Tom Waits has been doing just that for a while; unfortunately I think he'll have to keep on—waiting, that is.

Live Rock:

Beck Returns with Fudge and Cactus

Rock music's newest equal-billing "super group", Beck, Bogart, and Appice electrified their Winterland audience with a set of high powered rock.

Jeff Beck, one of Britain's finest guitarists who had an early career with the Yardbirds and his own Jeff Beck Group, is teamed with ex-Vanilla Fudge and Cactus members Tim Bogart (bass) and Carmen Appice (drums).

This trio had planned to get together sooner, but Beck was involved in a near-fatal automobile accident and took nearly a year to mend.

Now that they are together, rock audiences (if you can judge by Winterland's) now have a new group to squeal, scream, and develop cauliflower eardrums over.

BB&A's new album shows what great individuals make up this band, but they were overpoweringly loud for a trio at this concert and their distinct playing became lost in the noise many times.

Most would agree that Beck is truly one of rock's best guitarists, but he suffered in concert by trying to cram in as many notes per beat as possible, so his playing was not always clear.

Playing material from their new album and some oldies from the Beck Group, BB&A nevertheless had this audience by the front of it's Levis and they were brought back for two encores.

Black Oak Arkansas, the number two headliner, put on a decent stage show accompanied with loud monotonous rock 'n' roll. No improvement or change has been noted in this third viewing of BOA.

Lead singer Jim Dandy strutted, did the splits, and whipped his bare upper torso with his long hair in leading the group. His voice might be akin to a raspy throated Southern bullfrog.

The opening band, Wet Willie, led by another energetic singer, had it's few good moments only when this same singer played the harmonica or sax.

Coming in the weeks ahead:

May 18-19, Hot Tuna, Muddy Waters, Clifton Chenier at Winterland.

May 24, Procol Harum, The Strawbs, Terry Reid at Winterland.

May 26-27, Johnny Winter, Foghat, Frampton's Camel at Winterland.

June 3, Carole King, David T. Walker at S.F. Civic Auditorium.

June 29 - 30, Lee Michaels at Winterland.

Morgenthau Discusses Nixon Foreign Policy At Lecture Series

Hans J. Morgenthau, a distinguished professor political science and modern history at the University of Chicago, was the speaker here on campus recently. The influencial writer discussed "The Foreign Policy of Richard M. Nixon." Morgenthau wrote a couple of books that deal with American foreign policy, its purpose and principles.

The professor emphasized that "the Nixon administration has shifted its political route. Although the slogan 'stop communism' is still used as the fundamental of the American Policy, President Nixon sought a normalization relationship with China."

He said, "I believe the domestic political burden upon the government has a lot to contribute towards any political movements.

"The game we play is the balance of power: the US against the Soviet Union, Bonn against Berlin, Soviet Union against China and Vise versa." Morgenthau stressed.

When questioned about the USSR policy, Morgenthau indicated that "the USSR doesn't worry about countries like Italy or England, but a lot more about the West and East Germanys. He added "The Russian ideology lies in having security."

The professor explained that many nations after the Second World War were not interested in US involvement in their internal and external affairs. They have become self-supported neutrals. "That is the reason President Nixon invites the world in 1976," he stressed.

"The Vietnam war is nothing more than a place for a political game at the risk of the Vietnamese governments. Kissinger has been used as an instrument and his main message to Hanoi has been 'if you behave, you get money, but if you don't behave you will get bombs."

Continuing his statement Morgenthau emphasized, "I think the United States should reconsider its foreign policy, rather than relying on one part of the world and keeping the other side cool. She should examine each country in every continent and proceed for a new policy.

"In a new policy the US has to recognize every country as it is, without being concerned with the kind of government each has," he added.

"The future US Policy has to be formed in such a way that it would influence the world and it would bring understanding among people for long lasting peace," Morgenthau concluded.

Birthday Picnic

Honoring Malcolm X on his birthday, the Black Students Union is giving a picnic on Angel Island Saturday, May 19.

Tentative time for meeting at the ferry (Pier 43) is 9 a.m., but those interested should check with the BSU at ext. 356, as it was learned that the ferry blew up its engine last week.

Baseball:

Young SF Giants Prove Themselves

There's no getting around it folks; this year's edition of Giants baseball is off to a flying start.

As of May 1 their record stood 19 wins and 6 defeats, the same record they had two years ago when they won the division crown.

Second baseman Tito Fuentes said, "I tell you this; we're going all the way this year." At this time Tito's words are as good as gold as the Giants are tearing up the National League.

As a guest of the Giants recently, this reporter was eager to see if they were for real.

Testing the young Giants were the Pittsburg Pirates, rated as one of the toughest teams in the league. The "Bucs" showed why, as they jumped off to an early lead and provided most of the action for the "frigid fans of Candlestick Park," except for a solo homerun by Gary Thomasson in the fifth inning.

As miracles are, they pop up at the most unexpected times. Losing 7 to 1 in the ninth inning, the Giants were down to their last out with a runner on first base. All of a sudden pitcher Bob Moose couldn't find the winning secret as he walked the next two batters, loading the bases.

That was it for Moose. Pittsburg manager Bill Virdon went to his relief pitcher Ramon Hernandez to pitch to pinch-hitter, Chris Arnold. The count went to 3 balls and 2 strikes. The crowd went crazy in anticipation. Chris ripped the next pitch over the 365-foot mark in left center for his first grand slam of his career. The score now stood at 7 to 4.

The Giants were not finished yet as Gary Matthews lined down the left field foul line for a double. The Pirate pitcher had more control problems, walking Dave Rader and Jim Howarth, loading the bases again.

Bobby Bonds promptly hit a winning double, unloading the bases. It was total bedlam as players and spectators mobbed Bonds realizing that they had just witnessed one of the greatest comebacks in Giants history.

The Giants are a team of tremendous talent and promise and have been putting out a lot of energy. It is now our job as fans to give them the active support they deserve.

Opinion:

Will the Real Islam Please Stand Up?

In the Western press little effort has been made to distinguish between the number of Afro-Americans who have turned to Islam as their religion and the so-called "Black Muslims, Who are followers of Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam Movement in America.

Elijah Muhammad is practicing demagogy and racism and exploiting poor blacks in the name of Islam.

Islam is an Arabic word meaning peace, purity, obedience and submission and in the religious sense, Islam is submission to the Will of God. One who submits to the Will of God is a Muslim, a Muslim must bear witness that there is none worthy of worship but God and Muhammad is God's last Prophet and Messenger. A Muslim is one who accepts God's sovereignty and completely surrenders himself to God's law.

"QUR-AM"

According to the belief of Muslims, the Holy Qur-an (Arabic: The Recital) is the last word of God and the basic source of Islamic injunctions. Islam is not a new religion. It is, in essence, the same religion which God revealed to all His Prophets.

"Say: (Oh Muhammad) We believe in God and that which is revealed to us, and that which was revealed to Abraham and Ishmael and Isaac and Jacob and the tribes and that which was given to Moses and Jesus and to the Prophets from their Lord; We make no distinction between any of them, and to Him do we submit." (Qur-an 3:83)

"MUHAMMAD"

Muhannad, who died in 650 AD was a simple unlettered man. The Qur-an was revealed to Muhammad over a period of the last thirty years of his life. The Qur-an was committed to memory and into writing in Muhammad's lifetime by his followers. It is still in the complete and original Arabic in which it was revealed.

Islam rejects the idea of a "chosen people," making faith in God and exlemplary action the sole criteria and establishing a direct relationship with God open to all alike without any intercessor.

"It is not righteousness that you turn your faces to the East and the West; but righteous is he who believes in God and the last day and the angels and the scripture and the Prophets; and gives his wealth, for love of Him, to kinfolk and to orphans and the needy and the wayfarer and to those who ask, and to set slaves free; and observes proper worship and pays the poor-due. And those who keep their treaty when they make one, and the patient in tribulation and adversity and time of stress, such are they who are the sincere. Such are the God-fearing." (Qur-an 2:177)

In contrast, the theology of Elijah Muhammad is misleading to his followers. Elijah, has said that a MAN is God "in person." From, Message to the Blackman in America by Elijah Muhammad (p42) "Allah (The God) came to us from the Holy city Mecca, Arabia, in 1930. He used the name Wallace Fard, often signing it W.D. Fard."

True Islam teaches that, 'God is One, The Eternal. He was not born nor does He beget, and there is none comparable to Him."

"CHOSEN PEOPLE"

The followers of Elijah Muhammad believe that they are "the chosen people." Also, from Message to the Blackman in America, (p 54) "...the Blackman is the first and last, maker and owner of the universe."

Elijah Muhammad preaches separatism in the name of Islam. "The Black nation is self-created, while the White race is made by one of the gods and scientists of the Black Nation."

Islam is not and never could be based on any dogmas of racial superiority. Black pride, White pride, these things are very contrary to Islam.

Opinion:

The Metamorphosis from "Faggot" to Gay

Ever since the Gay Liberation Movement began in 1969, in New York, more and more gay men and women have been "coming out of their closets" and have attempted to change this society's mind about "the love that dared not speak its name."

Along the way, several reflections have been made by gay people from their own experiences. New York writer Merle Miller felt that the strongest truth about being gay is that, after emerging from his closet, (that is, becoming openly homosexual) he felt that it became the most important part of his identity. Merle Miller "came out" while in his fifties. That means that for about thirty-five years he lived with a fear that someday someone would find out, and possibly blackmail him.

LOBOTOMY

Another reflection was made by New York gay activist John Murphy: "...The topic came up when I was talking about future plans with a beautiful and intelligent young woman in a cafe. When I told her I was working on a book on homosexual liberation—because I was a homosexual—she was quiet for a moment and then leaned across the table and touched my hand. 'It's alright. Really,' she whispered. She was very sweet and serious, as if I'd told her that I was going to need a lobotomy or die of tuberculosis. I didn't know whether to laugh or shout at her. Why shouldn't it be alright?"

These two instances of "gay oppression" are only the beginning. Imagine, if you will, that you are with someone you love very much. You want to hold his or her hand but you can't because you could be arrested. Imagine having people you don't know harrass you with whistles, and degrading names, laughing. Think of the time you were hated for loving someone; (very few besides homosexuals know of the feeling.)

STEREOTYPE

Due perhaps to this oppression, some homosexuals cease judging or stereotyping people and are the best friends a person could want. Others crumble, and very few grow to their full potential because of self-hate inflicted by people who do not understand homosexuality and must therefore attack it.

While walking across this campus one day, an athletic type whistled at me as he would to a woman. He most likely did not expect a reaction, but he got one. "I'm supposed to whistle at you, you're not supposed to whistle at me. I thought I was the one turned onto guys, not you! Now remember, you whistle at women, and I'm supposed to whistle at you.

Of course, the mot aggravating of this subtle oppression is the fact that, if you are a gay man or woman, and you see another member of your sex to whom you are attracted, there is nothing you could do except admire from a distance and hope that you run into that person in a gay place.

When a gay person comes out of his closet, that is, becomes openly homosexual, an amazing transformation takes place that is hard to explain. Oppression is not being able to experience that feeling.

During a recent conversation with Guardsman Editor Paul Snodgrass, the following ensued. "The only thing that I don't like is that they try to hide it so much. Why don't they open up and just be honest about it?"

CLOSETS

The closets are far from being emptied. The majority of gay people are afraid to be open with their homosexuality. And with good reason. It seems most people do not like homosexuals. Even more cannot stand an "open" homosexual. The result of coming out can mean loss of job, loss of family and friends, and even more oppression, not to mention the stigma. But coming out can be worth all these things. For perhaps the first time in the individuals life, he has spoken up. He no longer has to listen to "fag" jokes, act like he's attracted to people who he's not attracted to, answer questions about marriage plans, have his identity denied. It's a very important part of us, indeed.

There are approximately 1,000 gay people on this campus. Some are faculty members; most are students. All are not out of their closets, but some are, and that's a start. A start for a better tomorrow. It will take reactions. It will take education, but above all, it will take love and understanding.

$228,570 Allocated For Needy Students

The California Community Colleges Board of Governors has allocated $228,570 to CCSF for disadvantaged student-aid funds which total more than $5.1 million statewide.

Ninety-one projects designed to assist low income students in community colleges throughout the state were approved under the state-funded Extended Opportunity Programs and Services (EOPS). More than 20,000 disadvantaged students will be assisted in the program through a wide range of EOPS student assistance methods including tutorial help, special counseling and college expense support.

The EOPS funding program is contingent on passage of the state budget. If the budget should be augmented above the $5.1 million figure by the Legislature and approved by the Governor, provisions were made by the Board to increase funding proportionately to the colleges.

The program approved by the Board was recommended after the screening of applications from 88 colleges seeking a total of $16,453,950 for a variety of EOPS projects.

Bookstore Committee Dumps Plan to Expand into Student Union Building

A resolution to expand the AS Bookstore in its present location was voted on and unanimously passed at the May 8 meeting of the Bookstore Committee.

The proposal will be submitted to various higher-ups and is a first step in the process toward getting more room for bookstore inventory, consequently, "increased funding for the Associated Students," explained Richard Main, manager of the bookstore.

Main said that a study had been made "to determine the feasability of remodeling the lower floor of the Student Union Building for use as the Bookstore." Main charged that the present (bookstore) location seriously limits the amount of business that could be done. Said Main, "if you (AS Students) want more money, we're (AS Bookstore) limited spacewise as to the amount of money that we can bring in." He continued, "The lower floor of the Student Union Building has twice the area we have to work with now."

Dean of Student Activities, Vester Flanagan, disagreed with Main's proposal. "Your (Main's) survey with regard to using the Student Union building (for The Bookstore) was misleading. If the Student Union Building is used," he explained, "the inconvenience to students would not be compensated by increased AS funds from the Bookstore."

Flanagan said that the alternate building proposed for student activities, Statler Wing, "is too small." He said that the Student Union Building belongs to the students. "It's their building," he added, "and they need it."

Thereafter, Lee Leonard, Chairman of AS Finance Committee, proposed to divide bookstore supplies, keeping supplies in Statler Wing and books in their present location.

Bookstore people opposed the suggestion "because," they said, "...dividing bookstores had been tried in the past and has failed, because it was not good economics and would mean increased operating costs while lowering efficiency."

Roger Dearth, Bookstore committeeman made a motion recommending renovation of the present AS bookstore be completed by September of 1973. It passed with one dissenting vote, that of Ray Early, Chairman of the Bookstore Com ittee, who, "for esthetic reasons," would not care to see any more horizontal construction on campus. The proposal which passed provides for an additional storage area to be built in the rear of the bookstore for storage.

Dearth announced another Bookstore Committee meeting to be held May 23. Interested students are invited to attend.

Student Council Votes to Boycott McDonalds

In an unprecedented action, the Student Council of CCSF voted unanimously to boycott McDonald's hamburger chain.

This action was a result of the firing of two CCSF students that were employed by McDonald's.

Further action was planned in the form of an informational picket line in front of the Ocean Ave. McDonald's.

McDonald's has been criticized in the past for its low wages, use of non-union employees and lack of procedures to air grievances and appeal firing decisions.

McDonald's has also been charged with exploitation of their employees. The Appeals Board also denied McDonald's a permit to build new outlets on three separate occasions.

Bill Hankin, SDS chairman and a member of the boycott movement, said, "I think this boycott will be successful. We must protect the workers against the rip-offs of the big corporations."

Asked how long this boycott would be in effect Hankin replied, "As long as it's necessary. We'll pick up this boycott next fall if necessary."

"Ocean of Tradition" in Bronze

"Sentinels," a new $20,000 bronze sculpture by Aristides Demetrios will hereafter grace the CCSF campus.

The sculpture which weighs about a ton, was paid for by the city of San Francisco and according to Demetrios, "it represents an ocean of tradition and protection in a pleasing series of shapes."

The San Francisco-based sculptor since 1962, has put on a series of one man shows, has won awards in competition including the San Francisco Hall of Justice Competition in 1968.

His major commissions include his 1968 Flame of Freedom creation now on Corregidor Island in the Philippines.

Guideline Violations :

Goode Wins in Upset Election; PSA to Protest

In an upset, William Goode, United Independent Party candidate for A.S. president, defeated Progressive Student Alliance candidate Reginald Kelley in last week's close election.

Marred by many violations of guidelines, the elections were protested by election officials and the P.S.A. party.

Only 805 people voted in the election, down about 10 people from last semester with Goode receiving 386 votes to Kelley's 327 votes.

The P.S.A. party has launched an effort to have the elections voided because of the many violations they claim to have taken place.

So far Goode has not made any statement about the accusation of infractions.

A special meeting of the Student Council will be held today to decide whether the elections should be voided.

The U.I.P. victory was attributed to the fact that Goode had the backing of the physical education department. The P.S.A. had intentions of finding another source of revenue to fund athletic events.

The U.I.P. party ran only 11 candidates. Four seats were won by the P.S.A., but not enough to give a majority vote in council. This gives U.I.P. complete control of all future funds.

On the propositions, it was 387 yes votes to 212 no votes on the issue of student support for C.C.S.F. Athletics. The change of requirements for Student Council candidates failed because it did not receive two-thirds majority of those voting. The issue of whether military recruiters should be allowed on campus was passed with 350 to 245 votes.

Governing Board Rules on Campus Issues

The Governing Board of the San Francisco Community College District rejected last week a faculty evaluation proposal submitted by the Executive Council of the Academic Senate.

The proposal was sent back to the drawing board for the third time because of its unacceptance by the student evaluation committee.

John Chin, chairman of the Board of Governors, appointed a committee composed of board members to work with the students and faculty to find a proposal suitable to everyone.

Other action of the board included the final decision regarding the rehiring of Ms. JoAnn Handler, psychology instructor. The board, with a final vote of 5 to 2 decided not to rehire the controversial teacher.

Ms. Handler is considering taking legal action in court where she believes she "has a chance" to overturn the board's decision.

Gas Rationing: A Prelude to Higher Costs, Renewed Offshore Drilling?

In a recent newsletter State Assembly Speaker, Bob Moretti, claimed that the fuel shortage is a prelude to higher prices, renewed offshore drilling and the opening of the Alaskan pipeline.

The speaker said three Assembly Committees will be conducting hearings in the next few months. The Assembly Subcommittee on State Energy Policy will research the broad subjects of the so-called "Energy Crisis" and the conservation of power.

The Assembly Transportation Committee will be holding a series of hearings on fuel capacity, supply and delivery. Also, the Joint Committee on Public Domain will focus on the price of oil in California, with particular emphasis on protecting the motoring public from cpricious fuel price increases.

Since the recent cuts on distribution, Standard Oil has decided to lower the octane rating of their fuels a few degrees, which they say won't effect cars' performance.

This move is being made because processing is cheaper when lead isn't added to gasoline, they said.

Many oil companies have raised the cost of their fuel by 1 cent, and Continental Oil Company became the first major oil company to ask the Cost of Living Council for permission to raise gasoline prices higher than 1.5 cents per-gallon.

It has been rumored that some companies want to raise the price of each gallon as high as fifteen cents.

Nevertheless, many think the "Energy Crisis" is a hoax and an excuse for greater costs which will put pressure on the government and force the resumption of offshore drilling and the opening of the Alaskan pipeline.

Perhaps the most important person espousing this belief is Ralph Nader, who claims he can prove oil [illegible]mpany mismanagement.

No Traffic Light In Sight

The latest word from the city's Department of Public Works about the Phelan Avenue crosswalks between the campus and the reservoir is that "a study of the traffic situation is near completion."

Since early April, when CCSF student Carol Hannum was fatally struck by a drunk driver on that street, public pressure (primarily from the college) has tried to prod the city into installing traffic signals on Phelan.

But unfortunately, it's all really a battle of priorities. Last year DPW was allocated just $100,000 for traffic light installation — roughly enough for ten needy intersections, a total which, according to DPW estimates, equals the number of separate complaints received by one engineer from all parts of San Francisco in less than three months.

DPW's priorities are based on a study of how "critical" the pedestrian's predicament is at a certain location — in other words, which streets have had the most blood spilled on them as a result of auto accidents.

With no increase in DPW's budget foreseen this year (unless the Board of Supervisors can be convinced otherwise), the 20,000 students at City College may have a long wait before anyone ameliorates the driving and walking conditions on Phelan.

Until such time, we suggest the campus police here try to restore a program used a few years ago which placed officers on Phelan to direct the flow of people and cars.

Campus Police Chief Gerald De Girolamo says that he can't spare the manpower for more traffic directors but that he could if his staff didn't have to handle the sales of Associated Students Cards for the issuance of parking stickers. (He wants the Student Union Building to take over that chore.)

If the chief is interested in providing the most valuable service to CCSF students, he should reconsider the number of officers assigned to patrol the campus looking for parking violations.

Only two or three are needed to control the cat-and-mouse game the Phelan Avenue congestion creates.

New Teaching Attitude Needed

Despite the fact that the Board of Governors did not rehire and grant tenure to psychology instructor Jo Ann Handler, she has an outstanding quality that other teachers could benefit from: the ability to establish a working rapport with her students. This attribute deserves attention.

Too many teachers can only relate to their students in an authoritarian manner. (Me teacher. You student.). They offer lectures as if they were handing down commandments; to be accepted and memorized but never questioned.

Only through exposure to a teacher who encourages questions and discussions, can a student learn to think for himself and function on his own. It is imperative that students feel comfortable and communicative toward their instructors.

It is not enough for teachers to simply know their subject matter; they must know how to impart this knowledge to students in an interesting and relevant manner.

Student-teacher seminars should be arranged to give teachers the opportunity to know and understand the students' needs. Review boards should be established to periodically test not only the teacher's current knowledge of his subject but his ability to relate it.

Special classes covering modern and more stimulating teaching methods should be mandatory for teachers who show weakness in this area.

A better screening technique could be used with teacher applicants to discourage those with a poor aptitude for student relations. Just as a sales company would spurn the hiring of a lifeless salesman, the college should reject potentially dull teachers.

Teaching and learning can and should be mutually satisfying experiences. Every effort should be made to insure progress toward this goal.

Maturity Adds New Dimension

Scattered among the blue jeaned, tie-dyed clad students at City College are a group of middle-aged students making their way to classes.

Ranging in age from the early 40's to mid 60's these students have returned to school in some cases to finish attaining a degree, in others to begin one, and in all cases to stimulate the mind.

It is an inspiration to all the younger students to see these people in school. To know that receiving an education is not something that stops after you have reached 25.

Many of the older people now in school bring an extra dimension to class discussions. Having lived through different historic times they bring a new perspective to story courses. Having raised families and in some cases, been involved in traditional roles of housewife and/or breadwinner, they bring refreshing and informative ideas to such subjects as sociology, psychology and political history.

Middle aged people and older people should be encouraged to attend school. Now, unfortunately, they are the true "freaks" on campus because there are so few of them compared with younger people.

City College and all other free state schools should be trying to get more middle-aged people in school.

Most advertising is now directed to the young about going to school and not becoming "drop-outs." Let us try to reach middle aged people and older ones who have dropped out years ago and let them feel they have the opportunity to return to school.

Let us encourage them to return to school.

Letters to the Editor

Warning About Campus Police

Editor, The Guardsman.

I would like to inform the students of City College that they are in danger of being suppressed by the Campus Police. For those who smoke marijuana: Beware!

The police force here caught me smoking a joint, searched my backpack and found three pills, which was cause for an arrest under possession of marijuana and dangerous narcotics. The campus police are responsible for my 28-hour incarceration in city prison, which was a most excruciating experience.

I was released on my own recognisance, and the judge dismissed my case, but the issue still remains: whether we as students want our campus patrolled by campus police who bust marijuana smokers.

The issue is somewhat more vast. We must ask ourselves what an educational institution is. In my opinion it is for enlightening people and for the pursuit of freedom through knowledge.

The fact that I was put behind bars for this pursuit seems ironic. I hope that all students who share this opinion will prevent these police actions from recurring through legislation or mutual aid in outlawing the criminalization of pot-smokers on our campus.

Thank You,
Jo Anne Daniels

QUESTION: "Why do some students lose interest in their classes at CCSF?"

Peggy Logan-Nursing

Most classes are purely lecture and I suggest a seminar or some type of group interaction because I believe that group discussion fosters better student and teacher relationships.

Pettway Percy-Real Estate

Often the instructors just go too fast for the students to keep up. Students are sometimes unable to comprehend what is being taught because of insufficient preparation for courses.

Richard Hourigan-Journalism

Students lose interest in learning because they are taken up in the whole process of earning grades and degrees. Students lose their intrinsic motivation for learning.

Jonnne Daniels-Theater

For one thing teachers don't support student opinion. Some students are lazy and are looking for lovers or whatever and weren't interested in learning in the first place. The campus is so huge that students tend to lose their identity. Students are required to take courses which are irrelevent to student's needs.

Steve Sum-Biology

You hear so much these days about the shortage of jobs, with Phd's doing menial work and all — sometimes you wonder what the hell you're doing in school. Also, too often required courses are pushed down our throats.

Bev Watson-Clinical Science

In my opinion students lose interest in classes because of poor teachers; teachers who are unable to relate and who talk and gab. Some students lose interest because classes are required.

Elvis at Tahoe - Panties Onstage, But the Pelvic Thrusts Are Slower

ELVIS—"... it takes him longer to stand upright again."

Not only can Elvis still make the girls scream and faint but he can even make them hurl their underwear and hotel keys on the stage.

At one instance, Elvis picked up a yellow bikini and responded, "Someone is gonna get cold."

The dramatic heart-beating instrumental sound of "2001 Space Odyssey," was the appropriate opening for the King of Rock 'n Roll.

Appearing at Sahara Tahoe, Elvis opened with the classic "Jail House Rock," and followed by introducing himself in a mocking voice, "Hi, I'm Glenn Campbell." He wore a white pantsuit with gold metal sequins; his shirt was cut in a low V-neck revealing a not too hairy chest.

His slacks were low slung with a gold design down the sides; he wore many rings, wrist bands and medals, all presumably gifts of gold. (One of which he received that night.)

Almost middle-aged Elvis has slowed down in his pelvic thrusts. They are still evident but it takes him longer to stand upright again.

The best part of the show was when the "King" walked on stage; cool, confident and slow (this reporter's heart skipped a beat) and received his usual welcome of a screaming crowd. The stage was taken over by females ranging from children to little old ladies who were not intending to leave until they received a holy kiss from their idol.

Entertaining not for the audience but to them, Elvis fulfilled their wish. A number of fans even received pieces of his attire. No, he didn't strip; he merely handed out scarves that he wore around his neck to clawing females.

With rehearsed wit and a poor choice of songs (considering his success and legendized god-like image, to this reporter), Elvis is billed too highly.

He was on stage approximately an hour singing some of his greats, but most of the songs were made popular by other artists. The public paid to hear the songs that brought Elvis to fame, not to hear him re-do other's songs which made them recognizable in the public's eye.

Handsome Elvis stands about 6'4", and is built well. His voice is hypnotizing and everything about him screams "masculine," in spite of his overdone eye make-up.

So why was the show a flop to this reporter? The expectancy was too great. Elvis is merely a good looking singer. He does not dance, nor joke (at least not ad-lib), nor show much of his personality on stage. He seemed almost a mechanical sex-image who doesn't appear too bright.

But to pay $15, plus another big bill to the usher for a good seat, is too expensive.

When the maitre'd asked one group if they wished to see the show again, a disappointed fan commented, "No, I'd rather spend money on something more interesting... like gambling."

St. Mary's Alumni:

Counselors Honored by Alma Mater

Two CCSF Counselors, William G. Fischer and Kenneth Meitz, have recently been awarded special honors by their college alma mater.

Fischer was honored as Alumnus of the Year 1972 at a recent St. Mary's College alumni awards luncheon on the Moraga campus.

The annual SMC award is given to an alumnus whose personal and professional accomplishments or consistent service to the College exemplifies the spirit and dedication of its graduates.

ALUMNUS OF YEAR—Bill Fischer

Kenneth Meitz, who also teaches an occupational psychology class at CCSF, is receiving his award from St. Mary's for his basketball prowess as a guard during his collegiate days on the Moraga campus.

Meitz is one of 45 athletes who will be honored (football, baseball, basketball, boxing and coaching) at the First Annual St. Mary's College Hall of Fame Banquet next Saturday, May 26, in Oliver Hall on campus.

Before entering St. Mary's, Fischer attended Commerce High School in San Francisco (now headquarters for the S.F. Unified School District).

After college graduation, Fischer returned to Commerce to coach the baseball and football teams for the next 11 years.

In 1947, Fischer came to CCSF to become head baseball coach and assistant football coach for 10 years.

When asked which job he prefers (coaching or counseling), Fischer replied, "Competitively, the aspect of coaching and working with the students in the field appeals to me most. After all, I did coach baseball for 25 years."

"I like counseling, too, however," Fischer continued, "for there is a point in life when you must have other challenges."

Regarding the difference between coaching and counseling, Fischer believes that there is not much difference between coaching and counseling. "It's working with people and trying to get the best out of them. There is no great change in that sense of the word," he claims.

Fischer's three sons attended City and played on the championship football teams some twelve years ago.

Meitz made varsity as a freshman and was a member of the All-Conference teams for three years. He played semi-pro basketball for the Olympic Club and Golden State Company. He now has turned to golf for his leisure hours.

Before coming to the CCSF Counseling Department in 1958, Meitz taught history and political science at Mission High School for 15 years; however, his main occupation was counseling.

The father of two children and five grandchildren, Meitz is very enthusiastic about his job and the students he teaches and counsels. "I like all of it," he says, "and it's a delightful place to come to. I have no regrets. I think the students are the finest; they all react. It keeps you alive. It's great!"

HALL OF FAME—Ken Meitz

Both Fischer and Meitz expressed tremendous satisfaction in hearing of the success of former students through personal notes, invitations, chance meetings while shopping in town or traveling in far-off places, and publicity via the grapevine.

Interview:

Computer Expert Warns of Future 1984 Society

To find out more about the role computers play in academic life at City College The Guardsman interviewed Frank Holden, head of the Computer Science Department.

Q. How are computers affecting the lives of City College students?

A. The computer is affecting every student where records are involved. All records are kept by the computer; grades are processed by the computer; eligibility for drivers licenses is determined by computer; eligibility for GI checks is done by computer; the mundane bills paid by the students are processed by the computer. The computer just about affects every aspect of their lives to a far greater degree than most realize.

Q. Just how important are computers today?

A. The entire structure of our complex society today depends on computers to run it. We can no longer live without them. Without computers, our factories would not run; our banks would not open; payroll checks would not be written and mailed; food would not be processed and electricity would cease being manufactured. The computer now ranks alongside transportation, communications and energy as a major determinant of progress.

Q. What role will computers play in the future?

A. The impact and influence of computers is growing at a pace unequaled by any other tool in our history. The consequent ramifications are profound. The computer may very well become the single most important factor in determining the future. There are inherent dangers in such a situation. There is little question but that "1984" is a distinct possibility. The computer could become an integral part of an Orwellian society.

The Computer Science department at City College, through such coursesas CS-1 (Computers and Society), offers students the opportunity to examine in detail the impact of the computer on people and their lives, and, just as important, teaches them how to use the computer and provides a basic understanding of how a computer works, its abilities and limitations.

Q. What courses does the Computer Science Department offer at City College?

A. For business students, we have CS-30, 35, 36 and 48. For social science students, who don't anticipate any further extensive study, there is CS-1. We also offer a variety of university-parallel courses, most common of which is CS-2.

Q. How are the computers in the library being used?

A. At the present time the terminals are being used to teach the computer language Basic in CS-1 and 7. The terminals are being used in physics, chemistry and mathmatics to enrich the instructional programs. They will be used for pre-registration in the fall semester.

Also, all the computer facilities are available to all students on campus as there are a variety of games which can be played on the computer terminals; instructions for playing the games can be found at the check-out desk at the library.

Delegates Discuss World Affairs

A three-day conference of the World Affairs Council of Northern California was held recently at Asilomar, Monterey, with more than 700 delegates participating.

CCSF scholarship recipients to the 27th annual Conference were the following: Guardsman reporter Seyoum Kebede, Steven L. Choban, Khanh Le Cong, Higinio A. Martinez, Michael K. McCaffrey, Beth Sosnick, William N. Turnbull, Elaine C. Wong, Kendall R. Thornton.

Dr. Virginia McClam, a CCSF political science instructor, was chairman of one of the seminars.

"New Realities of Power in Asia" was the leading topic of the conference. However, the delegates also discussed the international political situation as a whole.

The conference concluded by confirming that all countries big and small should not return to the old concepts but rather have new concepts of independence, recognition, and wide development around the globe.

Grade School Astro. Program Available

The Astronomy Department has a tutoring program that attempts to introduce elementary students to the concepts of astronomy.

There are approximately 67 students involved in the tutoring program, primarily designed for 4th, 5th, and 6th grade students.

At left, CCSF student John Johnson tutors the 5th grade students of Holy Name school here in San Francisco.

Johnson said, "It's really great to offer something like this to these students. They're at that age where they can hear different ideas and begin to understand."

Vets Club:

Omega Chapter Gets National Vet Award

The national veterans club, Allied Servicemen, recently gave out its annual awards, and the major recipient was the CCSF branch of the national organization.

The City College-based chapter, Omega, was nominated Chapter of the Year and area director Rob Hughes won the "Brother of the Year" award.

Omega was put into contention by producing a ten page catalog listing veterans' benefits, and by holding a two-hour seminar on veterans affairs. But the clincher came when Omega promoted a Northern California Collegiate Veterans Club Conference, which formed an alliance between the seventeen collegiate veterans clubs that attended the meeting.

When the plaque arrives next week, Omega plans to hang it on the wall of the Veterans Office, E-202.

In addition to Omega's award, Gary Tom, former Veterans Educational Incentive Program director at City, won the Outstanding Service Award for the pioneering work he did with the VEIP program this last year.

Baseball:

Ram Nine Win Last League Game

There is nothing more gratifying after long hours of preparation than to play on your opponents field, and after the game have the sweet taste of victory.

The action started fast as Mike Norris led off with a single to center in the first inning. Steve Caiola bunted him to second base. Don Lyons tried to get out of the way of a high fastball but the ball hit his bat; fortunately the umpire thought it hit his helmet and awarded him first base.

Rich Zerga walked, loading the bases. The Rams didn't waste anytime scoring as the next hitter, Dave Giorgi, cracked a single, driving in Norris and Lyons.

Giorgi later said, "I was trying to protect the plate with two strikes. The pitch was over the outside of the plate and I just punched it into right field."

John Grazzioli pitched respectably, keeping the Chabot hitters off balance with curves, sliders, and fastballs. But he tired in the sixth inning and coach Domecus called on Rene Mariluch. Rene pitched out of a bases loaded jam.

"Mr. Consistency," otherwise known as Don Lyons, continued his astonishing batting streak. CCSF has played twenty conference games, with a record of ten wins and ten defeats. Don has had at least one hit in all games and is second in the league in batting average with .420.

Lyons is not only a strong hitter, but he plays first base flawlessly and is one of the team leaders.

Going into the eighth inning the score was tied at five runs a piece. Then the "City Stickers" went to work. Norris again led off with a single to get things going. He promptly stole second. With first base open the Chabot pitcher walked Lyons intentionally.

The next hitter up, Rich Zerga popped one out of the reach of the shortstop in short centerfield scoring Norris with the Ram's sixth run of the day.

It was enough to preserve the win, but Chabot made it exciting in the bottom of the ninth. They had runners on first and second with two outs and a three and two count on the hitter.

This writer was behind the plate catching, and called for a fastball. Rene Mariluch let it fly for strike three; the game was over: the Rams had won six to five.

Nothing new in the league's final standings. College of San Mateo clinched first place for the fifth year in a row. Winning isn't everything but it sure beats losing.

Ball Players Picked

Three CCSF Ram baseball players —pitcher Mike Norris, first baseman Don Lyons and outfielder Rich Zerga— were selected to the first team of the Golden Gate Conference league. The players are selected by the baseball coaches.

Norris had a 4-4 record for the Rams with an ERA of 1.61. Outfielder Zerga batted .387 for the season and first baseman Lyons topped the club with a .402 average.

Norris, the Oakland A's first choice in the 1973 baseball draft, has signed with the club.

He will be assigned to the A's Burlington farm club in the Class A Midwestern League.

Gym Team Wins

City College's gymnastic team won second place at the Consumnes River College meet on May 4-5.

Evening School Grows Larger
Courses Offered in 9 Places

From a small six-course evening program originating in Chinatown, CCSF's Evening Divisions off-campus college program has evolved into almost a separate unit of the college.

For the Fall '73 semester 123 courses are offered at nine different locations throughout the city. Classes are held in the Chinatown, Mission, Downtown, and Bayview-Hunter's Point areas.

Warren White, Dean of Evening Instruction, explained how this massive program came about, "In Fall '70, Dr. Louis Batamale, (now Chancellor of the college district), raised questions about the ethnic enrollments in the college, particularly the Chinese students."

White continued, "The percentage of Chinese day students came to approximately 29% of the student body, whereas Evening Division totaled only 4%. It wasn't that the Chinatown residents weren't interested in education; we figured that CCSF was too far and those interested couldn't get here."

"In Spring '71 the first classes convened in Chinatown and we had an interesting cross-section. There were many Caucasians in those classes," White remarked.

"These courses grew in popularity and demand. Soon other communities were asking for evening courses."

Currently the program has been experiencing difficulties in obtaining adequate facilities for instruction. Hardest hit are the Chinatown (operating out of four locations in that area) and Bayview-Hunters Point (operating out of Burnett school) programs.

"We'll keep expanding it to the limits of our ability" promised White. "It's difficult to find space in Chinatown and we can only hope that better facilities will be built."

White expressed the hope that the problems of the Bayview-Hunters Point program could be solved by the acquisition of some facilities at the Hunter's Point Naval Shipyard.

Presently the program offers such courses as criminology, political science, sociology, psychology, business, English, and other general interest courses. Classes are free but students must be City residents.

It is too late for students to try and enroll in these programs now; Dean White explained, "We're swamped right now with just processing students already enrolled. We couldn't take any more. We estimate that there will be almost 9,000 part-time students in this program."

Looking into the future, White predicted that further expansion will be possible "partly on our ability to stay abreast of the situation." He remarked that the proposed Downtown Educational Center would help solve many of the problems.

NIGHT COURSES EXPAND—Sociology proves to be a popular course in Chinatown for night classes.

Students Negotiate with Library
To Stock National Gay Newspaper

The Free Gay Student Association has run into its first conflict this semester with the CCSF library.

During the summer, the Gay students decided to donate to the library for the Periodicals section, a national Gay newspaper, The Advocate.

At the beginning of school FGSA president Spencer Nutting went to Frank Burke, in charge of periodicals, to make arrangements for setting up a place to display the paper.

Burke became upset and claimed, "You have no right to subscribe to a publication and to submit it to us without first consulting us on the matter.

"You are a bit too forward and I do not want to discuss this matter any further."

At this point, Nutting told Burke that he would like to bring the publication to Burke so that Burke may review it.

"That won't be necessary. I am refusing your request right now and I would recommend that you withdraw your subscription."

Before leaving Nutting attempted unsuccessfully to change Burke's mind.

Later Nutting and FGSA faculty advisor, Bob Dunbar, met with Iola Matteucig, the Head Librarian.

Mrs. Matteucig claimed that the library cannot take gifts from "special interest groups because then every group on campus will be after us to take their publications."

Matteucig went on to add, "Once we had an awful time with the Hari Krishnas. They gave us several of their publications, and when we wouldn't take them, they complained to the college president! We had an awful time and just don't want anymore trouble like that."

To compromise, Dunbar put the Advocate on reserve for one of his classes. The publication can be requested by name at the main desk in the library. Dunbar added, "At least we've got our foot in the door!"

"DA DA GOO GOO"—The children are speaking out for the Child Care Center at their mother's meeting with CCSF President Dr. Harry Buttimer.

Council Fails to Operate;
Buttimer Resolves Care Crisis

The Child Day Care Center started the semester with a problem; no money to pay the staff. After two unsuccessful attempts to meet with the Student Council the mothers and staff took their problem to Dr. Harry Buttimer, President of City College.

Their worries began when $1,000 that was allocated to them for the salaries of their staff was frozen, due to new Civil Service guidelines.

An emergency meeting of the planning committee was held to deal with the situation. It was agreed to use part of the supplementary budget which they receive from the Associated Students fund to pay for staff salaries. This action required approval from the Student Council.

Then their problem became too great to handle. The Student Council had not begun to function. Three seats were vacant due to resignations and others were vacant because no one showed at the meeting.

Dr. Buttimer had been confronted with similar situations in the past. But instead of having to deal with an angry group of veterans or student strikers, this time he had a room full of children and their mothers.

Their meeting took place in the conference room of the Educational Services Building with Edna Pope, Dean of Women, speaking in behalf of the Child Day Care Center. She explained the situation to the president who was sympathetic to the situation. He agreed to talk to the Civil Service Commission to see if the problem could be solved.

Later that day it was learned that the money would be released and that the matter was resolved.

Dr. Buttimer said, "Some kind of plan for emergency action should be instituted in the future to deal with situations such as this, when the Student Council isn't able to take care of its duties."

Vester Flanagan, Assistant Dean of Student Activities said, "It takes time for the Student Council to get things started since it is the beginning of the semester."

Draft End Halts Enrollment in Many Colleges

The nation-wide decrease in college enrollment doesn't seem to have hit City Collete — yet.

According to Kenneth Castellino, CCSF's Registrar, registration here is not down significantly. However, Castellino does say that enrollment has stopped growing. "We were having roughly a 10% per year growth from 1966 to 1972." Now this growth seems to have stopped.

The registration figures aren't all in yet, but Castellino believes that CCSF has "around 14,200" students this fall, compared to 14,430 last fall. While daytime enrollment has stabilized or decreased, evening enrollment increased 20% last year.

Students — even daytime ones — are also taking fewer units. One possible reason for this, Castellino speculates, is that with the draft ended, to be a full-time student is less important to male students.

He feels that the reduced enrollment does not indicate a reduced interest in learning, just "a reduced interest in getting credit for it."

BOOKSTORE BLUES? — The bookstore tries to anticipate student needs in advance but sometimes the bookshelves empty faster than they predict.

If the bookstore is out of the text you're looking for, don't panic. Books can be ordered by any student willing to put down a deposit. There is a one to three week waiting period for delivery.

Entrance Forms Discriminate

Married women enrolling in or returning to college in California encounter discrimination before they ever get on campus!

The residence questionnaire required by The California State University and Colleges has a portion exclusively for married women to complete.

Questions asking what state your husband regards as his permanent home, and his present actual whereabouts, sent us scurrying to check the college Bulletin 1972-1973. .

An excerpt from the Bulletin reveals that the residence of a married woman "is that of her husband unless she is separated . . ." according to the State Education Code, which describes the residency requirements necessary for admission to the state college system.

The questionnaire also wants to know if your husband is attending a campus of either The California State University and Colleges or the University of California.

Has your husband lived in California continuously for the past two years? If he hasn't, be prepared to list all the places he has lived during the two years immediately prior to moving to California, including the month and year.

Not only that, but you must indicate whether your husband has ever registered to vote, and give the state and date registered and date last voted in each state!

Turn these questions around — men aren't asked such things. So why ask them of married women? Is a wife a piece of property whose only status is that of her husband's?

Since this portion of the questionnaire seems arbitrary, we checked with the registrar's office at San Francisco State.

"You're wasting my time with your questions," replied a clerk in the registrar's office.

"If the application and residence questionnaire aren't fully completed, you will be rejected. That's all there is to it. If you have any more questions, check with the dean of students."

The secretary to Dean Charles A. Stone, Associate Dean of Students, Admissions and Records, said the Legislature determines residency requirements. Any further questions should be directed to one's Assemblyman or State Senator.

A spokeswoman for Senator Milton Marks (Rep-SF) said changes in the application or residence forms would require legislative action, which could take months or even years!

We feel the residence questionnaire's portion for married women is discriminatory and is a direct invasion of their privacy.

Certainly such questions are not in keeping with the spirit of the new Equal Rights Amendment. Women have a right to be regarded individually, not as extensions of their husbands.

We urge you to contact your Assemblyman or State Senator regarding revision of the residence questionnaire, so that action will be taken soon to end this discrimination against married women in California's college system.

Parking Problem Again

Finding a place to park on campus often calls for a lot of patience, not to mention lots of luck. There just aren't enough spaces for everyone.

For those who park on campus the permit fee is $7.50 per semester. It's not a bad bargain considering the $10 fine you pay if you are caught without one.

Buying a permit is also a way to support student activities. All revenue collected from permits goes into the Associated Students fund for extra-curricula activities such as football, film series, guest speakers and various student organizations.

The money collected for parking violations goes downtown to City Hall.

The City College Police Department appears to have a field day writing tickets. If you want a rough idea of the amount of damage they can do just follow a policeman for five or ten minutes.

If they issue 200 tickets a day at $10 each it amounts to $10,000 a week, $150,000 per semester. It's quite a price to pay for a parking violation.

If you feel you are getting ripped off and something ought to be done about it, go to the CCPD and purchase a permit. Then you have a legitimate bitch when you can't find a place to park. If you are enterprising enough you might wonder why there is an empty reservoir right next to the one full of cars.

Warning to S.F. Voters

San Francisco voters are threatened with gross misrepresentation. This threat stems from the proposed "congressional reapportionment".

While the need for just reapportionment is unquestioned, gerrymandering is uncalled for and illegal. But the Plan does just that.

Gerrymandering, the alotting of legislative districts in order to favor one party, was declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Westbury vs Sanders.

The State Supreme Court Special Masters Plan would strip Congressman William Mailliard (Republican) of his main voting strength. The constituents in the St. Francis Wood, southwestern Parnassus Heights, and most of the Sunset areas who have sent Mailliard to the House of Representatives for 20 years would be given to Congressman Philip Burton (Democrat).

Mailliard acquires the Fillmore, Western Addition, and the Haight-Ashbury areas, making his political future uncertain. He retains southern Marin county and Russian Hill.

Burton remains strong with the Mission, Visitation Valley, Potrero Hill, and the Bayview-Hunter's Point areas to support him.

In a state dominated by a Democrat-controlled legislature, the weakening of Mailliard and his chances for reelection appear as no coincidence.

Should the plan be approved by the State Supreme Court, the voters of San Francisco will receive the short end by having foisted upon them a new representative.

Under these conditions, the new representative may not be responsive to the satisfaction of the new constituents. In the campaign of 1972, the new representative might not otherwise have been elected.

In this instance, misrepresentation as well as political "rigging" would become a regrettable reality.

Question: Do Men and Women Differ Intellectually?

Stephanie Bowser, Pre-Med
In ways of thinking they are quite similar to me. Just certain things are touchy, like women's liberation. It's just certain subjects that they would differ on.

Joy Lacho, Theatre
Men and women are not different in their intellectualism. Women have been oppressed for so long and denied many educational pursuits, and are therefore judged intellectually inferior. There are many women who perform to the best of their ability and surpass the attempts of their men-fellows.

Robert Rouse, Cinema
There are some differences, but I'm not sure they are qualitative differences. I'm not going to say one way of thinking is better than the other. Men and women are physically different so it stands to reason that their thought processes would be different.

Dan Kaplan, Cinema
Questions of intelligence in general are specifically related to factors of cultural conditioning and of socialization mechanizations. There is no inherent intelligence that can be assigned to male or female. In a free society with no blatant discrimination against women, I think women would perform just as well if not better than men in any test of intelligence.

Eleanor Ayling, Communicative Disorders
I don't think they differ intellectually. It's just conditioning response. Women are used to responding emotionally and to respond intellectually is something relatively new.

Francine Morin, Humanities
Women generally perceive things in a more personal way. The accent on their perspective is different. But other than that, I think they are the same.

Where Is the Missing 23rd Phone?

If you want to make a phone call on a pay phone around campus, you will have to walk a bit and probably wait in line.

There are 23 pay phones on campus according to the phone company, but The Guardsman found only 22 on a trek around campus.

Here's where the public phones are located:

In the cafeteria there are two next to the Pierre Coste Room and two in the main dining area.

In the Student Union, there are two on the main floor.

In the Science building, there are four phones on the first floor, and one in the basement, next to the ice cream machine at the south end.

In Cloud Hall, there are two phones on the "200" floor and three upstairs in the library. There is supposed to be one other phone somewhere in Cloud Hall, but it couldn't be found. Where could it be?

In the Administration building, there is a phone in the hall leading to the Registrar's office, one around the corner to the left, and one upstairs across from the office of the Dean of Business Affairs.

There is one phone in the old [illegible] building and two in the Visual Arts building, though one was out of order at press time.

All phones are busy throughout the day, but the best bet for making a call without delay seems to be the one in the corner of the Administration building and the two in the Visual Arts building.

If you are desperate, there is a phone in front of Safeway, one at the Shell station next to McDonald's, and one across the street at the Gulf station, all down Ocean Avenue towards the beach.

You'll have to find the water fountains on your own.

Allman Brothers Rock Bay with Vibrating Music

CROWD PLEASERS - The Allman Brothers strike a bucolic pose for their fans.

In the music world there are few groups with such a history as the Allman Brothers Band.

After four albums the group still was only an underground group on the West Coast, though they were sell-out material in their Eastern and Southern homegrounds.

When their live album was released from a Fillmore East concert the group began to break in the West.

With this current album, Brothers and Sisters, already gold and the nation's biggest seller, and their first single, Ramblin' Man, also gold, the new Allman Brothers made their first Bay Area appearance in over a year.

No longer catering to the "underground" crowd, the Allman Brothers were greeted at their two sold-out concerts by a mixed audience of teeny boppers and older fans.

The show opened with the Marshall Tucker Blues Band, a Southern group recording on the Capricorn label.

The group, sounding like the Allman Brothers much of the time, relies heavily on lead, vocals, and rhythm to generate their lively southern sound.

They played selections from their debut album, which was very well received by the energetic audience.

Marshall Tucker, leader of the group, was outstanding on guitars and with his vocals, while the talented saxophonist doubled on flute.

The blend of sounds and energy was impressive, at worst; completely stunning at best.

The Allman Brothers came on to be greeted by a standing ovation from the anxious fans.

The show opened with Wasted Words, a fine vocal tune accented by organ and guitar, and proceeded to include tunes from all of their albums with the exception of the first Bold Records release.

The selection drew heavily from the Live At Fillmore East album, using all tunes except for Hot Lanta.

Songs from the Brothers and Sisters album were Jessica, Ramblin' Man, and Come and Go Blues.

Dickey Betts' guitar was aflame throughout both of the Allmans' sets, and Gregg was likewise inspiring with his vocal renditions of the favorites and his exceptional organ playing.

The tight rhythm duo of Butch Trucks and Jai Johan Johanson (Jaimoe), each playing a full drum set filled the auditorium with a vigorous beat and backed the groups playing perfectly.

Newcomers Lamar Williams on bass and Chuck Leavel on piano stayed in the background for the majority of the night venturing out only at spaced intervals.

Chuck Leavell contributed a number of exceptional solos on Come and Go Blues and Statesboro Blues, but Lamar's only solo came during Les Bres In A Minor where he was only able to remind of Berry Oakley's unfortunate absence.

Richard Betts sang only during Ramblin' Man leaving all other vocal chores to Gregg Allman.

Richard's guitar playing was evident in every song. Switching from his famous Les Paul to a glittering guitar, he stimulated memories of the late Duane Allman at his finest.

The entire show was a rewarding and invigorating experience, though not without flaw.

Campus Police Are Criminologists

Do you know who those people are, who walk around City College wearing police-like uniforms?

They are City College students who are majoring in Criminology and doing "laboratory" hours as campus police.

The conglomeration of people on the campus force include: 2 Blacks, 6 Orientals, 1 Samoan, 9 Caucasians, 7 females and one chief-Gerald de Girolamo.

De Girolamo said, "The biggest headache is the campus parking problem. On the average, 20 parking tickets are issued daily."

He explained that more tickets are issued at the beginning of each semester because people don't adhere to parking regulations.

Campus police are sworn in as special officers and deputized by San Francisco Police Chief Donald Scott.

What if a campus policeman catches someone smoking grass? de Girolamo explained, "Catching marijuana smokers is not a priority. A campus policeman will ask for identification, then fill out an information card which will be kept on file, in the campus police office and does not go out of the office."

"It's very seldom that someone is taken 'downtown' for simply smoking grass," stated the chief.

Regarding the image of the campus police, de Girolamo explained he could see no great problem. He said the campus police were not there to only enforce the laws but also to give directions, direct traffic, and help in emergency situations.

De Girolamo also stated that the seven women on the force have the same duties as the men.

HAPPY OCCASION—Dean Hillsman, Brenda Gonzales and Dean Flannigan share in sad farewell party for Marion Geverty.

Farewell to Popular Marion

Marion Geverty, secretary to Assistant Dean Vester Flanagan (Director of Student Activities), was honored last Friday at a party hosted by her friends and co-workers, from the Student Activities office.

The informal gathering, held in the Student Union Building, was to say goodbye to Miss Gevertz, whose job is being terminated by the Civil Service Commission.

"Marion," as she is affectionately called by the students who work with her, has been employed at the College for the past five years. She began working in the Student Activities office this past January.

Deeply touched by the gifts and best wishes of the students, Marion only said that she hopes the new secretary will carry on where she left off.

Dean Flanagan, saddened by Marion's leaving, said, in proposing a toast, "You'll really be missed around here, especially by me; you were the greatest secretary that I ever had."

AS President, William Goode conveyed his best wishes to her on behalf of the entire student body when he stated, "Marion, We'll miss you."

Feminist Leader Speaks and Sings

Feminist party leader and founder Flo Kennedy, talked to approximately 100 enthusiatic students at the CCSF Little Theater.

Ms. Kennedy opened with a short and satirical song about Watergate. Members of the audience sang along, adding to the novelty of the occasion.

The topic of the meeting was "Sexism, Racism, and Oppression." The ideas covered by Kennedy provided insight into the areas of operation regarding the Feminist Movement and its goals.

Some of the issues covered were Racism. Oppression — the point being that everyone is oppressed in some way or another: Media Misuse — the interpretation of news as a tool against political organizations and other social fractions not in favor with media social views.

Re-action was enthuastic during the hour discussion. Interest was held by Ms. Kennedy's direct and personable style. She related well with her audience, providing a casual atmosphere to summarize the activities of her involvement.

Adding to Ms. Kennedy's style was her attire which included a brown Australian bush hat, a white knit sweater, tan jacket, matching pants and brown boots. Ms. Kennedy's manner was stately and confident while being admittedly outspoken.

Ms. Kennedy closed the meeting by announcing a conference of 130 chapters of the Feminist Movement to be held September 28-29-30 at the Clarimont Hotel in Berkeley. Interested people may check with the hotel for the time.

Rams Lose 26-13 To Delta Mustangs

The City College Rams, unable to overcome offensive line miscues, lost to the San Joaquin Delta Mustangs, 26-13.

Despite recovering four Mustang fumbles, three of them inside the 30 yard line, penalties and poor execution by the Rams killed vital drives.

The Rams drew first blood on a 29-yard pass from quarterback Dan Hayes to wide receiver Tim O'Shea who carried two tacklers into the end zone with him.

San Joaquin tied it up in the second quarter with a John Gay reverse for 25 yards.

The second half started all too dismally with Mustang tailback Mike Nealy breezing through the porous Ram defense. Out of the 61 yards gained on the scoring drive, Nealy accounted for 46, including seven yards on a touchdown run.

By now the Rams had become totally stymied even with their own offense. They repeatedly jumped offsides, missed blocking assignments, and performed the ultimate ineptitudes.

By now the Mustangs were unstoppable as they moved inexorably down field towards another score. Again Nealy supplied the scoring blow with a one-yard plunge.

Before the Ram defense could rest, they were summoned once again to stop the San Joaquin offense, maybe. They watched futilely as Mustang quarterback, Don Mack, sneaked in from the three-yard line.

Now desperate and short of time in the fourth quarter, Hayes turned to his aerial game to try and capture some lost respect and maybe even a big victory. After three vital completions, Hayes uncorked a 31-yard pass to O'Shea for a first and goal situation.

There Eric Day scored on a one-yard plunge. Hayes tried once again, but a fourth down fumble ended any comeback hopes

Water Polo Swims into Season with Many Problems

Although relatively unknown on the City College of San Francisco campus, water polo does indeed exist. Surprisingly enough, CCSF sports its own water polo team, which finished disappointingly last in its 1972 league season.

Coach Curt Decker must cope with numerous problems in trying to improve his club.

"The lack of a swimming facilitiy at City College hurts us because of practice time," explains Decker.

"We are forced to start our practice sessions at 6:45 am because this is the only time that Balboa Pool is available to us. This inconveniences many players who must ride the street car to practice."

Another problem hindering the team is a deficiency in experience.

"Since San Francisco high schools have no water polo teams, our athletes lack playing experience. This, of course, hurts our team."

One player who doesn't lack experience is veteran center-guard John Barcojo. Barcojo was voted to the honorable mention all-conference squad last year. Flanking him at the other guard positions are returnees John Mohr and Brian Holton.

The forward spots will be manned by Brad Krause on the right, Tony Campagna (a Peninsula League transfer) in the center, and either Art Mancia or Justin Smith on the left. The goalkeeper is Bob Annecston.

As one would expect, league competition is extremely tough.

"Out of 16 leagues in California, four teams in our league alone made the State playoffs last season," Decker points out, proving that his league ranks as one of the best in the State.

With Foothill College no longer in the league, Coach Decker sees San Mateo and Diablo Valley Colleges as the league's top teams.

Research Projects On Minipill and Iud

Women looking for contraception may be interested in participating in research projects of a "Minipill" and a new IUD beginning now at the San Francisco Clinic of Planned Parenthood.

A year long study of a half strength birth control pill is being undertaken to determine the lowest dose which birth control hormones can be effective to prevent pregnancy with the least side effects.

The new "Minipill" and the IUD and all associated medical care are free.

Volunteers for both studies must be in general good health, over 18 years of age and sure that they will remain in the Bay area for the following 12 months.

Interested women may call Nancy Faerstein or Debie Drinker at the San Francisco Clinic of Planned Parenthood, 2340 Clay Street.

Changes in Science Building New Labs and Lecture Halls

The Science building on the CCSF campus is currently undergoing extensive remodeling. According to Victor Graff, Associate Director of Facilities and Planning, the completion date will be August 31, 1974.

Originally estimated at $1.2 million, the cost rose to $1.5 million due to "changes in requests".

The building lends "itself to remodeling", says Graff. "To demolish this building and rebuild it would cost $10 million!"

Graff conceded that there was an inconvenience to teachers. "we had to rent space in a church on Ocean. There's a definite shortage of classrooms."

When teachers return to the building en force, they will find "tremendous changes. Some former classrooms will be labs; what once were labs may be lecture halls," explained Graff.

QUECHA INDIANS—One of many beautiful photographs portraying the life of the South American community.

The exhibit of 32 photographs documenting the daily life of the Quechua Indians, taken by a 21 year old photographer, is being presented in the Visual Arts Building by the Photography Department.

Rolando Garces, spent one year with the Indians traveling from village to village in the Peruvian Mountains.

Garces pointed out that the Indians spoke little Spanish. He communicated with them with the Spanish they knew and learned phrases in Quechua, their native tongue.

"The language is completely different than Spanish. I also used sign language."

Most people have problems being accepted by the Indians because many people have taken advantage of Indians in the past.

"I was accepted by talking to and making friends with the children, and then I would meet their parents."

Most of the Indians had seen cameras before but very few had seen photographs, especially of themselves.

"What was interesting was that they saw their own lifestyle and that the solutions to their problems were to be found by themselves."

Reflecting on his past, Garces related, "I've been into photography since I was 13, when I was photographing for a junior high newspaper."

Garces will return to Laredo, Texas after the exhibit closes here on October 12, where he will work on a book about his experiences with the Indians.

New Student Aid Programs Offered

This year the State Scholarship and Loan Commission is offering 1,700 new scholarships to currently enrolled college students.

These scholarships can be utilized at any accredited four-year college in California. Students attending community colleges during the 1974-1975 school year can have their scholarships held in reserve until such time as they attend a four year college.

The awards range from $500 to $2,200 at independent colleges, $300 to $600 at the University of California and the amount of fees charged to students at Cal State University and Colleges.

Applications are available from the Financial Aids office or by writing to the State Scholarship and Loan Commission, 1410 Fifth Street, Sacramento, California 95814.

Applications must be filed with the Commission by midnight, November 20, 1973, and the 1974-1975 Parents' Confidential Statements must be filed with the College Scholarship Service by midnight, December 11, 1973. Scores on the Scholastic Aptitude Test must also be submitted as part of the application.

New Grant Program

A new student financial aid program is available for the first time to full-time students for the 1973-1974 school year.

This Basic Educational Opportunity Grant Program is designed to assist eligible students planning to enter colleges, universities, community colleges, approved vocational and technical schools, and hospital schools of nursing.

For this academic year, $122 million will be available to assist an estimated 425,000 students. The maximum award is $452 and the average award is $200.

Investigative Report: Poor Facilities Hamper Goals of Child Care Center

"Wear a sweater," was the solution given to a staff member of the City College Child Care center when she contacted Buildings and Grounds about the lack of heat at the Center.

If you have ever visited the Child Care Center you may have arrived on your backside, since the only way to get to it is down one of the several paths on the east side of Cloud Hall. Try doing this with a child or two in tow.

A parent committee asked that steps be built on one of these paths and was told construction on a new building in that area would start some time in the next five years and the steps would just have to be torn down.

On Wednesday, September 19, painters working on one end of the bungalow that houses the Center poured paint down the drain in the middle of the children's play area. This caused a flooding of the "playground" that lasted over two hours.

The concrete outside play area in front of the center is a sore spot with many parents and staff members.

Last semester, an architect offered to provide the blueprint and materials at a low cost of $1,000, for a jungle jim type construction if the Center would provide the labor.

The problem they face now is raising the money to pay laborers to construct the project. The last suggestion was that "two women could do the work of one man, so let's get to it, mothers."

PLAYGROUND? — Children as well as parents are wondering when plans will become a reality.

The Center can keep each child for no longer than four hours per day. This is very limiting to parents in terms of class scheduling.

But State law says that in order to keep a child longer than this, there must be facilities for providing hot lunches and naps; facilities which do not exist at the Center.

At last week's staff-parent meeting there was little dissension as to the overall goals as well as needs of the Center.

Katherine Everson the friendly head teacher of the Center, opened the meeting with her views on what the Center should provide for the children.

"I'm really concerned about providing more than just baby sitting. I want to make each child feel like he belongs here. This is not happening now. It will take a lot of time and work."

Ms. Everson capsuled her ideas into what she called the Responsive Model Method. There are two goals to this curriculum.

One is to establish a positive self-concept. This means no competition between children, no comparisons to other children or to "standards."

The second goal is intellectual competence. In this area Ms. Everson includes sensory development through games and activities; language development through interaction with the staff; formation of classificational and relational concepts; and problem solving.

One of Ms. Everson's primary goals is establishing a "multi-cultural curriculum".

"The curriculum should reflect the different ethnic backgrounds of the children who attend the Center. Right now we have one Spanish-speaking teacher who we are in danger of losing because she cannot live on her salary from the three hours a day the budget has limited her to."

Many of the parents present at the meeting felt the administration was not very sensitive to the needs of the Center. Extended facilities were called for, as well as supplies, and of course money.

"The center is as important as the bookstore, the cafeteria, and any other place on campus," was the cry of a veteran mother embittered by several semesters of fighting for the same "necessities."

"What we have to do is re-educate many people. We are not just providing custodial care. This can be a real learning experience for all of us," said Ms. Everson in an effort to wrap up the conference.

"Quality day care is a right," she continued. In the future not only colleges but industry will have to provide day care."

At present there are three half-time teachers, three work-study people, and two lab assistants caring for upwards of 60 children.

None of these staff members are authorized to work more than four hours per day.

New Probe Into Kent State

Last month's announcement that the Justice Department is reopening its investigation into the Kent State shootings represents the first favorable government reaction to the pressures of private citizens, including parents of the victims, and a staggering accumulation of allegations.

Terrence Norman, an acknowledged former FBI informer posed, as a photographer the day of the incident. He allegedly fired a pistol preceding the Guard fusillade, possibly triggering the shooting by the Guardsmen.

Norman is quoted in a letter from an Ohio National Guard commander to Senator Birch Bayh as having told police, "I think I shot one of the students."

A Little Rock, Arkansas newsman saw Norman's gun turned over to a campus detective who opened the chamber and reportedly said, "My God, he fired four shots. What the hell do we do now?"

The FBI report of the incident said Norman's gun had not been fired.

Arguments that National Guardsmen engaged in a conspiracy to open fire moments before the shooting began are based on reports that Guardsmen were seen to have grouped briefly at the bottom of a hill, march to its top, turn almost in unison and begin firing.

A National guard sergeant was photographed giving a gesture with corresponds to a hand signal for an order to fire a moment before his men turned and opened fire.

A team of Justice Department lawyers, headed by Robert Murphy, urged then Attorney General John Mitchell to authorize a grand jury investigation on the basis of the original FBI report. Both Mitchell and his successor, Richard Kleindienest, refused to order grand juries.

Over three years of legal legerdemain have added irony to the declaration of Brigadier General Canterbury on the morning of the shooting, "These students are going to find out what law and order is all about."

Pro Football Blackout Lifted

With Congress acting with such unprecedented speed, the National Football League home game blackout rule was lifted, to the dismay of owners and fans alike.

The reasons for the owner's dismay is strictly a monetary one, that is, a matter of dollars and cents.

Actually the owners' seemingly complex problem breakd down into a two-fold problem, the first part being quite obvious. If fans don't buy tickets, the club doesn't make any money.

The second part of the problem is more complex. Fans who already have tickets purchased and decide to stay home and view the game from a better angle will also end up costing the owner money due to the fact that a large portion of the stadium revenue comes from the parking and food concessions.

With those two contributing factors, a person can readily see why the owners were so vehemently opposed to the bill.

On the other hand, the fans' problem is even more complex. Their problem range from monetary to morals.

Fans with limited incomes find it quite difficult to attend games, especially if they have families. But a bigger problem lies with the fan who does have the money to spend on a seat.

If he does not have season tickets, he is in a bind as to the location of his seat. Why should he be stuck in a poor location, when he can stay home and have a 50 yard-line seat the entire season.

This now leads us to the moral side of the issue. These fans have an obligation not only to the home team, but to the less fortunate fans who for some reason or another cannot attend home games. In essence this is why and who the blackout is for.

As is the case in any aspect of life, there is always those who think of only themselves. Such is the case in this issue. It boils down to a case of the haves and the have-nots. The haves are those with the money and the tickets, and the have nots are those with nothing who must rely on people to attend the home contests in order to see their team in action.

If the people of America can't work together on this small problem, how can they function as a cohesive unit on a major issue?

Ever Wondered Why?

It takes a lot of muscle to open a door to the science building.

The clock in one of the largest classrooms on campus (V115) is off more than six hours.

The bungalows don't have clocks.

* * *

The cafeteria has replaced ceramic coffee cups with paper ones that burn your hand.

* * *

The faculty parking lots are not clearly marked.

* * *

There are ants in the science building jelly bean machine.

The only way to get air into some of the bungalows is by opening the door.

Editors Take Over

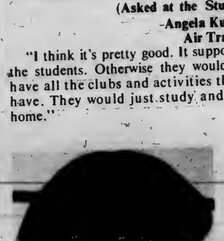
Doug Pon Managing Editor

Staff appointments for the Guardsman were announced this week with Doug Pon in the top slot as Managing Editor.

Co-editors Richard Hourigan and Esther MacLennan will be in charge of the News desk. Cheryl Jennings and Neil Calson will co-edit Features and Mike Skeels and Phillip Tom will head the Sports desk.

A team of three journalists, Kathy Hurley, Sharon Carbone, and Florence Wong will be responsible for Makeup.

Staff photographers are Alan Lee, Gerald Louie, and Lawrence Wong.



Pon stated, "We have a great staff of editors and reporters this semester. We look forward to a rewarding journalistic experience for everyone involved in the production of the Guardsman."

"Although the newspaper is published by journalism students as a lab project, we encourage anyone on campus to submit newsworthy items. Phone us at ext. 446 or drop by Bungelow 203."

Question: WHAT DO YOU THINK OF STUDENT COUNCIL?

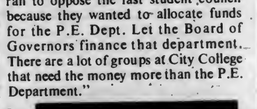
(Asked at the Student Union Building)

Angela Kuver
Air Travel

"I think it's pretty good. It supports the students. Otherwise they wouldn't have all the clubs and activities they have. They would just study and go home."

Karen Lynette Smith
Criminology

"I don't know anything about it. They haven't done anything to make me aware of it."



Corrine LaBreque
Undeclared Major

"I don't know. Being ignorant, I just don't know. I'm one of those apathetic students who just comes to school, works full-time, and then goes home.

George Salameh
Radiology Technology

They have meetings, but no actions result. I don't see any chance of clubs getting money this semester because most of the Council belongs to the football team. Most of the money has seemed to go to the athletic teams.

Fayez Darras
Business Administration

"There are a lot of people on it who don't know anything about it. They just ran to oppose the last student council because they wanted to allocate funds for the P.E. Dept. Let the Board of Governors finance that department. There are a lot of groups at City College that need the money more than the P.E. Department."

Whitney Neat,
Computer Science

"I think this year the student council is more organized. They are trying to have a better relationship with students on campus. They're trying to promote more activities to try and bring the students closer together.

Nude Student Exposes Views on Behavior

The heat wave of September 27 brought a different experience to City College.

On the north lawn of the Visual Arts Building, a woman student lay topless in the sun.

When asked if she was concerned about people making comments about her nudity, she replied, "People are people. They're the same as they were a year ago."

"I'm the only person who has changed. I don't believe in social conformity."

"I don't feel that male chavinism is such a big thing. If somebody gets turned onto me, let them. Everyone knows what basic human anatomy looks like and if people want to gawk, let them! It's their privilege."

JIMI HENDRIX—Late rock artist is the subject of a forgetable film.

"Hendrix" Disappointing

Contrary to reviews from London critics, this movie is neither "tremendously exciting" or "deeply moving."

The movie, sanctioned by the Hendrix estate, is very bland, even with Hendrix's acts with his amps and his celestial playing, and will probably bore all but his most loyal fans.

It does not go into Jimi's head or heart very deeply and the only moving scene is one in which he plays acoustic guitar, singing the blues and appearing very sad and vulnerable.

It does have many famous people, ranging from Mick Jagger to Germaine Greer, giving their views and opinions of him, and close friends and lovers telling "secrets," such as his "tremendous interest in Dylan" and his sensitivity about not being "black enough" for the brothers back home.

It is a surface examination of the man and legend at best and a person truly interested in how sensitive and tormented and deeply spiritual Hendrix was would do much better studying his lyrics and hearing him cry out his songs.

If you'd still like to see a movie about him, Rainbow Bridge is much better.

Red Buddha Theatre Brings A Celebration for the Senses

If the Red Buddha theatre's production of "The Man From the East" is still playing in San Francisco when you read this, you would be giving yourself a real treat if you went to see it. The show is unique, exciting and a joy to all the senses.

It could be called a Japanese Rock-Musical-Satire-Love Poem, but the presence of the graceful dancers make it close to a ballet.

Simple mime-like scenes are performed with such grace and beauty and surrounded with such vibrant music that even when you are lost as to the "meaning" of a scene, you are totally caught up in the pageantry and excitement and it doesn't matter.

The composer, director and choreographer is Stomu Yamash'ta, 26, son of a Japanese symphony conductor and considered the "finest percussionist in the world" by many critics.

Here he has fused Japanese folk music and western rock and jazz in such a manner as to perfectly harmonize with his scenes of ancient and modern Japan.

The story centers around a little lame girl and a hunchback who appear throughout the varied settings of the performance. A program is provided which explains the many things which are happening on stage, in the aisles and in the air.

The show has been compared to "Hair" and other productions, but except for the mass joyousness found in both, the similarity ends.

"Hair" was very much in the tradition of past musicals in format; "The Man From the East" is in the tradition of life itself.

Advice Center Asks for Volunteers

The Student Advice Center, recently moved to the booth in the Student Union, is much more than an "advice center."

According to Trina Semorile, Director of the Center, "We not only help students with questions regarding classes, teachers, administrators and any campus activities, but also serve as a switchboard, handling calls from people who are upset and need someone to talk with."

"In addition, we provide information to people who may want to attend City College, publish the Student Bulletin, which lists activities of interest, and provide a housing board with current rental listings. If we can't help a person here, we'll refer him to someone who can."

The Center has two paid staff members, trimmed from seven a few semesters ago, and is looking for volunteers to help out for a few hours a week in return for student leadership units and the satisfaction that comes from helping people.

The Center is open from 10-4 on school days and can be reached at 587-7272 extension 535 or 585-6500.

Charmer On the Keyboards

With quick and precise hands, classical pianist, Alexander Kapoostin filled the Little Theatre with his lively music.

Alexander, an accomplished pianist and also a college staff member, presented 10 themes during his hour performance.

His selections included compositions by Brahms, Cho,in, and Liszt.

The audience was attentive and respectful throughout, breaking the silence only to deliver the much deserved applause.

The concert was part of the continuing series of music presentations at the Little Theatre. Listings are posted for future shows.

A Roller Derby Speedster Returns To City College Life

If you want to know about bumps, jabs, and pain, Allen Littles is the man to talk to.

His name may sound familiar to you especially when you associate him with Bob Woodbury, Ronnie Robinson, and Tony Roman.

Allen Littles is a former professional roller derby skater who is now attending at CCSF.

A native San Franciscan, Littles grew up with the ambition of getting involved in sports. But Littles considered himself too short for most sports in high school except for track.

At 16, Littles decided to devote his life to roller derby and entered himself into the roller derby school.

In 1967, at the age of 18, Littles entered the professional skating rink. His skating career started with the local team, the Bay Bombers. He only stayed with the Bombers for a week, then moved on to the Pioneers, the Braves, the Red Devils, and the Jolters. In 1972, Littles left the Jolters and professional roller derby.

Littles' reason for joining roller derby was, "It was one way to travel and to see America." But life was hectic on the road as they were constantly traveling from town to town, staying no more than two days at any one motel.

Compared to other professional sports, salaries were quite low. When Littles retired, he was making $235 a week.

Littles talked of the effect of violence of roller derby toward the youth. "Roller derby attracts fans mostly from the lower middle class on down to people who live in the poverty areas. Kids from this income group are already affected by the violence in their neighborhood, so they know know what violence is."

Littles is a Business Administration major with intentions of moving over to California State University, San Francisco.

Littles also dreamed of being in a rock group for many years. Presently, his dream has come true as Littles is the lead singer for Cool Spice, a local band.

And for that question that everybody wants to ask about the violence, Littles states, "No, it's not phony . . . but at times it is dramatic."

Rams Dunk Contra Costa Polo Team 9-6

Indeed there are those here at CCSF who are ignorant of the ways of our water polo team, but there is one school which isn't . . . that being Contra Costa Junior College, which suffered a brutal defeat at the hands of our team.

The 9-6 victory was the first seasonal win for our team, a victory which could only be accomplished through hard work by the team, its coach, Mr. Decker, and outside advisor, Richard Glass.

Early morning and afternoon swim workouts proved their worth as quick swimming John Barcojo and Toni Campagna swam away to score three and two goals respectively.

But they were not alone in the offensive game as Brad Krause, Art Mancia, Sy Wiggi, and Bob Annecston scored goals to round out an aggressive, well-played game.

John Mohr did much to provide a well knit defense during the game, keeping Contra Costa's score down to six points . . . an unusual feat for CCSF. Perhaps most instrumental in our defense was goalie Justin Smith who, at 6'4", 210 lbs., allowed very few players, let alone scoring shots, threaten his goal.

It's unfortunate students at CCSF do not discover the sometimes explosive power of our team as their opponents often do. The games begin at 3:30 each Wednesday at Balboa Pool and the admission is free.

Hard Hitting Rams Upset Corsairs 14-8

With a hard hitting defense and good quarterbacking by Dan Hayes' the City College Rams upset top ranked College of the Redwoods, 14-8. Though marred by penalties, fumbles, and blown calls by officials, the Rams were quite impressive.

Quarterback Dan Hayes exhibited excellent playcalling, extreme poise, and a strong passing arm. He completed 18 of 31 passes for 173 yards and 2 touchdowns.

Complimenting Hayes' passing were the efforts of backs Eric Day, Bobby McCutcheon, Lee Britton, and Steve Drane who collectively gained 131 yards.

The story belongs to the defense, however. Performing brilliantly, the Ram defense frustrated the Redwood team. Linebackers Bill Goode and Steve Coffee cut off Corsair running backs with uncanny consistency.

Speedy cornerback Mel Washington broke up key passes with superb defensive efforts. Mel accounted for 4 broken pass plays.

The start of the game was dubious as the Rams were halted on their first offensive series. Before the Redwood team could pat itself on the back, they fumbled on their 36-yard line.

Wasting no time Dan Hayes unleashed a 36-yard touchdown pass to Dwight Williams for the first score of the game. Kicker Art Larson added the conversion to give the Rams a 7-0 lead.

Slightly stunned, the Redwood team was unable to mount a drive until midway into the second quarter. After recovering a fumble on the Ram 21-yard line, the Corsairs marched towards the Ram goal line. A dive for the goal line on fourth down died on the 2-yard line.

For the rest of the half both teams traded position on the field, but it was evident that the Rams were a better team. Each offensive drive showcased the Ram's versality.

When the second half began, the Rams took charge on their first offensive drive. Mixing his plays, Hayes moved the team down to the 3 yard line where he pitched a bullet to Tim O'Shea for a touchdown. Larson added the conversion with 6:10 left in the 3rd quarter.

Although the Ram offense didn't score any more points, it consistently ate the clock up to prevent any chances for the Corsairs.

With 36 seconds left in the game, the Corsairs scored on a 4 yard pass. A 2 point conversion was successful, but almost no time remained. A furtile outside kick was tried to no avail and the Corsairs 34-game win streak has ended.

Hayes' reaction to the victory was: "This is the biggest thrill of my life. We're going all the way this year. This team can do it."

Mel Washington was just as exuberant saying, "It feels great. The papers (referring to the article by the Examiner) talked about number one College of the Redwoods and said nothing about us. But we beat 'em."

Coach Dutch Elston appeared a little bit more subdued, but it was apparent that the victory pleased him. His reaction to the win was a simple, "It feels very, very nice."

Student Police Attacked on Campus

A campus police officer was hit, on October 4, with a blunt instrument. The officer was hit from behind, while performing his night duties. He was then taken to Mission Emergency Hospital, where he was treated and released.

Another assault on a campus policeman was reported on October 8. The officer was approached by the assailant, who asked him for a light, then hit him in the stomach.

The officers involved were not named but it is known that they were not hurt seriously.

Chief of Campus Police, Gerald de Girolamo said, "Because of a limited budget we had to cut back our personnel." On duty every night are three full-time civil service security guards and an unspecified number of part-time campus police.

The total budget for this semester is $30,000. Chief de Girolamo had asked for $160,000. Last semester the campus police received a budget of $38,000.

CCSF Receives More Funding

City College of San Francisco was allotted $40,000 for the disadvantaged students program.

These funds came from the more than $1.5 million alloted to community colleges by the Board of Governors for occupational education.

The funds were apportioned to individual college districts under the Federal Vocational Education Act.

Distributed in five categories, it includes programs for disadvantaged students, work-study, cooperative work experience programs, exemplary programs and research.

Funding for work study programs in occupational education was awarded to 55 colleges throughout California, totaling more than $226,000.

Bugged by the Flu? Student Health is offering flu immunizations November 1, and December 6, from 10 am to 12 noon.

The preventive vaccine is administered in two doses, so plan to come both days. Each shot costs $1.50.

Immunization is recommended for those who have chronic heart disease, respiratory disorders, metabolic disorders such as diabetes and renal disease. Immunization is not recommended for routinely healthy persons.

Tragedy Strikes Football Team With Death of Player

Tragedy struck the campus Saturday with the sudden death of John Albert Morgan, 25 year old student and member of the football team.

A flag flying at half-mast in the gloomy fog of Monday morning announced the death of this student and father of two small children.

Morgan collapsed in the locker room approximately 30 minutes after the 22-21 loss to Chabot College. Efforts to revive him were unsuccessful.

Morgan, a native of San Francisco, starred as defensive tackle for the City College Rams for the past two seasons. Coach Elston called Morgan "a fine defensive tackle and outstanding in his position."

An active member of the community, Morgan was a coach in the Police Athletic League and a member of the Board of Directors of the Lincoln High School Wranglers Club.

John A. Morgan - Deceased

Student Council voted to send flowers to the funeral, which was held on Tuesday, October 16 at St. Cecilia's Church. Burial followed at Holy Cross Cemetery.

Student Council also vowed to look into setting up a scholarship fund for Morgan's children, ages 4 and 6.

Joseph Alessi, instructor in the music department, will donate receipts of the first band concert on December 11 to the proposed fund.

Morgan is survived by his wife, Christine L. Morgan, and their two children, Barbara and William.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING—Spiro Agnew is the second Vice President of the United States to resign. His resignation on October 10th was unique because it was forced by political and legal pressures.

Unlike John C. Calhoun, who relinquished the office to become a Senator, Agnew leaves the second highest post in the United States government as a discredited public official. For campus reactions to the historic event, see page 2.

Prop. 1 to Raise Tuitions

On November 6, California voters will decide the fate of Governor Reagan's Tax Initiative, Proposition One, in an election considered to be more important than next year's gubernatorial contest.

Undoubtedly, Proposition One will affect all college and university students in California.

Basically, the proposed initiative will amend the California State Constitution to limit the amount of revenues that the state may raise and the expenditures the state may make.

It will also change the taxing prerogatives of both state and local governments.

The goal of this initiative is to relieve taxes in the coming years. It is estimated by Reagan's administration that an average family will save $17,000 within the next 15 years.

If the initiative is passed, many new educational programs will be reduced or eliminated, especially at the college level.

Also, all students attending Community Colleges, including CCSF, be subject to an annual tuition of $100.

Students attending State Universities and Colleges could be charged a $200 annual tuition in addition to the current fees of $118.

The increased tuitions would immediately go into effect in 1974.

There is a possibility of the University of California tuition being raised to help reinstate programs reduced or eliminated because of cutbacks necessitated by the initiative.

It is estimated that the state will receive about $121 million for 1974 from the tuitions of State Universities and Colleges and the Community Colleges.

Students attending private institutions will find the initiative eliminating State subsidies for private institutions.

Four programs are associated with the subsidies: the State Scholarship Program, the Graduate Fellowship Program, the College Opportunity Grant Program, and the Medical Student Contract Program.

Agnew and the Constitution

Is the American system of government collapsing? Some feel that democracy is dying. Quite the contrary!

This whole political mess that has surfaced is one of the greatest events in American history. The system of democracy in this country does work.

People in America are realizing that the concept of checks and balances, born in the minds of the fathers of the Constitution, is a way of exercising restraint upon elective officials.

Despite reports in some newspapers that the United States is losing esteem in the eyes of the world, the United States has gained in its personal image among young people in some countries.

"With Watergate exposures and subsequent congressional attempts to regulate future election campaigning, I see that your Democracy is all that has promised to be. The proof is in the power of the people," writes Hideki Minami, a student at Sophia University, Tokyo, Japan.

Students in England, France, and Germany have commented that they are amazed that the scandal of Watergate was not concealed by the press.

With Vice President Spiro T. Agnew's resignation, the principals of American democracy are clearly displayed—that Americans deserve and demand a responsible government, "of the people, for the people, and by the people."

In this, the biggest test of the American political system since the war between the States, the Constitution has won.

This nation shall endure.

Why Not Look Around?

For most students, City College can be defined as a stepping-stone to other things such as a job, another school, or marriage. There is a temptation to minimize the importance of this step in anticipation of better and more fulfilling things in the future.

It may not be easy to get excited about a transition period, but the fact is that we spend irrevocably part of our lives here. Why not look around a bit? There are many ways to make the college experience more meaningful through getting involved in campus activities.

There are 37 different clubs and organizations on campus, all anxious to recruit new members. Each semester, there are sports and drama events and music productions that need participants as well as audiences.

The Tutorial Center always needs volunteers and the campus publications can always use new writers.

A glance at the campus bulletin boards gives specific dates that students can view films or hear guest speakers. The way the campus is designed, students even take up mountain climbing.

As long as you're here, get the most for your time.

IUD - Question of Safety

The Intra-Uterine device, better known as the IUD, is one of the more effective methods of birth control.

Being unfelt when in use and unrelated to the sex act adds to the attraction of the IUD.

It is surprising that more than 3 million American women wear IUDs in view of how little is known about them.

It has been known for thousands of years that a foreign object in the uterus will prevent pregnancy, but it is not known even today exactly how an IUD works.

It is also not known why IUDs often cause unpleasant , even dangerous side effects (pain, bleeding, nausea, occasional uterine perforation). Nor is it possible to predict which women will experience side effects and which will not.

The main reason why these things are not known is simple lack of research. All IUDs except the ones containing heavy metals or drugs are almost completely exempt from government regulation.

The Food and Drug Administration can recall misbranded IUDs, but has made very little effort to do so.

There are no federal controls over manufacturers' premarketing claims, many of which are untested or false.

As a result of this lack of government regulation, many IUDs are marketed without being adequately tested.

Legislation to give the federal government premarketing authority over IUDs has been introduced in every Congress since 1962. Each year it has died in committee. Pressure must be put on congressmen to push this legislation.

The IUD may well be the ideal form of contraception for many women—but only if its safety can be assured.

Shortage of Men Leads To Disappointment for Women

There's a shortage of men in our society today, and the men that are available aren't exactly the kind a girl wants to take home to meet her folks.

If you are a single girl in search of a husband, or just plain old companionship you are going to run into problems.

Just before World War II men were not plentiful, but there were at least enough to go around. The Viet Nam War came along and women were and still are "without a prayer or hope" of ever meeting the man of their dreams.

Even the women in Washington D.C. are having a tough time finding dates or escorts for social affairs around the Capitol.

Everyone in our society is aware of the shortage of men but there seems to be no solution for the problem.

Maybe in a few years medical doctors will be able to produce a pill that will allow women to have male children only.

That won't help our generation but it will improve the chances of others.

Question: What's your reaction to Agnew's resignation?

John Cutler, Electronics
"I'm glad that he resigned, however, I wish that he had been fully prosecuted for all the crimes he had been charged with. I resent the fact that his jail sentence was suspended because I believe public servants should be subject to the same punishment as the average citizen."

Claudia Smith, Urban Studies
"He resigned because of a lot of political pressures. In his predicament, he did it to keep himself from being exposed too much. He knew that resigning was in his favor."

Ebert Kan, Electronics & Engineering
"When I heard he was stealing money from the country and he just resigned, I think he should have gotten more punishment."

Martha Burton, Conservation
"It's a good thing. It's a purging of the government. I think it's too bad for any man to be involved in something like that, but it's necessary that he's out."

Evana Ledbetter, General Education
"I think he should have resigned a long time ago. It's a good thing that he resigned before he was impeached. Nixon should take notes. He should follow up on his resignation."

George Gage, Mechanical Engineering
"In the back of your mind, you know they're all crooks anyway. It's a shame it took this long to find out. All those other people should be checked out."

You've Come A Long Way Baby

In the past five years smoking among girls 12 to 18 years old has increased at a dramatic rate, according to the American Cancer Society. In 1968 there were only half as many girls as boys who smoked. Today they are about equal.

The American Cancer Society estimates that 53 million Americans will eventually have cancer. This is approximately one in four persons.

In the 70's there will be an estimated 3-1/2 million cancer deaths, 6-1/2 million new cancer cases, and more than 10 million people under medical care for cancer, according to the American Cancer Society.

The American Cancer Society says in 1974 more than 218,000 Americans will be saved from cancer through continued cancer education and prompt medical treatment.

DANGER AHEAD — Why is this man smiling?

More needless deaths occur from lung cancer than any other form of cancer, states the American Cancer Society. The Society says the best protection against lung cancer is for people not to smoke.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Editor,

Regarding "Research Projects on the Minipill and IUD" on your last issue, I'm surprised that you gave no further information.

First you don't say what type of IUD is being tested. If new, has it been used on humans before? Are women being advised of all the dangers in testing the pills and IUD?

Since drug companies weren't mentioned do the legal responsibilities of the test fall upon Planned Parenthoods? If pregnancy results, will they provide an abortion? What if the woman does not want the baby or abortion? Will they adopt the baby?

I appreciate your effort to inform the students, but in this society where medical care is rarely free, we must never try to save money by risking our health.

Magazine Needs Talented Students

Little is known about CCSF's literary magazine. Written and produced by students, the latest edition is now available in the campus library.

Unfortunately, readership in the past has been low. "It's a shame so few students are aware of the magazine's existence, said faculty adviser Jim Madden. As a result, few students turn in work and are denied this opportunity of expression."

Though most contributions have come from writing classes, Madden welcomes any new talent.

Work has already begun on the next issue and the magazine welcomes all student contributions of stories and poetry. Especially needed are any cartoonists and artists willing to work.

The office is located in Visual Arts 104.

Gay Studies Petition Approved by Council

In a 12-2-1 vote, the Student Council of City College approved a petition to help create a Gay Studies program.

The program, as outlined by the Free Gay Student Association, will include a course in gay literature, and interdepartmental studies on masculinity, a sociology class on gay liberation, a psychology course on gay awareness, and a history class on gay oppression and liberation.

The gay students plan to circulate a petition on campus and from there, go to department heads and on to the Curriculum Committee, pending approval.

Dan Allen, English instructor, tried to have a course in gay literature accepted last year but was denied approval.

The petition approved by Student Council states that the first installment of the program would be Allen's course and others would follow in the future.

There is presently a gay studies program at San Francisco State University.

UNICYCLES — New Solution for Sore Feet?
(Photo by Alan Lee)

Classes Are Only A Glide Away

By unicycling around campus, Marcia Gallion has solved her transportation problem. While most students trudge up and down the hills of the campus, Marcia effortlessly glides from class to class.

"Unicycling is a lot of fun," says Marcia, who is a freshman general education major. "It's really a blast."

"Three years ago I saw this guy riding. It seemed easy; no effort. I said to myself 'I gotta try that'."

Try it she did. Though difficult at first, "I got used to it. I rode it to Lowell high school but now I carry the unicycle on the bus—if it's not crowded."

"Unicycling is terrific—it is a great way to get around and keeps me fit."

PAYING THE PRICE—Wide receiver Tim O'Shea sets up a touchdown with this catch, but is punished for his effort.

LOOK WHAT I FOUND!—Big Ram defensive tackle Siegan Keyes recovers one of the four Chabot fumbles.

Chabot Comes Back In Second Half, Beats Rams In Squeaker

Despite an impressive showing, the City College Rams dropped a 22-21 squeaker to the Chabot Gladiators.

Quarterback Dan Hayes, last week's Junior College Player of the Week, was less than effective with his errant passing and the receivers' inability to hold onto passes.

Early in the game the Rams offense moved smoothly against Chabot with the running of Lee Britton and Eric Day. Their runs set up a one yard touchdown plunge by quarterback Hayes. Larson's extra point was blocked.

The next Ram score came off of a Larson field goal from 23 yards out. The score followed a fumble recovery on the 22 yard line.

After trading field position for most of the second quarter, the Gladiators scored on a 14 yard pass from quarterback Dave August to fullback John Carter.

The second half started with neither team able to sustain a drive, until Ram safety Jack Holleman intercepted on the Ram 44 yard line. Hayes wasted little time hitting O'Shea for 11 yards and Mike Bacigalupi for completions of 25 and 18 yards. Fullback Eric Day then bulled over from 3 yards out for City's second touchdown. Larson's conversion was wide.

In the fourth quarter Chabot opened up its attack after they intercepted a pitch-out on an option play. Chabot eventually scored on a 6 yard pass to Jim Carter. A 2-point conversion pass was completed to the kicker Crumbuzzi.

Before the Ram defense could rest, they were back on the field to try and stop Chabot's spirited offense.

After a near interception by Ram Holleman, an option pass by Larry Roberson connected with Randy Noreman for 60 yards and a touchdown.

Suddenly trailing, Dan Hayes went to the air. After a holding penalty cancelled an 11 yard pass, Hayes hit Day for 49 yards to the Chabot 19 yard line. A quick 18 yard burst by Britton set up his own 2 yard run for a touchdown. The try for the two point conversion came up short and the Rams still trailed 22-21, and the Gladiators would not allow any comeback attempts.

Despite the disappointing loss, the Rams showed a lot of talent and guts.

Pro Sports Roundup

Football

With a mediocre 2-2 record the San Francisco 49ers will attempt to catch up with the Los Angeles Rams without the services of their top fullbacks, Larry Schreiber and Jimmy Thomas.

Called into action are the two remaining candidates for the job, eight-year veteran, Ken Williard, and second year acquisition Randy Jackson.

The question now is can Ken Williard, who missed spring training and said he honestly couldn't play his best for the 49ers, continue the strong running attack built by Schreiber and Washington?

Although he is third on the lists of active runners, Williard has shown little of the flair or power he exhibited in previous seasons.

Jackson has not even been in a league game yet, as a 49er, so little is known to the San Francisco public about his real ability. The 49er coaches obviously throught enough of Jackson's running ability to trade starting defensive tackle Earl Edwards.

Can either of these men spark a comeback for the downtrodden 49ers? The potential abilities are there, but the 49ers must figure a way to bring it out before the season is over.

Ice Hockey

Professional ice hockey is on its way back here in the Bay Area. The resident team, the California Golden Seals, opened their 1973-1974 season with a 2-1 win over the St. Louis Blues.

The Seals, who finished in last place a year ago, look forward to a much approved season. With the acquisition of defenseman Ray McKay and the return of most of last year's team, the prospects look brighter for the Seals this year.

Charlie Finley, owner of the Golden Seals, is known for his unconventional methods in handling his team and players.

Professional hockey is a fast moving, exciting sport. It might be worth your time to go take in a game.

Basketball

This year the Golden State Warriors will be in serious contention for the Pacific Division title of the National Basketball Association.

Several facts bear this out. The weakening of Los Angeles by the loss of Wilt Chamberlain, the non-cohesiveness of the Seattle Supersonics and the very poor play of the Portland Trailblazers. All this adds up to the Warriors going all the way in their division.

The Warriors are blessed with speed and depth in almost all positions and the marvelous combination of Nate Thurmond and Rick Barry.

The last time Thurmond and Barry teamed up the Warriors went to the finals of the NBA. However, the following year, Barry jumped to the ABA and Warrior fortunes went downhill.

With the return of Barry and the appointment of Al Attles as coach the Warriors seem to be making progress toward the coveted NBA championship.

Players of such caliber as Jeff Mullins, Clyde Lee, Cazzie Russell and Jim Barnett add nothing but sparkle to the picture.

Also the unexpected fine playing of reserves George Johnson and Charlie Johnson must give Warrior opponents headaches.

It proves to be an interesting year for the Warriors and it would give Bay Area fans a thrill to see the title brought home by the Warriors.

Archery Aims Towards Greater Participation

Since the introduction of archery classes at CCSF in 1935, many students have learned to enjoy the sport that sends feathered shaftments into a distant mark.

The bows used 38 years ago were made of lemonwood, a material which was costly and frail.

Today the CCSF Archery department has been modernized with the best equipment available. Right or left-handed archers can participate in the sport.

This semester there are 300 beginning and 20 intermediate archers under the direction of six instructors, Ms. Wirth, Galloway, and Scourkes.

Daniel Sui, captain of the Archery team stated, "The team is finally coming out after a few years from the public scene. I feel we will stand a good chance of excelling this year."

The first major conference shoot is planned for November 17 at Pacifica.

Students who would like to be a part of this year's archery fun should leave their name, address, and telephone number at the front desk of the Women's Gym in care of the Archery Team captain who will send return details on the recreation association for fun shooting or team competition.

Methadone is Not The Answer For Heroin Addiction

"Methadone isn't doing its job," according to Olga Kincade, a drug counselor working within the San Francisco Methadone Treatment Center.

Methadone is a government controlled and distributed drug used for the purpose of curing people who are addicted to heroin, a much more deadly drug.

The drug is available to those who admit themselves to a center where treatment is offered, therefore acknowledging the fact that he or she wants to kick the habit of using heroin.

A patient under such a program is given methadone once a day at prescribed times.

It has been discovered that methadone is not effective. It doesn't cure or curb the craving for heroin. In fact it causes a desire for heroin or double the dosage of methadone being issued per day.

Ms. Kincade stated that she had seen patients who were hooked on heroin enter the Center, go through the treatment program, be released after their so-called cure, and two to three months later they start the program all over again.

Ms. Kincade feels that the program is nothing but a sham. She said, "It's the government's way of centralizing these people and pacifying them at the same time."

She continued, "I feel there is something better to be done for heroin addicts. Let's not hide them in a corner and pass out medication that's doing nothing for their addiction.

Witnesses Sought --2 Students Hit by Autos on Phelan Avenue

The families of Carol Hannum and Elaine Carlson are interested in discovering any witnesses to the accidents of their daughters that occurred on Phelan Avenue.

Carol Hannum was a day-time student during the Spring, 1973 Semester. She was fatally hit by an automobile in or above the cross-walk leading directly down from the center doors of the Science Building to the residence area. The approximate date was the end of March or first part of April.

Elaine Carlson, a Fall, 1973 evening school student, was hit by a car in the vicinity of the cross-walk in front of the California Book Store on Phelan Avenue. The accident occurred on September 11. If anyone saw either accident, it would be appreciated if you contacted Dean Pope in person in the Educational Services Building, Room 106, immediately.

Opposition To McDonald's Grows

"The majority of San Franciscans oppose the McDonalization of San Francisco" stated Joseph Belardi, Executive Secretary of the Local Board of Culinary Workers and President of the San Francisco Labor Council, at a recent press conference.

He announced that the following organizations had resolved to defend the City against the onslought of McDonald's. They are: Marina Property Owners Association, the Mission Coalition, San Francisco Tomorrow, The All Peoples Coalition, the United Professors of California in San Francisco, the National Association of Social Workers, the Haight Ashbury Council, The Mission Rebels, The Delancey Street Foundation, and the CCSF Student Counceil.

McDonald's Boycott

Last spring the CCSF Student Council voted for a general student boycott of McDonald's after they had fired two CCSF students.

"We plan all sorts of action," said Belardi. "We would like to bring on a national boycott. Right now, San Francisco is the only place where anything is being done about McDonald's."

Some of the reasons for the organizations position against McDonald's are: The exploitation of youth, unethical CONLAN HALL — Formerly named Educational Services Building.

Educational Service Building Renamed

A vote to rename the Educational Services Building for former City College President Louis G. "Dutch" Conlan was highly praised by administrators, faculty and students alike.

On October 17, the Community College District Governing Board voted unanimously to rename the building for the 68 year-old Conlan who retired in 1970 after serving as CCSF president for 21 years.

The board waived a provision of the policy manual that states no living person may have a building on the campus named after him in order to accord Dr. Conlan the honor during his lifetime.

"This is the greatest honor that has ever been accorded me," Conlan said. "I certainly appreciate the fine sentiment expressed . . . by my fellow board members."

Conlan Praised

John Y. Chin, president of the governing board, said Conlan "has done so much for City College. He's practically considered one of the founders and planners of our modern City College."

Dr. Louis F. Batmale, Superintendent of the Community College District, praised Dr. Conlan for developing many innovative programs responsible for the continued growth of the college over the years.

Dean of Students Ralph O. Hillsman described Conlan as "a very successful educator and an outstanding San Franciscan."

City College President Harry R. Buttimer said, "He's just remarkable. He really does his homework before committee meetings, so we really have to be on top of things."

"He's a prime example of a man who has shown continued interest and dedication to something he felt strongly about."

Journalism instructor Barbara Rosenthal said the board had wanted to do this "for a long time.

" 'Dutch' had done a lot for this college. I'm in complete agreement with the decision. I think deserving people should be accorded honors while they're alive — not when they're dead," she commented.

A native of Berkeley, Dr. Conlan is a graduate of St. Mary's College and earned his M.A. and his doctorate in education from the University of California.

Former P. E. Teacher

He first came to CCSF in 1935 as a physical education instructor. In 1940 he was named co-ordinator for Educational Management at CCSF.

He left City College to serve as a Navy officer during World War II. In November, 1944, he became principal at Mission High School.

Dr. Conlan returned to CCSF as president in 1949 where he served until his retirement 21 years later.

Dr. Conlan and his wife, Etta, reside in San Francisco, where he is currently serving as a member of the Community College District Board.

Former POW Guest Speaker

At the annual dinner of Arriba Juntos, Ozzie Lugo, a spokesman for the City College Veterans, introduced the guest speaker, former POW Lt. Commander Everette Alvarez Jr.

The Arriba Juntos Program, an organization for business, education and community advancement, for the past eight years has provided assistance and support for the economically disadvantaged people who live in the Mission District.

Commander Alvarez's plane was shot down in 1964 during retaliatory raids against North Vietnam. He was held a prisoner in Hanoi for eight years, the first two years of his incarceration being in solitary confinement.

Although home only eight months, Commander Alvarez is setting up the Lt. Commander Alvarez Jr. Scholarship Foundation to help Mexican-American students pursue their education.

Events of the evening included a Mexican-style dinner, awards and presentations, a speech by Alvarez and dancing afterwards with music provided by the Supersonics.

Burglary and Vandalism a "Common Occurrence"

Within the past month there has been a rash of burglaries on campus. Smith Hall, the Student Accounting Office, and the Black Students Union's bungalow, B3, have been targets for vandalism and theft.

On two successive October weekends IBM typewriters, worth $600 apiece, were taken from the Hotel-Restaurant offices in Smith Hall.

Mr. James Longo, Purchasing Agent for the H&R Dept., called the burglary a "common occurrence" and disclosed that 13 typewriters valued at over $7,000, have been stolen in the past two years.

On October 1 an alarm alerted the campus police of a burglary in progress at the Student Accounting Office in Conlon Hall.

According to Robert Lynn, a clerk in the Veteran's Affairs Office, and an eyewitness to the incident, the City College police were able to apprehend the suspect and hold him until the San Francisco Police arrived.

Lynn, who works evenings keeping the office open for veterans attending night classes was robbed at knifepoint on campus two years ago.

He said "This place is not safe around here."

The break-in of the BSU headquarters occurred during the same weekend BSU members were out-of-town on a Santa Cruz get-together.

The bungalow sustained damage that included a broken window, smashed furniture and loss of money from their Coke machine.

According to Student Councilwoman and BSU member Lenora Bell, this is the sixth attack the BSU has suffered in the past few semesters.

Acting Campus Police Chief, Captain Colim Quinn, stated that all campus burglaries are investigated by their officers, and if the incident is termed "major," it is referred to the San Francisco police. This was the case in the Smith Hall, and SAO break-ins, but not with the BSU incident.

When asked why the BSU bungalow was not checked for fingerprints like Smith Hall and the SAO, Quinn said that even though it was technically a burglary it was not serious enough to warrant a full investigation.

CLOUD HALL EXTENSION — Artist sketch of proposed building.

In addition to the remodeling of the Science building, there are proposed plans for an extension to Cloud Hall. Construction is slated to start January, 1975.

The size of the new educational structure is planned to be about seven stories high with 100,000 square feet available.

The site will be above the football field, present location of the Experimental College.

Financing of this facility will be through a city bond. The cost is expected to reach in the area of about eight and a half million dollars. Voting will be in June or November of 1974.

HOLES IN THE HEAD

Middle East Explodes—Again

Once again, the Middle East power keg has exploded. This time the Arabs have started the "official" fighting.

Obviously, this is an Arab effort to regain land lost to the Israelis in 1967. That was a blow to Arab pride. They could not forget it.

So, it's off to war. Tear up the Sinai! Devistate the Golan Heights! After all, war's a mean business.

Bad as it is, the people of the United States must take sides. Since the Soviet Union is aiding the Arabs, then we must help the Israelis.

Better still, why not go over and fight. Sure, all flights to Israel are booked solid for several weeks, but the more the merrier!

Of course, America just got finished with Vietnam, but this is different. This is, uh ... let's call this a Holy War. Nothing like having God on the same side.

Of course, the Arabs believe that Allah is with them, but did not the prophets promise that Israel was the land of God's children?

Therefore, let's kill in the name of God! Burn their towns, cripple the Arab soldiers, lay waste to their fields, leave their orphans out in the streets, and teach them that war is a mean business.

Do this, in the name of He who made us, He who is love, in God's name, - victory.

Proposition 1: A Threat?

Does Governor Reagan think he can fool the taxpayers by promising them savings of $17,000 over the next 15 years?

Does Governor Reagan think he will make everybody a Reagan Rooter if his Proposition One is passed?

If passed, Proposition One will impose a $100 tuition on community colleges like CCSF and a $200 tuition charge for State Universities.

Students are already having problems getting money to attend colleges and universities. To add a $100 or $200 tuition would be lowering the curtain on a college education for many students.

As in all money saving schemes, someone ends up forking out the busk. In this case, the buck (S) lies with the college student.

Shall we let Governor Reagan rob us of over $121 million in 1974?

Is City College Safe?

The recent unprovoked attacks on two City College campus policemen along with the wave of vandalism and thefts has many students, faculty and administration members wondering what's happening to our campus . . .

Many people question whether it is safe to walk around this school during either the day or the night.

A spokesman for the campus claims "It's been pretty quiet this semester." Ingleside station, which patrols the City College area, maintains it has had no reports of violence or vandalism, and also considers the campus a quiet area.

A sergeant at the station did mention that high schools and junior high schools have been problem areas. In fact, he said that they have special patrols assigned to those schools because of recent outbreaks of violence.

We hope the attack on our campus police is an isolated incident, and does not reflect what's happening at the lower division schools.

Students, faculty, and the administration have a right to be concerned about their safety and welfare.

According to Campus and City police officers that safety should be assured to prevent future such incidents.

We in the Journalism department at City College of San Francisco, extend our deepest sympathies to our advisor and friend, Dorry Ellis Coppoletta, Chairwoman of the Journalism department, whose husband, Marco Hellman, died suddenly on October 20.

Mr. Hellman, was apparently the victim of a heart attack while duck-hunting in Fairfield. He was 65.

The Hellmans had been married since last January.

Mr. Hellman, a prominent financier, was well-known and respected in the community as a civic leader and philanthropist.

Services were held October 23 at Temple Emanu-el, Arguello Blvd. and Lake Street.

Clem Amato, Physical Education

"Yes, because he's robbing the people. He's a criminal and he's also cheating."

Janice Gavin, Library Technology

"Yes, I feel he deceived the people and when you deceive the public, you should pay for the consequences you did to the people."

Chris Arery, Science

"Yes, because he got caught."

Larry Louie, Biology

J. Geils Band, Hard And Heavy

Flashing lights, fantastic music, and a packed dancing audience were elements that contributed to the success of the J. Geils Band concert at Winterland.

The J. Geils Band has expanded their popularity from the East Coast to excite rock and rollers throughout the country with their all-out driving rock sound.

Their organist is fantastic, able to contribute both spacey sounds like Lee Michaels or a spicy rock beat. His solos were precise and fascinating.

Peter Wolf, lead singer, a talented singer and a capable performer. His stage tricks were a bit contrived, but he has a charismic personality that never bores his audience.

Wolf's singing impressed even the skeptics. His presence as a conductor was even more amazing. He moves the the group as he does the crowd.

J. Geils has always been one of the finest rock guitarists. He played without flaw on Saturday night and contributed some beautiful solos.

Magic Dick plays several harps and commands the sounds as if he invented the instrument. Dick continued to generate the excitement and perfection of the entire group during his precise solos.

Drummer and bassist played as well as anyone else in the group, resulting in a tight rhythmic backing.

The result was an unbelievable blend of rock and roll that I have yet to see approached.

The group mixed all their favorites with lesser known tunes to produce an energetic set that resulted in three encores.

J. Geils presented an exciting night of good old fashioned roll that the audience loved.

Latin Jazz At S.F. State With Cal Tjader

Cal Tjader recently headlined a night of Latin music presented by the Associated Students of San Francisco State University.

Tjader, a music teacher at State as well as an alumnus, is a master on the vibraphone, entertaining the students throughout the night.

He appeared with special guest trumpeter, Luis Gasca, who formerly played with Santana.

Solos by Gasca, conga drummer Jon Berg and pianist Mike Wolfe were very well planned and resulted in much applause.

The concert was opened by Spectrum, a local group that sounded much like a spin-off from the Malo and Aztec sound.

All of Spectrum contributed with vocals and percussion. Their music was kind of funky Latin, and very danceable.

Afro-Latin Quintet

Next came another local group, Joel Dorham Afro-Latin Quintet, led by Joel on timbales.

Their sound, a type of Latin Jazz, was received with much applause. Their treatment of Horace Silver's FOR MY FATHER, was one of the highlights of the evening.

Future concerts to be presented at State are John Handy on November 16, Luis Gasca and friends on December 18, and a free concert of electronic music on December 12.

Downtown Center Financial Hassle

The San Francisco Community College Governing Board met October 11 to investigate allegations that the cost of the Downtown Education Center was being unnecessarily raised.

Commissioner Peter Finnegan made the charges against the architectural firm of Rockrise, Oddermatt, Mountjoy, and Amis. He said it was a "sincere effort on my part to inform the taxpayers how their money is being spent."

"My credentials are at stake," claimed Finnegan. "I don't bring information in like this if I don't know what I'm doing."

Architect George Rockrise countered that HIS credentials were the ones at stake.

Expert Support

Finnegan based his argument on the expert opinion of Alex Corenevsky. Comparing the cost of the proposed eight-story facility with recent office structures of similar heights, Corenevsky estimated that the cost should not exceed $4,604,030. Rockrise's estimate, originally a little over $4 million, has risen to over $6 million.

In an effort to explain the cost, Rockrise used a series of charts on comparative prices and inflationary rates.

"Office buildings, unlike schools, are mostly empty space," Rockrise stated. "Television hookups, the necessity for larger elevators, and other installations naturally raise the cost of the structure."

"Our estimates are for a 'turn-key' building", he explained, "one that is ready to be occupied."

The board and the architects finally reached an understanding. "I am confident they (the architects) are doing the job," stated Chancellor Louis Batmale.

Understanding Reached

Finnegan explained "I am glad that we have reached an understanding. These questions had to be asked. Perhaps I expressed them a little dramatically, but I feel that the public has a right to know."

We are seriously dedicated to this project," said Rockrise. "I appreciate his (Finnegan's) searching interest."

Clinic is "Happy Corner"

The Speech Clinic (S109), with its colorful floral shutters and bright orange decor, has been dubbed "the happy corner."

The new, larger facilities are the result of the on-going remodeling in the Science Building. But because of remodeling the clinic did not open until two weeks ago.

"I'm really frustrated," says Jo Kennedy, speech clinician, "and so are the students." Most of the students who use the clinic are referred by their teachers during the first two weeks of school.

Once a student decides to come to the clinic, it is frustrating not to find anyone there. Chances are he or she won't come back again.

According to Ms. Kennedy 1% or 120 to 170 of the student body uses the clinic each semester. This year very few students are using it.

Daily hours of operation are posted on the door of S109. But even now the carpenters are in and out disrupting normal operations.

Everyone will be happy when the remodeling is finished. "I'm frustrated, but I'm also pleased," says Ms. Kennedy as she looks over her new quarters.

GI Widow Not Claiming Benefits

There are 243,140 women in the United States who are missing an opportunity to receive $220 a month in federal funds for 26 months of their education. Under the GI Bill, widows of servicemen whose deaths were service connected plus the wives and children of servicemen classified as 100 percent disabled, are eligible for extensive educational benefits. The amount of unclaimed monies now runs into millions of dollars.

Of the 261,931 women who qualified for the funds, only 18,791 have used them, a total of seven percent. Those now eligible include 195,153 widows and 66,778 wives.

On their own, and sometimes with the prompting of the Disabled American Veterans (DAV), women are finally discovering these programs. Last year 485 wives and 1,260 widows utilized the educational fund as compared to 1,801 wives and 4,507 widows this year.

Boycott Continues

"The struggle isn't over," says Glen Risdon, Treasurer of the CCSF Farmworker's Support Group. "People hear about the agreement with the teamsters and they think it's finished, but it isn't."

The purpose of the Farmworker's Support Group is to educate people about the present phase of the Farmworker's struggle, and to encourage people to become involved in picketing, store checking, or the boycott.

On-campus activities so far have included passing out leaflets, but the Farmworker's Support Group hopes to have films and speakers later in the semester.

The products currently being boycotted are: all lettuce, all non-union grapes, and Gallo and Franzia wines.

In reference to the presently negotiated agreement between the Teamsters and the Farmworkers, Risdon says, "Even if the agreement is signed, we will do a backup boycott until the growers' act positively.

We have to have some muscle — the growers have lied to us in the past."

He also said, "This may be just a publicity stunt. The Teamsters have a better P.R. man than we do."

The deadline for signing the agreement was to have been Wednesday, October 17, but at press-time, the talks have hit a snag. Cesar Chavez has asked the AFL-CIO for a formal boycott against all lettuce and non-union grapes.

The CCSF Farmworkers Support Group meets Thursdays at 11 a.m. in B5. Messages can be left at B6.

Declining Vet Enrollment

The number of veterans attending CCSF is declining.

Last semester, there were 2600 vets attending CCSF. Though the exact number is not available, Wally Wells, Assistant Dean of Veterans Affairs, stated there is a significant drop from last semester due to the ending of the Vietnam War.

Veterans Affairs is a center that offers vets help in their financial, educational, or vocational problems.

For vets who are attending CCSF, this service is available at E202, office of the Veteran's Affairs.

A Jobs For Vets Program was set up this semester allowing vets to ear money while attending college. A total of 900 working hours were allotted to Veterans Affairs with an available salary of $2.50 an hour.

A vets counseling center was recently set up by Dean Wells and other volunteers at 33 Gough Street. The center offers full time free professional counseling service.

Presently, Veterans Affairs is asking all vets to write their congressmen in an attempt to extend the eight-year delimiting period for completing educational programs to 10 years.

Plans are also being drawn up with the Bank of America to establish an emergency loan fund for eligible vets.

All veterans' records are permanently filed in the Veterans Affairs office for immediate referral.

Water Polo Team Lose One, But Win Second

It was a sunny warm day in Oakland as the CCSF waterpolo team defeated Laney, 9-4, for their first league victory.

Brian Holten scored the first goal of the game to give CCSF a quick lead. Toni Campagne followed suit to give CCSF a 2-0 lead at the end of the first quarter.

Campagne scored the only CCSF goal in the second quarter as the game became a defensive struggle. Laney scored their only goal in the first half after a CCSF player was taken out after an excess of fouls were committed by the Rams. CCSF left at the halftime break leading 4-1.

Speed is a great factor in this game, but it must also be balanced with an equal amount of endurance. John Barcojo excels in both and swam over and around other players to open up CCSF's lead by scoring four goals in the second half.

Brad Krauss also scored in the second half to give CCSF a final score of nine points.

Unfortunately after this game the CCSF discovered they no longer had a home pool, as Balboa pool closed for six weeks for repairs. How much this will affect the team remains to be seen in their next game.

Dennis Dunne

The CCSF water polo team opened the 1973 season with a disappointing 11-3 loss to San Jose City College.

San Jose held a 1-0 lead midway through the first period, when CCSF guard John Barcojo evened the score with the first of his two goals of the afternoon.

This was as close as the Ram's were to get, however, as the visitor's drove for six consecutive scores to give them a 7-1 halftime advantage.

The Rams refused to give up as Barcojo opened the second half with a long shot which sailed into the net, cutting San Jose's lead to five goals. Goalie Justin Smith kept San Jose out of the net, while Brad Krause added another goal to pull within four goals of San Jose.

San Jose locked up the victory in the fourth period, capitalizing on CCSF's lack of ball control. The visitors continuously intercepted Ram passes and scored four more times to complete the 11-3 rout.

Dissension Among The World Champs

The Oakland A's are the World Champions of Baseball, but all is not well with the Green and Gold. Inner tension, induced by the owner Charlie Finley, has created a mental rift amongst the players.

Finley's unpredictable behavior has given the players a feeling of being on a tightrope. His whims vary from suspending players to firing announcers and commentators.

The controversial handling of second baseman Mike Andrews was a major topic during the Series when Finley tried to cover the incident with a falsified medical report.

Starting pitcher Vida Blue has often gotten into salary disputes with Finley. Despite good performances by Blue, Mr. Finley is still doubtful of Blue's ability as a pitcher.

Bill Rigney, former Minnesota Twins' manager and former commentator of the A's broadcasts, was not given any reason for his release. When he attempted to pry the reason from Finley, he was told there was nothing personal.

The most devastating effect of Finley's meddling has been the loss of Manager Dick Williams after the World Series. It was a surprise that Williams had even lasted for 3 years.

Charlie Finley has proven to be both colorful and wicked. It's a wonder his team has won any sort of title. It must be because of all their talent.

Student Sports Will Be Available

Trudging up and down CCSF's mountainous campus is one way of getting exercise.

Another is joining CCSF's Intramural Sports program which is open to anyone on campus, excepting those who participate in varsity sports.

The intramural program is described by director Chris Davis as being "a recreational program for people who can't complete in varsity sports because they don't have the necessary skills or ability."

There are some two thousand students already involved in the program and others may still join by organizing a team and signing up in the Student Union Building. Anyone can sign up for an existing team.

The various sports offered in the program are softball, flag football, volleyball, track, basketball, and table tennis.

Basketball is currently underway, with games every Monday and Wednesday nights from 6 pm to 10 pm in the men's gym.

Other events scheduled to begin soon are table tennis, flag football, and softball.

A Turkey Trot (track meet) is slated for November 17, with winners awarded the main course of their Thanksgiving dinners.

Varsity Football:

Rams Win First League Game Bombs Merritt Easily, 27-12

The CCSF Varsity Football team equaled it's league record at one win and one loss with it's 27-12 win over Merritt College.

This was the first league win by City College since November 1971 when the Rams dumped Foothill College 42-12.

This game demonstrated the finely balanced attack of the Rams. The running game produced 175 yards while the passing attack yielded 148 yards.

The Rams were surprised in the first quarter by two Merritt touchdowns but CCSF came right back in the second quarter to take the lead.

After moving sluggishly in the first period the Rams mounted an offensive drive early in the second quarter that culimated with quarterback Dan Hayes sneaking in from the three yard line with the first CCSF score of the game.

On the next offensive series by City College Dan Hayes unleashed a long bomb to tight end Mike Bacigalupi that resulted in another Ram score.

The kick was blocked and the half ended with the Rams in front 13-12.

In the third quarter the Rams marched from their 25 yard line to another score. Running back Bob McCutchon bulled over from the three-yard line to make it, after a successful kick, 20-12.

Early in the fourth period the Rams clinched the victory by once again scoring. This time running back Eric Days ran the touchdown in to make it 27-12.

Now trailing, the Merritt Thunderbirds tried to pull a victory out of the game by mounting their first serious attack in the entire game. A vicious tackle by Ram linebacker Coulter ended all Merritt hopes.

With little time remaining the Rams played a controlled game by keeping the ball on the ground. During this series running backs Eric Days and Lee Britton showed the power of the Ram running attack by constantly rushing for substantial gains.

While the offense showed strength and power in it's attack, the defense made many errors that could have cost the game. City College picked up nine penalties that cost the Rams 90 yards. It was fortunate that the Ram offense was operating as well as it did.

Statler Library Founder Honored

An informal gathering in the Statler Library of administration, faculty, and friends, paid tribute last week to Winthrop 'Cap' Williams, a member of the emeritus faculty.

Williams, a member of the faculty from February 1941 until his retirement in June 1965, founded the Statler Library in 1965.

Those present at the luncheon included Chancellor Louis Batmale, Board President John Chin, Dean Leff, and Lawrence Wong of the Hotel and Restaurant Department.

Batmale said in praising Williams' work, "This library is unique. Nothing like it in the nation ... because of 'Cap's' committment to develop it."

Williams was presented with a placque engraved as follows:

One Seed Can Start a Garden
One Drop Can Start a Sea.

The seed Williams sowed — Statler Library — has blossomed into one of the finest of its kind in the nation.

As Batmale put it, "A model for all others."

College District Receives $8 Million

The San Francisco Community College District's finances have been bolstered by the passage of State Senate Bills 617 and 1455. They were signed into law prior to the deadline of the present legislative session.

Senate Bill 617, by modifying the Community College and State Construction Acts, will grant the district $8 million. The funds are to be used in the construction of graded or ungraded classes.

Previously, only graded classes could receive the funds. Since 35% of all the District's classes are ungraded, the money will be of some significance.

Senate Bill 1455 will allocate $500,000 for foreign students admitted to the US on permanent visas. These funds will be used for the first year of residency.

Earlier legislation required a one-year residency prior to financial grants. Thus, SB1455 will save the city half a million dollars in funds.

Financial Aid News

The final financial aid deadline for students wishing to be considered for December's dispersement is November 15, 1973. By this date all forms and applications, including the results from Berkeley, should be turned in to the financial aid department.

Students are urged to get their applications in early. According to Juanita Pascual of the Financial Aid Department, "Regardless of all the advertising we do, students still wait until the last minute to apply."

EOP applications are now being accepted at San Francisco State University for the Spring 1974 semester. Applicants must be transfer students with less than 60 semester units.

Interested students should contact their counselor or the Office of Eop Admissions, San Francisco State University. Phone 469-2482 or 469-1646.

Applications, transcripts, test scores, and letters of recommendation should be submitted to the EOP Office of Admissions by December 5, 1973.

Ray Kroc, chairman of the McDonald's chain was reputed to have donated $255,000 to Richard Nixon's 1972 presidential campaign. This donation came on the heels of a 10 per cent price increase that was allowed by the Price Commission.

"The basic issue in this matter is whether the people of San Francisco can decide what types of business are harmful to our community standards and whether the people can say no to a proliferation of these establishments," Belardi concluded.

Rats, Bees Haunt Trash Results Are Painful If Not Fatal

After visiting certain areas of the campus, it is clear that City College is turning into a massive garbage dump.

According to Victor Graff, Supervisor of Physical Facilities, there are rats on or near City College because of the garbage problem. "There is a real health hazard here, people throw their garbage wherever they please," said Graff.

"The scavenger company that picks up the garbage," Graff stated, "leaves plenty of trash laying around after their 5 am pickups."

It seems that the rat problem is more prevalent at night but fleas from the fats carry germs which can infect humans.

Barbara Cabral, Head of the Student Health Service, thinks the bees pose a greater problem than the rats.

Bees are ever present on campus but are especially hazardous around the Cable Car canteen trucks.

Many people have been stung by bees which poses a problem. To anyone having an allergy to bees or to the medication used for treatment of bee stings, which could be fatal.

If everyone would take the time to throw their trash in the cans and dumpsters provided by the college, these health hazards would be eliminated.

Campus Police--"Campus Crime Extremely Low"

"Crime incidence on our campus is extremely low," according to Campus Police Captain Colim Quinn, a Criminology major at City College of San Francisco.

Despite the recent attacks on campus police, and three known acts of vandalism on school property, Captain Quinn maintains that things are pretty quiet.

"If somebody gets ripped off or if they are victims of a fight or an attack on campus, they can and should report it to us," Quinn explained.

"If we (the campus police) don't know about it, nobody will — except the victims."

"Mostly auto crimes are committed, articles are stolen from cars. We haven't had any bicycle thefts reported to us," states Captain Quinn.

Quinn pointed out, "We do have certain powers of regular city police while we are on duty. We have the authority to make arrests if nexessary."

Regarding campus security, Quinn stresses, "We're well-staffed right now with about thirty members on the force. We have a general patrol of the campus area during the day."

Quinn said the campus is well-patrolled at night by campus police working as a unit with the Buildings and Grounds Patrol.

As further prevention against personal attacks at night, Quinn said, "We have an escort system down by the women's gym to escort women to their cars or buses."

Parking

"As everybody knows, we also issue parking citations," smiled Quinn. Contrary to rumors circulating around school, Quinn said, "We do not have any quotas to fill!

"The money paid for citations goes into the City's General Fund and is not funneled directly back to us," Quinn claimed.

When asked about illegal parking in the reservoir located across the street from CCSF, Quinn commented, "Right now we're not tagging cars not parked between the lines in the reservoir because the lines are so light, you can hardly see them.

"We only cite cars which are obstructing free flow of traffic through the lot, or are without valid parking permits.

"Hopefully," he continued, "the lines will be repainted during Thanksgiving or Christmas."

Personal Touch

Regarding the personal touch in campus police dealing with students, Captain Quinn said, "We've been very successful with our Lost and Found department in C119. A lot of people don't even know it exists."

Drugs

Free Tests Available

If you have been worrying about increasing cases of bad street drugs, then perhaps the Parm Chem drug testing program is the answer for you.

Under a four-month experimental program, Pharm Chem has been analyzing all types of drugs at the rate of about 20 each month.

The program has been such a success that the sponsors, the Berkeley Free Clinic, are seeking more funding to continue Pharm Chem's operation indefinitely.

To have a drug tested free of charge, fill out a questionnaire, using numbers instead of a name, and send it with the drug to Pharm Chem Labs, 1848 Bay Street, Palo Alto, Ca. 94303.

Questionnaires may be picked up at the Berkeley Free Clinic's office located at 2339 Durant Street in Berkeley.

Numbers are used to protect the identify of the sender and to avoid any legal problems.

Results of the tests are broadcast over KSAN radio on Fridays about 5:55 p.m. and published in the Friday editions of the Examiner, The S.F. Phoenix, The Berkeley Barb, and The Grass Roots.

Although the program has been credited as being a deterrent to drug use, it is not yet apparent if drug use has actually declined as a result of the testing.

Even if you avoid drugs, the reports are always quite interesting.

To date the laboratory has found such products as grocery store mushrooms sprinkled with LSD and sold as psilocybin, plain white powder masquerading as heroin, and animal tranquilizers claimed to be THC and a quantity of Hashish that has been selling well despite the fact that analysis proved it to be pure doggie poo poo.

Student Conference at CCSF During Career Guidance Week

The National Vocational Guidance Association will sponsor an Open House at the CCSF Career Guidance Center during National Career Guidance Week, November 12 to 16.

Career Guidance Counselor, Barbara Thomas, says that the purpose of the open house (from 9 am to 4 pm daily) is to acquaint students with the Career Guidance Center, especially with new features added since last semester.

Some of the new items are: expanded vocational files with more specific facts on careers; information on apprenticeship programs and Bay Area unions; pre-law and pre-med reference books dealing with admission requirements, financial aid, deadlines and expenses; information on specific departments of local colleges and universities; improved reference library to assist students with career choice and research; better staff to provide one-to-one counseling; referrals for aptitude and interest tests.

Ms. Thomas talks to individual classes when requested by an instructor.

The Career Guidance Center is open from 8am to 4:30pm daily. For individual counseling appointments, interested students can call 174 or 175.

New Vessel Traffic System Will Help Eliminate Collisions

The United Coast Guard, in an attempt to prevent any future accidents such as the 1971 collision of two oil tankers in the San Francisco Bay, has installed a Vessel Traffic System on Yerba Buena Island.

Commander Frank Thall, United States Coast Guard, said, "We try to provide information to the pilots on the ships. If necessary we will ground ships to prevent possible collisions."

Installed at a cost of $3.5 million, the system is designed to keep track of every vessel on the waters of the Bay. The project was designed by the Research and Development Department of the United States Coast Guard.

New Federal laws require every vessel to have ship-to-ship communications. Also with the passing of the Ports and Waterways Safety Act of 1972 the Coast Guard now has authority to prevent any marine accidents.

"At the time of the '71 accident the Coast Guard didn't have this authority to ground ships if necessary to avoid a collision," said Thall. "All the radar operator could do was helplessly watch the two ships collide."

"In Fall 1969 when the project was first set up, there were only nine operators. Today there are 30 men involved with it."

NOT SO TRICKY—In lieu of Watergate and continued criticism, President Nixon maintains that he will not resign.

Nixonitis? There's A Cure

It seems that in at least one aspect politics has become a safe subject for discussion; almost everyone agrees they don't like Nixon.

Though name-calling of the administration has become popular, sideline complaining is no remedy for bad government. If people expect to initiate change, they must be willing to do a little work.

Politics is a serious and complicated game. To win, you need more than an objective; you need to know the rules that will enable a player to reach his goal. Concerned citizens must learn these rules.

Criticism can bring results if properly channeled through voting and through active communication with elected representatives. Unfortunately, most people don't know their congressman's name. This attitude gives politicians the freedom to do as they please rather than follow the wishes of tbeir constituents.

When few people take any real interest in politics and even fewer are willing to learn the rules of implementing change, the people get the government they deserve ... Richard Nixon's kind of government.E

Ecology Begins With You

The garbage problem here at City College has become so acute it borders on a health hazard. It's evident that many students by their thoughtless actions have no respect for this campus or the health of their fellow students.

The mess students leave at the cafeteria and the litter strewn around the buildings and the grounds attest to the irresponsibility of these slobs.

This indiscriminate scattering of waste has produced a rodent problem of serious proportions. Could it be that the culprits of this crime are the same ones that scream and yell that the ecology and resources of this country are being raped by the big companies?

Doesn't ecology begin at home?

Or perhaps this is an insidious plot to close down this school by having the Board of Health declare the campus a health hazard and banning all human habitation?

Maybe the solution is in having a City College Conservation corps. This group would become our front-line sanitation engineers battling the garbage heap.

The financing of tbis group could come from the citations the campus police would issue for anyone caught littering on the campus.

Whatever the solution-it all depends upon students attending this college. Do they have the maturity and brains to remedy this problem?

Campus Going to the Dogs

An irritating influence that has been growing on this campus during the past few years must come to an end.

That irritation is stray dogs. The dogs are usually located in the lawn area near the Visual Arts Building.

In less than an hour of observation, it should be noted that everything except the birth of a litter of pups was experienced.

The dogs fought, copulated, howled, begged food off students, stole food from students whose backs were turned, and finally left landmarks to pollute the air to be breathed by all in the area.

It is time for the dogs to leave the campus. If you own a dog, it is your responsibility to leave it at home. If you don't, it is your responsibility to feed it, keep it from attempting to impregnate another dog, and to clean up all evidence of the dog ever being there.

City College is a campus for students, not a kennel for dogs. Barking and fighting between dogs destroys the academic atmosphere and interrupts socializing and studying. One cannot expect to enjoy coming here if the campus sounds and smells like the SPCA kennels.

Dog owners — do us all a favor — leave your dogs at home. If you fear its loneliness, stay home with it.

Students — if a dog bothers you — make a complaint to the Campus Police. There are laws against unleashed dogs.

Dogs are supposed to be man's best friend. The student's friend he isn't.

Question: Did you have any problems with registration?

Bruce Johnson, History

"City College held up my registration until they received my transcripts from a summer school class at State. By the time they processed my registration, it was too late to pre-register or meet with a counselor, even though I was coming in as a sophomore. Getting the classes I wanted was definitely a problem. I had to petition for them through the department chairmen."

Nancy Ingraham, History

"Yes, I had trouble, but it was typical. Everybody had the same number of lines to go through. It was complete chaos, nobody seemed to know what they were doing. I was impressed with the fact that it could have been done better."

Tim Porter, Communications

"No, I didn't have any problems. I pre-registered so I wouldn't have any problems. The only hassle was coming back in the summer."

Dermid Eagan, General Education

"Under the circumstances registration was pretty good. Most people generally do pretty well in getting their classes, considering the school is so overcrowded. With thousands of people enrolling, you've got to expect to stand in line for awhile. Maybe I was lucky, but I personally have no complaints. I would have to be complimentary to the people who run registration."

Christine DePew, Broadcasting / Journalism

"Yes, I had difficulty in getting classes I wanted because I am a first semester student. All the classes were gone when I got there. I am taking courses for credit, not just for interest. I had little help and guidance from people in the registration area."

Sam Leeds, General Education

"Surprisingly enough, it wasn't too bad. Yet I know a lot of people who did have problems. I just got in there and raced around like a madman to get my cards."

CITY HALL—A view from the bottle...

City Alcoholics:

"You Get Used to Them"

Inside or outside; rain or shine; awake or asleep; alive or ... people pass by like they were not really there.

"They," who inhabit, rather exist, in and around Civic Center, once were alive, alert human beings. "They" have decayed to a level of human non-existence. "They" are total alcoholics — winoes.

Nobody really seems to know when they began to gather here. Some say as recently as the groundbreaking for the Yerba Buena Project; others say as long as they can remember. It makes little difference for the fact remains that "they" exist.

Walking through the Civic Center on a pleasantly sunny day, they appear to be everywhere — lying on the grass, sitting on benches. "At first, they kinda scared me," admits one young office worker. "But, you get used to them."

INSIDE AND OUT

On rainy days, they migrate indoors. Some go to the library, grab a book and stare blankly at the pages as if they were in a trance.

Inside City Hall some cluster about the vending machines. "They're disgusting," mumbles one affluent looking gentleman. "They'll say, 'Hey man, got any spare change? I wanta buy a cup of coffee.'"

"Coffee? Coffeeee-hell! All they want is to go over and buy some cheap bottle of wine!"

Others inside will roam around the building. Some drop by the Board room and sleep while the Board of Supervisors decides what's best for the rest of the City.

In the hub of San Francisco politics, in the very lifeblood of the City's governmental being, it's ironic that these shattered remnants of hope, aspiration, love and mankind, should spend their days in such a way.

Student Produces Park Concert; Audience Boogies to Free Music

Twelve hundred boogying music fans danced away at the Free Concert in the Friday afternoon sun of Golden Gate Park.

Sitting at the rear of the stage with a satisfied grin on his face was Steve "Strange," a broadcasting student at City College, and the man responsible for the successful resurrection of free rock music.

Steve said, "I'm not a magic man," but there was magic in the air as Stoneground kept the crowd jumping."

Two other bands, (Timberline and Lightyear) have played an hour set apiece and Stoneground's set was the last of the year for Golden Gate Park.

Steve has produced seven such concerts, with no disturbances like the mini-riots that have plagued other free music ventures.

This track record makes Steve optimistic about next year. "I'd like to do about two a month," he commented.

Steve "Strange" is the entire production company—he gets the park permits, the bands, the sound system and the publicity.

Money for the sound system comes from the coffers of the Neighborhood Arts Association.

Steve exaplins, "I felt that the music scene in San Francisco had reached a low point. There was no place for people to hear free music, and new bands always have difficulty in getting exposure."

The formula works well enough so that lesser known bands, such as Natural Act, Nimbus and Banana and the Bunch, have had a chance to be heard.

The concerts have not been limited to unknown groups. Stoneground is a local favorite. A June concert featuring Jesse Colin Young attracted a gathering of 2000.

Although the concerts are 100% nonprofit. Steve explains that all involved get something in return. The Bands get exposure, the sound people get experience, and the audience gets free music.

Nixon's Horoscope Foretells Problems

"President Nixon's problems have just begun. January, February, March and April of next year will bring problems with his physical and mental health. He may have a nervous breakdown during that time," but, "any attempt to impeach him will probably fail.

"Inflation will continue for about five years.

"Ronald Reagan will be out of the limelight for about two years, then will make a comeback."

These are just some of the predictions made by astrologer Maris Fletcher-Rudd in a recent appearance at City College.

Ms. Fletcher-Rudd, in a fascinating hour-long lecture, pointed out that while no one knows how old astrology is, the ancient Egyptians, Greeks and Mayan Indians were better astrologers than anyone today, even though today's astrologers use computers.

She also illustrated astrology's application to psychology, medicine, weather, and accident prevention.

Ms. Fletcher-Rudd advises people to plan important moves on days when the moon is in their Sun sign.

Mark-Almond Headlines in Rare Appearance At Winterland Concert

Making a rare appearance as headliners at Winterland, Mark-Almond displayed the talent that has kep them alive though they have yet to cull a hit album or single.

Johnny Almond, accomplished artist with vibraphone, background vocals and a master of all types of concert flutes and saxaphones, and Jon Mark, who handles all guitars and lead vocals, lead this group in some impressive jamming.

Though most famous for their work with John Maynall on the unapproachable Turning Point album, Mark-Almond is still very much alive.

Backed by drums, conga, timbales, bass, and organ, both Mark and Almond exploded with rich and rewarding solos.

Drawing on material from all four of their past albums, Mark-Almond provided both a highly enjoyable night and a fresh change from the loud rocking that is normal for Winterland.

Mark-Almond were preceeded by two British groups, Robin Trower, a spin-off from Procol Harum, and a dazzling trio, and Wishbone Ash, a talented rock quartet.

Bicycling; Smogless Transportation That's Fun But A Hassle

For many students, bicycling at CCSF has almost become an art. There are endless opportunities for expression in the potential daring and recklessness of the bicycle ride.

The biker's two main concerns are for the safety of his bike and his body.

The greatest threats to the rider's safety comes from nearby campus traffic. It is rare to ride to school without coming dangerously close to at least one accident.

"Most car drivers are concerned with finding good parking space and getting to class on time," says one rider. "Most car drivers aren't too concerned about bicycle riders."

This problem arises from the absence of any separation of bicycle and car traffic near campus.

Another threat to safety comes from the pedestrians on campus often colliding with bicyclists who ride through crowded hallways.

"People should just keep to the right in hallways," said one college rider. "I think a lot of problems could be avoided that way."

"I think the campus police should watch the bicycle room instead of leaving it up to the students to guard," he continued.

Weather is another worry for bike-riders who often find their bicycles rusting as a result of the unpredictable San Francisco rainstorms.

"At present, bicycling is just not a practical means of transportation," said one cyclist who has turned to the Municipal Railway.

CCSF has a bike room located below the Student Union building. Although equipped with five large bike racks, chains, and space for over 100 bikes, the room is never filled. The facilities presently house an average of over 20 bicycles.

"Even though we usually have guards during all hours, many people do not trust us," reported a member of the bikeroom guards.

Many cyclists prefer to keep their bikes within sight at all times. They must contend with stairways, crowded classrooms, and unsympathetic teachers.

Frustration Vented

"It is worth all the trouble when I can climb on my bike and pedal out all my frustrations," confided one cycling enthusiast.

Many riders enjoy the mobility and excitement of a good bike ride. Others insist that bicycles are the best way to avoid the traffic, while some prefer this ecological means of transportation.

HELL ON WHEELS—Author on his personal bike.

The cyclist faces many hazards, the greatest being traffic, weather, and potential theft.

"Cars often speed up to pass me or try to run me off the road," said one student cyclist. "Drivers do not seem to realize that we have the same rights as any automobile."

It is impossible to ride to the first, second, or third floors of the Science building, the first or third floor of Cloud Hall, the second floor of either gym, into any of the bungalows, or third floor Arts building without carrying your bike up at least one stairway.

Most teachers allow bicycles in their classes, but crowded classrooms often makes this privilege impractical.

Little consideration was given to bicyclists when City College was built. Perhaps now would be a good time to make alterations to accomodate bicycles.

Most important would be the creation of a safe means of parking bicycles on campus.

It is interesting to find bicycling listed as a campus Physical Education course. Happy biking.

Rams Blow Lead, But Tops Laney, 26-21

Riding on a one game win streak the CCSF Rams, paced by a strong running game and a clutch defense, outlasted a Laney second half surge to beat the Eagles 26-21 at Laney College on Friday October 26.

The victory over the Eagles put the Rams into the race for the conference title.

On the opening drive of the game, City easily moved through the Eagle defense with as good a running attack as they had had all year.

Runs by backs Eric Days and Lee Britton moved the ball 54 yards on seven plays to the Laney 5-yard line. Days slipped in for the first score of the game.

Somewhat shocked by the forceful Ram attack, Laney was unable to mount an attack. Eagle quarterback Mark McKee, the league's leading passer, fumbled the ball on Laney's 24 yard line where defensive back Dan Gallagher recovered for the Rams.

From there it was no problem for the Rams to score. They drove to the one yard line where Ram quarterback Dan Hayes pushed his way over for the second Ram touchdown in less than three minutes. Larson's conversion gave the Rams a stunning 14—0 lead.

The Eagles remained totally stupefied as their offense sputtered and gasped. McKee was ineffective as a passer and a runner.

Near the end of the second quarter McKee tossed an errant pass which Dan Gallagher intercepted at the 41-yard line.

Before the Eagles could get set to stop a drive, Hayes tossed a 36-yard touchdown pass to wide receiver Mike Bacigalupi to increase the lead to 21-0.

Relaxing too much, the Ram defense got caught up by the defiant Eagle offense. McKee moved Laney to the 21-yard line, where he hit tailback Brad Fisher with a 21-yard touchdown pass. The half ended with the score 21-7.

In the third quarter the Eagles came out firing as they struck for two quick touchdowns.

The first came when Ram cornerback Mel Washington fell down, freeing Eagle receiver Allen Goodlow for a 32-yard touchdown. The conversion was muffed leaving the Eagles trailing by eight points.

The second touchdown came on a fourth and goal situation from the seven-yard line. McKee hit on a swing pass to running back James Wiltz. A questionable two point conversion pass to tight end Paul Berlin evened the score at 21-21.

For the remainder of the third quarter and most of the fourth quarter neither team allowed the other a chance to score.

There were were times Laney came within striking distance only to have the Ram defense stiffen and force a punt. McKee would go back to pass only to have Ram linemen drag him down.

Near the end of the game the Rams recovered a fumble on the Laney 14-yard line. In striking distance, the Rams set to move in for the kill. However, the drive was stopped and CCSF tried for a field goal. Paul Larson came in to try a 35-yard field goal, the kick barely clearing the upright, making the score 24-21, Ram's favor.

Scrambling to get into the lead, McKee dropped back to pass on the 14-yard line. He was tackled for an eight yard loss. McKee dropped back again resulting in a safety as the Rams dropped him in the endzone.

One last ditch attempt at a game winning score by the Eagles wound up in the hands of Ram safety Jack Holleman.

Later in the week defensive end Siegan Keys was named the defensive player of the week in the Junior college division. Keys accounted for eight tackles and two fumble recoveries.

COAST GUARD AT WORK—Main radar room of the Coast Guard's new Vessel Traffic System on Yerba Buena Island.

Tim Porter

Coast Guard Traffic System To Reduce Bay Maritime Hazards

"Before the '71 collision about 90% of all vessels entering or leaving the Bay would check in with us. Only 50% of them would actually stay in contact with us" explained Thall. "Since then better than 90% of the vessels are keeping in touch with us."

Collision Statistics

Commander Thall commented that something had to be done about the marine traffic on the Bay. "Our statistics show that there was a major collision in San Francisco every 6 to 8 years. However, the capability of having a collision was too high."

Currently, the Coast Guard has set up traffic lanes to try and cope with the increasing amount of marine traffic. These lanes were set up to try and eliminate the major trouble areas in the Bay.

The problem areas — the Golden Gate, Yerba Buena Island, Angel Island, and San Pablo Point — all have the potential to turn into a major disaster if a collision occurs.

"We don't want to deny anybody the right to use the Bay," said Thall, "but when you consider a tanker weighing 250,000 tons takes three miles to stop and gets a little sailboat weighing 150 pounds cutting across its bow, someone is going to have to give way."

This experimental project was proven so successful that future expansion has been planned for other harbors in this country. Specifically, the ports of New York, New Orleans, and Seattle have been marked as future sites.

O. J. Simpson, Former City College Star, Sparkles In National Football League

Only halfway through the regular season schedule. O.J. Simpson has collected over a thousand yards rushing. Now he is aiming for a second thousand to break great Jim Brown's record of 1,800 yards. Simpson also holds the single game record for yardage and most carries in one game.

Simpson, once unhappy with the Buffalo team, now rejoices in his role as main offensive weapon. The man responsible for Simpson's sudden love for Buffalo is head coach Lou Saban.

Saban installed an offense which consists of Simpson to the right, Simpson to left and Simpson up the middle. For the former City College student it was a return to happier days at USC where he was also the main offensive weapon.

The future for Simpson is filled with promise of awards, big salaries and maybe the highly coveted Super Bowl ring.

Campus Leaders Critical Of Nixon Watergate Policy

"I guess he thinks what he's doing is what's right," responded Associated Student Body President, William Goode, "but his right is wrong with everybody else."

Goode was reacting to the firing of Archibald Cox, former prosecuting attorney in the Watergate Case by President Nixon, and the resignation of Attorney General Elliot Richardson.

Goode stated if Nixon had used more secure measures, then he wouldn't be in this kind of mess.

In favor of a definite change in the administration, Goode added, "The administration is not working for its people. They're all for themselves."

Goode said laughingly, "When Nixon goes, his others can go too."

Dr. Harry Buttimer, President of City College, was less committing in his views.

"He misjudged the conscience of the actions he took when he let Cox go and Richardson as well."

"So apparently he's reversed himself in light of the decision to turn over the tapes and it seems to me that it's a good thing."

AS President Bill Goode

Buttimer said that what has happened is good because it allows Congress and the Executive Branch an opportunity to review the information and make that determination.

On the subject of impeachment, Buttimer stated, "He certainly should be held accountable for the actions he's taken."

"I was furious all weekend. Everytime I was thinking about it, I was muttering to my wife and to my son."

That was the immediate reaction of Mr. Eugene Mead, head of the sociology department.

Mead then added, "I was frankly outraged and depressed. I felt when I first read that it indicated guilt on his part."

"I felt impeachment was the only solution."

But Mead felt that since Nixon released the tapes, there may be another solution.

Though Mead admitted that he's a Democrat, he's always disliked Nixon, but he admired what Nixon has done in foreign relations.

Mr. Robert Johnson, political science teacher, commented, "Nixon fired Cox, not because of the tapes, but because he was getting too close. And the resignation of Richardson really screwed him up."

"He had to avoid impeachment by turning over the tapes to Congress."

Johnson explained that because of the ease of editing tapes and the fact that John Ehrlichman had the tapes overnight, nobody would believe the tapes anyway.

CCSF President Harry Buttimer

Though Johnson said he would like to see President Nixon impeached, he doubted that would happen.

Evaluation To Begin

A teacher evaluation will be instituted throughout CCSF within the next few weeks.

A faculty-student evaluation questionnaire committee, composed of four students and four faculty members, is being headed by Mrs. Lene Johnson, Department Head of the Women's P.E. Department.

Unlike the teacher evaluation printed two years ago by the Experimental College, this evaluation will not be available to CCSF students.

The purpose of the evaluation is to let a teacher have a general consensus of his or her teaching method, with hopes that each teacher will use the evaluation to better their teaching and, in turn, improve the student's learning.

The questionnaire, along with a computer answer card, contain 21 questions which the student will give a rating of one (poor) to five (excellent) to each question.

Room will be given on the back of the card for comments.

Each department has a Departmental Evaluation Committee which will decide which classes will be used for evaluation and whether a student or faculty committee member will set up the evaluation in the classes chosen.

To allow for an honest and unbiased evaluation, the teachers will not be able to set up the questionnaires for their own classes.

After the computer cards have returned from the computer services department, the results will then be shown to the teachers who may then discuss the findings with their classes.

All data from the computer cards will then be kept in the department head's office for two years, after which the next teacher evaluation will begin.

The Faculty-Student Evaluation Questionnaire committee is hoping that this evaluation will benefit both the teachers and the students.

Lunch Program Saved

AS President Unsuccessfully Tries To Pass Controversial Legislation

Recently the Student Council made an effort to regulate spending of money allocated for student activities.

The attempt came in the form of a proposal submitted by Associated Student Body President William Goode.

If the proposal had been adopted, it would have established a policy for all future student body allocations.

The proposal was drafted during the summer by a tri-partite committee composed of three members of the administration, three faculty and three students who included the AS president and vice-president.

The plan immediately came under fire from students in the council room. One student pointed out that the proposal would freeze all future appropriations with a six-percent increase in sports activities and a five percent decrease in such popular programs as the book loan and free hot lunches for needy students.

One student wanted to know why the proposal was drafted during the summer and why the faculty and administration were involved when this is a student matter. The question went unanswered because of shouts and complaints of being ripped off.

Debate on the topic was long and bitter. The Student Council normally adjourns around one o'clock, but AS President Goode wanted action taken, and the matter wasn't resolved until 2:30 when the motion died on the floor due to an objection.

BART Is Open—Downtown To CCSF In 10 Minutes

STUDENTS WAIT FOR BART — Sparce crowd getting ready to board BART train at Balboa Park station.

After a four-year delay and many millions of dollars, Bay Area Rapid Transit service in San Francisco began last Monday.

BART's San Francisco service came after Mayor Alioto requested that service be provided since the original plans called for San Francisco service four years ago.

Many riders were pleased with the smooth ride, colorful decor, and efficient service. BART lives up to all its claims and more.

On opening day the only incident that marred service was the breakdown of two cars during the morning rush hour. Criticism of BART has been gathering from different people on separate problems.

The San Francisco Board of Supervisors, at the urging of Supervisor Kopp, have voted to urge that the BART system and the Muni system have a mutual transfer arrangement.

Presently there is no transfer system between the two transit lines as there now is in the East Bay betwen the AC Transit and BART.

Also it was discovered that the noise level that BART generates is well above safety levels. This level of noise may make people feel extremely uncomfortable.

Many City College students have already begun to take BART to school. One student commented, "It's fantastic. Before, it used to take half an hour to forty-five minutes to get to school. Now it only takes about twenty minutes."

Actual traveling time between the Powell St. Station and Balboa Station is ten minutes. The cost? A mere thirty cents.

—Another student commented, "The extra cost doesn't bother me. I can finally get to school feeling refreshed and wide-awake instead of dragging into class."

Currently BART only offers weekday service between the hours of 6 a.m. to 8 p.m. Week-end and nighttime service is planned to start in mid-1974. For the upcoming Christmas rush, BART plans to extend service to 10 p.m. at night.

Energy Crisis Or Nixon Crisis?

In a recent speech, President Nixon called on Americans to unite in this time of crisis. He obviously was discussing the energy crisis but perhaps this could be more truthfully labeled the Richard Nixon Crisis.

The fossil fuel problem is one that had been predicted and could have been dealt with less sensationally years ago.

The methods the president proposed to cope with the problem such as limitations on fuel useage and increased research into alternative energy sources are not examples of inspired leadership; they are the most obvious and practical steps to take.

It seems this "crisis" has conveniently come at a time when the nation is divided by fear and suspicion. It has come at a time when only something as serious as a national emergency could bring the nation together. This is a "crisis" at a time when Richard Nixon's personal effectiveness as president depends on a united America.

Will the people be duped into believing Richard Nixon is a 'White Knight' stepping in to save us from this new crisis?

Or will the people see this for what it really is; a political move by the president to make a "crisis" out of a real but long-existing problem with inevitable solutions?

Riding Reaganized Education

There was once something in California called "public education". But that was a thing of the past.

As you recall from history, the administration of then Governor Ronald Reagan had a peculiar habit of vetoing certain bills. Usually, they had to do with financial aids to needy students or other educationally-oriented programs.

Instead, highway construction received favorable financing. Thus, middle and lower income students could hardly go to college but they could ride on an eight-lane freeway.

As inflationary tendencies increased, the governor decided on further cutbacks in spending: welfare, education, and other "social" legislation.

But that was not enough. There followed tuition—not just at the university level, but at the state and community college levels as well.

Various programs which the governor deemed unnecessary were eliminated. In this manner the rise in tuition (an annual event) would increase at a lower rate.

"After all", said top government spokesman Jasper K. Hammerhead, "education should be open to all upper income students—not a select few."

And still, the price of education was too high! So a new policy was adopted—make all students from the first grade on buy their own books!

Naturally, tuition rates were established to compete with "private schools".

Of course, the people were dismayed. "Don't worry", said Hammerhead, "there's a new eight-lane highway just opened, connecting Market St. with the Great Highway!"

Thus, no members of lower—or middle-income groups could attend school but they could ride on an eight-lane highway!

PROP. 1- Reagan's Scapegoat

Ronald Reagan lost his popularity vote in California November 6 and his scapegoat was Proposition 1. It's plain to see that Proposition 1 was very unclear in the minds of the voters. Mr. Reagan knew this from the outset.

Reagan was testing his own voter strength and if the proposition had won, well, that would have launched his first step towards the number one slot on the Republican team in 1976.

The Republican party leaders were closely watching the results in California and they saw one thing: people are a lot smarter than they think. Any politician who uses a ballot proposition to gauge his own popularity and spends thousands of dollars of the taxpayers money, does not deserve to be called a public servant.

Regan said that government spending was at an all-time high. One wonders how much Mr. Reagan has helped the rise in government spending because of his personal proposition.

• Campus Views •

Question: Why do you think Proposition 1 failed?

Mike Fernandez, Business Administration

"Probably because the people thought they might wind up with the burden in paying the other taxes."

Partrica Rowe, Social Psychology

"Today's society is made up mainly of middle class and lower class citizens. Since the upper class citizens have more money, why should the poorer citizens have to make up the difference in their taxes, state or property? I didn't quite understand this proposition, but who can understand Reagan anyway?"

Al Robinson, Business

"It's probably because people are tired of Reagan. It has to do with political aspiration and his aims toward the White House. I wish I knew more about the proposition.

Gay Studies Petition

Currently being circulated on campus is a petition for a Gay Studies Program, organized by the Gay Student's Coalition, formerly known as the Free Gay Student Association.

The petition, endorsed by the Student Council, will need at least 5,000 student signatures before the group can approach the Administration on the program.

Courses to be introduced include a gay literature course on masculinity, and courses in sociology, psychology and history.

The petition helps insure students the right to decide on what they want to take in the future. At this time, students cannot learn about homosexuality in an accredited class.

There are several colleges and universities in California, among them being San Francisco and Sacramento State Universities, which offer Gay Studies Programs.

GOLDEN FOOTSTEPS — Cast of new musical revue assembles for a bow

Women P.E. Students Participate in All-New Musical Dance Review

"Golden Footsteps" will be seen and heard in City College's Little Theatre when the Women's P.E. department presents an all-new musical dance revue.

This semester's production, coordinated by Miss Susan Conarad, P. E. instructor, features 80 students participating in the various routines.

The program includes different types of dance such as tap, ballet, modern dance, jazz, Afro-Haitian, and Taitian solo dance.

A Charleston routine is included in the ballroom dance, as well as the Mambo, swing dance, jitterbug, and the Foxtrot.

The first half of the program offers the modern dance and jazz dance routines, ballet, and Afro-Haitian and a Taitian dance solo.

The second half of the show will trace the different dances from the 20's through the 50's eras.

"The dance show will have something for everyone," Miss Conrad says. "The dancers will be dressed in costumes reflecting the era to which they are dancing."

Performances will be held Thursday November 15 at 11 am. (free admission) Friday and Saturday nights, November 16 and 17, at 8 pm. Admission to the evening performances is $1 (general), and $.50 for students with a student body card.

Part 2 of a Series

City Alcoholics — "No Place To Hide"

At the Civic Center, for those "faceless" men whose total existence is the bottle, there is no place to hide.

But why the Civic Center? "I don't know," explains one of the men. "Others was here, so's I knew where to go."

Another adds "Ya see, we share... share with all our brothers... Gotta stick uh, humm together. Gotta stick together!"

Guilt

At lunch-time Civic Center is filled with office workers and government employees. A few alcoholics filter through the crowd looking for soft hearts with "spare change."

"I feel so guilty," says a young woman. "I can't explain why. I really don't know myself."

One thirtyish gentleman offers a theory: "Hey, you really wanna know why they come here? There's a huge captive supply of gutless individuals who'd give away all they got if it were up to them!

"You just gotta be firm," he continues." Just say 'no'. They won't take you on."

"I been bummin' here for 20 years.... Why here? Why the hell not!

"Lessee ... on yeh, 'Cause there's people with money." The elderly drunk continues his narrative after a short hacking fit.

"We can pool our take. Odds they're with ya."

A younger "brother" says, "When it's cold—ya know, man, like rain—got ta have someplace to go. Yeah, man, Inside. It's public.

"Say man, you got any spare change?"

Solution

"I don't see how City Hall can be so oblivious to the situation," says one young man. "How can anybody just walk by without wanting to do something about it."

What can the city really do? What is the answer to the situation?

Of course, this depends upon the question asked. "Get them away from City Hall." Fine, relocation can be done easily.

But what would it really accomplish? Such a measure would only sweep it under the rug. There has been too much of that in the past.

Open and/or improved rehabilitation centers is a possible solution. But that requires a volunteer effort on the part of the alcoholic.

Starting an Alcoholics Hostel may get them off the street. It would provide a place to go, a shelter against the rain and cold.

Then again, it may merely cover-up the situation.

Perhaps there is no cut-and-dried solution. But there must be a general recognition of the situation as it stands.

Only then can we be able to make any attempt to help those who are unable to help themselves.

Elton John and the Who are back with Double Albums

The Who, presently at the peak of their American popularity, and one of England's biggest supergroups, have released their second rock opera, Quadrophenia, to coincide with their first United States tour in two years.

The double album, written mostly by the prolific lead guitarist/composer, Townsend, is an excellent package of the Who formula that has kept them at the top of the music world.

Although the album contains few surprises, the music is an artistic blend of lead, bass, organ and vocals that would not disappoint any Who enthusiast.

Elton John has also released a double album, his first two-record set and first work for the newly formed Rocket Record company.

Entitled Goodbye The Yellow Brick Road, the package contains Elton's most recent single, Saturday Night's Alright For Fighting, and his current hits of Funeral For A Friend and the title track.

The team of John and lyricist Taupin have struck again with a rich display of highly diversified material.

The finished sound is exceptional, which is not the least bit unusual for the talented Elton John who is a versatile pianist and vocalist.

Fleetwood Mac's latest work, Mystery to Me, sounds a great deal like a remake of their previous album, Penguin.

Although the vocals are beautiful and instruments sharp in the background, Fleetwood Mac has failed to move in any new directions since Peter Green left the group.

The album falls short of any expectations despite the inclusion of the Yardbird's hit, For Your Love, and two fascinating compositions, Emerald Eyes and Hypnotized.

Also out is the first Gregg Allman album, Laid Back, a departure from the driving style of the Allman Brothers.

Gregg, playing piano, organ, and handling the lead vocals, is backed by a talented array of sidemen, including a variety of horns.

Though the sound is somewhat slowed down in comparison with past Allman Brothers' albums, there is enough to interest any music lover. This package includes new versions of Midnight Rider, Please Call Home, and the traditional Will The Circle Be Unbroken.

Peter Sings Sans Paul and Mary; OK But 'Ghosts' Linger

Despite "a terrible San Francisco cold", Peter Yarrow worked hard and successfully to entertain the 100-plus students who crowded into the choral room to hear and see this third of the now defunct Peter, Paul and Mary trio.

Yarrow sang seven songs in the 35 minute mini-concert including sing along versions of "Stewball" and "I Shall be Released." To his credit, the audience participation was nearly 100 percent.

Contributing much to his new sound were four young, talented back-up musicians—"the Peter Yarrow Band."

But, good as they were, one still missed the vocal support of Mary Travers and Paul Stokey, whose ghosts it seems Yarrow will never shake.

San Francisco Police Lie In Wait For Offending Motorists

A caravan of three hundred motorcycle police are infiltrated throughout San Francisco. They are stationed mainly at intersections in the city where construction is under way.

Their job is to issue moving violations to anyone who disobeys a detour sign.

Officers stationed at the intersection of Geary Blvd. and Presidio Avenue have already issued more than two thousand citations to motorists who failed to detour at the interesection of Lyon and Geary.

During the rush hour, 4:00 to 6:00 p.m., the detour signs state that all traffic, except Muni buses, must turn right on Lyon instead of continuing westbound toward the beach.

Motorists traveling along Geary who by-pass the sign are flagged down and issued a costly moving violation.

Motorists who cannot produce valid drivers license are asked to get out of their cars for immediate towing.

Issuing these traffic tickets seems to be causing much more confusion but officers say those who violate the law must get their just desserts!

Officers not occupied ride their cycles up and down Presidio Avenue until the light at the corner turns green, and a new flock of motorists are herded their way for more citations.

The news media, for over a month, has been informing the public of the detour and the penalties for disobeying the sign.

The operation has been in effect since October 23. Officers could not give a closing date for the operation.

Rams Blasted By San Mateo, 24- 0

On a cool, crisp Saturday afternoon the CCSF Rams took to their home field with high hopes of challenging the College of San Mateo for the lead in the conference.

Their hopes were dashed as a superb Bulldog defense shut out the Rams 24-0.

The San Mateo defense proved so effective that the Ram offense could muster only 67 yards total and could cross mid-field but once.

Meanwhile, the Bulldog offense totalled 273 yards and crossed the mid-field mark more than once. The victory put them into sole possession of first place in the Golden Gate Conference.

The first San Mateo touchdown came in the first quarter on a six-play 80-yard drive, culminated in a one-yard plunge by running back Larry Backstrom. The touchdown was set up earlier by a 55-yard run by Backstrom.

The ball exchanged hands a few times. Then, in the first minute of the second quarter, kicker S. LaPlant connected on a 22-yard field goal to bring the lead to 10-0.

Midway through the second quarter the Rams had an opportunity to score. Recovering a fumble on the 43-yard line of the Bulldogs, the Rams moved downfield on a variety of plays down to the 14-yard line.

Paul Larson tried for a field goal but the attempt was wide to the right.

From there the Bulldogs wasted little time in moving to another score. Moving 80 yards, they tallied a touchdown on a 31-yard pass to wide receiver Robert McLennan from quarterback Mike Wright. This brought the score to 17-0.

The stifled Ram offense remained totally ineffective. After four downs the Rams gave up the ball to the Bulldogs on their 36-yard line.

Wasting less time than before, San Mateo proceeded to march downfield methodically. With little or no restraints from the Ram defense, San Mateo faked an end-around and wide receiver K. Castellanos heaved a 35-yard pass to end Rich Clarke. The score now stood at 24-0.

The half ended on an absolutely ridiculous note as punter Paul Larson was forced to kick five times due to penalties from both the Rams and the Bulldogs.

The second half told an entirely different story as each team showed defensive strength. Quarterback Dan Hayes felt the unending Bulldog rush cover him time and time again.

Backs Lee Britton and Eric Days were unable to find holes to run through for one simple reason. There weren't any.

The same held for the Bulldogs as their offense ground to a halt. With a first and goal on the 9, they were held without scoring.

The display of defense gave both teams a lot of hope for their next game.

A sad note to the game, other than the game's loss, was the loss of guard Mike Bishop with torn ligaments in his knee. Surgery was performed Sunday.

CCSF SHARE Tutors Turn People Onto Life And Education

"Nobody likes eating a hotdog by themselves," says the eye-catching phrase used to advertise the SHARE program on campus.

Operation SHARE is a tutoring program which gives grade-school kids a chance to turn on to education and life with a little help of a CCSF friend.

SHARE tutors are actually much more than tutors to their troubled youngsters. They try to motivate their tutees by first being a friend.

The usual problems of a tutee are lack of confidence, shyness and loneliness. The tutor can reach the child only by being a friend and a listener.

Picnics, field trips, and parties are planned for all SHARE participants to get to know each other and let the children release a lot of pent-up energy.

Ron Mar is the first CCSF student to tutor a handicapped child in the SHARE program. Ron himself has a speech defect, yet he has instilled in his paralyzed tutee a positive outlook on life that was previously missing.

SHARE is a government-funded program, which offers one, two or three credits to students for their work with children or for working with the co-ordinator, Gaby Toure, in her office in Cloud Hall, room 133.

Who qualifies to be a SHARE Tutor?

Ron Mar says, "Anyone who is humanitarian enough to love kids!"

New Monitors Bring News To CCSF Students

The Broadcasting department is in the process of adding more monitors to its closed circuit television system. Monitors are now located in the Library, the lobby of the New Arts building, the Student Union and Educational Services building.

New monitors, according to Henry Leff, program coordinator of the Broadcasting department, will be placed in the Science building and Business Arts.

In the Science building there may be a monitor on each floor and the women and men's gyms may be future sites for monitors.

Presently the monitors are broadcasting news, weather, sports, Watergate hearings and other special events. The broadcasting department has a direct line to Channel 6, which is a cable television station in San Francisco.

In the future, campus information will be combined with the cable telecast. This will make City College one of the only college television stations in the country to have this kind of a system.

Robin Trower Trio A Rare Experience

Just as Procol Harum began to break as a group in this country, disagreements resulted in the departure of Robin Trower, their lead guitarist.

Robin put together a trio, backed by bass and drums, and recorded a fine debut album, entitled Twice Removed From Yesterday.

It is very rare to see a trio in the rock world today, and much rarer to experience one as good as Robin Trower.

Using only the three instruments of lead, bass, and drums, the group managed to build a state of excitement with their lively playing.

Songs included their single, Man Of The World, the standard, Rock Me Baby, and an enjoyable rendition of a dazzling song, Daydream.

Wave Of Thefts Plague Student Bookstore

About $22,500 mainly in expensive textbooks have been smuggled out of City College's Associated Bookstore in the past year, according to Dave Hunter, textbook and paperback manager.

Hunter disclosed these figures in a meeting November 27 of the Bookstore Committee, composed of students, faculty members, and administrators.

"The first time we were aware of the serious theft problem was about a month ago," said Mr. Hunter. "We saw one guy with a big coat on who stuffed a bunch of books under it and split out the door. It's happened several times — the same three or four guys are involved."

He stressed to the Bookstore Committee that something has to be done. "I don't want to be a policeman ... and we don't have the staff to watch everybody to prevent this."

Hunter further stated that large numbers of the stolen books were sold to the California Book Co. Ltd., 11 Phelan Avenue.

Jim Arnold, manager of the Cal Book, verified that stolen books from CCSF's bookstore were filtering into his store. "We stopped buying the books when we discovered they were stolen."

"We actually saw the same guys running out of the student bookstore and pulling a bunch of books out from under their coats. Then they would come over here and try to sell the books to us, but we would turn them away," said Mr. Arnold.

"I could probably identify them, if it comes to that," Mr. Arnold continued. "We don't really have a way of dealing with City College's theft problem other than refusing to buy obviously stolek books. But some of our staff met privately with Dr. Buttimer, CCSF President, to help find a solution."

Dr. Buttimer feels the theft problem is very serious.

"The Bookstore Committee is working on this. Disciplinary action in the past has depended on the circumstances. The difficulty has been in determining the identity of the persons stealing. If we could do that, there would be no holds barred. We would proceed with the fullest disciplinary measures. We might use a security agency in the future."

Energy Conservation Practiced; CCSF Turns Heat, Most Lights Down

Recently some of you may have felt the classrooms to be a bit cooler than usual. The reason, explains Maintenance Superintendent Clement Dang of the Facilities and Planning Office, is because "The thermostats in every room on campus have been turned down to 68 degrees."

Also, from President Nixon's request for conservation of energy, CCSF will comply by limiting its use of lighting around campus. Currently smaller bulbs are replacing the old ones in the areas where lighting was not critically necessary.

Teachers have been advised to adjust shades and venetian blinds properly in order to use as much natural light as possible. The Facilities and Planning Office urges use of electric lights only when natural light is inadequate and to turn off all lights when leaving an empty classroom.

Experiments will be conducted to see if possibly two-thirds of the bright lighting in the parking area at the reservoir could be eliminated.

Also to conserve energy, the remodeling in the Science Building dalls for flourescent lights as in the classrooms of Cloud Hall. The change from incandescent to flourescent lighting will save on electrical power.

These measures and perhaps others will save on energy. "But more important," explains Dang, "is that such measures will not hamper the safety of students and personnel on campus or interfere with the educational process."

★ Women's Action Committee Meets ★

The CCSF Student Women's Action Committee recently held its first meeting for this semester. The meeting was attended by approximately two dozen student and faculty women.

The purpose of the Women's Action Committee is to institute hot lunch and book loans programs, and to help women students to obtain financial aid.

The committee plans to set up a Women's center on campus to coordinate these programs and to, in the words of one committee member, "provide a place for women to be together."

Women interested in joining the Women's Action Committee, or helping with these programs, can obtain information on meetings and schedules at the Experimental College.

Veterans Offered Aid

The CCSF Vets were formed out of a need to provide services for veterans who are not receiving the necessary assistance that the Veterans Administration is supposed to give.

Job referrals, peer counseling, emergency assistance advice and book loan programs are but some of the activities of the Veterans organization.

Two years ago the organization was quite small. They were using space in the La Raza Bungalow. Today they have their own office in the Experimental College and the organization is anything but small with a membership of 400.

Two of the most essential services that Veterans office offers is the book loan and hot lunch program.

These programs provide books and hot lunches for needy veterans who might otherwise have to quit school.

Other services include emergency assistance referrals and information concerning the upgrading of discharges for those who are ineligible to receive their educational benefits.

Other services planned for the future include an outreach program to contact veterans who aren't receiving current benefits, a tutorial program, and direct employer relations to provide jobs for those who need them.

The City College Vets are having a Christmas Party December 14, beginning at 3 o'clock, at the Lower Level of the Student Union Building. Admission will be 75 cents and a ten-speed bicycle will be given away as a door prize.

The City College Veterans raffle for the ten speed bicycle was not held for reasons beyond their control. They give their apologies to the people who bought tickets. Holders of these tickets can exchange them for tickets to their Christmas Party to be held December 14, 1973 beginning at 2 o'clock at the Lower Level of the Student Union Building. An admission charge of 75 cents will be required. The bicycle will be awarded as a door prize.

J.C. Penney Store Offered for Downtown College Center

In a surprise move, the Louis Lurie Foundation offered to lease the former J. C. Penney building at Fifth and Market to the Community College District as a Downtown Education Center.

The Board of Governors did not act on this proposal but directed the superintendent of facilities to look into the possibility.

"We have been trying to get a building downtown for sometime now," said Louis Batmale, Chancellor of the College District. "However, a reconstructed building isn't as good as a planned school building."

According to Batmale, he didn't think that the college district could get permission to establish a downtown center on Market Street because of opposition from the Chamber of Commerce and from the downtown merchants.

Batmale said, "Our students are first class people and they shouldn't be put into a second class building."

The offer was made by William Stone, a real estate broker acting for the Lurie Foundation. Stone pointed out the advantages of using the vacant building as opposed to the construction of a new building.

Stone cited the advantages students would have in transportation since Muni has service lines on Market and the BART station at Hallidie Plaza.

He also said that it would be cheaper for the district to lease the building for twenty years at a cost of $6.5 million, rather than spend $10 million in developing a new building.

However, the board indicated that they were determined to go ahead and develop the building at Fourth and Mission.

FIFTH AND MARKET — Proposed site for Community College District facility is near Muni and BART transportation.

Bookstore Negligence?

For a long time now there have been signs of trouble emanating from the bookstore. With a recent disclosure that $22,500 worth of books have been stolen, the administration can no longer ignore these signs.

For years there has been a steady flow of criticism from teachers and students about the bookstore. The beginning of every semester brings the familiar round of complaints. Teachers order their textbooks but don't always receive them. Sometimes books are delayed two or three weeks into the semester. No one needs to explain what a problem this presents.

Students complain about resale prices. They say the bookstore buys their used books at low prices and resells them close to the original cost when bought new.

But these complaints which deserve attention have been put back on the shelf due to the recent disclosure that $22,500 worth of books has been stolen during the past year.

Dave Hunter, assistant manager of the bookstore, claims the thefts have been committed by the same persons, "a ring of three people." This statement seems incredible. How can three people who are prime suspects, walk out of the store with $22,500 worth of books? If true why aren't the bookstore personnel able to catch them?

Anyone entering the place has to check his belongings at a counter by the door, he then receives a number and on the way out reclaims them. So upon passing the cashier at the checkout counter, all items in that person's possession would be those to be purchased.

You must admit it sounds pretty shaky, especially when this has been happening for years. How can the bookstore personnel and the administration continue to do nothing when thousands of dollars are stolen each year? The assistant manager claims people have been caught stealing in the past, but have never been prosecuted.

How long can situations like this exist before some responsible action is taken?

Surely what we need is a full-scale investigation. Only then can the facts become known. Anyone found guilty of negligence, irresponsibility or any wrongdoing should be dealt with accordingly.

White Male Domination

Liberate-v., to release from slavery, enemy occupation, etc.

This term is used so freely by the many diversified groups in America that one may wonder about th. term's implications.

Indians, for example, were the original landowners in this country; they suffered "enemy occupation," chiefly from white, male-dominated pioneers.

The Indians have been asking for liberation ever since the white man arrived and took over the country.

The Blacks, enslaved by white, male-dominated societies, have been seeking their "release from slavery."

Latinos, another group stifled by our white, male-dominated society, are finally speaking out against their oppressors.

Japanese families were forced into concentration camps in America during the Second World War by a white, male-dominated government.

And the women! Women in all these groups are trying to liberate themselves from a white, male-dominated culture.

Maybe Webster should revise his definition for our country and say that liberate means: "to release from white, male-dominated slavery; white, male-dominated enemy occupation!"

Tape: "It's all a Mistake"

A full 18-1/4 minutes of subpoenaed White House tape is missing and Mr. Nixon's dedicated personal secretary says, "It's all a mistake."Rosemary Woods claims she accidentally erased the recorded tape while attending to a telephone call which she stated seemed more like 5-1/2 minutes.

To tell the truth, it sounds like some of Mr. Nixon's masterminding handiwork.

It's amazing how such an irresponsible person such as Ms. Woods could have been placed in such an important position. Well, she's only the President's secretary.

Truthfully, Ms. Woods should have saved her breath — her story just doesn't add up, and the general public isn't going to buy it, either.

If she's smart, she'll pull out now and possibly get away with a light charge of perjury, but, should she insist on being involved in this political chaos, she'll find herself sliding down the drain with her boss.

The GUARDSMAN predicts, that should Judge Sirica continue to have Ms. Woods' testimony re-read, she Woods will tell the truth before Christmas.

Social Concern Should Concern Big Business

Seventy percent of college editors strongly agree that big business should concern itself as much with social responsibility as with profits. This is one of the principal findings of a poll conducted by Newsweek and The Associated Collegiate Press.

The Survey on the American System was conducted during September and October of 1973. It was designed to determine college editors' feelings about the state of affairs in the United States in four areas: political, economic, social and cultural.

Nearly three-quarters of the editors polled have confidence in the principles of the American political system.

Seventy percent feel that even though the American system may not be ideal, it is the best available in the world today. A majority of the editors polled believe that the American system of government is truly democratic.

Because of the structure of our economic system, seventy percent of the editors believe welfare is necessary. Three-fourths think a system of socialized medicine should be instituted in the United States.

More than eight-tenths feel civil liberties are being threatened by too much government intervention.

A majority of the editors feel that this society has the right to legislate social restraints on heroin but on marijuana, pornography, homosexuality or privacy (e.g., the "no-knock" law).

Question: What are you doing for the Energy Crisis?

Ronald Bustillos, Fire Science

"At home I turn off the lights if I don't need them. There are two television sets, if both are on, one is turned off. I don't have a car, so I don't have that problem."

Bernice Won, Optometry

"We turn the hall lights off which were previously left on. We turn off the lights in front of the house. We haven't turned off the thermostat because it would get too cold."

Skipp Nobles, Drama

"The only thing I am doing is when the lights or radio aren't being used, I turn them off. I am more aware of wasting electricity now."

Letters to the Editor

Dear Editor,

In the Nov. 8th issue of the GUARDSMAN you printed an editorial denouncing the presence of dogs on campus, signed by Spencer Nutting.

Although I am not as much an authority on the subject as Mr. Nutting appears to be, I would like to correct some gross misunderstandings.

Mr. Nutting complains of the noise dogs cause, the fighting they partake of so often, and the "landmarks" they deposit much to Spencer's dismay.

I would like to point out that dogs are generally blamed for most of human shortcomings.

The mess that dogs leave behind is small when compared with the amount of garbage that their "civilized" masters strew thoughtlessly about campus. It is human fault that the entire student body is plagued with a real health problem; bees and rats.

I must also remind Mr. Nutting that the occasional dog bark is heavenly silence when compared to the dreadful din of the library, our quietest room.

As to the fighting, I must remark that humans have mastered violence far beyond any other animal's ability.

I must assert that our four-footed friends are just as much a part of this school and community as any other animal, even Spencer.

Dogs tend to help one forget the drab and artificial surroundings of the atrocious school. They help one relax when realizing that some forms of natural life still exist within these concrete walls.

Lastly, I must question Mr. Nutting's observations as being accurate on a first-hand basis.

Dear Editor,

Your article about litter is very appropriate. Ever since I came to San Francisco from Europe 16 years ago I have been shocked by the amount of litter strewn all over the city and by the nonchalant way people drop things on the ground — as if that is the natural thing to do.

I was taught as a child that leaving litter around was a no-no, but apparently the schools here don't include such teaching in their curriculum; and it's harder to teach adults. But not impossible — with a little impetus.

According to signs in the financial district, littering is against the law and subject to a penalty of up to $250! I don't suppose anyone is apprehended under this law, anymore than for setting off firecrackers or riding motorcycles on the beach (two other illegal activities), but if even a few $5 fines were slapped on people for decorating the scenery with candy wrappers, beer cans, etc. — with perhaps a generous alternative choice of penalty, namely spending one hour cleaning up litter — than people would become litter-conscious almost overnight. If they won't try it in the city, why don't we at least try it on campus?

Incidentally, those are not bees around the Cable Car canteens, they are wassp or yellow-jackets and they are scavengers, representing one of Nature's attempts to clear up man's mess.

As a San Francisco businessman, I find it incredible that THE GUARDSMAN will not accept advertising. Is there a statute or ordinance which sustains this rather unrealistic policy? Yours is a good medium; I see no reason why part of its cost should not be underwritten by reputable advertisers who would welcome the business our city's only community college's students could direct our way. Charles I. Beatles Reunite Temporarily

Drummer Ringo Starr Returns With His Best Effort To Date

This week's choice is the much-acclaimed return of ex-Beatle drummer, Ringo Starr.

The album dubbed simply, RINGO, is without doubt a might step forward for the musically shy former Beatle.

Since their break-up, Ringo has contentedly remained in the shadow of George Harrison. Many thought him talentless, as his earlier solo albums seemed to testify.

His newest work boasts the enlisting of perhaps the greatest of all sidemen — John Lennon, George Harrison, Paul and Linda McCartney, Nickey Hopkins, Harry Nilsson, Marc Bolon, Klaus Vorman — and the impressive list goes on.

The entire production seems equally extravagant; fortunately the ten tunes included are not overdone.

Some of the innovations, such as full orchestral background and sharp, full horns, capably played by Tom Scott, enhances the quality of this superbly produced album.

If there is one word to describe this album, the word would definitely be "cute." This is perhaps the classically "cute" album of the year, carefully balanced between corn and trash.

The best tunes are the Harrison-influenced, "I'm The Greatest;" the slow ballad, "Step Lightly" the humorous "You And Me Babe;" and the fascinating and familiar single, "Photograph."

Ringo Starr, virtually absent from the music world since his Beatle days, has finally made his long awaited comeback — one well worth waiting for.

Another former Beatle, John Lennon, has also released a new album, MINA GAMES, in the undeniably excellent Lennon style.

Included are several catching numbers with the short "National Anthem Of Nutopia," a stimulating concept.

Billy Cobham, Mahavisnu drummer and possesser of two of the quickest hands alive, has his first solo work, SPECTRUM out on CTI.

The guitar work and organ on this album are electrifying, and Cobham is completely competent on drums — a fascinating and successful combination.

Santana's latest, WELCOME has quickly generated both praise and disdain. This album is a continuation of the McLaughlin influenced guitar licks that transformed CARAVANSERAI from the past Santana style.

If you are into "Black Magic Women" or "Oye Como Va," this record might best be avoided. If you have marveled at Carlos Santana's recent metamorphosis you will be captivated by his newest work.

You can safely look forward to the new Neil Young, Boz Scaggs, and Crosby, Stills and Nash reunion albums. All are scheduled for release in January 1974.

Talented Actors Are Big Hit

When the Committee closed their theatre on Broadway nearly a year ago, they created a gap that had been unfillable in the San Francisco entertainment scene.

That gap was filled last week when the Committee returned for a two-week engagement at the Boarding House that kicked off a nation-wide promotional tour of their new album WIDE WIDE WORLD OF WAR.

For two hours the cast — Howard Hesseman, Julie Payne, Morgan Upton, Dan Barrows, Ruth Silveira, Jim Cranna, and Larry Hankin — kept the capacity crowd a hootin' and a hollerin!

The Committee members demonstrated their versatility by poking fun at everything and everybody from President Nixon to "Harry Krishna," radical chic to personal hygiene.

The most memorable piece of the evening is by far a highly original allegory featuring Ruth Silveria and Julie Payne. They portray a pair of mismatched college roommates who gradually, almost invisible, age fifty years during the twenty-minute skit.

A combination of pointed humor and timeless perception makes this piece the icing on a very nutty cake.

The Committee will be on the road for six weeks and then will return to San Francisco.

Those who go to see them will be starting off the New Year right.

STEELWIND — On Stage at the Matrix

Big Band, Folk-rock

A phenomenon inconsistent with the high-priced rip-offs of entertainment these days is manifest at two progressive-thinking spots these days.

One is The Great American Music Hall at 859 O'Farrell, currently featuring a Quincy Jones big-band style by the Scratch Ensemble, once the Chris Poehler Band. The classy solos and great harmonic lines of this outfit make one jump for joy. They play Mondays.

The same hall generates lively rock for dancing couples on Wednesday nights with the Delta Wires spreading their musical wings.

Spot number two for free music is the Matrix, formerly the Seven Divinities, but originally opened as Mr. D's. Free folk-rock furnished by two gifted local groups, Steelwind and Dolly Lama and her Mountain Boys start at nine and bounce until the wee hours Sundays.

It was Steelwind who recently gigged with Jack Trayler and Papa John Creach, while the Dolly Lama & her Mountain Boys combine original material with more traditional tunes to produce a happy Sunday evening.

Free is the way to go. It is literal generosity as well as good business for the spots because they build traffic for more famous groups on nights when fees are levied.

Yet the free groups have fine musicians and singers and are undoubtedly the finest free entertainment available anywhere.

New Campaign For Modified "Pot" Law

The same people who directed last year's marijuana decriminalization campaign are now working to present a modified version of last year's Proposition 19 to the voters in June, 1974.

Proposition 19, which failed by a two-to-one margin, was accepted by over 75% of the college students in California last year.

The new proposal seeks removal of all criminal penalties for any form of private marijuana cosumption or cultivation, while reducing punishment for the public use of marijuana to a maximum $100 fine.

To qualify as a state proposition on the 1974 ballot, 325,504 signatures of registered voters are required.

The several groups that are sponsoring this campaign are seeking 500,000 signatures to cover for invalidation.

Campaign workers are sought to circulate petitions and work around the office. Funds are almost non-existent.

Students may also help by purchasing any cigarette papers made by Amphoria, which donates all of its profits to the decriminalization campaign.

Volunteers can call (415) 563-5860 in the Bay Area or visit the Canabis Cooperative at 2073 Greenwich Street in San Francisco.

★★ Viking Rampage Ruins Frustrated Rams ★★

Battered and frustrated by a disappointing season, the CCSF Rams trudged into the home field of Diablo Valley College, where they were soundly bounced off the neighboring mountain 48-21.

Viking quarterback Steve Leroy enjoyed his best game, passing for three touchdowns and running for two. Feeling no pressure from the Ram front four, Leroy sat behind the line and throttled the Ram secondary.

From the beginning of the game the Vikings wasted little time in establishing the tempo of the game. On their first possession of the game the Vikings rolled 55 yards on six plays where Leroy pushed his way in from the two-yard line.

The next Viking score was set up when Viking Safety Tom McCarty found the handle of a tipped pass.

Moving from their own 26-yard line the Vikings used a variety of plays to move to the Ram 16-yard line. There, tailback Doug Zimmermann slithered and darted to an easy touchdown. Kicker Al Edwards missed the conversion when the ball popped off the upright.

In dire need of a score, the Rams revived their half-dead offense to move 69 yards on 12 plays to score on Eric Days' seven-yard dash.

Treating the Rams score as a slap in the face, the Vikings used only two plays to score their next touchdown. After a Leroy pass connected with flanker Ron Turner for 42 yards, Leroy hit split-end Jim Magana for 18 yards and an easy score.

Shocked and stupefied, the Rams tried to mount a drive, but the Vikings' defense stiffened and held the Rams short of a vital first down.

Taking the ball on the 25-yard line after an interfering with the punt returner call, the Vikings used two quick plays to score their fourth touchdown of the night. A 20-yard pass to Turner gave the Vikings a towering 27-7 lead.

On the ensuing kick-off Kenny (K.C.) Chambers did what he has been threatening to do all year — break a kick-off return wide open, rambling 95 yards without a hand being laid on him.

Stunned by Chambers' heroics, the Vikings failed to return to form until two series later. Starting from their own 27-yard line, Diablo Valley drove 73 yards where halfback Brian Parker bolted over from the one.

On the opening of the second half Ram safety Jack Holleman picked off an errant Leroy pass at the Ram 20 yard line. Using his backs on circle patterns out of the backfield Ram quarterback Dan Hayes drove his team 80 yards capping the drive with a 29-yard pass to halfback Bobby McCutcheon.

Unwilling to allow any sort of comeback, Diablo Valley quickly moved to another score on the next series. Moving downfield brilliantly, Leroy capped the march with a five-yard pass to Turner.

As if the Vikings had not inflicted enough injury on the hapless Rams they chose to complete the rout with a fourth quarter touchdown by Leroy.

Completely overwhelmed by the explosive Viking offense the Rams rolled over and played dead for the rest of the game.

Defense, San Jose Prevail in Mudbowl; Rams Lose 9-7

With no hope of a conference title, the CCSF Rams took to the their muddy home field against San Jose City College on a matter of pride. It wasn't enough as the Rams dropped a tough 9-7 loss to the Jaguars.

With almost uncanny precision the Rams continued their inept style of play. A variety of penalties and miscues gave the ball to the Jaguars on their own 45-yard line.

From there the Jaguars marched down field to the seven-yard line. There, they suddenly caught the Rams' illness, and committed a personal foul penalty to push them back. Three plays later Lou Rodriguez missed an easy field goal from the 12-yard line.

Suddenly inspired with a show of defense, the Rams marched 80 yards on two plays. A quick 11-yard burst by Eric Days set up the play on the 31-yard line. On the next play days swept the left end and rambled 69 yards untouched for the Rams' first and only score.

For the rest of the half both teams displayed strong defenses. Each team was unable to move the ball into scoring range and when they did, the other team would kill the drive with a good defensive play.

At the end of the half a series of turnovers, consisting of fumbies and interceptions marred the performance of the two teams.

The second half opened with Jaguar running back Marv Stewart rambling through a scattered Ram defense on his way to a 195 yard day. However, a Jaguar fumble killed the drive.

Towards the end of the third quarter, the Jaguars sloshed 37 yards, where fullback Tom Newton scored on a four-yard swim for a touchdown. The subsequent conversion was wide, leaving the Rams well within victory.

Trailing 9-7, Ram quarterback, Dan Hayes, tried to move his team to a victory. With his team on the go Hayes committed a mortal sin and turned the ball over once again.

From there San Jose moved deep into Ram territory with ideas of putting the game away. It wouldn't come about as their try for a field goal from the 21-yard line was wide to the left.

With still another breath of life, Hayes began to engineer a drive that would leave the Rams with some respect. Using a variety of short passes, Hayes moved his team to the Ram 42 yard line. There two bad plays destroyed their effort. The first play was a swing pass to Eric Days which lost 11 yards. The second was Hayes' old nemesis, the untimely interception.

The game ended with Jaguar quarterback Tom Boehme cradling the ball and gently falling down.

Wave Of Thefts Plague Student Book Store

Dean of Students Ralph Hillsman, says, "There is no reason for a student attending City College to have to steal to get his books. There are several ways the college can help him get those books through student assistance programs. If a person is caught stealing from the bookstore, it's likely they will be prosecuted."

Manager of the AS Bookstore Dick Main says he's been fighting for tighter security measures for years. "In the past very little was done. Now I think we're going to prosecute ... and it's a good thing."

Main says they don't know how much the bookstore's loss actually is. In the past 5 or 6 years, he says their gross sales profit precentage has dropped from a high of 25% to 19%. The decrease, he says, is probably dur to pilferage.

Main says, the $22,500 figure quoted by Dave Hunter, is based on an annual precentage of pilferage. "Dave's figure is an estimation, an absolute minimum — it may be even higher."

It was learned that people have been caught in the past stealing from the bookstore but the only punitive measures were a reprimand and banning of any future entrance to the bookstore.

The committee wondered why the bookstore didn't prosecute, as is normally done at other campus bookstores. No answer was forthcoming at the time because the bookstore manager, Dick Main, was not at the meeting. It was learned that he hadn't been to a meeting all semester.

The committee discussed ways of eliminating this problem and came up with various hoped-for solutions. One was to station campus policemen at the doors to prevent people from running out of the store with the books under their coats, a prime modus operandi.

This proved unfeasible when it was found that the campus police don't have the personnel or the funds to cover the bookstore.

The best solution the committee decided was to expand the bookstore to reduce the opportunities for theft, by increasing store-wide visibility. However, any expansion must be approved by Vic Graff, director of facilities and planning for CCSF.

The committee learned that such expansion would take possibly five years to complete after going through all the bureaucratic procedures for new construction.

"One of the reasons we want more space is to reduce the height of the shelves;" said Hunter. "Frankly, all we need is more space."

At an earlier meeting on November 20, the special sub-committee consulted with Mr. Graff and other administrators where the problems of CCSF's insufficiently-spaced bookstore was raised.

The members claim that a larger bookstore should have been planned, better security measures put into effect, and a broader range of reading material carried in the bookstore which would, in turn, raise profits sales which are steadily declining due to the large amount of pilferage going on.

During the committee meeting a recommendation in proposal form was drafted and submitted to Dr. Harry Buttimer, CCSF President.

For a short-term solution, the following were offered:

(.) Add a separate relocatable type building in the open space immediately behind the current bookstore, making a new storeroom space available.

(.) Remove the wall dividing the current sales area of the bookstore from the stockroom to provide additional space for sales.

(.) Re-locate the Financial Aids Office.

(.) Remove all the wall between the Financial Aides Office and the bookstore and utilize the vacated area for additional sales space for the bookstore.

And as a long term attack:

(.) Modify the school master plan to make a provision for a new and larger bookstore. One option is that the bookstore could be located in the new Library Building.

Ex-POW's Holiday is Dimmed

A year ago Commander Richard Stratton was a North Vietnamese prisoner in Hanoi's Hua Lo Prison. Today he is preparing for his first Christmas home with his family in Palo Alto.

"I'm miffed. I get home and there's an energy crisis" Stratton said in a recent interview in his 68 degree Lockheed / Sunnyvale office. "The boys had planned on a lot of decorations. I had to explain that since I work for the Prez we couldn't have them."

Despite the energy crisis he is obviously looking forward to this Christmas, it will be his second one this year. His first was March 4, 1973 when he was released from prison. "My material wants this Christmas are basically nonexistent. I already have what I want," he said pointing to the picture of the reunited family on a table near his desk.

Stratton and his wife, Alice, are still involved in the POW-MIA (Prisoners of War / Missing in Action) that helped get letters and gifts to the POWs. "There are 1200 MIA the North Vietnamese haven't accounted for."

He is also concerned with the basic

Comet Kohoutek Now Visible to Naked Eye

The Great Comet of 1973—Kohoutek—is now visible in the pre-dawn sky. The comet was discovered March 18, 1973 by the Czech astronomer Lubas Kohoutek.

Dr. Kohoutek, analysing two photographic plates taken on March 7th and 9th, found a faint, nebulous object moving in a west-northwest direction in the constellation Hydra, a few degrees east of the star Procyon (it was 400 million miles from our sun).

It is estimated that when the comet is closest to the sun December 28, 1973, it may be brighter than a full moon. If the comet reaches extraordinary intensity, it may be possible to observe it with the necked eye in broad-daylight right beside the sun.

The comet has become faintly visible to the necked eye since November, but you have to look low in the southeast dawn sky. It will remain in the dawn sky gradually growing brighter through mid-December, passing closest to the sun on December 28, then it will reappear in the evening sky, low in the southwest.

The comet will not come very near the Earth — closest approach will be 74 million miles, on January 15. Minimum distance from the sun will be 13 million miles. The tail, which is directed away from the sun, should be seen best in January when it will be seen nearly broadside from the Earth.

There will be many eyes in the sky watching Kohoutek — satellite Copernicus, Skylab Mission IV, Mariner 10 (Mariner Venus / Mercury probe), Pioneer 8, a NASA Learjet in late December, and in January a new airborne infrared observatory on a C-141 transport.

The effect of this comet on earthlings should be interesting. Predictions of the end of the earth — to what will happen on astrological charts. Comet Kohoutek won't be this way again for a long, long time so don't miss it.

ERICH VON DANIKEN — Author claims "I've been ridiculed by the world.

Author Claims Ancient Gods Arrived On Earth In UFOs

"I have been ridiculed by the world," said Erich von Daniken at a Press conference last week.

The Swiss author of the controversial book, Chariots of the Gods? was in San Francisco for a lecture tour of 29 universities!

He recently had a meeting with the leading Unidentified Flying Objects research man in the United States, Professor Alan Heinich of Chicago's Northwestern University. He also met with NASA scientists a few weeks ago. "Every brain was there," said von Daniken.

Not so said Stanford and Berkeley anthropology experts.

While they declined any invitation to meet Mr. von Daniken during his San Francisco visit, he will meet in December with their more-liberal counterparts in the east — the Harvard Professor of Anthropology!

The cause of all the trouble is Daniken's theory that the gods of mythology, the holy books and legends of man, were actually visitors from outer space, who looked like us and created us in their own image.

As proof, von Daniken gives one

Energy Crisis

Cooler Classrooms Cut CCSF Campus Fuel Use

In an effort to combat expected fuel shortages and conserve energy, Mayor Alioto recently directed that all buildings run by the city "cool off" to a temperature of 68 degrees, including City College.

Acting on that directive, CCSF President Harry Buttimer asked Clem Dang, head of maintenance, to keep the campus heated to as close to 68 degrees as possible. He stated that no one should feel uncomfortable, and students should wear sweaters and jackets if they feel cold.

Dr. Buttimer personally turned the thermostat in his office down to 68 degrees, to set a precedent for administrative staff and faculty of the school.

Roy Burkhead, chairman of the Health Education Department, said we are actually healthier if it is slightly cooler indoors. Many students remarked that they couldn't tell the difference, anyway.

The Mayor also asked city employees to form car pools, drive slower whenever possible, and to turn off lights and other electrical equipment when not in use. It is expected that by reducing the heat around campus the school will save an estimated 2500 dollars a year in heating oil alone.

Regarding heating campus buildings, Clement Dang, the chief engineer at CCSF, stated, "All possible measures to conserve energy on campus have already been taken by lowering thermostats." This was verified by a random check of thermostats throughout the campus buildings.

In another attempt to conserve fuel on campus, the CCSF facility and planning department has proposed additional energy saving procedures to be enacted immediately.

The departments proposals include the removal of all electric heaters, turning off of all unnecessary lighting and electrically operated equipment when not in use, and to minimize the use of district vehicles. These proposals, while helping to alleviate our fuel crisis, will in no way interfere with normal academic operations.

The departments proposals include the removal of all electric heaters, turning off of all unnecessary lighting and electrically operated equipment when not in use, and to minimize the use of district vehicles. These proposals, while helping to alleviate our fuel crisis, will in no way interfere with normal academic operations.

Although these proposals show a conserted effort by the administration to curb energy consumption they are of no value without the cooperation of students and faculty.

For instance, on December 4th, I took a short walk through the campus buildings. Within 15 minutes, I discovered 13 empty classrooms with all lights burning.

It is essential that new sources of energy be obtained. But until alternative energy sources can be developed, this wasteful consumption of energy must be halted.

"Electric" Muni Beats Energy Crunch

The threat of large scale fuel shortages and high prices for gas may force many City College students to leave their cars at home and use the Municipal Railway system.

Those students will be happy to know that the Muni will not be affected by the fuel shortage.

Although Mayor Alioto has asked all city departments to cut down on fuel consumption by 10% there will not be any cuts in Muni services.

Instead, the Muni is increasing services by adding more street cars, and adding more coaches on Sunday when gas stations will be closed.

The Muni is able to do this because of its large use of electric vehicles such as street and trolley cars.

The electricity used by these vehicles is produced by the city's own generators at Hetch Hetchy.

Hetch Hetchy is made-up of several hydro electric plants in the Sierra foot hills which produce the electricity for the city's public utilities.

Both the Muni and the Hetch Hetchy project are under the control of the Public Utilities Commission.

An official of the Public Utilities Commission said he foresaw no cuts in any public services due to the fuel shortage.

Crisis Bestows Benefits

Just as the drunk is saved from killing himself or others on the highway by passing out from over-consumption, the American people have been rescued from the automobile by the energy crisis.

Americans have fallen into a physical and moral slump.

We are overweight; under exercised; isolated from our neighbors; and more often than not, viewing an air-conditioned world from a bucket seat.

We are prone to heart attacks, migraine attacks, and attacks of loneliness.

Our bodies are stalked by pollution; our belongings by crime; and our minds by the spectre of Big Brother.

At last, though, we have been saved.

As the crunch of the energy crisis tightens on America's jugular, the freeway, our life style will change.

As people begin to leave their cars at home, long forgotten experiences will be reborn.

We will get more exercise, meet our neighbors on the bus, or the BART, and increase the use of local parks for recreation.

Air pollution will fall off; neighborhood participation will increase, and the police will resurrect the foot patrolman.

By spending more time at home, or near it, Americans will develop concern for their community. And from this pride will grow, and maybe, just maybe, we will revive our deflated political system.

It is not often that a society is given a second chance, a chance to stop in midstride and check its direction. The energy crisis is ours.

When Are Students Adults?

Though legally adults, college students are treated as children. When applying for financial aid, the student is required to include the incomes of both parents in addition to his own earnings.

Many City College students transferring to universities or four-year colleges encounter frustration and difficulty with financial arrangements.

When funds are being appropriated, the students needs are evaluated according to estimates of his parent's financial capabilities.

Unless completely independent from his or her parents, the student is still considered a dependent "child;" even if putting himself through school while receiving only token parental assistance.

This legal injustice has been challenged by many organizations, including the American Civil Liberties Union, which has filed several class action suits, all ineffective as yet.

Hopefully, progress will soon be made bestowing all legal rights upon eighteen year-olds, instead of treating them as if they were second-class citizens.

BART Brings Parking Problem

BART is being hailed as a great technological achievement, all over the world, but for some people who live near BART stations, BART looks like an ugly monster.

Residents at three BART stations, Daly City, Balboa Park, and Glen Park, are inheriting new problems.

At the Daly City station the parking lot is filled before 7 am by Peninsula commuters. At the Glen Park station, small businesses have suffered up to a 30 % loss because shoppers cannot find parking places.

At the Balboa Park station, homeowners are constantly being pressured by property agents into selling their homes. Also, many students cannot find parking places on Ocean Avenue which was crowded before the arrival of BART.

The irony of the situation is that the people on the peninsula voted not to support BART years ago. Now they are reaping the rewards of BART without having to pay for it.

BART does look good to the outside world. Is BART really that great, though? As a few homeowners!

ALL ABOARD—This BART car may not be crowded but the BART parking lots certainly are!

Indian Compares Systems Prefers American Education

An educational system should be universal, so that everyone is equally educated. This universality makes it easier for transfer between universities. But like it or not, the truth is very much different: I am referring to the educational systems of the United States and India.

The Indian system of education is a very unique one. It is a combination of Indian heritage and the rigidity of the British system.

To make a comparison of the systems, I must mention five differences which I readily notice.

A major difference is in the academic session. In India the academic session is a full year, except for two months of summer vacation, with the final exam at the end of the year. The American academic semester is only for five months with a final at the end.

Secondly, the timings of the finals are significant. A final at the end of one year means studying throughout the year. In the American system you study today, take the test tomorrow, then forget everything you "learned."

Thirdly, I must point out that repetition of a subject helps to set it in long term memory. Many years later, a student of the Indian system remembers his subject. The students of the American system, I dare say, don't even remember last year's classes let alone the subject matter!

Fourthly, a very important difference is in the course structure. In India "recommended" courses are really required courses if you want a degree.

In the U.S., the student chooses his own courses, which is quite a liberty! Then again, the disadvantages of choosing courses is that the student might wind up with very little knowledge in any subject if he has many different ones.

SUNIT KUMAR SAHA — CCSF student from India.

The last difference is the most important difference. In an Indian university you can break your education only for a maximum period of two years. More than two years means you're a freshman again! The U.S. collegian can complete their degree in ten years if they want which is quite advantageous for the working student.

One must realize that a country's educational system has a lot to do with social and political backgrounds. For this very reason, the U.S. and Indian educational systems are totally different.

I am fortunate enough to have attended both systems and personally, I prefer the American system.

Entertainment Offered Students

Being an international student in San Francisco can be very exciting, and sometimes very lonely.

The International Students Center at 70 Oak St., is in the business of taking the loneliness out of being a foreign student.

The ISC provides cultural and educational programs with the cooperation of Bay Area colleges, community groups and the U.S. State Department.

These programs traverse the entire entertainment spectrum. They include concerts, dances, dinners, art exhibits, poetry readings, and guest lecturers on a variety of subjects.

If the international student has no specific entertainment pursuit in mind, the Center also offers pool tables, ping-pong, a TV lounge, and a full range of sports facilities including a swimming pool, and basketball and volleyball courts.

With so many things to do at the Center, a student can develop quite an appetite. The Center can handle this too.

If a student has purchased an annual membership card for a nominal fee of $1.50, then he can eat a soup to nuts home cooked meal five nights a week for only fifty cents.

Once a week the Center also serves a gourmet international dinner featuring the menu of a different nation. Upcoming dinners include an Iraqi dinner next Wednesday, and a Israeli dinner on Thursday.

Membership in the ISC is open to all interested foreign students. They can find out more about the Center by dropping in to visit at 70 Oak St., or calling 626-3999.

Dickens Christmas Fair Welcomes Cockney And Aristocrat!

At the entrance to the Dickens Christmas Fair, there is a preview of things to come as you notice the hot chestnuts for sale, a scene straight out of Oliver Twist.

Inside, prople are dressed in 19th century English garb. The delightful British accents that are spoken run from common cockney to stuffy aristocrat.

The three most impressive aspects of this fair were the three fun aspects of old British culture: food, drink, and merriment.

English delicacies abound throughout the fair, ranging from triffles and plum pudding to Robin Hood style roasted ribs.

For those thirsty connoisseurs, there are two fancy pubs with floor shows and a spattering of drink stalls.

These watering holes serve everything from nonalcoholic cider to hot mulled wines and ole English ale (really Guinness Stout).

The main theater, the Victoria and Albert Bijou Music Hall, has a "live puppet" presentation by the Beggars Theater, six veterans of the Renaissance Fair.

Their play is pure spectacle, featuring 12 foot live puppet "people," ingenious props, and a show stopping "locomotive" that noisly chugs around the audience.

THE GREAT DICKENS CHRISTMAS FAIR — Puppet Entertainment was a hit at the Bijou Music Hall.

Kids are delighted with this play as they are with Father Christmas, who is royally wheelchaired around the fairgrounds. His surrounding entourage looks like something out of Babes in Toyland.

The Dickens era equivalent of street artists are present at the fair. There is a juggler who lets kids try to juggle, a "female" tight rope walker who actually is a guy in drag, and there are several wenches who walk around selling their wares, namely foodstuffs.

For those who like to share a leg, there's Fezziwig's Dance Hall which indeed looks like a scene out of Scrooge's Christmas Past. In this eerie lighted room, people participate in dancing, kissing games, and other party activities.

For those who like to shake dice, there's the sinister Fagin's gambling den.

Besides food, drink, and entertainment the Dickens fair is like an island full of shopkeepers! Everything from aphrodisiac tea to apple dolls the heads are shrunken apples) is sold in various shops.

The Dickens Christmas Fair, which is run by the same people who run the Renaissance Fair, is held on weekends until New Years, next to the S.F. Produce Market near Army Street.

Organization to Help 'Badly Discharged' Veterans in Appeal

Veterans who have received less than honorable discharges from the military service and feel they were unjustly discharged can now seek help. The Discharge Upgrading Project, welcomes inquiries, according to Morton Vicker, spokesman for the DUP.

The DUP's objective is to build an organization in San Francisco run by the "badly discharged" veterans themselves.

Vicker states, "We hope to build a political movement with badly discharged veterans as the core, and attract trade unions and civic support to force executive or legislative action to put into effect a single discharge (there are now five types), retroactive for all veterans and the elimination of SPN numbers."

According to Vicker, a Special Processing Number (SPN) is assigned to each certificate of separation from the service. This is a coded number and specifies what a discharge is for. The most common offenses are dope, homosexuality and Absence Without Leave (AWOL).

Vicker feels that although the war has been universally hated and opposed, veterans are often punished directly for opposition to the war and their inability to conform to contrary standards of conduct. They are returned to civilian life with less than honorable discharges.

The Discharge Upgrading Project offers services completely free of charge.

They handle two facets of appeals.

The first is by case appeal. All military records are sent for and they are reviewed by lawyers, law students and the veteran.

Ultimately, an appeal, along with a brief is filed before the Discharge Review Board. The veteran is represented by American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) lawyers in Washington, D. C.

If the appeal is denied, the case is brought before the Board of Corrections of Military Records.

Finally, the matter goes to Federal Court on either a case or class action suit basis.

Since 1962, an average of 15-16% of the less than honorable discharges that have been appealed to the Discharge Review Board have been upgraded. Only 5% of those that went before the Board of Corrections of Military Records, the only remaining appeal, were upgraded.

For 'Natural High' Try Herbal Teas

The next time you have a headache try grabbing for a sprig of peppermint instead of an aspirin. Unlike chemically synthesized drugs, natural herbs are reputed to restore health without unpleasant side effects.

The inhalation of fresh peppermint leaves helps the sufferer to alleviate pain without the harmful effects attributed by some to aspirin. Although aspirin reduces pain, it also causes dysfunction of the blood platelets, according to Merck's Medical Manual.

An infusion of herbal tea can stimulate and restore health, ostensibly because of the balanced properties within the plant.

Most consumers are aware of rose hip tea and that it contributes large amounts of Vitamin C to the diet, but did you know that parsley tea is rich in Vitamin C, B and A?

Prepare for your next exam by putting a bit of Rosemary in a glass of wine or by making a tea with it. Rosemary has been alleged to crease blood circulation to the head, thus nourishing those tired cells and practically guaranteeing an outstanding test!

If you can't sleep at night, try lemon balm. This has a calming effect on the nervous system, it is said, and, incidentally, has the reputation of securing a long life for the user.

Nasturtium leaves, growing in any San Francisco garden, may be used as a pleasant substitute for pepper. Antibiotic qualities have been attributed to leaves.

'Wise Neil' Knows Exactly Who He Is

Most people don't know who Neil the picket is.

Standing in front of 1907 Ocean Avenue for eight hours a day, five days a week, for one full year would be a strain on most people. Neil doesn't seem to mind, though.

The Teamsters' Union pays Neil $18 a day for carrying the union's sign and its bright blue banner. The reason for picketing the Ocean Liquor Company is that they are non-union.

Eighteen dollars a day pays Neil to stand or lean against the wall where he chain smokes cigarettes and raps to whoever is willing to talk.

Neil doesn't know how much longer he will be manning the picket line. He muses that he might stay on for maybe another year.

"What the hell," said Neil. "I'm not a member of the union either!"

Student Center

The Heavy Action Is Downstairs

The Student Center of CCSF is sterile. The building is attractive, the chairs are comfortable, the rooms are open and sunny. But it is still cold and standoffish.

A walk through the center shows that few people use the Center.

However, chairs and couches are soft enough to catch a quick nap. Students can be seen sleeping, somehow overcoming the murmer of conversations that fills the air. The conversations come from small clusters that join together in ethnic groups.

The Student Advice Center seems slightly closed off in the middle of the room. The walls that turn the Advice Center into a booth, display posters, flyers and student advertising. They provide the only visual stimulation; the other walls are barren.

A walk down the stairs lead to the action. The mood on the lower level of the Center is several degrees livelier. Music rocks out from the semi-concealed jukebox.

The cluster groups downstairs are definitely more animated than upstairs. Card games are played hot and heavy with a lot of advice from the sidelines. Food, drinks and good times are the feature of the lower level of the Student Center.

But the walls are just as bare and the furniture predates to early 1960's diner type. It is utilitarian but certainly lacks comfort.

The horticulture and art departments could add a great deal to the appearance of the Center. The plants which contribute to the charm of San Francisco could only enhance the walls, tables and space at the Center.

The art which is encased in the Arts Building could slice through the barrel mary has been alleged to increase blood circulation to the head, thus nourishing those tired cells and practically guaranteeing an outstanding test!

plight of the Vietnam veteran. "Jobs are hard to get . . . they have to pay the price of an unpopular war. We owe them our respect for doing the job they did."

Cmdr. Stratton, 42, spent six years as a prisoner in North Vietnam. He was an A-4 Skyhawk pilo stationed on the U.S.S. Ticonderoga. He was shot down on January 5, 1967.

Two months later the East Germans released a film of Stratton in a Hanoi press conference. It was intended to be a visual statement of the humane treatment the POWs received at the hands of their captors.

During his "period of contemplation" as he described his stay at Hua Lo Prison, "We celebrated Christmas, Thanksgiving, Saint Paddy's Day when we ran out holidays and birthdays we'd have un-birthdays."

The first Christmas they had together the North Vietnamese called a riot. "They scrapped off the top 28 guys and put their hands and feet in stocks and put four or five of them in a seven by five foot cell."

For the first time in seven years the Stratton family will celebrate Christmas together. And for the first time in twelve years America will be at peace in the world.

CCSF Soccer Team Socks It To Ohlone for 2nd Place In League

The CCSF soccer team returned to its usual winning form this year by posting an impressive 4-2-2 record in league play, good enough to capture a second place tie with Ohlone College. Chabot won the conference title with seven wins and one defeat.

After a dismal 1972 season which saw the Rams struggle to a 2-5-1 record (the worst in CCSF soccer history), Coach Diederichsen's team bounced back to finish with seven wins, three losses, and two ties overall.

CCSF's two league losses were to Chabot, who compiled sixteen wins and one defeat overall. The conference champs advanced to the state finals, held November 24. The Rams were tied by Ohlone and Skyline.

One of the Chabot losses was 1-0 defeat. It was ironic in that Chabot won the contest on a penalty kick.

"City College outplayed Chabot most of the game, but just couldn't score," said Coach Diederichsen. "A couple of shots went just outside the poles and one went over the top."

The Rams were hurt in this contest by the absence of injured right wing Ivan Castillo.

This year's talented ballclub placed four of its members on the All-Conference squad. First team honors went to co-captain William Zazaboi, a freshman center-forward, while teamates Robin Herfort (fullback), Andre Shy (inside left forward), and Carlos Molina (fullback and co-captain) were named to the second squad.

"Next year should be our year," predicted Diederichsen. "This year we had 21 freshmen and one sophomore. Assuming everyone returns to play, we should be very tough."

Volleyball Team Brings Home Honors

CCSF men and women continue to bring home volleyball victories this term. The team has won 14 hard fought battles already this season.

The women's and co-ed teams played West Valley College on November 21. The co-ed team lost by scores of 15-11 and 15-5, while the women's team won by scores of 15-1 and 15-3.

Outstanding first string co-ed players were hitters Robert Ruzzette, Linda Lee, and Karen White, and setters Barbara Hattori and Jayesh Patel. On the women's club, hitter Rosa Chase and setter Doreen Suslow were dominant.

On December 7 and 8 there will be an Invitational tournament at the University of Nevada, Reno.

Last year's energetic team coached by spunky Mrs. JoAnn Hahn, took third place. This year's club is of number one potential.

Mitch Palacio, Grand Champion Black Belt, Demonstrates Skill

Pow! Thonk! Bam! reverbrated through the hall as three judo black belts were sent sprawling across the mat, each in less than 10 seconds of "fighting", not by Batman but by Mitchell Palacio of CCSF.

Mitch's performance highlighted the 5th promotional tournament of 1973 in Northern California judo held at the S. F. Judo Institute on November 18.

In a promo, the competitors earn "epons" so as to advance their rank. Showing up, tying and winning (not by a throw) a match is half an epon, winning by a throw is one epon, and losing is zilch.

If one has enough wind to win six straight by throws (no rest between matches, just fresh opponents) then he moves up one degree. If he can't do that, then ten epons raises him one degree.

The tourney began with five girls, four brown belts and one black belt, doing Kata, a demonstration of judo techniques.

Then the white belts took to the mats with several City students participating. Although their opponents were all from judo schools, CCSF's men did well, especially 19-year old David Ross who had three wins and one tie.

Next came the greens, purples, and browns. To wind up the competition, the black belts performed on the center mat. There was tension in the air as people realized that a recent "Grand Champion" was to fight.

Mitch Palacio won that title just the week before on November 10 at the Far Western States Judo Championship. The third degree black belt didn't disappoint the fans as he threw five opponents and tied the sixth.

Scuba Diving -- "Fun But Not Easy"

Because of student demand a skin diving course has been set up this fall under the direction of swimming coach Kurt Decker. The P.E. class takes place on Fridays from 10—12 at Balboa pool.

It is an evenly divided coed class of 22 young students. The course began with a swimming ability test which included a 300-yard nonstop swim and a 20 yard underwater swim. Through this test, ten of the 32 students were either referred to other swim classes for more practice, or dropped the class.

The students seem to share a single cause—discovering the new medium of the underwater world. Yet, individual reasons for taking the course are varied.

There is enough zeal among class members and a genuine interest in both teacher and students to make the class a success. But the course has stubbed its toe on several stumbling blocks since it began.

Because of insurance policies, actual ocean dives are not possible. Also for "safety and liability" reasons, as well as cost factors, the class won't include tank-diving instruction.

However, instructor Decker hopes in the future that ocean trips, with cooperation from local dive shops, will be possible.

Another problem is that there is only enough school equipment for eleven students. The remainder is to be made up with personal investment.

If you would like to join the beautiful, interesting, and always exciting sport of skin diving, be forewarned that it takes a lot of work. As in the words of one class membe, "It's fun, but it's not an easy class... it turned out to be a lot harder than I thought."

Teacher Invents Monopoly Game

Economist Ralph Anspach has developed a board game called Anti-Monopoly. The game, sold on a mail order basis, could help relieve some frustrations over the energy crisis.

Anspach, a Professor of Economics at California State University, San Francisco, will present the first game to Senator Philip Hart of Michigan December 11.

Hart is Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Anti-trust and Monopoly Legislation.

The object of Anti-Monopoly is to bust monopolies and trusts, the opposite of the well known Parker Brothers' game.

Players can entertain themselves by busting trusts called Stundart, Egson and Techsico Oil, ITD, Nazareth Steel, West House Electric and Electric Dynamics.

When landing on mailbox squares, which give instructions, players of Anti-Monopoly, like real prosecutors, can receive boosts or setbacks. Unlike current prosecutors, each player can only be fired by him or herself!

The hefty, pipe-smoking von Daniken, once jailed for tax fraud, says, "We must look at things with today's eyes, not yesterday's. Fifty years ago, they said an aircraft wouldn't fly because it was heavier than air."

Commenting on recent UFO sightings, von Daniken said that if they were UFOs, they may prove to be malevolent. "Otherwise they would land and show themselves."

Other books by Erich von Daniken are Gods from Outer Space and Gold of the Gods. Together, his three books have sold 25 million copies. He is also the subject of a television special, In Search of Ancient Astronauts.

Ozzie Lugo Wins Student Body Presidency with 211 Votes

Ozzie Lugo captured 56% of the student body vote last Friday to become spring semester's Associated Student body president.

Lugo's running mate, Stephen J. Congdon, was elected Vice President with 68% of the 359 votes cast.

All thirteen candidates for Student Council were victorious. One Council seat remains to be filled.

The newly elected Council members and the votes they received are: Vernice James, 351; Neal D. Gouveia, 337; Leslie D. Davis, 247; Andres Chevez, 244; Leland L. Leonard, 242; Jean F. Marquadt, 241; Cristan L. Peterson, 238; Joel H. Bierbaum, 235; Patricia H. Nolan, 153; Louise Robinson, 144; William E. Nolan, 137; Mark E. Kane, 125; and Raymond R. Siri, 119.

Presidet-elect Ozzie Lugo expresses otimism for the coming semester.

Ozzie Lugo

"I'm an idealist," says newly elected Associated Students President Ozzie Lugo. "I want to see things done right."

The 24 year old president-elect and other members of his coalition, the Veteran's Student Alliance (VSA), favor the assigning of priorities by polling the student body.

Lugo says of his dealings with City College President Dr. Harry Buttimer, "We say the students want something, and he asks, 'How do you Know?'

"With the student opinion poll we can prove statistically what the students do want."

Lugo's winning coalition is composed of four campus organizations: the CCSF Vets, La Raza, the Women's Action Committee (WAC), and the Black Student's Union (BSU).

Each member of the VSA slate has his own project to focus on during the coming semester.

Lugo has his own priorities well defined. He cites the need to expand student awareness, gain greater community support for City College programs, and the creation of an adequate child-care center.

In an outline of the issues the new council will probe into, Lugo mentions the clarification of the Administration's role in student government, and the operation of the Bookstore.

Although he hasn't yet seen a detailed financial report of Bookstore operations, the business-wise Lugo calls the Bookstore's loss of $27,000 worth of inventory "incredible".

Ozzie Lugo also sees his new office as a chance to be effective.

The Puerto Rican born Lugo, who was once injured as a Vietnam grunt, feels that the many challenges in his life so far have prepared him well for his battle against bureaucracy.

"We are only in office for a short while, and I plan to solve as many problems as I have time to solve," says Lugo.

Daylight Savings Time Creates Hazards For Early Arrivers

Daylight Savings Time, now being used all year round, has made directing traffic on Phelan Avenue hazardous to campus police and pedestrians.

Darkness still covers CCSF before morning classes begin, producing hazards for arriving students who must use crosswalks.

Sergeant Ruggiero of the campus police has required patrolmen to wear bright orange vests for their own safety and use flashlights to direct traffic.

Ruggiero said, "It's harder to direct traffic because people can't see us. Flares are also being used at crosswalks in order to slow traffic."

City College Superintendent of Maintenance Clem Dang said, "Daylight Savings Time didn't help the school at all, we are using more lights."

Most ground lights stay on all night and are turned off at 8:30 am, an hour later than usual, said Dang. Extra lights are also used at the Educational Building between 6 am and 8:30 am.

Cuts have been made in power consumption by lowering classrooms temperatures and by requesting teachers to shut classroom lights when rooms are not in use.

Bus service to C.C.S.F. has not been effected by the Daylight Savings Time change, according to a spokesman for the Municipal Railway Passenger Safety department. He said bus drivers have been instructed to exercise precautions as they do on the night shift.

Deadline For New Classes Being Offered

A mixed bag of new classes is being offered this spring semester at City College of San Francisco.

The most innovative classes being offered are the two you can "take" at home, watching television. "Law for the 70s" and "Risk Management" will be shown on KGO-TV, Channel 7, from 6:30 until 7 pm.

"Law for the 70s" will be shown on Monday, Wednesday and Friday beginning February 18. It will run for 50 sessions and offers the student three units.

"Risk Management" is a Tuesday-Thursday class for two units. It will run for 30 sessions. The class will deal with risk management in the insurance industry. Both classes are under the aegis of the Business Department.

Jules Fraden, dean of instruction, stated, "This program is believed to be the largest undertaking of its kind in the country."

Twenty Northern California community colleges are financing the series by contributions ranging in size from $3,000 to $12,000.

Assembly Approves Legal Drinking For 18-year Olds

The California State Assembly approved by an overwhelming vote last week lowering the legal drinking age from 21 to 18 years.

With no debate on Jan. 7, the lower house voted 56 to 10 to revise the Constitution regarding the buying and drinking of liquor, beer, and wine and has now passed the amendment to the Senate.

If approved by the Senate, the measure would be placed on the November 5 statewide ballot. The Senate, in the past, has always killed similar legislation.

Currently, California 18-year-olds are considered adults for virtually every purpose except drinking.

The author of the measure, Assemblyman Robert P. Nimmo (R-Atascadero), commented that such a proposition is inevitable through a voter initiative if not passed by the State Legislature. He said such an initiative would be successful and it would be wiser for the Legislature to approve the measure than to "incur the wrath of young voters."

Even higher on the political ladder, Governor Reagan was questioned by a group of students from Sacramento regarding the proposed amendment. He replied, "I'd vote against it. Why should you be so anxious to get at it (liquor)?"

Pocket-Calculators

Department Chairmen Discuss Class Policies

Now that mini-calculators are readily available to City College students, school policy regarding use of the calculators may determine whether the cost is worth the investment to the student.

Jules Fraden, administrative dean of instruction, said that each department sets its own policy concerning use of calculators in class, for homework, and for examinations.

Chairman of the business department, Richard Szukalski said calculators cannot be used in an examination situation. "I don't allow them at all in a remedial math class. Students are their to learn what two and two is," Szukalski said.

Mathmatics department chairman W. Rollin Hanson said no one has brought a mini-calculator to class yet, so his department does not have any policy either for or against using calculators.

"I don't know of any instructors in my department who don't allow calculators," said Daniel St. John, physics department chairman.

"It's perfectly fine for use in examinations, but then, it's up to the instructor to decide," St. John remarked.

He said quite a few physics students are using calculators now; as many as 5 to 10%.

"Using calculators doesn't give the student that much of an advantage," St. John said. "None of the questions asked on our tests have problems a slide rule can't solve."

"Using a calculator possibly reduces a student's anxiety in a test situation, which might help him to do better," St. John commented.

The Engineering Counsel recommended to Chairman James Schon, that calculators be used in class, and for homework.

"The nature of our work makes the use of calculators essential," said Schon. "The department has purchased a number of Hewlett-Packard 35 calculators for in-class use. But they're not allowed to be used for examinations."

Manfred Naumann, chemistry department chairman said his department also provides calculators for the students.

"They're bolted down in the labs so everyone has an equal opportunity to use them," Naumann said. "Calculators are allowed for use in class examinations."

Rationing: Is 1984 Closer?

Though once dismissed as unthinkable, the spectre of energy rationing looms ominously ahead. Under a standby plan for acute shortages, announced by the Federal Energy Office, the first steps could begin as early as March 1, 1974.

Under this program, each licensed driver over 18 would receive a ration card allowing him to pick up coupons authorizing the purchase of from 32 to 35 gallons of gas per month. That's roughly a gallon a day.

Californians, who depend a great deal on their autos, would get more gas than, say, New Yorkers, and large car owners would suffer the most.

The coupons will cost one dollar. While the government says this will help defray the estimated $1.4 million cost of the system, drivers will surely resent the extra gouge.

Coupons will also be negotiable. If one has more than he needs, he can still sell the surplus to anyone for whatever the market will bear.

To prevent counterfeiting and black marketing, the coupons will be color coded monthly, good for only 60 days and exchanged by gas dealers at selected banks. The well-to-do will have their usual advantage, but will have to pay scalper's rates to avoid the inconvenience of shortage.

In addition to the problems inherent in any attempt at equitable rationing, expensive federal and state bureaucracies would need to be created and, once entrenched, would be difficult to remove.

The government plans to administer the program with 50 employees per state, 500 at the federal level, and a five-man rationing board in each county. That will double the size of some of the smaller state governments.

Rationing could be more than just a bureaucratic headache. The loss of mobility, cards, coupons, and what have you of this new program suggest Orwellian possibilities.

A monthly correspondence with its citizens will give a government a closer check on the movements of each and every individual. Think about it.

Right To Abortion Endangered

An amendment introduced by Senator James Buckley of New York that would cut off all Medicaid (Medi-Cal) funds for abortion, even to save the mother's life, was attached to a major piece of federal legislation in early December. This amendment passed the Senate on a voice vote!

The entire bill has gone to a House-Senate Conference Committee which, shortly before Christmas break, approved the bill (without voting on amendments). When the committee meets again in January, the Buckley Amendment will be considered, and if approved, will go back to the House and Senate for a vote.

This amendment is in direct conflict with the 1973 Supreme Court decision nullifying all state laws restricting the right of women to obtain abortions during the first two trimesters (first 24 weeks) of pregnancy. According to the Supreme Court, termination of pregnancy is strictly a matter between the woman and her physician.

Buckley's amendment, if approved, would deny an entire segment of the population — the poor — a much needed medical service. Over one-third of all legal abortions are currently paid for by Medi-Cal in California.

If the amendment passes, the California State Department of Health and Welfare would be forced to eliminate entirely all abortion benefits to women on welfare. Many women would be forced to have children they otherwise would not have had.

We support the U. S. Supreme Court ruling on legalizing abortions. Buckley's amendment is a dangerous infringement on the right of a low-income woman to decide what to do with her own body.

Smokers Endanger Students

Smoking is a dirty, unhealthy and dangerous habit that has been prohibited in almost all City College buildings. Yet, there are still inconsiderate and disrespectful students and faculty members who continue to smoke in the classrooms.

According to custodial sub-foreman Clifton Brown, cigarette smokers cause a major custodial problem on campus. People leave cigarette butts in hallways, classrooms or wherever they are.

"No smoking" signs are posted in all buildings but people ignore them. Because smoking is prohibited, there are no ashtrays in the classrooms. People put out cigarettes on walls, carpeting and furniture.

Cigarette smoke is an irritant and a known health hazard, not only to smokers, but to those who must breathe smoke polluted air. In a closed classroom the smoke is doubly annoying and dangerous.

The careless smoker is a walking fire hazard. A thoughtlessly dropped match or cigarette can do tremendous damage in minutes.

For the benefit of the student body, the smoking prohibition should be enforced in every area in which the signs are posted. Students and faculty should take responsibility for reminding smokers that cigarettes have no place in the classroom.

To enforce this reminder, citations should be issued by campus police to anyone disregarding the no smoking rule.

— Kathy Hurley

• Campus Views •

Question: Do you think the 'No Smoking regulation in most areas of the campus should be more strictly enforced?

Gene Thompson, Literature/Theater Arts "I don't know. It doesn't bother me personally but I can sympathize with those who are bothered with people who smoke."

Dennis Philosphy
"Yes, I do, because when you smoke it has been proven that inhaling smoke of any kind is damaging to your health. When people smoke they are also endangering the health of others."

Bert Fannin, Psychology
"No, I don't think it should. I smoke and it makes me nervous when I can't. I believe the smoker should be considerate enough to ask if it bothers anyone."

Madeline Courtoy, Music
"In some ways. Smoking should not be allowed in some classrooms. But in classes like art, it should be. I think the hallways and the area outside if O.K. for smoking."

Ron Urbina, Para-psychology
"No, the smoke that filters around is not offensive. You can ignore it if you want. Not only do I think it is not offensive but grass smoking should be legali in the classrooms and everywhere else. It's even healthier than cigarettes."

Letters to the Editor

Dear Editor:

Have you ever "listened" to the library? If you have, you'll find it downright blatantly, NOISY. A person can't study in this place.

I come in here looking for a "quiet" place to spend an hour with my books and I have to listen to the students yak their heads off in their native tongues about God knows what.

The next table goes into minute detail on why the 49ers are a bunch of bums. One student comes in for his daily hour nap and is hard at work creating "zs." Why? Is this a library or a social center?

People act and greet each other like they haven't been seen in years. It's a shame I can't study and read in a quiet, serene, college atmosphere ... I like this library, why let is go to pot with a score of "gabbers" having "rap sessions" throughout?

Respectfully yours,

Messengers of Jazz

Music Major Forms Jazz Band

Clifton Prophet has the best of two worlds. He is a college student and an entertainer.

Prophet is the leader of a new musical group who call themselves Clifton Prophet and the Messengers of Jazz.

He is also attending City College as a second semester student with emphasis on music, voice and drama, and says he hopes to grow musically, vocally and dramatically through his study experience.

His San Francisco background has included performances at a club called Nikki's, located on Haight Street. His current vocal activities in Glide Memorial Church's choir on Sundays.

Prophet organized the Messengers of Jazz in the fall of 1973 and brought the group to the Country Club last month.

Their music is jazz improvisation

The group is composed of Clifton Prophet on trumpet and vocals; Peewee on bongos and flute; Gene Daniels on drums; John Andre on bass clarinet and Joe Lucas on bass.

Clifton hopes to develop his music, write more of this own pieces, develop his voice to sing pop and possibly opera and incorporate these talents into drama.

Mini-calculators Now On Sale At CCSF

Mini-calculators are now available at the City College of San Francisco Bookstore and the California Bookstore, 1 1 Phelan Avenue.

Campus bookstore Manager Dick Main said prices for mini-calculators range from $69.95 to $195. At Cal Bookstore, mini-calculators range from $39.95 to $495, according to Manager Jim Arnold.

Students with a student body card cannot get a discount on the mini-calculators, said Main. "We don't make much of a profit on these calculators. We only get a 15 to 20% discount from the supplier."

Sales of the calculators are slow so far, according to Dave Hunter, campus bookstore assistant manager. "Not many people know we carry pocket calculators yet."

Jim Arnold at Cal Bookstore said "We've sold about 20 of the cheaper model. There hasn't been that big of a demand because students here just don't have the money to plunk down."

Models

Pocket calculator models available at the campus bookstore are TI 2500 ($69.95), Melcor 400 ($95.95), SE 88M ($104.95) MR 8 ($114.95), and the Unicom ($195).

At the Cal Bookstore, mini-calculators include Electronic Data ($39.95), TI 39 ($189.50), and Hewlett Packard 80 ($495). The Hewlett Packard has to be ordered from Berkeley, and can be here in an hour, according to Arnold.

500 Grants Open For Eligible Students

The State Scholarship and Loan Commission has announced that 500 State Occupational Education and Training Grants are available for fiscal year 1974-75.

The grants are for students who have the aptitude and desire to train for specific occupations, vocations, or technical careers, but do not have financial resources to enter training programs in public or private institutions.

Applications forms are available at high schools, accredited vocational educational institutions or by writing the State Scholarship and Loan Commission, O.E.T.G. Section, 1410 Fifth Street, Sacramento, California 95814.

HARD AT WORK — Students use cadavers to study human anatomy.
— Timothy Porter

Students Not Bothered By Use Of Cadavers to Study Anatomy

Students in Dr. Elson's Anatomy 25 class are not a squeamish lot.

Their reaction to the use of human cadavers to facilitate the learning of the "gross and microscopic structure" of the human body was typified by Liane Dyer's casual response, "It never bothered me."

Two cadavers, one male and one female, are purchased each semester from the San Francisco Mortuary Company for $85, which is far less than the $600 price tag on a wooden model of the human body.

The mortuary receives the cadavers from non-local, anonymous donors who have willed their bodies to science.

Dr. Elson explained that, through the use of chemicals, decomposition of the cadevers can be satisfactorily prevented for the length of the semester.

Careful dissection and critical examination of the parts of the body provides the students with a realistic learning experience.

During exams, which are filled with furrowed foreheads, and which even Dr. Elson concedes are "not easy", Anatomy 25 students made frequent visits to the front of the classroom to check their memory against the real thing.

The atmosphere in the third floor Science building classroom is serious, but the energetic Dr. Elson manages to keep things relaxed despite the demands of the course.

Anatomy 25 has no prerequisites and is open to all interested students.

ANYONE FOR WINE?—Taking the leading roles in Arsenic and Old Lace, are Donna Yahner as Aunt Martha; Sigrid Warschmidt as Aunt Abby, and Dan Daniel as the newphew Teddy. It all adds up to a delightful evening of high comedy.
—Timothy Porter

Drama Class Presents "Arsenic and Old Lace"

And so we've got these two sweet old ladies, who have the most wonderful habits of giggling all the time, and of bringing broth to sick people, and of taking kiddies to the movies. And this is all very good, and it makes you want to sit back and say, "Goodness, how lovable they are." Except that these two grannies also have a deadly habit.

They poison elderly gentlemen and then bury them in their cellar.

This week-end, the City College Drama Department is happily presenting a comedy based on the antics of these two sweet creatures: Joseph Kesserling's "Arsenic and Old Lace." Morbid and gruesome it ain't — but if you're in the mood for an evening of chuckles and good vibes, this is the place to go.

During the show, all sorts of complications arise for the old ladies. Their modus operandi involves mixing glasses of elderberry wine with arsenic, strychnine, and cyanide — "so that we can help lonely old men to their peace," as one of the biddies explains.

Sharon McKnight, who recently directed a production of "Jesus Christ, Superstar," pilots the play. Tickets are a dollar fifty (one dollar for students). Showtime: eight p.m., at the City College Little Theater, Friday and Saturday, January 18 and 19.

Rumors have it that elderberry wine will be served during intermissions. This is probably untrue, but if you do encounter a glass, sip lightly — it has quite a kick.

Tough Restrictions Hamper Work/Study Program Entrants

Many jobs are available through the work/study program, but because of tough restrictions, many students cannot qualify for the program.

In order to qualify students must show proof of financial need. Both the students' and their parents' 1040 tax return forms must be reviewed.

As a result of this, some students get discouraged. Dean Willis Kirk, head of the Student Placement Office, commented, "I've seen students just carry the forms around in their pockets because the restrictions are so tough."

Once a student fulfills the financial qualifications for off - campus work/study, he must have at least three hours a day available for work. Students working on or off campus can work a maximum of 15 hours per week and are paid $2.71 per hour.

Off-campus jobs for work/study are arranged through contracts with non-profit organizations that meet government guidelines. Such organizations include Social Security, U.S. immigration and child care centers.

Most jobs offered for off-campus work/study are stenographic or clerical, childcare and tutoring.

On-campus lab attendant positions are available for students by mutual agreement with their instructors. These positions are funded by the school district and require a chest X-ray.

The great difference in restrictions is because HEW provides the guidelines for work/study, while the Community College district provides lab attendant guidelines.

Kirk exclaimed, "I hope to God the guidelines for 1974-1975 are a lot less restricted than they are now.

January Is Deadline For Alien Registration

All aliens in the United States, except a few diplomats, and accredited members to certain international organizations, such as the United Nations, must report their addresses during the month of January.

The card with which to report may be obtained from any Post Office or any office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Parents or guardians of alien children under fourteen years of age are required to submit address reports for such children.

Failure to report can result in serious penalties. The mailing deadline for these reports is January 31.

Life Begins For Baby Sara As Dad Photographs Delivery

At the same moment that John Stapleton was becoming a father, he was recording the event in the pictures on these pages.

John, who will graduate this semester from City College's photography department, accompanied his wife Midge into the delivery room so that their family would be "a unit from the very start."

On December 4, dressed in a green surgical gown and toting his faithful Nikon camera, John photographed the natural birth of his six-pound, ten ounce daughter, Sara.

Both of John and Midge Stapleton's daughters have been born using the La Maze method of natural childbirth.

Midge Stapleton is enthusiastic about this non-anesthetic method of delivery, and declares that, "When the mother is awake during delivery, she is conscious of the father being involved in the birth."

John became involved in his own way, through his camera. He also admits that by concentrating on the camera work he was able to "avoid any queasiness."

"It's a girl," says the doctor while nurse checks time of birth as midnight nears. Baby Sara greets the world with a healthy wail.

Good Old Vitamins Now Controversial with Doctors and FDA

The great war over vitamin control between the Federal Food and Drug Administration - and the National Health Federation has spiraled into an issue of personal freedom.

The FDA, fearful of a possible consumer overdose of vitamins, has developed a package of 19 regulations, proposals and policy directives.

These directives will require prescriptions for high dosage forms of vitamins A and D. Smaller units of the same vitamins will continue to be available over the counter.

D. Alexander Schmidt, FDA commissioner said, "The fear that the FDA is going to make certain vitamins unavailable, or if available, then only at a higher cost or only be prescription is untrue. The single most important purpose of this regulation is to require full and honest labeling and fair promotion of vitamins."

The FDA's decision came after an exhaustive ten year study over this highly controversial issue.

The Health Federation, which represents thousands of health food enthusiasts, challenges that there will be no "freedom of choice" in matters of health and nutrition if these new strict limits on labeling, promotion and sale of vitamins, as of October 1, 1973, are allowed to stand.

They feel there will be a bureaucratic dictatorship in the primal province of food and nutrition. They are determined to fight this law.

The health food proprietors also feel this law is a direct threat to their autonomony in the radical field of health from good nutrition. The five prohibitions contained within this new law would restrict health research and the publishing of results of that research, according to the Health Federation.

President of the National Nutrition Food Association, Cliff Wells stated, "I am not anti-doctor. although they are the biggest monopoly in the country. An auto mechanic can only survive through wrecked cars, a doctor's business is to cure the sick-not the well. "In three ounces of liver there are 28,000 units of Vitamin A, in one cup of carrots, 18,-500," said Wells "Are liver and carrots to be put under prescription also?"

Cliff Wells is a sincere proponent of the crusade for good nutrition and he lectures extensively throughout the country.

Another crusader, Linus Pauling of Stanford, has said that it would make as much sense to place liver on prescription as oranges which are already on prescription in Cuba.

Modern doctors are recognizing that this area has been a neglected field of study and some medical schools are beginning to include nutritional studies in their current curriculum. In the past there has been no one course in nutrition.

According to the University of California, the education for medical men has been in the context of nutritional deficiencies or specific diseases. Doctors study this vital field in terms of nutritional evaluation courses.

The consumer remains a static bystander on the periphery of this great battle. He will be beseiged in the future with claims and counter claims. If the order of the FDA stands, he will be protected from possible harm to his already polluted body.

If the Federal Health Food Association wins, the consumer may find a radical answer in the treatment of diseases that have plagued him for centuries.

One conclusion is certain, it is because of the consumer and the maintenance of his well-being that these forces have been joined in a monumental display of power.

Lady Bell-Hop Reveals Trials and Tribulations of Job

UNIQUE JOB — Christine DePew models the colorful uniform she uses on the job as a bellehop in a San Francisco hotel. "You never know what to expect," said Chris. "One minute I'm carrying bags, the next moment I'm driving the shuttle bus or taking bath towels to guest.

"How to I respond when people yell 'Hey, Boy' — well I just grin and bear it as I pick up the bags."

Lift that bag! Tote that trunk!

So goes a typical day on the job for Christine DePew, a broadcasting / journalism major at CCSF.

"It's a good way to put yourself through school," said Chris, clad in her blue and gold uniform, "and a great way to keep in shape." (Ed. note: Christine, a slender 5'6", has an excellent shape). "Many people think the work is too strenuous for a woman, but it's all in knowing how to lift."

Shortly after landing her job at the Quality Inn last August, Chris learned that most men resent her carrying their bags. Not being a Women's Libber, though she is frequently called one, Chris tells the male guests that she is working as a bellegirl because she is able to do the work and enjoys her job. Out of curiosity, the men give her a crack at it.

"There have been a few times when I just couldn't lift a bag," she admitted, "but we have a luggage cart for the really heavy pieces."

Aside from working in the only San Francisco hotel employing female luggage carriers, Chris found there were other unique aspects to her job.

The crew and guest stars of the television show "The Streets of San Francisco" stay at the hotel. "Ricky Nelson, Ida Lupino, Barry Sullivan ... even the cougar on top of the Lincoln / Mercury sign have stayed there," said Chris. A real bonus was when actor Claude Akins took her to lunch at Ghirardelli Square.

Being a bellegirl is not always a glamorous job. Occasionally Chris runs into problems when helping a guest to his room.

"I guess some men figure when a girl carries his bags to his room he should give her something more than a tip," she said. "Normally they invite you in for a drink or to watch TV. Sometimes, when a 'no thanks, it's against the rules' answer doesn't work, I laugh and tell them to watch out or they'll end up with a suitcase on their head. That seems to work. I haven't bopped anybody on the head yet!"

Chris claims that men are better tippers than women on the average, "probably because they travel more. A normal tip is 50c a bag, and on a salary of $2.25 an hour, tips are extremely important."

There are three other bellegirls working with Chris. The number of eight-hour days a girl works depends on the season. "During the summer months there are two girls per shift because the hotel is full. We take turns helping guests. When business is slow, from around November through January, only one girl per shift is needed."

When summoning one of these young ladies, the traditional bell is not used. The girls can be found behind the front desk assisting the clerks. They are all-around handywomen for the hotel, too.

"You never know what to expect," said Chris. "One minute I'm carrying bags, the next minute I'm driving the hotel shuttle bus or taking bath towels to a guest."

A former computer operator at Cape Kennedy, Florida, Chris would like to see more bellegirls in San Francisco.

"If you like people and enjoy public contact work, it's a great job. Besides, it's a great 'conversation piece.' "

Student and Wife Believe in Family Unity from the Start

Both Stapletons are sold on the La Maze method of keeping the parents together at the birth to finish what they started nine months before. John expressed his disapproval of the stereotyped pacing-the-waiting - room floor expectant father.

John declares that the togetherness of both parents in the delivery room erases any anxiety on both the mother's and the father's part.

"And a more relaxed delivery," says Midge, "produces a healthier baby."

Although the Stapletons are advocates of natural childbirth, the concur that birth of a child at home, without the safety features of a modern delivery room, would not appeal to them.

Being a first-hand witness to the birth of his family has given John a deeper understanding of this once female-dominated domain.

He feels that he is better equipped now to appreciate the paradoxes of childbirth.

When Midge Stapleton says, after nine months of pregnancy, "The pressure is off. What a relief!", her husband, who has been with her all the way, can experience that release with her.

Even with this appreciation, John Stapleton says their family is complete and is not planning on more children.

"Welcome aboard, Sara," says Dad. Mom says, "We're lucky to have her and she's lucky to have us-- because we love her so much."

Birdie Ann Cohen Really Digs Higher Education at CCSF

"I really go to college, I think, because I want to help other people. I always try to help everybody, try to be kind and do the best I can."

Birdie Anne Cohen

Those are the words of CCSF's longest attending student, Birdie Anne Cohen.

Miss Cohen, a music major, is currently in her 15th year of higher education at City College. She's watched the college change in many ways since first coming here in 1958.

"They have more buildings now than they had when I first came here. We only had the Science Building, Cloud Hall, and the bungalows on the other side (south end)," explains the self-employed piano teacher and part-time organ player.

Miss Cohen has witnessed the appearance of the students also change since she first started.

"The girls didn't wear slacks and didn't wear their hair way down to their hips. The boys didn't wear long hair like they do now. People looked different. It seemed different.

"The teachers used to be different when I first came here. There are still a few teachers that were here before and they're still like the traditional teachers. But the new ones and even some of the old ones, they're changing together. they're dressing like the students. They're coming down more to the level of the students."

Diploma

Taking one course per semester, she has maintained a 2.38 grade point average, accumulated 99 units, and has earned an Associate in Arts degree.

Miss Cohen never finished high school. Personal problems forced her to quit Lowell in her junior year. But being the dedicated student she is, she studied foreign languages in the Work Progress Administration during Franklin Roosevelt's era before deciding to go to CCSF for a high school diploma.

"I was always sorry I never got my high school diploma. In 1960 my counselor told me I had the units for my diploma. I didn't have to have a high school diploma to go to City College. I could have gone straight on and gotten the AA sooner. But I felt that it was very important to have a high school diploma.

"I got what I came for and then stayed on to get the AA degree. I didn't expect to get the AA degree."

Dedicated

Among the countless courses she's taken are physcology, sociology, Spanish, English, and botany.

She doesn't believe in missing exams. One morning Miss Cohen awoke with laryngitis but didn't let that stop her from taking a final in a psychology class. She trudged through a typical San Francisco rainstorm, caught a jitney bus, and arrived on time to pass the exam and receive a B final in the course.

★ Society is Changing Quickly With Aid of Computers ★

"Whether a student likes it nor not," says Computer Science Department Chairman Frank Holden, "computers have a tremendous effect on him. I think it would be helpful to all students to learn a bit about computers."

Computers are influencing society so much that some colleges are considering making a course in computers mandatory.

"At Dartmouth college," Holden points out, "97% of all students use the computer. The president of Dartmouth, Dr. Kemeny, has stated publicly that he feels no college should be granted accreditation if they do not require of all students some minimal familiarity with the computer."

For City College students, the computer science department offers a course for non-computer majors. It is designed to give liberal arts majors and other students a basic understanding of the workings of a computer.

The class, Computers and Society, examines the impact computers have on education, science, national defense, government and society.

"It is a fact," states Holden, "that without the computer, life in this country would come to a fast halt. Given just the amount of paper work, every man, woman and child would be occupied 15 hours a day with no other work being done.

"For example, the registrar could never process all the grade reports without the help of a computer."

Students are also taught simple computer symbols and how to feed them into a computer. One hour a week is spent working out simple problems on one of the campus computer teletype machines.

These machines, ten of which are located in Cloud 305, are available to all students at all times.

According to Holden, it is difficult to predict who will be successful in a computer science course. "We require high school algebra as a prerequisite. It's not used in the class but it indicates ability for logic.

COMPUTER ROOM — Students work in Cloud 305 on teletype machines that are hooked up to Woodrow Wilson High School.

"You would think someone with a high aptitude for math would be good with computer symbols but it doesn't always work out that way. Music majors for some reason tend to do especially well."

Student reaction to the class has been generally favorable. As first semester student Wagdy Barsoum points out, "It is a good class to take because, today, everything is computers."

Ram's Basketball Team Slumps After Winning First 8

Although starting their season by winning eight of their first nine games, the City College of San Francisco Varsity Basketball team has found itself in a slump. According to coach Sid Phelan, the club has had trouble working together and are getting burned by teams with well-executed fast breaks.

Entering the highly prestigious Modesto J. C. Toirnament ranked No. 5 in the state, the Rams were beaten by Allan Hancock J. C. of Santa Maria, whom Phelan calls "one of the best teams in the state." In the second round, City beat Golden Gate Conference rival Merritt J. C. 81-74, and then found themselves outrun by San Joaquin Delta J. C. in the consolation semi-final.

The following weekend at the San Joaquin Delta J. C. Tournament, the Rams fared much better. Here they reached the finals by defeating Sacramento J. C. and Diablo Valley J. C., before losing to Chaffey J. C. of Alta Loma, 64-59. In this tournament, freshman Ken Banford, previously the sixth man on the team, broke into the starting five and played brilliantly. He was named to the All-Tournament team, the only Ram to be bestowed this honor.

In the Golden Gate Conference opener on Friday, January 4, Merritt bounced back from the first confrontation to bomb City 55-37. Phelan summed up this loss:

"We are having a problem getting up for the games, especially against teams we have previously beaten (Merritt and possibly Diablo Valley). Also our inexperience has not helped, with only three sophomores returning from last years' squad. However we look better in practice this week (January 7-11) and I feel we will snap out of our slump."

This Friday January 18, the Rams play Chabot J. C. at their Hayward campus. As this is written, the Gladiators have the best J. C. record in the state (18-1) and are ranked No. 4. Phelan rates them as the team to beat this season. The game starts at 8 P.M. tomorrow night.

Track Coach Leaving-- Team Needs Runners

Louis Vasquez, coach of last year's CCSF Track Team will be leaving for Europe at the start of next semester to study the track teams there. Vasquez will visit such countries as: Poland, France, and Sweden, to stydy their methods of training and running.

Coach Willie Hector will take over the track team this year and he is in great need of runners. "I need runners." said Hector, "I am willing to help anyone who is willing to work hard."

Last year's track team won the State Championship. But noen of last year's runners will be returning this year, three of the runners are at San Jose State and another three are attending Berkeley.

Anybody is interested in joining the track team please contact Mr. Hector at the Men's gym as soon as possible. Mr. Hector is always at his office at 11:00 a.m.

Other colleges have got a jump on CCSF since they were training during Christmas vacation. But City College has always been known as a slow starter and picks up steam at the end. If Mr. Hector can get a team together within the next two weeks City should be in excellent form when the important meets come up.

Archery Champions On Tour

On the road again are archers Albert Tong, Daniel Sui and Mike Franceschi of the CCSF Archery Team who will be competing at the world's largest Archery money shoot and amateur Championships. The U. S. Open tournament entitled 'The Desert Inn Archery Classic' will be held at Las Vegas, Nevada on January 24-27.

Ram's Coach Sid Phelan is Leaving Class After 18 Years

Sid Phelan, varsity basketball coach for 18 years will be leaving at the end of the spring semester.

The popular coach who led C.C.S.F. teams to 13 championships in 18 years will become Director of Physical Education and Athletic Director at Los Medanos College, near Antioch. "C.C.S.F. has always been ideal," says Sid Phelan.

The varisty basketball team at C.C.S.F. has always ranked high in the league standings. Willie Wise, who now plays for the Utah Stars of the American Basketball Association and Gene Williams, an outstanding performer the three years he played, rate as two of the greatest players C.C.S.F. ever produced. Whatever team Sid Phelan puts on the court they always seem to jell.

Mr. Phelan attended St. Marys High and attended the University of California before coming to C.C.S.F. in 1955 to become a P.E. coach.

How does he inspire his basketball teams? Mr. Phelan shrugged his shoulders and said, "I wish I knew."

COACH PHELAN—"C.C.S.F. has alwas been ideal for sports."

Sports Day At City

Sports day at City College was on Saturday, January 12, from 8 am to 2 pm featuring three activities:

Co-ed bowling at Castle Lane;

Co-ed volleyball in the CCSF Women's gym;

Women's basketball penathon in CCSF Men's gym (basketball skills emphasized, i.e. free throws and dribbling).

Other colleges which participated in the competition were Foothill, Hartnell, Marin and Chabot.

Mrs. JoAnn Hahn and the CCSF Recreation Association were responsible for this event.

The results are as follows:

In the basketball event Diana Batanides turned out to be a one girl team as she won four of the five basketball events along with the overall champion honors. Annette Lea took first place for City in Women's Bowling with a 187 score.

The High Series honors in Bowling went to Mike Leong with a 527 in the Men's Division and in the Women's Division Claire Lockwood took first with a 544 score.

Tennis Court Dream Comes True at CCSF

Tennis anyone?

Hopefully by the end of February CCSF will have eight new tennis courts of its own located across from the girls gym.

It will be a ten year dream come true for many of City's faculty and student body.

Funds for the court were received through the energetic work of student councilman Gaymond Louie and President Buttimer — the former an archery buff, the latter a tennis buff.

To date, tennis classes have been competing with the public for use of four courts in Balboa Park. The courts have been overcrowded, and public relations precarious.

Construction of the tennis courts began in September with a projected completion date in November. Due to rain and construction problems completion has been delayed until February.

New tennis classes for the courts have already been scheduled and if the courts are not completed by February, "our whole tennis program will go to the dogs" as put by one tennis instructor.

The new courts have come not a moment too late, as tennis is becoming a fresh and invigorating fad among the young and old alike.

Rams' Baseball Looks Good

The 1974 baseball season is just about ready to get underway for the Rams. Coach Domecus rates his team's strengths in defense and pitching. He is fairly optomistic about his team's chances in the Golden Gate Conference which gets underway February 12 at Foothill.

The pitching department is bolstered by such players as Rich Blake, Phil Weindinger, and Mike Forresti. The catching corps will consist of George Fields and John Malaspino. The outfield will be manned by Mark White, Ken Sears, and Rene Meriluch. Greg O'Malley, Steve Arminino and Bob Bono will shore up the infield. The season will be broken up into two halves with the winner of each playing each other for the finals.

The Rams have gone since 1966 without winning the championship. That year saw them make it all the way to the state finals.

Meet the Champs

Volleyball Team Hits Reno Jackpot

Christmas came a little earlier last year for the CCSF Girl's Volleyball Team as they took first place, not to mention two trophies, in the Reno Tournament held last December 8.

On their way to first place the team knocked-off Merced College, University of Nevada and wrapped up the tournament with a 15-11; 15-9, win over Southwest in the finals.

"It was a well fought match, you could see the kids thinking on the court," said Mrs. JoAnn Hahn, the team's coach. "Everyone played superbly, they really wanted to come home with first place."

When the tournament was over Linda Lee was voted the Most Valuable Player of the tournament by the other schools.

Last year in Reno the team took third place so this year they had a real incentive to take first. Going into the tournament the girls had an eight game winning streak. The longest streak for Girl's Volleyball team at City since volleyball competition started for girls in 1969.

What has made this team so different from the ones in the past seasons? Mrs. Hahn's explanation for the sudden change is, "They played well together as a team and function as a unit."

Mrs. Hahn has been coaching the volleyball team since 1969 and every year her teams have played above .500 ball. Mrs. Hahn explains her success by saying, "All the teams I've coached have had a desire to put in the extra time in practice." With eight straight regular season wins and three wins in Reno, one would think this team would not be in dire need of many practice sessions.

"Everybody has some things they can work on. We work on the individual skills." Mrs. Hahn went on to say, "Individual skills is the key, each girl is trying to improve herself so that we can have a better team."

Notes: Mrs. Hahn held tryouts for next semester's volleyball team on January 14, but anyone interested in joining team may contact Mrs. Hahn at WGYM. The Girl's Volleyball team played in the Solano tournament last Friday and Saturday.

Last weekend the Girl's Volleyball team took another first place trophy at the 1974 Golden Valley League Tournament held in Solano. The results for the tournament are as follows:

1st match—CCSF-Merced, 15-11, 15-9;
2nd match—CCSF-Modesto, 15-11, 15-7; 3rd match—CCSF-Sacramento City College, 15-10, 15-1; Championship Match—CCSF-Sacramento CC, 15-10, 15-5.

49ers Looking for Break Away Back

National Football League will hold its annual college draft on January 29th. The San Francisco 49'ers, who had a dismal season in 1973, could benefit greatly from this draft.

The 49'ers have two first round draft picks. One for their scheduled pick and one for the Bob Windsor trade to New England last season.

In the past three years, the Niners have made terrible choices in the draft. In 1970, they chose Tim Anderson, a defensive back who now plays in Canada. The last two choices have been Terry Beasly and Mike Holmes, both of whom have been injured from the start of their careers. Where Niners need help now is at running back, linebacker, and defensive tackle.

The Niners desperately need running backs. They don't have breakaway type of back.

Vic Washington has failed to live up to his expectations. Also, they need a charging, overpowering fullback to replace Ken Willard, who at 31, is not getting any younger. Someone like Woody Green of John Cappaletti would be the type needed. The Niners also need a defensive tackle who will replace retiring Charley Kruegar. The Niners need an overpowering type who could make Cedrick Hardeman's pass rush effective. Last season, the opposition avoided Hardeman's rush by running up the middle.

Lastly, the Niners need a linebacker. Willie Harper is good in the middle and Dave Wilcox is an All-Pro on the outside. The Niners need someone better than Jim Snadecki and someone to backup Harper.

The 49'ers have a chance to rebuild themselves from the disastrous drafts of the past three years.

State Consumer Affairs Officials Warn Against Car Ripoffs

The gasoline shortage is not the only problem facing the unwary motorist today. He must also watch out for deceptive rip-offs by some service station owners.

According to the Department of Consumer Affairs in Sacramento the most common "tricks" used by unscrupulous operators who prey on the passing motorist are:

1. Shock Absorbers: squirt oil from an oil can on shock absorbers as evidence of failure and claim all sorts of possible dire consequences.

Fact: there are four shock absorbers on each car, one near each wheel. These help control bounce and give the car added stability. Only rarely will a shock absorber fail suddenly, and almost never will all fail at the same time. Usually shocks will last 20,000 miles or longer. Don't be pushed into immediate replacement.

2. Fuel Pump: squirt raw gasoline on a fuel pump and claim pump failure.

Fact: an average fuel pump should last upward of 50,000 miles. Be suspicious of anything appreciably less.

3. Starter and Generator: Squirting oil on a starter or generator and claiming impending failure.

Fact: neither a starter or generator are lubricated with sufficient oil to leave external evidence of oil leaking. Unless you have other evidence such as a starter failing to turn over the engine or the generator failing to charge (the red light stays on) ignore such advice until a further check can be made.

4. Fan Belt: Partially cutting through a fan belt and pointing but need for replacement.

Fact: little can be done at this point. The belt should be replaced as soon as possible, but by all means demand the old belt to take with you. If the belt shows evidence of deliberate cutting, contact the Bureau of Automotive Repair.

5. Battery: should it fail, regardless of age, check the water level, inspect the tightness of the cables on the battery terminals and look for the presence of terminal corrosion.

Symptoms of loose or corroded battery terminals are exactly the same as that of a failing battery.

Fact: all reputable dealers will fully test the battery before recommending buying a new battery. Do not buy a new battery the first time your battery loses power unless clear evidence of failure is shown. It may only need charging to be fully usable.

According to the Bureau of Automotive Repair, the overwhelming majority of garages and service stations are legitimate and operated by conscientious, responsible citizens. But, as in any area of commercial exchange, the wise buyer is the aware buyer.

Campus Pusher

★ Selling "Coke" Lets C.C.S.F. Dope Dealer Earn While He Learns ★

Jim is a 34-year-old City College student. He has a wife, two children, bills to pay, and promises to keep. In other words, Jim is an average husband and father, except for one thing. He makes his living selling drugs.

Jim is a pusher.

"It's not like I'm a bum or a criminal," he said. "In my own way I'm getting helped through school just like any other Joe."

Jim is a careful and shrewd businessman, which probably accounts for his never having been arrested.

"I never see more than a few cats at at time and I handle enough stuff so that it changes hands five, may be ten times before it hits the streets."

Jim has been dealing for about four years. He said his customers trust him and his "stuff." "I protect their interests and they protect mine."

Education

"When I got out of high school, I thought I was pretty hot stuff, so I got a job and moved out of the house. I was ready to tackle the world," he said.

After about seven years and a variety of jobs — service station attendant, janitor, night watchman, salesman — the "whole nothing route," Jim enrolled in math and accounting classes at John Adams Adult chool.

"It didn't work out. I had too much to handle between my family, a job, and school."

After sporadic attendance at John Adams, Jim finally quit his job and enrolled full-time at City College five years ago.

Money

"My biggest problem was money," he said. "There just never was enough of it. I knew it was impossible to go to school and work full time and still remain a decent father."

"Before I quit working, I was making enough money to buy pounds or bricks and then peddle the stuff to friends. That way I got my dope free. I was never into it heavy, and I only did coke occasionally; no hard drugs.

"As my connections improved, I realized that I was actually making money and thought maybe I could make enough to buy a good tape deck."

"Some friends and I bought a few pounds of hash and I had my tape deck in under two weeks. I realized that drugs involved more money than I had ever conceived.

"I've got to admit, I never went into this consciously by choice. No one really does. You are forced into it by your needs, and everything falls together until all of a sudden you are smack in the middle of the whole mess."

The "mess" that Jim is presently involved in provides him with about $12,000 a year — tax free — enough to support his family of four.

Jim is very sensitive about people's reactions to such a substantial amount of money.

"Hell, I could make three or four times that if I just cut down on all the precautions I take. No way, though. I make enough and my safety is most important."

Aid

Jim continually stressed that he was forced into his present occupation by the urgency of his financial situation.

"I qualified for financial aid, food stamps, welfare, and a few other aid programs. Problem was, none of them provided for decent food and shelter and you can't have aid from all the programs at the same time."

When he first applied for unemployment benefits, he said, they were denied because he was a student.

"It's like you can go to school, or you can work, but not both. I just got fed up with all the papers and questions and stupid bullshit that was tied onto the money. They don't want to help you — they want to change you.

"Besides, I couldn't do any of that now. They would want to know where I've been getting my money for the past four or five years."

Plans

This month Jim will receive his Associate of Arts degree. Although originally involved in the accounting program, he now hopes to go into hotel and restaurant management.

"In a couple of years all of this will be in the past and I can open up my own kitchen and serve the finest food anywhere. Then I will be a full-time husband and father.

"I really don't enjoy dealing. Sometimes I get paranoid as hell, and my wife worries all the time. I think I must dig the challenge 'cause I feel real good after a big deal.

"I don't have any complaints. Business has been good. All my customers have been satisfied so they keep coming. My conscience is completely clear. I've never touched any hum stuff and kept away from the hard crap.

"When I quit, I'll quit clean."

Suicide is Tenth Major Cause of Death in U.S.

Each year at least 100,000 people in the United States attempt suicide. Enough succeed to make it the tenth major cause of death.

In San Francisco, where the suicide rate has been consistently higher than the of the rest of the country, there have been over 1,300 suicides since 1969. This is equivalent to over 37 suicides per 100,000 per year. According to estimates by the City's records department, unsuccessful or undiscovered attempts would be close to three times that figure.

In San Francisco in 1972, males between the ages of 35 and 44 had the highest incidence of suicide, with 24 recorded deaths. This was followed by females between the ages of 25 and 34, with 15 reported suicides.

Methods

The most common single method of suicide, used by 104 of the victims, was an overdose of drugs. Barbiturates accounted for 72 of these deaths.

Jumping, which accounted for 50 deaths, and guns, which accounted for 48 suicides, were the second and third most common methods used.

According to city officials, the total amount of suicides per year and methods used, vary only slightly from year to year.

In the sense that all human beings have been subjected to the process of frustration and repression of guilt and anxiety, suicide can be a potential outlet for anyone under certain kinds of emotional stress.

Despite advancements in psychoanalytic psychiatry, and a better understanding of the motives for suicide and the social conditions under which suicide occurs, the practice of suicide cannot be controlled.

Damien Switchboard

In another approach to the problem of suicide, organizations such as the non-profit Damien Switchboard have been established within the community to counsel with anyone who is in a crisis.

The switchboard, which began as a drug counseling agency, was named after Father Damien, who was known as the "Father of the unwanted."

Their trained volunteers, answering more than a thousand calls a month, offer a free and confidential telephone counseling service 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Anyone wishing to talk with a staff member about a problem, or needs any kind of information or referral should contact the switchboard.

Damien Switchboard is located in Daly City at 45 Southgate Ave., Tel. 992-5600, and is in operation 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

BOOKSTORE SECURITY—Mike Sablinsky surrenders his coat to Larry Re at the Bookstore.

Due to wintry weather and the energy crisis, students have been wearing their coats to classes. However, the chilly temperatures will catch up to them in the Bookstore. Since the beginning of January all persons entering the store are required to check their heavy coats at the front of the store. This is a security measure to guard against theft.—

Coats Off!

CCSF Bookstore Tightens Security

Following the recent discovery of extensive theft, tighter security measures are now in force at the City College of San Francisco Bookstore.

All students must now check coats as well as books at the checkstand upon entering the bookstore.

According to Dave Hunter, assistant Bookstore manager, coat checking is "the only way we can think of. It's logical. If you don't have a coat on, you can't stick anything under it."

Hunter admits this procedure is a "drag for us and a drag for the students," but adds that it is cheaper to hire students to check the coats than to replace the stolen books.

The bookstore will hire a security guard from a commercial security service. According to minutes of the bookstore committee meeting December 4, 1973, the guard will be paid by the bookstore and will not carry a gun.

Students caught stealing will be subject to administrative action by the appropriate Dean, and possibly prosecution. Non-students caught stealing will automatically be prosecuted.

Campus police will be called for assistance when an individual is caught burglarizing. Ingleside Police will be called when there is a need for prosecution.

Also at the meeting, CCSF Bookstore and California Bookstore, 11 Phelan Avenue, agreed to publicize the burglarizing and prosecution actions in THE GUARDSMAN.

Other Matters

Dick Man, campus bookstore manager, and James Arnold, California Bookstore manager, discussed plans to follow the same policies of text book refund returns. Marking of the books in a special pattern was discussed as a solution to the problem.

Narcotics Agents Tell How They Nab Pushers

A panel of five Federal undercover narcotics agents recently participated in a press seminar here as part of a conference called by the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), an arm of the U.S. Justice Department.

John Bartels, Director of the DEA, stated the purpose of the conference was to eliminate the "absence of knowledge of the working day of a Federal narcotics officer."

For two hours the five officers answered questions concerning everything from the type of weapon they carry to how they feel when they use it.

A definite profile emerged. These men were serious, dedicated, and believed that drug abuse is the most serious of America's problems.

Their average age was late twenties; all were married; and their races were as varied as the United Nations.

Each agent had received a minimum of 300 hours of classroom training, and more than 280 hours of exercises in enforcement techniques.

They were trained in detection of drug concealment, chemical testing procedures, and "ranger type" physical and arms training.

Upon graduation from the training program, agents receive a salary of about $10,000 per year for a 40-hour week that often is much longer.

It is not uncommon for the agent to work "80 or more" hours a week — in pursuit of a dealer.

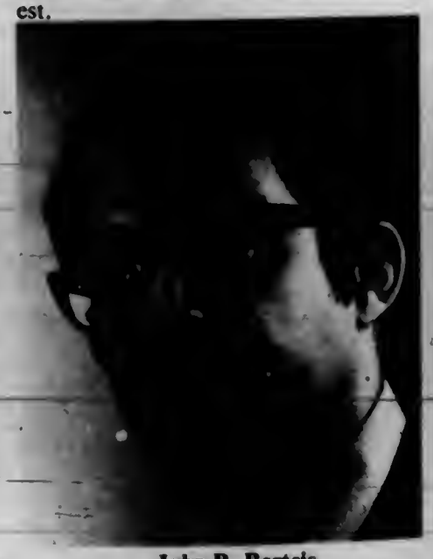
The agents emphasized that they do not concentrate their search on the "baggie" marijuana dealer, but rather are primarily after the "multi-quantity" heroin and cocaine marketers.

When making buys of $20,000 worth of heroin, the agents stressed the need to carry a gun for self-protection.

In tracking down the quantity dealer of hard-core narcotics, agents rely primarily upon the information furnished them by on the street informers.

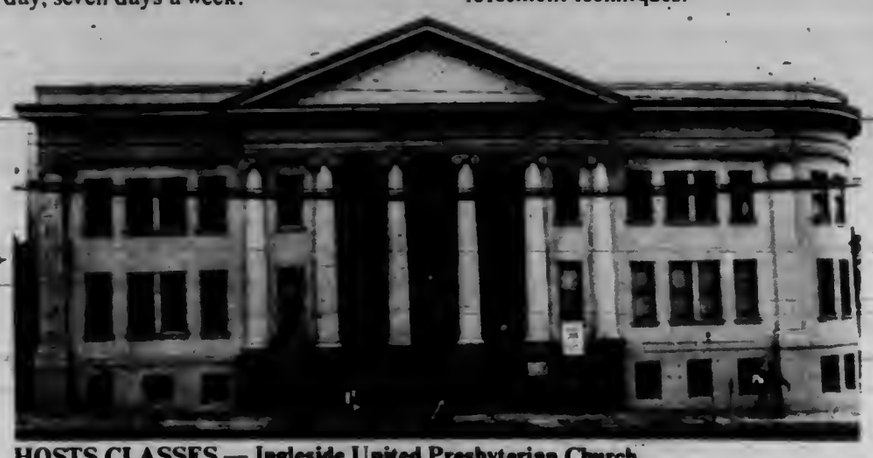
An informer's aid is solicited when he is arrested for a minor drug offense, such as using heroin.

Making an arrest of a large seller is then an escalating series of "buys" until the agent reaches the person he feels is the major supplier.



The agents explained that by acting and using "jive" language they are able to contact suppliers and complete purchases without becoming users themselves.

There are now more than 2200 Federal agents in the United States. This does not include customs agents and officers of various local and state agencies.



Large dealers in marijuana and other soft drugs should not feel safe just because the thrust of enforcement is centered on heroin and cocaine.

Agents are quick to stress that if a tip from their sources indicates the possibility of a major marijuana arrest, then their "enforcement team" will go after that dealer.

These teams also work closely with local agencies, and turn over any cases to them that are primarily of local interest.

HOSTS CLASSES — Ingleside United Presbyterian Church.

★ ★ Classes Held In Church ★ ★

This semester, City College has turned a number of students into regular church-goers. Because of campus building construction, approximately 480 students, in classes ranging from Russian to zoology, meet one or more times a week in the Ingleside Presbyterian Church on Ocean Avenue.

Next semester, 29 classes are scheduled to be held in the church, 11 more than there are at present. The number of students attending these classes may almost double.

Says church Pastor Alvin Mills, "It certainly is busy here but it doesn't interfere with our regular activities. In general, the students are very well behaved and considerate. It would be nice if we could have them on Sundays, too."

Police Granted Liberal Search Rights

In two separate decisions, the United States Supreme Court limited the freedom of citizens encountering the law.

In the first decision, handed down in December 1973, the court increased the extent of a search to which a person is liable when stopped on suspicion of any crime.

Previously the police were allowed only a "pat" search to check for hidden weapons. Now the law allows a complete and thorough search of any person suspected of a crime.

This provision extends to offenses such as jaywalking or speeding. Any materials of questionable or illegal nature may be seized and the suspect detained.

The key word in the new law is suspicion, a concept that must be applied by the respective peace officers.

In a separate decision made in early January, the Supreme Court ruled that illegally seized materials were presentable before the grand jury, and the possesser of such material is liable for questioning concerning said material before the Grand Jury.

Previously, all evidence of crimes found illegally was not permissable in Grand Jury hearings. The illegally seized materials remain unacceptable as evidence within the courtroom.

★ City College Males Still Favor Good Looks in Their Women ★

Males at City College are attracted by a woman's looks while campus females favor men who have personality.

Sociology students probed the values of fellow students in a survey conducted last month on campus.

Encouraged by Mrs. Elbea Fahle, who teaches a course on Marriage and Family, eight students tried to determine the qualities males and females valued most in a date and a mate.

Finding subjects in halls, the quadrangle, before or after classes, in the cafeteria or waiting in line at the snack truck, the survey takers asked 200 willing respondents to write, in prepared forms, the three qualities they value most in a date, and in a spouse.

Conducting the survery were Perry Dair, Claudia Fenton, Gerry Folmer, Francis Look, Anita Madrigal, Carl Smith, Paul Yee, and Jane Young.

The total sample included 100 men and 100 women. Approximately 33% were Chinese, which is consistent with the precentage in the entire CCSF population; Caucasians accounted for 34% of the sample, less than 43% attending CCSF; while Blacks made up about 33% of the subjects, considerably more than the approximate 11% of the student body which that group comprises. Although student researchers tried to choose subjects "at random," the sample cannot be considered a scientifically random sample of CCSF students.

Record Size Enrollment Of Viet Veterans

More college students have already received educational benefits under the current G. I. Bill than were trained during the entire World War II G. I. Bill program, reports J. E. Mullen, Director of the San Francisco Veterans Administration Regional Office.

During October, Mullen said, nearly 801,000 G. I. Bill college students were enrolled. This surge pushed the cumulative total during the seven years since the newest G.I. Bill was enacted to 2,258,158 trainees.

College enrollments during the entire 12 years of the World War II G. I. Bill numbered 2,230,000. The total for the seven years program under the Korean G. I. Bill was 1,158,109.

College trainees under the current G. I. Bill include 91,312 servicemen and 2,166,846 veterans. Military personnel on active duty were not eligible for training under the two earlier G. I. Bills, explained Mullen.

The number of college trainees in the present G. I. Bill program is expected to far outstrip the World War II college trainee total in the years to come since Vietnam-era veterans have eligibility for eight years following release from service.

In terms of percentage of all G. I. Bill trainees who trained at the college level, Mullen noted, only 28.6 percent of the World War II veterans went to college. That percentage jumped to 50.7 percent for the Korean G. I. Bill, and to date stands 56.1 percent for Vietnam-era veterans.

A major reason for the big increase in college level training today, Mullen added, is the higher level of pre-service education attained by present day veterans.

During World War II only 38.5 percent of servicemen had completed high school. Some 85 percent of the Vietnam-era servicemen were high school graduates, and thousands of others were able to complete high school training under military educational programs while in service.

FUZZ PATROL—Campus police are stepping up parking rule enforcement. Students are warned to stay out of faculty lots to avoid a ten dollar fine and guard this fellow against a severe case of writer's cramp. See page 4 for another photo.

Male-Female Pay Gap is Expanding Despite Women's Liberation Action

Having surveyed the economic lot of California women during 1973, the State Commission on the Status of Women concluded last week that the women's liberation movement had not been as effective as its presence in the news might have indicated.

"The earnings gap between men and women," the commission reported, "is actually increasing" — a development that commission members found "shocking."

"A California woman makes less than 50 cents for every $1 earned by a man," said commission chairperson Anita Miller. "A statistical breakdown of earnings by occupation shows that in virtually every field men earn more than women, even in clerical jobs."

The report, highlighted at a Sacramento press conference, determined that three million women in the state worked full time outside the home, a figure constituting more than 40 percent of the entire California work force.

"Fully two-thirds of these women," Mrs. Miller said, "are either single, divorced, widowed, or their husbands make less than $7000 a year." And, she added, "on the average, a California woman needs four years of college in order to equal the earnings of a man who dropped out of high school at the end of the eighth grade."

Campus Police Step Up Drive On Violations

City College police will begin a crackdown on student parking violations on March 1.

"This campus is saturated with just too many cars, CCSF Chief of Security Gérald De Giralamo told the Guardsman. "If we weren't here, people would park on the lawns."

Some people seem to have no reservations about double parking and blocking other autos for several hours or more, De Giralamo added.

He pointed out that cars must have an Associated Student's sticker, available at the Student Union building, to enjoy parking privileges. Those without will be cited.

He warned that students parking in areas designated for faculty use should be ready to pay $10. All faculty parking lots have signs indicating them as such.

It is illegal, the lawman noted for evening students to park in Cloud Circle, the area surrounding Cloud Hall.

DeGirolamo's fuzz will be watching for drivers who like to straddle the parking space divider lines. Elimination of this problem, he feels, would enable all drivers to park conveniently.

Those drivers usually oblivious to the finer points of criminal justice might heed the chief's tongue-in-cheek suggestion that teachers in attempts to park may "take it out on students on their tests."

Eligibility Decided At First Council Meeting

Associated Student Council met February 20 in executive session to determine which of its members were eligible to sit on the newly elected Council.

Joaquin "Ozzie" Lugo Associated Students president, called the meeting to order and announced the fact that three council members Christan Peterson, Louise Robinson, and Mark Kain had resigned.

No reason for the sudden resignation was given, and at press time the two remaining seats were still vacant.

Lugo also pointed out that the eligibility of two council members was still in doubt.

Neal Goveia and Lee Leonard are in the process of clearing up their academic records, so they may sit on the council.

There were four seats unfilled on the new council; one was filled by Alan Fernandez, who was a write-in candidate.

Raymond Lee was nominated to fill one of the three remaining seats and was accepted by the council.

The council will meet every Monday at 12 noon in the upper level Student Union and they desire student support at the council meetings.

Health Service to Occupy Their New Location In March

The Student Health Service, now located in Science 190, will be moving to new, and larger quarters this semester.

Three bungalows behind the Arts Building are now being converted to a combination consultation and treatment center.

Student Health Director, Barbara Cabral, is hoping for a March completion of the $90,000 project, which was begun last December.

The present locale, amid the clutter of construction in the Science Building is smilingly termed the "zoo" by Ms. Cabral.

The move to the new location is expected to beef-up the already extensive services the Center has available.

A more modern examining room will be provided for the two part-time doctors, and three full-time nurses who comprise only part of the Center's staff.

They will then be able to utilize equipment which has been sitting idle for lack of space.

In addition to the medical services, the Center will continue its mental health program, and women's clinic.

A gynecologist is available in the women's clinic, as is contraceptive information.

Group and individual mental health counseling is also provided.

All Student Health Center Services are free to the student, and strict confidentiality is observed.

Representation or Extortion?

The Symbionese Liberation Army claims to represent "the people." But does it really? The reaction to the kidnapping of Patricia Hearst seems to prove them wrong. Thousands of people, rich and poor alike, are shocked at what the SLA has done.

Poor people, who stand to benefit most from the demands of the SLA, have signed petitions saying they won't take the food that is being given free.

Many have sent Randolph Hearst money from their welfare checks. Hundreds are offering their time in the distribution of the food. Does this sound like "the people are in support of the SLA?"

The SLA is a group of extremists who have kidnapped an innocent girl to get what they want. The vast majority of the people do not favor extortion and blackmail to effect change in this country. And yet, this is what the SLA has done. It seems their claim to represent the people is just a smokescreen for their own political profit.

When Randolph Hearst offered two million dollars worth of food, the SLA wanted four million dollars worth. The SLA are fanatics who will stop at nothing to get what they want. Their example is giving other extremist groups a precedent, as last week, the editor of an Atlanta paper was kidnapped. Do these groups really represent the people?

New Leadership Needed For '74

Two months into 1974, the people of America are still shaking from the many events of 1973. The new year is cluttered with a lot of old problems.

There is now "peace with honor," which means that Vietnamese, Cambodians, and Laotians are killing each other instead of Americans killing and getting killed.

A cease-fire is now in effect in the Middle East and while there are presently peace talks in Geneva, the situation is far from resolved and the killing continues.

Another major headache is the "energy crisis." The only ones who seem to be gaining from the situation are the oil companies and big business, while it is hurting many Americans materially and physically.

The past year has seen the invention of Phase III and IV programs to control inflation but prices have risen faster in that year than they did in the preceding 20 years. Furthermore, we are told the worst is to come.

Last, and perhaps most important, Watergate has left America with a paralyzed government and a decimated morale. Everyone knows who and what caused the whole affair.

And now, a new year is beginning. There are good things happening in this country, but with the old crises still haunting us, there is an unhappy mood prevailing. Many good and decent people feel apathetic and powerless to do anything. They feel that the light at the end of the tunnel is nowhere to be seen.

We must demonstrate, sign petitions, and write to our representatives to let the leaders know how we feel.

If we could approach 1974 with new leadership and new ideas about how to solve our problems, then, just maybe, this new year would have a chance to avoid becoming a repeat performance of traumatic 1973.

Graff Explains Bungalow Problem; Says Lack of Clocks Not Important

Where have all the clocks gone — long time passing? Where have all the clocks gone — that's what some students would like to know.

That is what they asked Victor Graff, associate director of planning and grounds. Why are many bungalows stuck without a clock?

Graff said that every bungalow initially came with a clock but that many have been ripped off by "the kids in the neighborhood." He explained that a clock does not get replaced until a teacher fills out an official request form. Several teachers said that they had asked for a clock for their rooms. Graff said that he had not received an official request from these teachers.

Now that he knows about the problem what is he going to do about it? "Nothing — unless an official request form is filled out, said Graff. "My department doesn't have the personnel to go around looking to see what bungalows don't have clocks in them!"

Finally, Graff was unsympathetic to students who find it annoying to ask their neighbor what the time is. His response to this inconvenience: "Nuts. It's not really that important."

Letters to the Editor

Editor,

Today I had the good fortune to attend a lecture in basic psychology at City College presided over by a presumptuous, uncommunicative, unprofessional goon who shall remain nameless.

I say good fortune for I now realize what a lot of students are being exposed to in the name of psychology, or worse, education. On the subject of frustration, the lecturer gave a meandering discourse on God knows what, squandering a whole hour of college time on his half-baked views and hard-boiled prejudices.

He moaned and groaned about the history of Judaism in the Middle East, the poor distribution of wealth in the Arab states, and the relative merits of Jews over Arabs, ending up with a detailed (and illustrated) account of the Middle East wars.

Not that it was as interesting as it might sound, for this was all delivered in the same bland way that he had previously been lecturing. I could see little connection between these subjects and frustration, and felt that I was not alone in this attitude, even though most of the students never thought twice about what he was saying.

Now I am no expert on psychology, neither am I an Arab or Jew, but I have enough sense to realize that everything of importance this man said could have been reduced to three or four well-put sentences.

And this is how a good instructor would have presented this material, together with a few well-chosen examples. As it was, I found myself bombarded by a point of view, (and a widely circularized one, too, it seems nowadays) no better than any blatant anti-semitic outpouring, under the guise of psychology.

This is all to say that if an instructor is going to teach psychology, teach psychology, but if he wants to go on like this I suggest he grab the nearest soapbox and air his dogmatic tendencies elsewhere. But please do not waste students' time with twaddle such as this!

Machine Means Careful Speech

A person's voice can reveal whether or not he is telling the truth.

A machine known as the Psychological Stress Evaluator (P.S.E.) measures the amount of stress in a person's voice.

The P.S.E. uses the unit itself and any cassette tape. The voice can be taped anytime and anyplace. When the tape is installed in the P.S.E. a reading comes out on a graph similar to an E.K.G.

The Polygraph lie detector, which requires many wires attached to the subject in question, is outdated by the P.S.E. whose instruments do not touch the body. In fact, a subject does not have to know that he is being evaluated.

Warren R. Maloney, Director of Loss Prevention for Castle and Cooke Merchandising, stated that the P.S.E. measures the inaudible voice. "The machine surveys the involuntary responses from the heart, lungs, central nervous system, an the subconscious," he said.

Maloney also stated that with the use of the P.S.E. unit during interrogations he has quickly and efficiently solved fraud cases involving employees and shoppers.

The P.S.E. was used by the United States Army for a number of years before it became available to the public for commercial use.

It has been used as evidence successfully in nine court cases in California.

Help Offered to Needy Students

"A smorgasborg of programs" is offered at the Tutorial Center for students who are interested in helping others with their studies.

"We tailor to the specific needs of the tutor," Mr. Lance Rogers, (Tutorial Center Director) explained. "A volunteer tutor can work anywhere he wants to in the city — and with any age group."

Several City College students are scattered throughout San Francisco assisting teachers in elementary school classrooms. Others are in high schools, junior high schools, and even trade schools.

"If you live in the Hunter's Point area, for instance, and want to tutor in your own home, that's fine," Rogers explained. "Or if you are an Oriental student and would like to tutor someone of your own race, we can put you in touch with the Chinatown YMCA. The possibilities are limitless."

Other programs involve reading for blind people, tutoring veterans, and assisting in certain classes on campus, such as English as a Second Language.

Units are given to anyone volunteering his time. In addition, a tutor can be paid for his services, if the Financial Aid Office approves.

30 Plus Club Meets

The 30 Plus Club will hold its first meeting for this semester at 8 pm tomorrow, in the lower level of the Student Union building.

Students 30 years and over are invited to attend the club's get-togethers.

Ann Tingali, president of the club said, "it's a place where older students can get together to meet and talk."

According to President Tringali, there were 200 students at the last get-together and there are more than 4,000 students who are 30 years plus on the City College campus.

For further information about the 30 plus club contact Ann Tringali in E-106.

A DATE OR A MATE?—Drama students portray a way of communicating.

Females Value Personality Highest in CCSF Males

Listed below in rank order are the qualities valued in a date by CCSF males and females.

Males value:	Females value:
1. looks	1. personality
2. personality	2. looks
3. sense of humor, fun	3. understanding, kind, considerate
4. sex, sex appeal	4. sense of humor, fun
5. good conversationalist	5. honest, sincere, faithful
6. understanding, kind, considerate	6. financial or social status
7. compatable, companionable	7. compatable, companionable
8. honest, sincere, faithful	8. respects me, concern for me
9. traditional feminine traits: charming, graceful, quiet	9. good conversationalist
10. intelligent	10. intelligent

It is apparent that males and females value many of the same qualities in dates, but there are exceptions. Both think intelligence relatively unimportant with looks and personality leading the list and intelligence coming in last. "Beautiful but dumb" is acceptable in both males and females! Females include "respect for me" and "financial or social status" in their list, while males are looking for the traditional feminine traits plus sex and sex appeal.

How about in a mate? Does the ordering of characteristics remain the same? Below is a rank order of those qualities most valued in a mate by males and females.

Males value:	Females value:
1. honest, sincere, faithful	1. honest, sincere, faithful
2. love	2. understanding, kind, considerate
3. looks	3. love
4. understanding, kind, considerate	4. compatable, companionable
5. personality	5. responsible, stable, financial security
6. compatable, companionable	6. looks
7. stereotyped feminine traits: charming, submissive, quiet, good housekeeper, thrifty housekeeper, good cook, good mother	7. religious
	8. personality
	9. intelligent
8. intelligent	10. sense of humor, fun
9. sex, sex appeal
10. religious

It appears that some qualities have shifted in rank. Looks become less important, although still remaining among the first three for males. Both sexes value honesty, sincerity, and faithfulness highest. A sense of humor has disappeared in the male list and shifted to the bottom in the female order while concern with financial security remains important to women.

Love has arrived on the scene, as has religion, while conversational abilities no longer make the top ten. Feminine traits valued by males now include those consistent with the traditional wife-mother role, while sex and sex appeal is less important. (Perhaps most males feel that quality already is part of the job description.)

Paramount Theater Reopens with $4,000,000 Facelift

Following a four million dollar face lift, Oakland's new Paramount Theater opened recently and has managed to astonish all visitors with the plush luxury of a fine theater.

Plans for the theatres' future center around its' use as a concert hall.

Local promoter Bill Graham has expressed significant interest in the remarkable capabilities the theater presents.

Already Graham has sponsored a night with the Brubecks (Darius, Dan, Chris and their father Dave). Graham has scheduled the return of Boz Scaggs with a 35 piece orchestra for early March.

Additional plans for the renovated movie palace involve such names as Milton Berle, Doodletown Pipers, and Lola Falana.

The new Paramount Theater, recently named to the Registrar of Historic places, intends to maintain a wide program of entertainment catering to the cultural needs of the Bay Area.

Big Bands Swing Back to 30s

The Big Band music of the 1930s and 40s is now in the midst of a revival. The old bands and stars are back on the nightclub circuit. The Andrews Sisters, who originally did "The Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy of Company B" are making a comeback. Bette Midler, whose big hit is "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy of '73," has been on the cover of both Time and Ms. Both were asking that burning question: Why Bette Midler? More to the point: Why this current revival?

KMPX, FM 107, has been broadcasting a full program of Big Band music for 18 months and is the only station of its kind in the country. It claims a broadbased audience with an average age of 30. John Jensen, KMPX station manager, thinks its popularity with people too young to have heard it "has something to do with nostalgia for a time when we [the country] were really together."

Nostalgia isn't the whole story. With the oomph of a Glenn Miller trombone section swing music swung with America out of the depression. The delicious thrill of Benny Goodman's clarinet kept a war-weary nation's morale high. "This music was good then and it's still good today," Jensen said. Indeed, the infectious joy of a hit like "One O'Clock Jump" has rarely been captured by jazz, rock or pop music since then.

The musicians of the era were exploring, in a great exuberant burst, the fruits of the 20th century's pre-H bomb technology. The phonograph, the radio, microphone, the talkies that brought the Big Band sound to the screen with Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers; and Busby Berkeley extravaganzas.

Jensen offered the following as a list of the era's superstars. Duke Ellington and Jimmy Lunsford, Benny Goodman, Glenn Miller, Bing Crosby, the Andrews Sisters, Artie Shaw, Billie Holiday, and Harry James.

Bette Midler

Sources for beginning a collection of this music are the Goodwill, Purple Heart and used record stores. The latter are found in abundance in Polk Street Gulch.

Columbia Records has a good re-release library and other records companies are also making new presses. Many have been re-channeled for stereo.

McClure's "Gorf" Offers Something Extra

Michael McClure's Gorf is a hilarious dada musical melodrama that offers theatre-goers a refreshing pause from Watergate and other realities.

Former City College student, Dan Orsborn, who composed almost one third of the music, is the play's musical director and arranger.

A brilliantly formless plot easily utilizes an incredible and goofy list of characters which include a giant penguin, motorcycle outlaws, naked tapdancing stars, and a winged purple phallus.

The play offers fast-paced entertainment and those who enjoy dissecting story lines for hidden meaning should be forewarned that if Gorf offers any message at all, it is simply not to take life (or story lines) too seriously.

The cast, props, and costumes fit the show like a glove, and the sound effects alone are almost worth the price of admission.

Dan Orsborn's use of melodramatic and extravagant music to support nonsensical scenes works well every time.

"In cases where you can't get a particular mood from original music," explains Orsborn, I would just search for the hippest music I could find."

Drawing on such sources as Broadway musicals, children's theatre, Spike Jones, and classical Greek comedy, Dan Orsborn's musical arrangements contribute much towards the play's success.

His spotlight performance at the beginning of the performance consists of a gargling rendition of the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" followed by kazoo version of "The Good Ship Lollipop."

"I guess half my job is the arrangement of sound effects," laughs Orsborn.

Orsborn, 25, has played in folk, rock, blues and jazz bands across the country, but the area that holds his current interest is one he was introduced to last year while attending City College: electronic music.

"When I first started to work on Gorf, I was thinking I'd use electronic music," Orsborn recalled. "But I found out I needed all kinds of styles. I had absolutely no background in producing music for theatre, but I found out I'm really good at listening to styles and then writing a piece that sounds like it."

The amiable Orsborn says he attained his present position by convincing Director John Lion that he was really interested in working on the Gorf musical. "I can't say why it happened, but I created it," smiled Orsborn. "I believe that you keep doing music, things will open up for you."

Music teacher Gerald Mueller, who has seen one of Gorf's performances, says he is pleased with the accomplishment of his ex-pupil. "Dan's music always fit and the quality and types of music he used were very good."

Gorf will be appearing at the Firehouse theatre Friday, Saturday, and Sunday nights until March 24th.

Rams Great Start in Baseball Attributed to a Sound Defense

As Winter comes to an end and Spring appears, so do the men wearing knickers with loud color socks. They will also be wearing those shoes with the pieces of metal nailed to the soles that would make a mess of mother's waxed floors.

But there's nothing to be worried about — it's only the beginning of America's pastime, otherwise known to as baseball.

CCSF's team has gotten the feel of things with a 2-1 record going into the third week of pre-season. The Rams started with a 7-5 win over Foothill followed by a 7-1 loss to Canada in which Canada's runs were all unearned.

It didn't take long for the Rams to get back on the winning track again when they beat Contra Costa, 6-3. The Rams finished in fifth place last year in the Golden Gate Conference.

The 1973 poor showing can be attributed to the lack of a sound defense. "We're stronger this year on defense than last year and we should improve in the hitting department," said Coach Ernest Domecus, "If we don't I'll be disappointed."

At the moment it's too early to say just how far the Rams are capable of going this season, but as far as the pitching department goes they may just have found a stopper in Rich Blake.

Blake has pitched seven innings so far and has shown great stuff. He went six strong innings against Canada but had the misfortune of having seven unearned runs against him. The hitting slack has been picked-up by Grant Becker who has hit well in the first three games.

Police to Present a Self-Defense Program

A women's self-defense program will be offered to City College students on March 6, 7, 8 in the women's gymnasium from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Sargent Vic Macici of the San Francisco Police Department will lead the hourly discussions on self-defense. On March 8 from noon to 1 pm an actual self-defense demonstration will take place.

The Recreation Association encourages any interested students to attend.

Spring Lecture Series Hosts Popular Speakers

Fewer but more popular speakers will be coming to the City College campus for the spring lecture series due to the rising prices of guest lecturers.

According to Austin White chairman of the committee for the lecture series speakers are asking 25 to 30 percent more for lecturing.

"The committee's only criterion is that there be sufficient student interest and the speaker be highly qualified in his or her field," said White.

Not satisfied with participation at the lectures, White commented, "attendance varies from 25 to 300 students."

Ideas for guest speakers come from department recommendations. Any student with an idea for a guest speaker should contact his department head or Austin White at Cloud 335-D.

Chances of Track Team Repeating as State Champions are very Slim

The CCSF Track Team will be trying to again become State Champions but chances are 100 to 1 that they won't make it. Coach Willie Hector will be starting from the beginning this year, trying to get a team together for the season.

"The chances of us repeating as State Champions are slim," said Hector. "The people who won it last year had worked hard for two straight years."

Last year's championship team marked only the fourth time a Northern California team has held the State Championship. However, according to Hector, Laney College has an excellent chance of taking the title this year, since they've been training all year round.

The team will have to do some hard work to catch up with the other schools who have been training since Christmas vacation. Ram's practice started in late January.

"The distance runners should be in good shape for our first meet," said Hector, referring to Tony Herbert, Keith Noel, Mike Dunn, and Mark Hipp.

Despite the late start you can depend on Hector and his runners to go all out to keep the State Championship here at City for another year.

CCSF Spells Out Rules For Campus Newcomers

City College of San Francisco has certain attendance regulations that many students coming from high school to college aren't aware of.

They are:

1.) Students are expected to attend classes regularly and to be on time.

2.) At the first class meeting of the semester, instructors shall announce the number and type of excusable absenses.

3.) Student's are responsible for all class work in class, regardless of absencey.

4.) If a student exceeds the allowable number of absences, the instructor may, after giving written warning require the student to drop the class without penalty.

5.) If, due to excessive absenses, a student's grades suffer, that student may be dropped from the course and may receive an F or a No Credit grade.

Horticulture Students Reveal Methods For Plant Care

It has been said that plants and flowers should be treated and cared for as if they were children. According to Christ McIntyre and Janet Carrier, two horticulture students at CCSF, plants need tender loving care in order to sustain life just as human beings do.

House plants, in general, require a great deal of attention. Plants should have proper lighting, moisture, and setting. One of the more popular house plants, the Philodendron, should not be placed in the bathroom, den or hallway. The kitchen is the best place for this particular plant, because of its high need for sunlight and air.

Ferns can be placed almost anywhere in the house. They do not require much sunlight, but require a great deal of moisture.

Helpful Hints

House plants should be placed according to environment. Temperature, soil, moisture, light and air are important.

Never make the mistake of giving your plant too much or too little water. To be safe, water plants every other day. Feel the soil for moistness. House plants are not to be subjected to outdoor weather conditions. They cannot survive strong winds or rains.

Saving The Life of a Plant

Should you notice your plant looking a little lifeless, check your enviornmental factors. You plant may need relocating, more or less sunlight.

After you have considered all factors and there are no better results, consult your book store or library for a copy of Sunset Gardens a popular handbook which will be helpful to you and your plants.

Girl Escapes Campus Attack

Editor's Note: The name of the student in the following story has been omitted at her request.

With a smash in the gut and a grab at the groin a campus superchick fought off a trio of assailants on February 6.

The pretty, brown-eyed karate expert and criminology major, said that at 4:45 pm, in the Men's Gym hallway, she was approached by three men. The tallest of the group bumped into her intentionally. As she turned, thinking it might be a friend, he said, "What are you going to do about it?" She showed him.

When he grabbed her by the right hand, she dropped her arm dragging her attacker off balance. Then she pivoted and lashed out with her left foot, catching him in the solar plexus. The 18 year old student said of her attacker, "He never got a chance to double up."

She reached in, grabbed him by the genitals, and held on for about twenty seconds. "It seemed like a long time to me," she said, "I'm sure it was to him!"

This is a dangerous move. She added, "...but I knew what I was doing." Her karate training has taught her "never to use one blow. Always use a combination."

The five-foot-eight-inch coed said that while keeping her prisoner in a compromising position she told the other two to "back off."

The girl, a member of the track team "showed them how fast I can run."

WASHED OUT—Eight deserted tennis courts are not complete because contractors cannot compete with the rain. In the meantime students play tennis on public courts in Balboa Park.

Tennis Fad Booms On Campus But Courts Not Ready to Use

All the students who brought their spaulding tennis rackets and their Wilson balls expecting to play on City College's new tennis courts this month can just take them both home and wait for another three weeks and hopefully not any longer.

"I am trying to do everything spiritually and physically to get it finished in two weeks," said Mrs. Lene Johnson, Director of Women's P.E., "The rains came and made the asphalt uneven so they had to go over it again."

The wet weather has been the main factor for the tennis courts not being completed last month as expected. But when they are finished, City will be the proud owners of one of the best tennis courts in the city. The eight courts will be made of 1/8 inch thick plastic vinyl, which is sometimes used indoors for professional tennis tournaments. These courts will give the ball a great bounce.

But there is only one drawback, and that is you cannot walk on the courts with hard heel shoes. Hard soles will leave a dent on the court that will not come out, so anyone playing on the courts must have on tennis shoes..

City has been trying for eight years to get tennis courts on campus. During that time City has had to share the Balboa courts with the public and as everyone can tell you having to hike down to the courts only to find them occupied by the public isn't a favorite pastime, especially when your next class is in the science building.

Since the Billie Jean King-Bobby Riggs match there has been a great increase on tennis play. City has had to open new classes in the morning along with Saturday classes. If City can get the approval of the legislature they will have classes on Sundays.

The courts will be used every hour of the day from 7 am to 5 pm. The main worry will be the security on weekends. Although the courts are surrounded by a 12-foot fence, it won't stop anyone who really wants to play. Mrs. Johnson is interested in having someone who wants to sign up for work study

Why Can't CCSF Students Read? Tough Problem With No Answer

Approximately 12 percent of all City College day students drop out of school each semester. One reason, as Time magazine recently reported, is that many City College students can't read.

According to the magazine, Edward Kloster head of CCSF reading program estimates that more than half the student body needs help with reading, and some 300 of these students have difficulty deciphering even simple words.

Poor reading is not unique to San Francisco, however, Kloster points out to the Guardsman.

"Students are dropping out of different colleges everyday simply because they cannot read their textbooks," he said. "There are reading problems in all areas of the United States.

College President Harry Buttimer explains that City College has special problems because of the high ratio of foreign-born students in San Francisco. To these students, English is a second language.

Foreign-speaking students, however, by no means represent the whole of City College problem readers.

Some of the poorest readers are products of San Francisco's public schools.

Since 1969, reading scores for San Francisco students have been dropping steadily.

Wilson High School math instructor David Friedman says that the reading ability of some Wilson students is so poor that teachers must devise simplified versions of the standard math text for their math classes.

Despite the extensive and varied educational demands of incoming students,

Edward Kloster

Dr. Buttimer assures, "We try to meet the needs of every student who has reading difficulties."

Reasons for reading deficiencies are complex and blame seems impossible to place. In the case of native-speaking Americans, the main problem seems to be sociological, according to various authorities.

Its Koster's opinion that students coming from happy environment tend to master reading skills more readily than those who don't. Most of the damage he thinks is done in the first three years of elementary school.

When a child can't read, he feels inadequate and becomes increasingly withdrawn from school activities. After that time, the inability to read becomes a dominating negative factor in a student's education.

"Competition is very important to Americans," reflects Kloster, "and it's wonderful for those who win. But a lot of these people never win. They just get pushed down lower and lower."

Lauren Santora Wins Herman Scholarship

AWARD—Mrs. Gladys Herman and Pres. Harry Buttimer flank Lauren Santora at presentation which was followed by a formal lunch in the faculty dining room.

Lauren Gail Santora, a 20 year old elementary teaching major, was presented the second semi-annual M. Justin Herman Memorial Scholarship.

The $500 scholarship check was presented by Mrs. Gladys Herman, widow of M. Justin Herman, long-time Director of the San Francisco Redevelopment Agency.

A 1972 graduate of Lowell High School, Lauren had originally planned to become a teaching assistant, but hesitated to try for a teaching credential partly because she did not think she would be able to finance schooling.

The scholarship was established by Mrs. Herman to aid students in the CCSF pre-school and elementary teacher assistanting programs and encourage them to go for their credentials, according to Donald F. Snepp, City College Scholarship Coordinator.

(Asked of Journalism students on campus)

Question: Why do you think some students get to CCSF without learning how to read?

Bob Cane

"I think most people learn to read and spell through their pores: that is, they learn by constant pleasurable exposure to the printed word. They git this exposure in backgrounds in which there is the leisure to read, books are chreised and kep easily available, and the expression and investigation of ideas is encouraged.

Howard Smith

"There are many reasons. The lack of good secondary training, with both teachers adn students at fault, and initiative in the home are two of the main ones."

Kathleen Hurley

With the present popularity of television, I think many children lack motivation and interest in learning to read well. Reading is no longer a popular extra-curricular activity. And I'm sure there are a thousand other good reasons.

Larry Espinola

Some of the students, when they were small, may have had some physical problem such as hearing or seeing. The teachers never know that the child has a handicap and take it for granted that the child is slow.

Mike Hutcheson

Stupidity and laziness. Some people are just plain dumb. Others are influenced by anti-intellectural peer group pressure.

Sharon Fisher

"Because in prvious educational training someone neglected to teach these students the proper basic skills of reading. It's surprising that anyone who doesn't have the basic skills would want to go to college, which does require a lot of writing."

Press Must Stand Up To SLA

Freedom of the press is guaranteed to all Americans in the Constitution.

In essence this basic principal means that anyone may, provided they have the resources, start a newspaper or other publication.

And aside from committing libel, or appealing to someone's "prurient interest," they are free to print whatever they like.

One of the first bellweathers of the loss of a society's freedom is the restriction of its media. This is evidenced by the puppetry of the media in a totalitarian nation. They are organs of the state, printing only the official line.

During any revolution control of the local and national press is one of the primary objectives of both the revolutionaries and the state.

America's first self-identified revolutionary organization has emerged in the Bay Area, the Symbionese Liberation Army. Their first "target" was Oakland Superintendent of Schools, Dr. Marcus Foster.

Their second was the media.

Using the life of Patricia Hearst as a lever, the SLA commanded the media to publish their ransom demands and statements of dogma in full.

Fearful for Miss Hearst's life, the media complied with the demands.

Next the SLA stipulated that no direct press coverage was to be given to the food distribution program they ordered Randolph Hearst to develop.

Dutifully, with the exception of a few papers, no photographs were published of these events.

A free press is the root of a free society. Sever the root and the tree will die.

If the SLA members are the dedicated revolutionaries they say they are, then they are very aware of this.

The media and the public should be also.

Aid Offered Eligible Students

Students with a grade high grade point average and 30 or more units may be interested in applying for a general scholarship.

Scholarship Coordinator Donald Snepp states that "any student who has maintained a grade point average between 3.6 and 4.0 has the best chance of being awarded a scholarship.

There are two types of scholarships available to students — inside and outside, he said.

Outside scholarships are awarded to specific students by various organizations.

Inside scholarships are offered by CCSF and fall into two categories.

1. General scholarships awarded by Snepp's office with the approval of the City College Scholarship Committee, and vary in size from $100.00 to $250.00.

2. Scholarships offered through individual departments. The department chairmen should be able to tell you if there are any scholarships available and upon what grounds they are awarded.

Any student enrolled full time (12 or more units) in either the Fall or Spring semester is eligible to apply for a general scholarship during that academic year.

The deadline for such applications is April 5, 1974.

The Scholarship Coordinator is available to answer any questions students may have. His hours are posted in Scholarship Office E-109.

New System Coming

The Computer Science Department is laying plans for a new computer system, to be used at City College next fall.

The new system will expand the number of available terminals from approximately 18 to 40, and may be programmed to help in individual instruction in some subjects.

The College's present computer system consists of two computers, which are being used to give students experience in computers working and programing. The administration also uses them to process things such as registration and grades.

Tough Reading Problems Hurt Kids

Lack of adequate phonetic training, without which beginning readers and non English speaking students have no guide to accepted pronunciations of unfamiliar words, is another factor cited by experts.

Kloster feels that many of the nation's schools are remiss in not putting enough emphasis on phonics and reading in general.

"Math and writing are important," he acknowledges, "but I think today's three R's should be reading, reading, reading. A student won't grasp other subjects unless he knows how to read."

Kloster feels that 90 percent of students enrolled in basic City College reading courses are sincere and anxious to learn how to read. But, he says, the taks of accomplishing in one or two semesters what should have been easy.

In a letter to Time magazine, following the February 25th article, Kloster stressed, "There are many failings to be corrected in San Francisco ... but I am truly more concerned with this appalling condition as it exists, East, West, North and South.

Campus Attackers Steer Clear of Her This Super-Chick is Ready for You

Within a matter of minutes she covered the five blocks from the school to her home where she phoned the police.

What she wonders now is if the three have learned their lesson or will want to get even. At the time of the attack she was worried that they might be seeking retribution for what she termed the "Zebra killings," the murder spree of a few weeks ago.

She described her attacker as six feet-one inch, 190-200 pounds, blonde with a light complexion. He was wearing jeans, a T-shirt, and white tennis shoes.

The other two were dressed similarly — one about five-ten with dark brown hair; the other, about six feet, 170 pounds with "surf blonde" hair and a suntan.

The student who holds a brown belt is not a women's libber, at least not in the popular sense. She values independence and strength of character in a woman, but says she likes to be pampered and protected.

What does she recommend for women in such situations? With training, she claims, a girl should keep in mind three points: who her attackers are, what they want, and what they look like. Then, plan a defense and search for a way out. Don't get into a corner, she adds.

She advocates avoiding platform shoes because they keep a woman off balance and prevent her frum running.

For a girl proficient in karate, she said, "A man is no real threat."

How Much Does Television Advertising Affect Your Life?

Have you ever given much thought to the TV Commercials you watch? You should - Harry McMahan does.

Of over 34,000 television commercials produced and aired in 1973, it would seem difficult, if not impossible, to select the 100 best. However, last week a presentation of 100 commercials was seen by more than 300 advertising executives in the Terrace Room of the Fairmont Hotel. The se ads were chosen as the "best of 1973" by McMahan, advertising analyst and consultant and columnist for Advertising Age which sponsored the showing.

Expert Picks "100" Top TV Commercials

The selection process is a 12-month operation in which about 14,000 of the better commercials produced are viewed. These selections are made by the advertising agencies, the advertisers and the various television ad production houses.

McMahan's nation-wide advisory staff report on likely material. He then picks the outstanding commercials for review in his column.

At year's end, more entries come to McMahan for the finalist selections.

McMahan's intent in making the selection is to provide a showcase of effective television commercials for advertising personnel and creative people.

In making the selections, reviewers take into account marketing success, effectiveness of production techniques and creativity.

Among the outstanding examples in the marketing success category were classic high sales producing ads by American Motors and Arm and Hammer.

Trend setting commercials such as coke's "the real thing", signaling a switch to youth orientation, received special attention.

The Uniroyal stunt driver ads, and the Fiat commercial with stunt driver Remy Julienne were among the commercials picked for exciting action and name identification.

Retail advertising, which gives the local advertiser a possibility to use the tube and increases the flexibility of some national ads, was another important category.

"The first step in advertising is to establish the name beyond any possible misidentification," says McMahan. Whirlpool's distinctive graphics and General Tires "sooner or later . . . you'll own Generals" were unquestionably successful in this area.

Jungles and songs are effective for TV largely because of what is called the "image carryover" from radio, McMahan said. Speaking of the famous Doublemint Gum Twins commercial, McMahan commented, "Here is doublecorn, shrewdly popped." Nobody likes it, but it sells, he said.

"Names" have always been product sellers, and the names in McMahan's list included Joe Namath and Anita Bryant, both well paid to lend their names to products they may or may not know something about.

Ads Are Trying To Outsell Brand X

Comparative commercials bounced strongly into the limelight this past year being more bold and definite in saying why "we're better than Brand X."

Two obviously outstanding winners in this category were Goodrich vs. Goodyear and Foster Grants vs. Cool Ray Polaroids.

Two of the 10 awards given in the Demonstration grouping went to SCM typewriters for the commercial displaying their "ribbon cartridge" idea and Chevrolet for the ad showing their three-quarter ton pickup pulling a 187-ton log train.

Television has only been around for about 20 years, but already has proved itself to be one of the most effective mediums to ever reach the American public.

This almost total saturation opens to the advertiser a possible buying audience never before dreamed of.

Better not try this stunt unless you have a Fiat! — Better yet a strong net!

Since the advent of the automobile, nothing has changed American family life so much as that small box that fits so neatly in over 96 percent of U. S. households.

This almost total saturation opens to the advertiser a possible buying audience never before dreamed of.

War Between Sexes Not Total Chron Women's Editor Explains

Ruth Miller Trimble reaffirmed her belief that the sexes share common goals and interests in an interview by the CCSF Journalism 21A class. She described the "People" section of the Chronicle, which she edits, as "not just a woman's page but a general interest section for men and women".

EDITOR ADVISES — Ruth Miller says put yourself outside when you are writing for masses.

In the stuffy confines of an overcrowded pressroom, she presented an ever-fresh, cool and professional stance toward her audience of probing journalists.

Acting as if attack was to be her best defense against the budding reporters, Mrs. Miller began by asking the seemingly innocent question, "What did you think of the movie, Guess Who's Coming to Dinner?"

Most labeled the movie as a "cop-out".

Explaining an important premise in journalism, Mrs. Miller said that a journalist "must think through a judgment rather than reacting emotionally to a situation . . . put yourself outside, react objectively; advocacy journalism cannot supplant objective journalism. One must present all sides of a situation."

Mrs. Miller's varied career has included working as a copy "boy" on the Chronicle in 1944, and a "meteoric rise to a junior reporter," because all the men were off to war. After a stint on the Honolulu Star and the Santa Barbara News Press, Mrs. Miller returned to the Chronicle as Assistant Society Editor.

Three years ago when she became editor of the Chronicle's society section, she decided to change the format because, "We were getting a wider readership; the world was changing."

This was a world-wide trend as society sections were trying to appeal to men and women. Determined to "cut down on society stuff", (while still listing important events, engagements, and parties) she decided not to judge what people should be reading. "I wanted to give them a choice."

When asked "Where would you be a reporter if given the choice?" she immediately answered, "A foreign correspondent, editors don't get much opportunity to write!"

Mrs. Miller's answer to the question, "Being a woman, do you believe you have more intuition than men?," revealed her to be a human liberationist. "I followed a man in the job," Mrs. Miller said. "Society is no longer a woman's section, what does it matter? Men have insight also, not just women."

Nostalgia

City College was a jumping campus ten years ago, when haircuts were shorter and hemlines were down around the knees.

The college had a Pep Band, which was considered so good that it was invited to the New York World's Fair. Also, the Associated Women Students (now defunct) held a "Don't Say No" leap year dance.

The Associated Men's Students (also defunct) and the Associated Women's Students were working together to set up a dating bureau to help shy people meet members of the opposite sex.

The Rams basketball team was rated No. 2 in the nation, for two-year colleges. Also, Sid Phelan, coach of the team who will be departing this semester, was picked as the nation's number one coach in his category.

1963-1964 PT students had to be able to run equivalent of a quarter of a mile.

Also, the Phi Beta Delta fraternity collected $271 for the March of Dimes which brought them TV publicity on the evening news.

Brass Horizon Student Band Offers Dance

COACH SID PHELAN LEAVES IN WINNING STYLE

The Sid Phelan era at CCSF came to an end with a victory at home on February 26. At halftime Ozzie Lugo, Associated Student body president, presented the basketball mentor with a Certificate of Award and a cake for his coaching at City. It was appropriate that Phelan, who came in a winner, should leave as a champ as he coached his 287th victory, beating San Jose City College, 83-67.

After 19 years of coaching the Rams to title after title, Phelan accepted a post as athletic director and head basketball coach at the new Los Medanos Community College near Antioch.

Explaining why he was leaving, Phelan, 59, said "I want to get into other interests, but the main reason is that City has a mandatory retirement policy at age 65. I feel I've got more than six years in me."

A graduate of Cal, Phelan coached at George Washington high school before coming to City, where he won 13 league titles and an overall league record of 218-40. In all games, the mark is 287-88. Phelan and his teams have won nine titles in 11 previous Golden Gate Conference seasons, including six in a row 1966-71.

In the one-year existence of the Golden Gate League (1961-62), the forerunner of the GGC, Phelan's team took the league title with a 13-1 record and then went on to win the state junior championship. The GGC opened in the 1962-63 season, which saw the Rams run off a stretch of 33 straight games behind Willie Wise, now a star with Utah of the American Basketball Association.

Late last year, Phelan was elected to the California Junior College Basketball Coaches Association Hall of Fame and is a member of the U.S. Olympic Committee. Phelan also coached a JC all-star team to third place in the 1971 AAU trials and coached AAU squads on tours of Russia and Brazil.

With the win over San Jose the Rams were able to even their Golden Gate Conference record to 6-6. Although this year hasn't been one of Phelan's best, he doesn't blame it on the team.

"It hasn't been the team's fault for the bad year; it's been my fault for not getting them together," he explained.

The moment the team got on the court you could see there was no way they could lose this game. In the first half the game was generally even, with the Rams never able to extend their lead to more than six points. Ken Banford hit for 16 points in the first half with fifteen foot jumpers over San Jose's zone defense. Even with Banford's hot shooting the half ended with the Rams leading by four (36-32).

As he had so many times before, Phelan got his team up for the second half. They came out and started to run off basket after basket. James Gaston, who scored only four points in the first half, came back strong in the last half to burn San Jose for 14 points. With 5:30 left in the game the Rams put the game away with their biggest lead of the night, 15 points. Banford finished the night with the game high of 22 points, Gaston's sudden burst of fire gave him an 18 point total, and Dana Loville racked up 16 points.

Tennis Courts Still Not Ready After Eight Years of Waiting

watch the courts on weekends. The student who accepts this job would not have to work on Saturdays since tennis classes will occupy the courts for most of the day. On Sundays, however, someone must screen out people wearing hard-soled shoes. Hours will be from 7 am to 5 pm. Anyone interested should get in touch with Mrs. Johnson.

City has been trying for eight years to get tennis courts on campus but were never able to get approval, until the students of the archery class came to Mrs. Johnson and asked for a larger place to shoot their arrows. Mrs. Johnson told them they should get together and work on a project to find the right location. The students found the perfect place right behind the women's gym.

"Persistence, and we got the students involved," explains Mrs. Johnson. "Students in archery wanted a place to practice, so they decided on the space behind the women's gym which used to be a garden until the freeway came in and they had to move. The space was much too big for an archery range so they decided to have tennis courts installed. Guyman Louis, an architect came up with the design and along with student pressure things began to slowly happen."

When the courts are done, City College will be trying to get a backboard installed for teaching sessions and right on the other side the backboard will serve as a protective wall for the archery class.

City had hoped for lighting but that thought was forgotten quickly with the energy crisis on hand. Due to the amount of space used in building the courts only two courts are regulation size. These two courts will not only be used for classes but they will also be used for tournament playoffs.

City should be very grateful to the administration, and to the students who work so hard to get these new courts and last but not least the tax payers. And as Mrs. Johnson put it, "In terms of tax payer's money that was the best term they could have consented to us."

LEADING SCORERS—Three players this year scored in double figures. David Smith took high scoring honors with a 12.8 average along with scoring 30 points in a game, the most by any Ram player this season. Ken Banford had a 11.3 average and James Gaston came in third with 11.3. (Compiled by Bill Block)

CCSF Trackmen Start Season With Big Loss

As expected of any team that has had a short period of time in which to prepare, the Rams lost to Modesto JC, 79-56, in the opening track meet of the year on February 22.

"I think we did well considering we had only a few weeks in which to practice," said Coach Willie Hector. Individually, the Rams still made some good showings during the competition.

In the triple jump, Thermond Wells took first with a jump of 46' 7-1/4". Ken Chambers came home with a 10.0 for City were Roy Gains who set a 15.6 mark in the high hurdles and Anthony Herbert ran the mile in 4:38.5.

Randy Minix took high jump honors with 6'2"; Robert McCutcheon won the long jump with a 21'5-1/2" mark, and Keith Nowell came in with a time of 10: 35.6 for the two mile.

'There are still a lot of people we haven't worked with," said Hector. "We have a meet coming up with San Jose, who is the best dual meet team in the state."

Things won't get any easier for the Rams, as they will have to face powerhouse teams such as Chabot and Laney, along with the other teams in the Santa Barbara Relays, Bakersfield Relays, and Northern California Relays.

The runners will really have to work this year to make a good record.

S. F. Athletes Aren't Slouches

Lately, people are saying that Northern California doesn't have any tafent in sports. Southern California has it all they say, and maybe they're right. After all, look at the UCLA Bruins or the USC Trojans football team. They win year after year and almost always have superior personnel.

However, Northern California has had its share of talents. Look at Bill Russell, ex-center for the Boston Celtics: He went to USF. Or how about Ollie Matson or Gino Marchetti, both Hall of Famers for football. They also went to USF.

More recently, there's Bob Lee, quarterback for the Atlanta Falcons. He went to Lowell High, then to City, as did Willie Wise, all-star forward for the American Basketball Association's Utah Stars.

Then, there is O.J. Simpson. All he did was rush for over 2,000 yards and break six other rushing records. He went to Galileo High, and was in the same backfield as Lee, when they were both at City.

It seems that Northern California doesn't have the teams that Southern California has. However, the people that San Francisco has produced haven't been all that bad.

Frogmen Optimistic Team Wants Swimmers

CCSF swimming team is looking forward to the new season with high hopes.

"We stand a pretty good chance at winning this year," Coach Curtis Decker thinks. "Although our team is pretty small, we have seven veterans from last year's squad returning again this year. We also have five newcomers on the team."

However, Decker is looking for swimmers. Anyone can sign up, he said, but he would prefer people who have a competitive attitude. Also, of course, they must know how to swim.

Practice begins at 6:45 in the morning, and lasts until around eight-thirty at Balboa Pool. Anyone interested should see Decker in his office in the Men's Gym or go to Balboa Pool in the morning.

Four City College sophomores will be competing for $2,000 cash awards in the semi final element of the Bank of America Community College Awards program, at the Holiday Inn in San Francisco on March 20.

Representing CCSF in the 21st annual cometition are: Min Huey Hsu, Business; Richard Blake, Science and Engineering Victoria Romero, Social Science and Humanities; and Anita Lutz, technical and vocational.

These students have already been awarded $150 for their work at City College, and will compete against students from neighboring community colleges. Winners will be selected on a basis of scholarship, extra curricular activities, and performance in group discussion.

Eight area winners will advance to finals on April 18.

Min Huey Hsu, an accounting major, is mother of three and a full-time student.

Blake, a pre-med major, works part-time as a police cadet, and is active in varsity baseball and cross-country, and little league baseball.

Anita Lutz, an ornamental horticulture major, is a leader in the campus landscape program sponsored by the Ornamental Horticulture Society and winner of an award for design excellence from the St. Francis Wood Society. She is also active in field work for Muir Woods National Park.

Victoria Romero, a pre-nursing student, is an active member of the Sierra Club, and a "Candy Striper" at the University of California Medical Center in San Francisco.

All four students have a 3.49 grade point average or better.

Free dental X-rays will be provided by members of the Dental Assisting department in S-132 from 8 to 11 am Mondays and Wednesdays, and 8 to 9 am Fridays.

The X-Rays will be taken as part of the Dental Assisting students' laboratory requirements.

Persons taking advantage of this offer should realize that it may involve two or three appointments until satisfactory films are acceptable.

According to state law, the films must be mailed to the patient's dentist for diagnosis.

Blood Drive Begins March 20

The annual City College Blood drive is scheduled for March 20-22.

Donations can be made at Statler Wing from 8 am to 3:30 pm. Any student, alumnus or employee of City College over 18 is encouraged to participate.

Each unit of blood donated entitles the donor to a one year membership in the City College Blood Fund.

During that year, a member may, on one occasion only, withdraw from one to eight pints of blood for a friend or an unlimited amount for himself or a member of his immediate family.

A blood donation is an investment that can be drawn on in time of need, explains Dean Vester Flanagan, chairman of the blood drive. "I've received many thank-you cards from people who say the blood fund really helped them out by making blood available when they needed it."

Flanagan says he will consider the drive a success if 600 pints are collected, but he hopes for much more. "This is an excellent time," he said, "for students to get together to help each other."

The Student Council is showing its support this year by offering two bicycles as prizes. One male and one female student will be selected as winners in the drawing which will be held March 22.

LISTENING CENTER — Students make use of the Cloud Hall facilities.

Students having difficulties with their studies will find it advantageous to drop by the Listening Center in C249.

The center offers filmed and recorded material for both study and entertainment. It is open Monday through Thursday from 8am to 8pm; Friday 8am to 4pm, and Sunday from 1 to 5pm.

Tapes on such subjects as Afro-American studies, English, biology, and history are available to supplement students' studies.

There are also cassettes of popular and recorded music and written works.

To use the listening center all a student has to do is look through the catalog to find the tape or filmstrip he wants. He then simply checks it out with the Librarian, and plugs it into one of the machines in the center. Tapes and filmstrips are not allowed to be removed from the premises.

Baubles, Bangles and Shiny Beads Draw Crowd at Campus Bookstore

A veritable Fort Knox of baubles, bangles, and bright, shiny beads was displayed in the campus book store last week. Amidst the show of opulence was a man with the familiar name of John Quincy Adams.

Mr. Adams — his real name — was here to promote the sale of school rings. He claimed to have sold seven in his first hour and a half on campus.

"All the old traditions are coming back," he said. He pointed to the rising sales in campus sweatshirts and the current interest in nostalgia as examples. "A year ago you couldn't give this stuff away."

The manufacturer's representative includes the skyrocketing price of gold in his sales pitch. Less than two years ago it was 35 dollars an ounce. Two weeks ago it hit a record high of 150. Within six months, he predicts, it should break the 200 dollar barrier.

Adam's company is aware that students at two year colleges like City College may not have an interest in class rings. They therefore, guarantee that those who go on to four year schools will be able to replace them by turning in the CCSF rings and adding fifteen dollar, regardless of the price of gold at the time.

The ten karat rings start at 56 dollars for the small ladies sizes and work their way up to 78 dollars for a massive monster for men. All carry a lifetime guarantee.

"Call Me Superfan," Sportscaster Milt Kahn Tells Students

"It took Howard Cossell fifteen years. It took me fifteen seconds. I'm not what you'd call "run of the mill." So announced Milt Kahn, controversial new KPIX sportscaster when he appeared for a press conferncne with Journalism 21-A students last week. "Fortunately I didn't have any formal training in broadcasting," he added, "or I would be just another robot."

Impeccably but casually groomed in his well-tailored slacks, plaid sport jacket and cashmere turtleneck, he rat-a-tatted answers to questions with machine-gun rapidity. "We're living in a very boring society," he said candidly. "Most people are trapped in jobs they can't stand. I'm doing something that I enjoy and if it ever gets boring I'll quit and do something else. I don't like being part of the press media. I'm part of the fan group; it's just the way I feel.

"Sure I'm pretty bizarre for TV but then so is KPIX because they hired me." Although he has great admiration for the cooperative spirit, imagination and laissez faire attitude of Westinghouse Broadcasting Company he insisted, "I didn't really need this job but I did it because I like a challenge. My deal is probably the best one ever made. If I'm fired I could retire to the Riviera." His eyes lit up as he momentarily contemplated the possibility.

PRESS CONFERENCE - Reporters Dermid Eagen and Kathleen Hurley gather around Milt Kahn following a spirited exchange of ideas about sports coverage on KPIX television news program.

So whose gas problem?

Editors Note: The gas shortage has hit the campus. Students spend hours in line at stations waiting to fill cars with fuel. Here are a few helpful hints about the tender care and "feeding" of a car.

Hints to Increase Gas Mileage

before You Drive...

1. Gap spark plugs to maker's specifications.
2. Time the ignition so it's right on the nose.
3. Inflate tires to proper pressure.
4. Change the air cleaner at recommended intervals.
5. Tune carburetor periodically so that the air/gas mixture is not too rich.

And while You Drive...

1. Make smooth starts.
2. Anticipate situations so you can take your foot off the gas pedal far ahead of the time you must stop.
3. Don't race the engine.
4. Avoid high speeds; it wastes lives as well as gas.
5. If you drive mostly in the city, take the car out for a run in the country every week or two. A bit of fast driving will permit the engine to run hot enough and fast enough to burn up or expel contaminants inside it.

What to Do When it Won't Start

1. If there's no response from the starter motor. In a car with an automatic transmission, be sure the gear-shift lever is firmly set in the Park position. If the starter won't work in Park, try Neutral. If it still won't work, jiggle the shift lever to both sides of the Neutral position. Or it could be a dead battery or a disconnected battery cable.

Check the cables, then turn on the headlights. If they're very dim, the trouble is the battery. A solution is to jump-start the engine with another vehicle's battery. This operation is common enough—and safe, provided proper precautions are taken.

2. If the starter motor cranks too slowly to catch. Repairing a faulty starter is a job for a mechanic. When there is no defect, slow cranking usually means that the starter is not getting enough electricity, or that the engine for one reason or another is putting up more resistance than usual; or the problem is a combination of both.

Try reducing the drain on the battery by loosening every other spark plug several turns (in their firing order, not as set in the engine). If the engine does start, let it run a few minutes to warm up, then turn it off and tighten the loosened plugs. If it won't start, tighten the plugs and (a) with a manual transmission, get a push or (b) with an automatic transmission, call a mechanic.

3. If the engine cranks normally but does not start. It could be either the electrical or fuel systems—but (a) first be sure the car isn't out of gas. Then (b) before calling for a tow, make sure the trouble isnot simply flooding; follow the instructions in the car-owner manual for starting a flooded engine. (c) Pull one of the spark-plug wires off and hold it about 1/4 inch from the engine block—as far from the carburetor as possible, while a friend turns the key.

A fat spark should jump the gap. (d) If it doesn't, check all the spark-plug wires and the wires from the coil to the distributor to make sure they're clean, dry and plugged in tightly. (e) Remove the distributor cap and wipe it inside with a dry, clean cloth, while checking to be sure that the rotor isn't broken. (f) If the spark does jump, the problem is in the fuel system.

How to Keep it in Good Condition

* To assure full starting power from your battery, scrub the entire top with a mixture of baking soda and water. Disconnect the battery clamps. Rub down the battery posts and inner surfaces of the battery clamps to bare metal with a wire brush, then reconnect the clamps and coat with petroleum jelly.

* When your horn gets stuck, just unplug the electrical line on the horn relay, or the horn itself, then get the horn fixed at your service station.

* Use touch-up paint on chipped surfaces to keep rust from gaining a foothold.

* Clean a grimy, oily engine with a degreasing agent and the engine will dissipate heat more efficiently.

* To make certain that you will be able to remove a wheel easily if you have a flat, take the time to loosen the lug nuts and drip penetrating or lubricating oil on the threads of the wheel studs—then retighten them.

Editorials:

Automobile Addiction Blasted

Driving has become more of a habit than a convenience to the American people.

With the so-called energy crisis upon us, we are finding out that cars have become to drivers what heroin is to the addict.

The price of gasoline has risen to more than 50 cents a gallon. But, people are so afraid of the withdrawal symptoms stemming from a different means of transportation that they will wait in lines for up to three hours just to buy ten gallons of the stuff.

As in the case of the heroin user, the only person who suffers is the addict. Oil companies (the pushers) sit back and rake in the dough from their hooked clients.

The addict continues to shoot heroin and the public continues to drive to work and school.

When faced with the threat of long lines and not being able to get gas at all, the convenience of the auto in the city is questionable. We must realize that, for the most part, we can get along without the use of the car.

We must show the pusher that we can do without his expensive crutch.

Form car pools, ride bicycles, take the bus, or even walk. Use alternative forms of transportation until this so-called energy crisis is solved.

Rape Victims Mistreated

Thousands of cases of rape go unreported each year. The reason is not, as some say, simply because these women are embarrassed to step forward.

More often it's the genuine fear of a grueling courtroom trial that causes a raped woman to remain silent.

When a woman brings charges of rape against a man, it is common procedure for his lawyers to begin an intense investigation of the victim's private sexual history.

If a woman's sexual past has been anything less than pristine pure the lawyer will then suggest in court that she encouraged or even cooperated with the rapist's attack.

This puts the responsibility for defense on the victim, rather than on the rapist.

Recognizing the injustice of this system, the California Assembly's Criminal Justice Committee this week is recommending adoption of new rules of evidence for rape trials; special training for police who handle rape cases; self defense courses for women in schools and improved hospital programs for treatment of rape victims.

In addition Assemblyman Alister McAlister (Dem. San Jose) has introduced a bill to prohibit defense attorneys from questioning women who have been raped about their prior sexual history.

Such legislation is long overdue. Write to your state assemblyman and urge him to take immediate, positive action on these proposed bills and make reporting rapes a little easier.

Sandwich Trucks Face Gas Crunch; Lines Create Chaos For Leasees

If you think you've got gas problems, look at what Barbara Frigge has to go through!

Mrs. Frigge, who operates the Cable Car sandwich truck in the Art building plaza, has to wait in line for gas for her car so she can siphon it into cans to gas up her truck.

As if that weren't bad enough, while she's sitting in line for an hour and a half she has to hire students to run her truck.

The truck is one of "1-1/2" cable car trucks operated here by Ken Ingles, who also sends trucks to several local high schools. Ingles, who contracts with City College has had his trucks on the campus for five years, and Mrs. Frigge who leases from him, has been with him the entire time.

Other campus canteen operators are Sharon Tracy, who parks in front of the Experimental college, and Lois Kelly, who covers nights and extra shifts.

They work from specially refitted one-time ice cream trucks that are filled with goodies ranging from cokes and coffee to sandwiches selling for 75 to 80 cents. Burritos, says Mrs. Frigge, are the most popular food item.

Mrs. Frigge and the other leasees work about 180 days a year. The business, she says, varies.

"Right now its pretty good" she said, glancing at the long line of students working their way up to the window counter. "But then this is the first of the month. Toward the end of the month it will quiet down. I make a pretty good income though," she adds.

Mrs. Frigge, a 13 year veteran of the truck catering business, says she finds this location preferable to some others she has had over the years.

"I'm very happy with the younger group here. They are much nicer than they are in most places."

Seductive Betty Boop is Back Doing Her "Thing" in Cartoons

The current wave of nostalgia has reintroduced the public to Marilyn Monroe, wire-frame glasses, and Bill Halley and the Comets.

Now it reintroduces them to Betty Boop.

Surely you remember Betty Boop? She was the little girl with the big eyes, and short spit-curled hair, who sang, "Boopboopedoop," in a shrill persuasive voice.

Miss Boop and her friends are starring in a cartoon feature entitled, "The Betty Boop Scandals of 1974," released by Ivy Films, New York.

OOPS - Betty puts her foot in it again and coos boopboopbedo!

Betty Boop was created by the late Max Fleisher in 1932. She was originally created as a semi-canine and was to be the companion of Bimbo the dog, another of Fleisher's many creations. As Betty's popularity increased she acquired human characteristics. Her large black nose became smaller, and her long flappy ears became loop earrings.

In her cartoons, Betty showed signs of being both an ingenue and a temptress. Though she spoke in a childlike manner, her swaying hips exuded sensuality.

It was the latter quality that invariably caused Betty great difficulty. Villains were constantly attempting to molest her. In her efforts to escape their advances, Betty would climb a tree (while singing, "Don't take my Boopboopedoop away.") and the branches would grab for her dress.

Tree branches grabbing for people, and chairs talking were nothing new in cartoons created by Max Fleisher. When Fleisher spoke the words, "If it can be done in real life, it's not animation," he took them to heart. Mr. Fleisher was known for taking real-life situations and injecting them with nonsense and absurdity.

Potted plants watering themselves and ashtrays smoking cigars were common in his creations. Nothing was static in Fleisher's cartoons. Everything was always changing shape, always moving.

Fleisher's inventive genius was further demonstrated when he created the bouncing ball sing-along cartoons. In these the audience would sing along with the characters. The words would be shown on the screen and a bouncing ball would set the tempo. A typical sing-along cartoon would have a baby robin fall out of its nest, start bouncing, turn into a red ball and lead the audience in singing, "When the red, red robin comes bob-bob-bobbing along."

FLIRTING - Sexy Betty wowed the cartoon world in the thirties.

Max Fleisher could almost be called the father of animation, for it was he, in 1917, who invented a process which he named the "roto-scope." This process was so efficient that it's still being used exclusively in the industry today. In spite of Fleisher's obvious talents, he lived his life in relative obscurity. He experienced a brief spell of fame, but his surrealistic style of filming was far ahead of its time, and was therefore unappreciated. For the most part, his contributions went unnoticed. On September 11, 1972, Max Fleisher died, also unnoticed.

Nostalgia

The year was 1944 and it was fall. City College was a part of the war effort.

A campus Bond Drive was started for $30,000 so the U.S. could send eight bombers to bomb Tokyo. The entire sum was raised in a week. At that time, 1,000 WAVES were housed across the street from the campus.

There was no unemployment problem in 1944. Every employer was seeking more help and women made up a large part of the labor force.

The gas shortage is not unique to 1974. During 1944, 25% of all students were living outside of San Francisco. This created a problem, however, as the government had banned all unnecessary driving.

There was an intra-mural basketball tournament featuring two fraternities, Beta Phi Beta and Beta Lau. There was even an inter-fraternity basketball league.

Speaking of fraternities there was a big controversy over their propriety on campus. It seemed that new members were constantly being harassed and embarrassed by the initiation ceremonies.

There was a sophomore dance sponsored by the Social Committee (now defunct.) At that dance, Jeanne Williams was elected as High Sophomore Class Queen.

Telly Offers Salute To Actor Jim Cagney

A Hollywood gangster is breaking back into the racket—at popular request.

James Cagney will "do time" on Channel 5 (KPIX) Monday, when he is saluted by the American Film Institute.

Cagney will receive the American Film Institute Life Achievement Award "for the whole body of his contribution to American Film". It will be the veteran star's first public appearance in several years.

Some of Cagney's pals in the motion-picture world were to attend a formal testimonial dinner honoring him last night in Los Angeles.

Among them: Governor Ronald Reagan, Frank Sinatra, Doris Day, Kirk Douglas, Frank Gorshin, Charleton Heston, Jack Lemmon, Shirley MacLaine, George C. Scott, Cicely Tyson, and John Wayne.

Cagney has done more than 60 pictures during his 31 year career.

Streaker Could Use Ballet Lesson

It was bound to happen here sooner or later, and on March 6 it did. City College got its first streaker — almost.

A semi-streaker was seen running down the stairs in front of the Science Building.

A group of on-lookers described him as "wearing white boxer shorts that were open in front, football shoes, socks, a white motorcycle helmet with a yellow face shield."

The "streaker" ran down the Science Building entrance stairs, and hopped into a waiting car, but the car wouldn't start. So the streaker goes on, noticed but nameless.

Movie Review:

Fling Before Prison

When a simple-minded sailor draws eight years in the brig for attempting to steal $40 from the Admiral's wife's favorite charity, two unconventional swabs are assigned to transport him to the prison. What follows is The Last Detail.

Taking pity on their eighteen-year-old charge, the two guards decide to show him the time of his life before delivering him to the brig.

In five days, they introduce the shy boy to sex, booze, brawling, and religion, in the process of changing a child-like, complacent prisoner into a bitter, hate-filled man.

Wildly funny in parts, coarsely tender in others, the movie makes ample use of some of the roughest language ever to hit the screen. Writer Robert Towne won an academy award nomination for a screenplay which comes across like an improvised version of a tale told in the men's locker room.

Jack Nicholson received a best-actor nomination for his finest performance to date. Randy Quaid was nominated best supporting actor for his excellent portrayal of the prisoner.

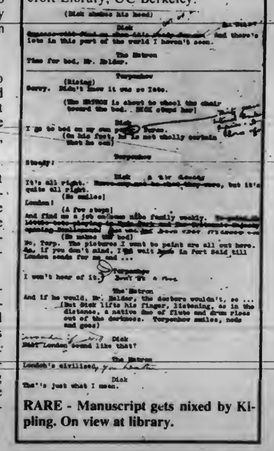
Widows of Civil War Vets Draw Benefits

The last of the Civil War veterans died almost 15 years ago, but Uncle Sam is still trying to pay benefits to their widows — if he can find them.

The ladies are entitled to a $55 monthly aid and attendance allowance if they are eligible.

Officials noted that in December 1973, there were 511 Civil War beneficiaries (272 widows and 239 helpless children) on the agency's rolls. There were 548 last June.

The average age of Civil War widows is 89.1 years, with 26 of them 100 years old or more. The oldest Union Army widow is 117 years old, compared to 105 for the oldest Confederate Army widow.



The last Union Army veteran died in 1956 at the age of 109. The last Confederate veteran was 117 years old when he died in 1959.

Pros Make Mistakes Too

Think you have problems with your English instructor who edits your writing? Take a look at this reproduction of the original manuscript of The Light that Failed, written for the movies by Sidney Howard.

Howard's screenplay for the novel by Rudyard Kipling was sent to the British poet and novelist for review and contains voluminous comments in Kipling's hand—mostly corrections of diction, class speech, and "English" usage.

The manuscript is on view at Bancroft Library, UC Berkeley.

Bando Speaks Out On Career And Boss Finley

"To make as much money as you can in as short a time as possible" is the goal of Sal Bando, all-star third baseman for the world champion Oakland Athletics.

Bando is not as money-hungry as his statement sounds. In his recent appearance on campus, en route to Spring training, Sal explained that baseball is not like other careers. The average lifetime of player is four years. An injury can occur at any time and end your career. You also have to worry about some new young player after your job every year if you are not playing well.

"I can't imagine going through life working at something I don't enjoy," said Bando. "All ballplayers enjoy what they're doing. I don't think too many people can make that statement."

The last couple years batting averages have been rather low. "Pitching has gotten better," Sal commented. "The only rule change that would help batters would be for the pitcher to tell you what kind of pitch he is throwing and even then it would be hard to hit."

About his controversial owner Charles O. Finley, the burly third baseman feels "If Finley doesn't like you he'll trade you, but it's part of the game. Finley likes to trade players to Texas, the worst team, so many of the players asked to be traded to Boston or New York."

Although Finley is not one of the best-loved owners, he has done a lot for baseball. Bando said it was Finley's idea to have the All-Star game and the World Series played at night; he was the first to put color in baseball by dressing his players in kelly green uniforms along with the A's trade mark, white shoes. Until Finley came up with these ideas many people were not able to watch the World Series games during the day as they were working.

All of Finley's ideas have been successful, recalls Bando. He remembers one where he wanted the team to come out of the dugout with sparklers when the team hit a homerun. "He fails to realize that pros want to be treated like men," Sal feels.

On women in baseball, "Women are beautiful, soft and nice, the game is too physical, they would be defeating their own purpose." Those comments drew moans and groans from the women.

Ram Bowman Takes First And Second In Recent Tourney

City will be proud to know that we have a Robin Hood on campus. He doesn't go around stealing from the rich to give to the poor, but he can shoot arrows just like old Robby. Our Mr. Hood is Daniel Sui, captain of the Archery Team. He took a first and second place in the Chabot College Invitational recently held at Cal Archery Range.

Sui took first in the Federation of International Target Archery meet with a score of 280.

In this event the archers stand 19 yds. 1 ft. 9 in. away from the target, and get 30 shots. The target is made up of ten rings with the center worth ten points. In order to get the total points of 300 you must hit the 1-1/2-inch wide center ring thirty times. Sui missed only twice.

In the Professional Archery Association event, also known as the Las Vegas, Sui took a second place, but only after losing to a Chabot in a sudden death shoot-off. Each bowman received an extra 25 shots in the shoot-off. Sui scored 23 while the archer from Chabot won with 24.

Sui, who finished the day with 577 points; commented "I thought I would win and since Chabot and City are the biggest colleges in the area with archery teams, we should win."

Archery may seem like a minor sport on campus, but the fact of the matter is it's our second largest P.E. activity, with tennis being number one.

"It's a sport where small, medium and big people have an equal chance of exciting competition," says Sui.

Dr. Alice Duffy can be credited for some of the great showing of the team. "I was very please at what I saw," said Dr. Duffy, "I saw a very exciting and promising team. I am now trying to recruit women for archers."

The team right now has only four members, Sui, John Hong, Albert Tong, and Baren Fong. So there is a great opportunity for men and women. Anyone interested in more information on archery can contact Dr. Duffy at her office at the WGYM on Wednesday and Friday, 1-2:30pm.

Volleyball Team Lose Game, Three Players

Win streaks, like other happy events, seem to end all too quickly. And the girl's volleyball team's twelve/game win streak did just that — came to a sudden halt — last week, as they lost to DeAnza College, 15-11, 11-15, 15-13.

The co-ed team had better luck in winning two games out of three to take their match 16-18, 15-8, 15-13.

Three girls of the starting six from last year's team were not able to play, which may account in their one loss.

Linda Lee, the team's all-purpose player and Most Valuable Player of the Reno Tournament last season, suffered a knee injury in a game against San Jose.

Terra Sullivan has a dislocated ankle, and Paula Hocker is also injured.

"Both teams played rough," said Coach JoAnn Hahn, "We have a lot of hard work ahead of us."

Two of the main problems the girls will work on will be serves and the setting of offensive plays, which gave them a great deal of trouble against DeAnza.

"We'll get them (DeAnza) on our court and we'll beat them next time," said Hahn.

The girls' next opponent is St. Mary's College, coached by Mrs. Saphie Rheinhimer, a former instructor here at City.

It's a new semester and new members have joined the team, so it will be a little rough in the first couple of games. But if the girls can get together and play as a single unit, as they did last year, they should have no trouble getting another winning streak started.

Sportscaster Explains Personal Philosophy to Students

"The biggest problem in the sports world today is the people in it," he stated. Most of them are really dull. All my competitors take themselves too seriously. The world is getting much looser and more fun. Sure, sports is part of the news but just giving scores is a waste of time. I want to talk to people who don't know that much about sports — housewives, people who never to go games — get them interested — talk to everybody."

Grinning broadly, the light reflecting in his oversized glasses, he quipped, "Of course I write my own material. Who else would do it? Woody Allen wasn't available."

Denying that he relies on any assistants to cover simultaneous games, he joked, "Westinghouse is working on a secret formula right now to make two more Milt Kahn robots for covering other events. I just hope I'm the one that gets the love life."

Milt Kahn

Enlarging on KPIX's policies he assured the audience that he wasn't censored, adding "Naturally, they won't let me use obscure (sic) language."

"There's no logic to what makes a person successful," he maintained. "It's the chemistry that really makes it happen." A journalism major himself, he smilingly admitted, "Appearing before this class just might be the highlight of my career."

Fired from his 40 a week job with a theatrical agency in New York, ("Maybe I didn't produce"), Kahn moved to Los Angeles and decided to publish a sportsheet ("Milt's Mirror") which became an immediate success. At 25c a copy he sold thousands of subscriptions and "offers started coming in like mad. Why not be a star "

"I'm my own man," he emphatically declared. I pay my own way. Sure I have an expense account. Sure it covers tickets. However, Westinghouse pays, not the teams — a far cry from getting freebies. You're obligated when you get free meals," he insisted. "I'm the only guy in this business who doesn't take food." Then pausing a moment he corrected himself and resuming his lightning speed, explained how once at a '49er game he inadvertently grabbed a donut ("It was late and I was hungry"). Conscience immediately intervened and later that day he mailed 25c to the team, together with a covering letter. (A few days later they sent HIM a letter, returning his 10c and restoring his integrity.)

An avid tennis player, he definitely advocates an active sports life. One of his immediate ambitions is to compete in the March of Dimes Athletic Event as the best all-round athlete.

Soccer, according to Milt, is one of the games requiring the most skill. Professional soccer will certainly catch on, he believes. "All it needs is better people to sell it. This is the only country where it isn't big, but good men have been signed and now it's just a matter of time."

"How do I feel about women in sports " He almost relaxed a moment as he clasped his hands behind his head. "I love them," he laughed. "Without them what would life be?"

Although he claims to be the only sportscaster in the Bay Area who has promoted Billie Jean King's new magazine, he looks with disfavor on her endorsement of Virginia Slims.

"She's backing something that could be deadly," he emphasized. "Sure, maybe she had no other offers but what if the Mafia backed her? Should she sell crime?"

Milt feels it makes no difference what color you are. "Sure we'll have a black coach someday; we might even have an orange one — but why would anyone want to coach anyway? It's the worst job in the world."

Being recognized on the street doesn't give him a thrill, he insists, adding, "Gangsters are recognized. Criminals in the post office are recognized. What's recognition?"

His parting advice on how to break into broadcasting was simply: "You need a vehicle. Mine was my newsletter. Get yourself on talk shows. Make a tape. Send it to all the stations. Knock on all the doors." Then grinning, hands in pockets, he reconsidered, "Better still, marry a rich woman if you're a guy or marry a rich guy if you're a woman."

PRESIDING — The late William Goode takes charge as Fall '73 president.

Ex-Prexy Killed in Shooting; "He threatened me," coed says

William E. Goode, 27, last semester's student body president, was shot to death March 9 on the front lawn of San Francisco's Sunnydale housing project. Goode was shot four times in the back by City College coed Louise Robinson, 27.

The District Attorney's office brought no charges against Robinson, who was released from custody on March 13 on the grounds of justifiable homicide.

Numerous witnesses substantiated her statement that Goode had threatened to kill her and had demonstrated his intent by advancing on her in a threatening manner, investigators reported.

According to Homicide Inspector Al Podesta, Robinson stated that Goode, a former boyfriend, had come to her apartment the night before the shooting, apparently hoping to effect a reconciliation. However, Louise Robinson refused to discuss the matter and went to a party.

In her absence, said Podesta, Goode entered her apartment and caused "severe damage."

When Robinson returned at 8:30 am, Goode confronted her outside the building.

He made attempts to get her out of her car by menacing her with a jack handle. When she attempted to drive away, Goode jumped on the hood of the car and smashed the windshield with the jack.

Inspector Podesta said that Goode had blocked the street with his own car, but Louise Robinson was able to escape on foot to her mother's nearby apartment. From there she called a girlfriend who informed her that her apartment had been wrecked.

Robinson walked back to survey the situation, but while she stood out front talking with a friend, Goode returned, and, in Inspector Podesta's words, "flew at her."

Witnesses quoted Goode as saying "If I can't have you, no one else will!" Robinson replied "You're crazy!" She then pulled a .38 caliber pistol from her purse.

According to witnesses, the sight of the gun frightened Goode, who cried "No, don't!" and turned to flee.

Robinson later told police "I just kept pulling the trigger until it stopped clicking."

He was killed instantly.

Assistant Dean of Students for women, Edna Pope, and Assistant Dean of Student Activities, Vester Flanagan, both confirmed that Louise Robinson could not be reached for comment.

As the Guardsman went to press, William Goode's funeral, scheduled for March 18, had been cancelled.

Funeral Services were private.

According to Associated Students Vice-President Stephen Congdon, Goode's brother took custody of the body, which was flown to Philadelphia for burial.

City Employees Strike and Muni Halt Nearly Paralyze Campus

The Student Council last week asked President Harry Buttimer to close the City College campus due to strike-caused unsanitary conditions.

The Council letter was one result of a city wide civil service employee's strike and consequent transportation stoppage which, among other things, brought on a severe drop in class attendance, and cancellation of some class sessions.

Among the other campus strike results were the closing of the Student Union Building and Statler Hall.

Explaining the closing of Statler Hall, Carl Frank, assistant to Dean Vester Flanagan, told the Guardsman, "I end up cleaning up and I don't go for that; that's not my job."

Garbage was a major problem on campus. Most of the wastebaskets were allowed to overflow, and the floors of the hallways, classrooms and restrooms were strewn with refuse and cigarette butts.

In addition an array of pickets on the campus blocked the entrances to the faculty parking areas.

Members of the Service Employes International Union were striking for higher pay and better benefits. The American Federation of Teachers, Local 2121, were picketing in sympathy with them. The Associated Students also voted to support the strike.

One of the picketing teachers, Drama Instructor James Haran said, "I'm halting the educational process, but there are times when you've got to do that. The injustices being committed here are more important than the injustice in halting my classes."

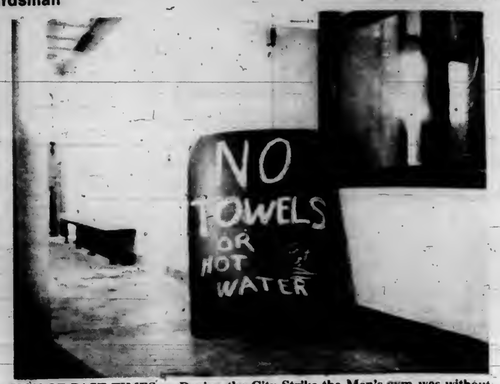
Another teacher, James Valasquez, of the English department, was picketing because he felt it was "important to support the other strikers."

One student on the picket line, who only identified himself as "Albert", was helping out because "Capitalists run the country and don't care about the janitors or little people."

CITY STRIKERS - The Strike of the city employees all but closed down the City College campus last week. Custodians, office workers, and teachers manned the picket lines that blocked the faculty parking areas.
Demanding more money, the city workers stayed off the job. Above are two of the many determined picketers.

Where does all the money go? For the first time the entire budget is published for all students to evaluate. See story of Associated Students Spring '74 budget on Page 4.

Men's Gym Kept Fairly Clean Despite City's General Strike



The City College sports scene suffered, like everything else, from the strike. Although the athletes continued training and working out for their particular sports, regular gym classes seemed to be stymied by the strike.

Some of the classes were cancelled, but most classes were still supposedly being held. However, there usually only half the usual number of students in any of the classes, if there were that many. It seemed that many of the people couldn't make it to class, or they were on campus but just don't go at all.

In comparison with the rest of the campus, the gyms were relatively clean. There was no hot water in the showers or towels in the men's gym, but there were paper towels in the bathrooms. By contrast, the rest of the campus restrooms were dirty, had papers on the floor and were nauseating to look at, let alone use.

However, the men's gym appeared deserted by students and faculty. It seemed as if some of the male gym teachers had vanished and trying to contact some of them was almost impossible because some of them were apparently never in.

Hopefully, the gym soon got back to normal. Many people like to work out and City is the only place available to some of them.

SIGN OF PAST TIMES – During the City Strike the Men's gym was without towels and hot water.

Mom and Daughter Are Teaching Judo

Walking around at night may be hazardous to a women's health but this can be changed easily.

Venus Williams, and her mother, Mrs. Annie Williams, are assisting Sensei Kako Fukuda in teaching Judo this semester at CCSF.

The Williamses have been practicing Judo for 5½ years. They feel that this martial art is not only a form of self-defense but also offers exercise.

Their style of Judo-Kodokan is to insure, "maximum efficiency, minimum effort and mutual welfare and benefit," according to Venus.

Both mother and daughter are brown belt holders.

JUDO EXPERT - Venus Williams believes in maximum efficiency with minimum effort in the use of body and mind.

Deserving of Superstar Title?

More and more in sports, the focus seems to be on the superstar. In baseball, the pitcher or the big slugger gets the publicity. In football the running backs or quarterbacks are usually in the limelight. Defensive or offensive lineman are constantly overlooked by the press. They are also the lowest paid performers, next to the kicking specialists.

In basketball, the superstar is even more noticeable. Players like Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, Dave DeBussure, Walt Frazier, Jerry West, and Rick Barry, are always in the headlines. These players deserve the publicity they get. However, many so-called "superstars" are vastly overrated. Players like Connie Hawkins, Oscar Robertson, or Gail Goodrich, do not live up to their publicity.

On the other hand, there are players who are underrated, too, such as Clyde Lee, Phil Jackson or Nate Thurmond who plays center for the Golden State Warriors. Thurmond is possibly the best all-around player in the game but is constantly overlooked for honors. It seems that because he has never played on a championship team, and is so consistent as an offensive and defensive player, he never gets noticed. Without Thurmond though the Warriors aren't serious competition.

This is not to say that stars shouldn't get notice. Some players are genuine superstars and deserve the publicity they get. However, wouldn't it be different if the everyday steady performer got a little notice too?

After all, they make the game what it is.

Commuters Stealing S.F. Gas

It seems that the commuting suburbanite has whammed the city again. With almost all counties except San Francisco and Alameda counties, on the odd-even gas plan, some commuters have had trouble getting gas on certain days. However, they seem to have found an answer to their problem. They just come to San Francisco to get their gas. The city does not have an odd-even system of rationing, so it is a sellers' market to anybody. So approximately three hundred thousand gallons of gas are pumped into cars belonging to people who don't live in the city. Consequently, the people of San Francisco have to wait in longer and longer lines to get gas. Sometimes they can't get it.

This procedure is unfair to city residents. Why should we have to give people who don't even live here our gas? If suburbanites can't find gas in their own communities, that's their tough luck. Let them wait in the long lines for two or three hours and then find out the station isn't selling any more gas. Suburbanites have cheated San Franciscans out of jobs, created smog and freeways on which to drive to work, and created problems with traffic. It's about time that local residents got a fair shake, and let the suburbanite suffer for awhile. Gas should be given to San Francisco residents first, then if there is any left over, give it to the commuter.

Then maybe, he'll start getting gas in his own community.

Are Americans Really Safe?

Robert Hanson, the ten-year-old newsboy who was brutally beaten and left on the steps of an Oakland church more than two weeks ago, emerged from his deep coma early this week.

This is the first ray of hope after an apparently futile, vicious event which has caused severe financial trouble to an innocent family, and may change the entire lives of every one of its members.

Compounding the problems brought on by the sudden medical expenses, Robert's father, Donald Hanson, was laid off his job four days after the boy was found.

Who is going to pay for Robert's hospital bills? Contributions are coming in from many people who don't even live here, some of whom are tourists passing through San Francisco on business. This will show that despite the existence of people capable of committing such acts, many others are capable of showing the greatest of kindness and generosity.

If you'd like to do something why don't you contribute some money? It doesn't have to be a big amount, small change will do just fine. Show that you care about a little ten year old boy lying in an Oakland Hospital, brutally beaten.

If you'd like to contribute some money, send it to Oakland Childrens Hospital, 51st and Grove Streets, Oakland, California. One little boy would appreciate it.

Cafe Boss Takes Gripes in Stride Stretches Food for Hungry Campus

Lawrence Wong may be worried about prices, but he isn't worried about complaints.

That is not to say that Wong, the personable chairman of the City College Hotel and Restaurant department, ignores student's feelings about the cafeteria food service – which is under his department; nor does he think all complaints are meaningless.

"We just take them in stride", he said. "They're a common thing. A lot of the guys on campus are just back from the service, where complaining about the chow is a standard form of recreation."

Younger students, Wong continued, are used to home cooking, with the food prepared to the family's individual tastes and served right from the stove when everyone is ready.

There is no way possible for a mass operation putting out some 1500 meals a day to meet this kind of competition, he said.

The main objectives of the cafeteria are to provide a training lab and to reach people who want inexpensive complete meals, the department boss said, adding, "I think we do the job well."

He emphasized that the total operation, from purchasing to service and dishwashing, is handled by students. "Every station is a training station."

Wong is of course concerned with the rising cost of food and classified help; but he is proud of the way his students and faculty have kept costs low "compared to downtown".

Where else can you get a complete breakfast for about 85 cents or a complete lunch or dinner for $1 to $1.50, he asked.

"Its a real problem trying to run a good teaching operation, meet the high cost of meat and help, and still maintain the quality of our meals while feeding so many people," he told the Guardsman.

How well does he do? Here are the thoughts of a few students:

Don Borgstrum: "It seems pretty expensive to me . . . (pointing to a small bowl of soup) I think it should be a lot cheaper. Why should a bowl of soup cost 20 cents when this place uses students . . ."

Patricia Johnson: "I think they have too many starchy foods, and it's a little bit expensive considering the portions they served. But I think it is reasonable compared to downtown."

John Pidgeon: "Well, it's mass produced food. It's really not too good. This bacon (in his sandwich) is not really cooked. The worst problem is the inefficient distribution. I come in here at noon, and it takes me almost 45 minutes to get served and get out."

Paul Stover: "It tastes pretty good to me. It may be a touch on the high side; but with food going up, it seems pretty reasonable."

Judy F: I think it's worse then before . . . Not enough meat, maybe because of meat prices. Too much starch. Sometimes the potatoes are a little raw, some times there okay. The price is reasonable and the service is very good."

Student Poets Televise Show for Prison Friends

Two City College students, Lige Dailey and Albert Walker, have recently taped a 30 minute TV show to be aired on KQED, March 27, at 6 p.m.

The students, who call themselves the Soledad Prison Poets, dedicated the show to Bob Wells, a black man the students met while they were in prison.

Wells, who was convicted for receiving stolen goods, (two suits of clothing), has served almost 50 years in California Prisons. He is currently incarcerated in Vacaville.

The program, Daily promises, will be "dramatic and informative."

AMA Says Platform Shoes Hurt

Platform shoes raise your view and your chances of injury.

The American Medical Association says that shoes elevating the wearer 3 to 7 inches aren't safe.

One foot specialist blames the new style shoes for the 30% rise in traumatic foot injuries over past few months.

The AMA cautioned all elevated shoe wearers to walk carefully, and take their time.

Nude encounters may not be legal much longer. Lures are easy work, high pay.

Babe Bares Bod for Big Bread

College women who complain of limited career opportunities may be interested in a new line of work.

In the spirit of public concern, The Guardsman last week asked nude encounter hostess Marlene Tyree, 24, a buxom blonde planning to enter City College this summer, how she feels about her job.

"It's better than being a hooker," she claims. "We can be lazy and we don't have to worry about cops."

Business is slow now, Marlene said. At present, she only makes $200 a week, but in May, when the conventions arrive, she expects to prosper.

"It's a lucrative business," she said, "I've seen girls make up to $475 a week."

It's easy, Marlene says. All she has to do is talk. Poor conversationalists sometimes ask her to read pornography. At fifty bucks an hour, it makes little difference to the girls.

Though touching is a no-no, many men try. Some get mad when they don't get any sex. One man, she said, tried to set the place on fire.

"We get a wide variety of people. You name it; if it walks, crawls or slithers it comes to us," Marlene said.

She commented that most of the customers would actually prefer normal sexual relations but are from out of town and can't get any.

She does get some weird ones though.

"One guy came in with three or four diapers sewn together. He pulled out some baby powder and asked us to diaper him." On a lark, she said a couple of the girls went ahead and did it.

Marlene has little inhibition in such matters. "I've powdered babies. Why not a six foot baby?"

"A lot of men are astonishingly ignorant about sex," she remarked, "even those who've had long marriages.

They ask us questions that they're afraid to ask their wives. They must have awfully frustrating lives."

Marlene said that men are allowed to undress, and often point to their privates asking questions like, "Does this turn you on?"

"What they don't seem to realize is that this is just a job. How could anyone be turned on eight hours a day?

"What's funny is watching the men freak when the vice cops peek in," she said. "One got so upset he defecated."

Broad-minded girls searching for a stimulating experience had better hurry. The San Francisco Board of Supervisors is looking for a way to close down these places of pleasure.

Until they do, there is money to be made.

Nostalgia

The big news at City College twenty years ago, was Lee Meriwether, who spent a year at CCSF, and was in her reign as Miss America. Miss Meriwether, who co-stars in the TV series Barnaby Jones, went to Aptos Junior High and Washington High before coming here.

The Guardsman office was moved to the Science Building, Room 304, where it stayed until being moved to Bungalow 203 last semester.

low 203 last semester.

In 1954, one student took an hour to get out of a campus parking space. The reservoirs weren't used as parking lots then either.

The enrollment of the campus was up to 5650 students, an all time record up to that year.

In sports, Balboa Park had a new baseball field put in. Before the field was built, the Rams played at Oceanview Playground or at "Big Rec" in Golden Gate Park.

The New York Giants had a potential superstar in center field. During the previous year he led the National League in RBI's with 119. He also hit 41 homers and batted .345. His name: Wally Mays.

Many new buildings opened up on campus.

A Student Union Building was completed in 1955. It was located on the corner of Ocean and Phelan avenues. A new library was also opened on campus in Cloud Hall.

Lastly, there were 15 finalists in the running for the coveted title of Homecoming Queen. The winner was Jann Palmer.

Dance a Bloody Affair?

The Associated Student Council is sponsoring a blood drive dance Friday, March 22, 8:30 till midnight.

Live music will be provided by "Avalanche".

The lower level Student Union will be used for the dance. All students who give blood will be admitted free.

Blood donors will also have a chance to win one of two ten speed bikes, the winners to be announced at the dance.

Funds collected at the door will be used to defray the cost of the bikes.

Additional funds will be put back into the AS treasury for future events.

Admission will be $1.50 for students with AS cards and $2.00 general admission.

Needed Reforms Sought by New Associated Students Council

Improved Communications

Student Body President Ozzie Lugo has decided that communication channels between students, clubs, associated students , student council and the Board of Governors have been closed for too long.

His first step toward better communication was reached March 5, when Lugo appeared before the Community College District Board of Governors. At that time, Lugo requested and received approval for the Associated Students' President to be granted five to ten minutes at the beginning of each bi-weekly Board meeting.

Lugo is confident this action will bring the students' needs closer to the attention of the Board.

Responding to what he termed "an urgent need" for increased communication between clubs and student council, Lugo has initiated the Inter-Club Council Association (ICC). The ICC will consist of representatives from each of the AS approved clubs. If Lugo's guidelines are accepted, the club will meet at least once a week to exchange ideas and support.

"Some of this year's clubs are paper clubs," says AS President Ozzie Lugo

Lugo feels that through these meetings, the clubs will reach a better understanding of each other's needs, and, perhaps, bring an end to the budget quarrels that have plagued and disrupted council meetings in the past.

"Some of the clubs mentioned in this year's budget are only paper clubs," said Lugo. "The only time we ever hear from them is when we're going to discuss the budget."

Currently, none of the AS Council members, nor their adviser, Dean Vester Flanagan, can say how many members there are in the various campus clubs and organizations.

Dean Flanagan emphasized, however, that before any money is allocated to a club, that club must present a type-written copy of their constitution, a list of elected officers, and fifteen signatures to verify the club's existance.

Lugo thinks that ICC members will be able to give AS Council members a better feeling for the strength of their organization by sharing information of this sort during meetings.

Lugo's third concern lies in the development of a central information office for students. "I hope to make a Student Advice Center office," he said.

At present, the only master list of clubs, sponsors and meeting locations available to students is filed with Dean Flanagan's secretary. Lugo thinks there should be another source for this and all other student-related activity on campus.

He plans to have such a source available to students in the near future.

Stricter Budget Guidelines

Associated Students' Finance Chairman Lee Leonard warned recently that all clubs and organizations budgeted by Associated Students of City College will undergo "a lot more scrutinization this semester than they have before."

Leonard feels that many clubs are simply abusing AC funds. He cited one instance last semester in which an organization requested $60 boots as part of their uniform allowance.

Some campus clubs knowingly request thousands of dollars more than can possibly be given. The Black Student Union for example, sought $6,850 and got $800. Leonard doesn't think it should be this way.

Leonard said that during the semester he will enact more and stricter financial guidelines for clubs and organizations. Those failing to adhere to these guidelines will not be funded, next semester, he added.

One of the new guidelines, will require organizations requesting new uniforms to show their old ones to the Student Council before a decision is made to allocate funds.

Leonard also expressed interest in investigating the PE department

Book store loan program is termed as "a farce" budget, book loan programs and supply requisitions among others.

Last semester's book loan program was termed "a farce" by Student Body President Ozzie Lugo. Most of the participants sold their club-financed textbooks back to bookstores and pocketed the profit, instead of recycling the books to other club members as was intended.

This semester, Lugo has purchased a stamp to mark each of the $2,600 worth of books which will be purchased from eleven City College clubs.

Nine clubs are sponsoring hot lunch programs this semester at a total cost to Associated Students of

Students found to be taking advantage of free lunch program offered by clubs

$1,900. Leonard feels this program is very necessary, but that it, too, has been abused.

The program was designed to offer needy students one dollar lunch coupons to be exchanged for food at the school cafeteria. Some of the participants however, made a habit of using the coupons for 10c purchases, then spending 90c change elsewhere said Lugo.

Coupons are currently dispensed at the discretion of the individual club sponsors. Some require a potential participant to secure his counselor's signature on a form verifying his need. Others have no prequisites. Steps have already been taken to insure no change would be given by the cafeteria to coupon holders. Other guidelines may be forthcoming.

Both Lugo and Leonard feel it wouldn't hurt to look deeper into membership figures to help insure fairer allotments at budget time.

Dean Vester Flanagan, advisor to Associated Students, said that no attempt has been made to keep comprehensive membership records because "when you start asking students a lot of questions . . . they say they're being harassed."

SNIP — Even with expensive chains, bikes are vulnerable. Social Security numbers are a better protection because they can be used for quick identification.

Bikes Swiped; Cops Place Blame For Crime Wave On Gas Shortage

A pair of fast-working bandits hijacked two bicycles from behind the Science Building on March 22.

Witnesses told campus police the men used bolt cutters to sever the bikes' heavy chains. Police said one of the chains cost $15.

San Francisco Police said this was the 75th reported bicycle theft in the city since March 1. In 1973 only 266 out of 1,189 stolen bikes were recovered. The actual figures may be much higher since many robberies go unreported.

The desperados may strike again. CCSF security chief Gerald DeGiralamo said there has been a rash of campus rip-offs recently. "We lose a couple a month," he claimed. "It will get worse as the weather gets better." He said the thieves' success may encourage them to repeat their effort.

Police said that while most of the thefts are committed at random, they occasionaly arrest people in pick-up trucks who follow bike riders.

Armed with bolt cutters and other tools of the trade, they wait till their victim has momentarily left his bike before they make their move.

Some of the thieves take orders for specific kinds of bikes. Police said the most popular brand is the French Peugot which retails for over $100.

Stanyan Street bike shop owner Dave Nayer, who rents bicycles to Golden Gate Park riders, said that the going rate on hot bikes is about $40.

He added that the gas shortage and Muni strike have caused the demand to far exceed the supply, thus creating a lucrative black market. Though he demands identification and a deposit from his customers he still loses half a dozen vehicles a week.

Park police routinely stop bike riders to check serial numbers. The information is then forwarded to Sacramento where a computer similar to those used for automobiles stores pertinent data.

Chief DeGiralamo urged students to park their bikes in the racks near the Student Union Building. Most campus thefts have occurred when they were left in secluded areas. In addition, he asks students to report anyone they see carrying bolt cutters.

Dean Discounts Vets' Charges While Investigation Continues

"I've been wiped out," said Dean for Veterans Affairs Wallace Wells denying grounds for his dismissal as charged by members of a campus veterans organization.

"If I thought the allegations against me were true, nobody would have to ask me to leave," he said. "I'd quit."

Meeting with the seven-member Veterans Office Committee, City College President Harry Buttimer announced a continuance of the investigation into the charges leveled against Wells.

Willis Kirk, dean of student assistance, is handling the investigation.

In a six-page letter to Dr. Buttimer, the veterans committee called for removal of Dean Wells from his administrative responsibilities at City College as they pertain to veterans affairs.

They cited insensitivity to veterans needs and lack of initiative and interest in establishing new programs for veterans on campus as primary reasons for his proposed dismissal.

The letter also emphasized the veterans' belief that Wells is personally unsuited to his position.

According to the committee, "Wells is of another generation and social and economic class than most veterans on campus . . . Underscoring his unsuitability more than anything else, is the fact that he is not even a veteran himself."

Charging that the hiring of a non-veteran for this position is an affront to campus veterans as a group, the committee stated that Dean Wells, regardless of professional training, could never understand fully the problems of a veteran.

His misplacement, they stated, should be as obvious as the appointment of a man to serve as dean of women or a white person to head a Black studies program.

The committee also accused Wells of being contemptuous of the Vietnam-era veterans. They offered examples which included an instance where Wells, in the course of disussing veteran work-study placement, commented that veterans must be given chores such as "moving boxes around" to keep them busy because "many of these guys don't know the alphabet."

Dean Wallace Wells

Dr. Buttimer said he will meet with the veterans committee again next week to discuss the matter further. Dean Kirk will offer a preliminary report of his investigation at that time.

Bookstore Turns Teachers Off

English teacher Burt Miller feels that the problem of obtaining books at Associated Students Bookstore is "getting worse." He plans to shun the campus bookstore and deal directly and solely with privately-owned Cal Book.

The problem, according to some teachers, is that books too often arrive well after the start of the semester, and when they do, there are either too few or returned before students buy them. In addition, book order deadlines often come and go before a teacher gets his next semester class schedule.

Miller says he is not alone and other instructors will do the same. He blames "sheer stupidity" for the core of the problem and suggests that "only a change in management would correct things."

David Hunter, assistant manager of the AS bookstore, defends the store saying, "There are bound to be errors occasionally, but the overwhelming majority of teachers are satisfied." He cites the store's constant and extensive paperwork and endless communication with publishers, authors, distributors and truckers for the foul-ups.

English Department Chairman James Cagnacci believes the gripe exists mainly in the English department due to the quantity of classes and books. However, he cited other teachers who have had similar mix-ups in getting the desired textbook for their students.

"Too often the college works for the bookstore instead of the bookstore working for the college," said Cagnacci. "We are usually in the dark regarding their system. There is a definite lack of communication."

Cagnacci stressed that while the entire faculty is not upset, there are a sufficient number of complaints which

President Responds To Strike Petition

Students Against Cut Backs presented a petition to CCSF President Harry Buttimer with demands concerning students problems stemming from the city workers strike. The group, describing itself as "small," consists of approximately eight students.

Their demands are:

Students shall not be penalized because they couldn't get to class or refused to cross the picket line.

Make up tests must be provided for students who were absent.

Students must be given material that will enable them to catch up with what they missed during the strike.

Kathy Olson, one of the spokesmen for the SACB, estimated 50 percent of the CCSF students were unable to make it to class during the strike.

Olson said that students were having particular problems in the business and chemistry departments. She claims that tests were given the day students returned from the strike and that students were being held responsible for the material they missed during the strike.

Buttimer's response to the petition, according to Olson, was "The administration should keep out of it; it tends to polarize people."

Buttimer told The Guardsman that the campuses' 800 faculty members "have been asked to judge and determine how best to handle the problem under the circumstances."

He added that to help alleviate the situation the date the mid term grades were due was extended.

Board Members, Students Mingle Over Dinner

Associated Students Council hosted an informal dinner aimed at alleviating separatism between the Council and the Community Colleges District Board of Governors.

Approximately 35 students, administrators and board members mingled during the dinner which was held in the Pierre Coste room of City College.

The event appeared to be enjoyed by all attending. Board of Governors' President John Chinn expressed enthusiasm for the dinner and the work of the current Student Council. "I especially commend your efforts toward organization of campus clubs," he told students.

"The exchange of ideas was quite productive," remarked City College President Harry Buttimer. "At my table there was lively discussion on a wide range of topics."

Dr. Buttimer said he heard favorable comments after the dinner from other members of the administration.

Associated Students President Ozzie Lugo hopes two more dinners of this type can be arranged before the end of the semester.

INFORMAL MEETING — Campus Chief of Security Gerald DeGiralamo, President Harry R. Buttimer and AS Council Finance Chairman Lee Leonard engage in conversation over coffee during recent dinner. Thirty-five members of the student body, administration and board of governors divided themselves among five tables which provided an intimate atmosphere for informal discussion of City College activities. The dinner was followed by a regular board meeting.

Safe at Any Speed

Recently, a California legislator and the head of the California Highway Patrol demanded the return to the 65 MPH speed limit on our freeways. The demand is far too conservative!

It appears that the underlying reason for this proposal is our concerned CHP officers are embarrassed to cite 57 MPH "speeders." Raising the speed limit to 65 would not sufficiently alleviate this problem.

Patrolmen would not be placed in this awkward position if we up the limit to 85 MPH. The higher speed limit would result in fewer speeding violations, thereby unclogging the courts.

There is much controversy today as to whether or not there is a fuel shortage. Adopting the higher speed limit would once and for all put an end to the argument. There would definitely be a shortage. This situation would be desirable not only to California but the country as a whole. Gasoline is selling at 60 cents a gallon today. This price, when compared to other countries, is too reasonable.

In parts of Europe, $1.50 a gallon is not uncommon. American tradition has always been one of fairness, and higher domestic prices would be our way of sharing the world price burden.

At the reduced speed limit of 55 MPH, it is estimated that California alone has saved 75 million gallons of gasoline in the last three months. Returning to the 65 MPH speed limit would not adequately compensate for this savings, whereas driving at 85 would solve the problem.

The 85 MPH speed limit would drastically reduce pollution in our cities. It would force the elimination of the internal combustion engine, thereby ensuring our communities of cleaner air.

This proposal would also be of therapeutic value to the freeway driver. Driving at high speeds is a great release from tension, which in turn would make for happier employees and spouses.

The accident rate on our highways has substantially decreased since the introduction of the 55 MPH limit. With the population problem confronting the world today this situation is intolerable.

As citizens of this state, it is our responsibility to alert our politicians to our stand on this issue. After all, if increasing our speed limit from 55 MPH to 65 MPH is such a good deal, wouldn't an additional 20 miles an hour be a bargain?

Things Are Bad All Over

Many Americans would like to wear a tag saying, "Please don't fold, bend or mutilate."

They have been lied to about the bombings of Cambodia. They are discovering the war they sent their sons to die in was illegal.

The President is under investigation for his income tax deductions and not reporting a cover-up payoff.

The law and order ex-Vice President, Spiro Agnew, turned out to be a man who accepted graft and was forced to resign.

John Mitchell, ex-attorney general, another law and order man, is on trial for attempting to hinder an investigation in return for accepting a donation to the 1972 Nixon campaign.

The President has said about himself, "When the going gets tough, the tough get going." The going is what most are concerned with.

A young girl is kidnapped for the "crimes" of her parents. Is she alive or dead?

In San Fraacisco we've just had two strikes. Muni wasn't working, BART stopped. City hospitals and schools were virtually closed and raw sewage was flushed into the Bay.

And if that isn't enough there's an oil shortage. Is it real or manipulated?

Whose fault is it? Is it the fault of some of the people? Only 55 percent of the eligible voters went to the polls in 1972. The turnout for state and local elections is even lower.

Is it the fault of Congress? Where were they when the war in Vietnam was being escalated? Why have they permitted the President to impound funds from vital domestic projects. Why can't they override vetos of important social legislation?

Who should we blame for strikes? Oil companies or the Arabs for the oil shortage?! The Israelis?

In a land of plenty, people are poor and hungry. The one third of a nation that was ill housed, ill fed and ill clothed, is still here long after the depression years of the 30's.

If every one who is able to work, wanted to work and actively sought jobs, there wouldn't be enough jobs for them. Minorities are looking for jobs. The unemployment rate for Blacks, Indians and Chicanos is higher than the rate for the White population. To give them jobs means some Whites must be fired. "Which side are you on?"

Something has to change. Let's try changing our priorities.

Instead of bombers, battleships and missiles, let's build homes, hospitals and schools for a start.

Instead of building more and bigger cars, with more and more power, let's build mass transportation that works.

Instead of sending the young to jail for drugs, let's give them a reason for an education.

Instead of poverty, let's give jobs.

Instead of higher taxes to prepare for war, let's lower taxes and prepare for peace.

But most of all, instead of boycotting the polls, let's get out and elect. Let's become part of the selection process. Let's choose candidates who are good, instead of voting for the lesser evil.

Teachers Criticize Bookstore Policy

should lead to questions concerning the efficiency of the bookstore.

Hunter readily admits that processing errors are often the fault of the bookstore but says, "It's easy to blame us . . . few people realize what we must contend with." Despite most of the formal orders from teachers, he said, the actual orders are estimations of previous classes coupled with administrative information regarding new or dropped sections.

Hunter eagerly reminds critics that "unlike Cal Book, all our profits remain on campus and we fund the entire Associated Students operation."

In actuality, the bookstore is responsible for 55 percent of the AS budget of $45,000 per semester.

Bookstore Committee Chairman and English Instructor David Rath comments, "Inadequate facilities and lack of space seem to be the primary problems. This committee, comprised of students, faculty, administration, and Business Affairs Dean Harry Frustuck, conducts periodic meetings designed specifically to increase interaction and efficiency with the bookstore.

Letter to the Editor

Dear Mr. Klipfel:

In response to your editorial in the "Guardsman" of March 14, I think that a good answer to why many of us are "automobile junkies" lies in the editorial that appeared below yours (on rape).

Yes, I am very much addicted to driving my car — public transportation is woefully inadequate in this city, especially late at night. I got around this problem for years by hitch-hiking, but after being hassled constantly I now refuse to hitch-hike anywhere. I learned to drive and bought a car.

Bicycles are great for short distances and in the daytime, but I can't get around the city that way all t[illegible]e, and I don't consider them too saf[illegible] in traffic. Have you ever tried car pools to get home from a meeting or other place at a time when nobody else is going your way? And recently they barred dogs from traveling the Muni, so how do I get my collie to the vet?

So, Mr. Klipfel, many of us have quite valid reasons for using our cars. I don't like wasting resources any more than I have to, but I think if you were a woman and could experience the hassles of hitch-hiking (ask Ms. Petrakis) you wouldn't be so vehement in your criticism.

Jewish Group Requests Funds

"Out of a student body of 20,000, most student body officers get elected by 200 votes or less," stated Burt Lustig, Hillel's official representative to Student Council. "The biggest problem of this student body is apathy," he continued, "but it's understandable. This is a commuter college and most students work.

"If only campus media, student government, administration and student groups could combine forces, we could have more participation and less apathy," he maintains.

"One of the ironies of student government here is that it is virtually impossible to carry a full load and be active in it," Lustig regrets, admitting that in 1972 he dropped several classes in order to serve on the finance committee.

He feels that every group should have an official representative on the Student Council but previously Hillel has had none. Meetings are held Mondays and Wednesdays from 12-1, often running overtime, and its members were not free during those hours.

For the first time since 1972, however, Hillel will submit a request for funds from the student body. Rabbi Roger Herst, leader of Hillel groups both at State and City Colleges, stated, "The Jewish community has always paid for itself. We don't feel we should ask for student body funds to propagandize but only for programs that would be of community interest."

Such programs are now being planned. For example, the group is obtaining the film "The Fixer" to be shown on campus for the entire student body, and arranging for the appearance of a special speaker.

"Hillel isn't a powerful political force like the other groups," Burt Lustig emphasized. "We don't want it to be. We only want to increase Jewish awareness. We don't want to have a large amount of propaganda, but when the Arabs get $700 we feel we should be able to have an extra speaker or a movie."

California Law

Women Retain Names Changes Unnecessary

The names Joan Harris and Ann Smith may not ring a bell, but Joan Baez or Ann Margaret sure do! Most people believe that a woman, by law, has to take her husband's name.

Not so. California Attorney General Evelle Younger says that California law allows a woman the right to use her maiden name, or any other name, if she so chooses.

A married woman may use her maiden name when registering to vote, applying for a driver's license, and applying for credit.

For example, not only can a woman retain her maiden name, but she has the option to change her name from Smith to Jones, even though her husband's name is Roberts.

"For years," according to Evelle Younger, "married women have had to go to court if they wished to change their name. This is because legal authorities have mistaken custom for law."

Senator Milton Marks of San Francisco has introduced legislation to clarify the existing law which will guarantee a person's common law right to change his name without having to go to court.

Marks feels that passage of this legislation would end bureaucratic arguments which have denied many Californians this right. It would also end many useless court battles.

People who desire to change their names through a legal process, however, can do so. This is stated in the Code of Civil Procedures, sections 1275-79. If a person under 18 wants to change names, both parents of/if parents are deceased/a legal guardian, must petition to change it through the legal system.

Senator Mark's legislation will simplify the method of name changing by educating the public and legal authorities on the subject. "My legislation will end the myth that a woman loses her maiden name upon marriage."

Will the day come when men take their spouses last name? Will they accept the name switch with enthusiasm?

The majority of male students polled on campus felt that most men want their name to be carried on by any offspring of a marriage.

GETTING TO KNOW YOU.— These moppets are exchanging small talk while they learn to play and engage in group activity at Child Care Center.

Child Care Center Wants Aid For Kids Who Need Daily Love

"City College Child Care Center could use some care from grown-ups," said Child Care Director Catherine Everson.

She's looking for people skilled in woodwork to volunteer time on Saturdays to help create an outdoor environment for Center children.

"Climbing structures and planters are especially needed," she said. Currently, the Child Care Center is operating at maximum capacity, caring for approximately 50 children daily.

WHAT'S THIS? — There are new discoveries every day at the Center.

"We have a long waiting list," sighed the center's secretary, Juliet Lund, "But we just don't have the square footage and facilities to take care of them."

Efforts are being made by the staff to have the center relocated or enlarged in the near future.

The center's primary function is to give parents, especially women, the opportunity to continue their education while providing practical work experience and class credit to City College students.

Participating children are exposed to a wide range of experiences designed to enhance their self-images and general development.

The center is open to children of CCSF students between the ages of 2 and 5-3/4 years. Priority is given to low income and single-parent families, and to students closest to graduation.

Two programs are offered by the center: a morning session from 8 am to 12 noon and an afternoon session from 1 pm to 5 pm. Children may attend either session for a maximum of four hours daily. Parents are expected to arrange their class schedules accordingly.

Parents are asked to participate one hour per week by working directly with the children in the center or by serving on one of several Child Care committees, which include material-making and fund-raising groups.

Not Everybody Loves Lucy Attempt to Play Mame in "Fiasco"

The formula for success seemed to be there; a successful book turned into a successful play turned into a successful film turned into a successful musical version of the play, should be a successful musical film, right?

So thought Warner Brothers, who sank a reputed ten million dollars, hundreds of costumes, and a good supporting cast into the year's musical fiasco, Mame, which is as unentertaining as last year's musical rehash of Lost Horizon.

The main fault with Mame is the script. Scenarist Paul Zindel has turned brash fun-monger Mame Dennis (who exerts a questionable influence on her young nephew Patrick who has come to live with her) into such a nice and sickly, sweet, lovable, dear aunt that, gosh, one can't help but love her. Audiences were amusedly shocked by Mame's antics in the film and play; now the audience yawns. Zindel mixes social comment about snobby neighbors with syrupy sweetness: "Mame," chirps little Patrick, "you're the Pied Piper." The two moods don't mix.

Lucille Ball has shed her Lucy image and desperately tries at creating a whole new image for Mame. But how can Miss Ball change her image when one can see reruns of I Love Lucy three or four times a day? Let's face it; Lucy is Lucy, and in Mame there are no slapsticky stunts for her to do.

At moments, she looks as if she were about to dance up a storm; instead, she goes through three costume-and-wig changes. All close up shots of Lucy are done in muted color and tone, making one doubt if the photographer's camera is focused correctly. An effort to make Lucy seem years younger than she really is only produces eye irritations to the yawning audience.

Lucy portraying Mame

Director Gene Saks tries to be inventive, but doesn't have the know-how to create a musical. Indeed, his previous directorial endeavors (Plaza Suite and Last of the Red Hot Lovers) were fair, at best, suggesting maybe Saks should learn a great deal more about the precise art of film direction before attempting to gamble with the outcome of a big budgeted movie.

However, most of the supporting cast is great; especially Bea Arthur, who, as Vera Charles, creates the epitome of a "bitchy-camp-twenties vamp." From Vera's first line, "I just love little boys!" to her hysterical rendition of "The Man in the Moon is a Woman," she is a constant delight, and more than steals the show. Everybody else seems stuck in the background, crushed under the inept dominance of Lucy.

The songs and choreography are lackluster. The title song and resulting dance number is about as inventive as a junior high school's version would be. To say Lucy is definitely not a singer is being too kind. The results of talent being abused in Mame shows by the film becoming top-heavy and threatening to collapse under its own bloated weight.

All in all, Mame should have been entitled Maim, a salute to the bad fifties musical. The film is intended for the Geritol set and ardent Lucy fans only.

Blooming Spring Flowers Brighten up Campus

Spring is the time for lovers, babbling brooks, and flowers. The academic process doesn't provide for love or babbling brooks; but the ornamental horticulture department on campus is big on flowers.

Seeds are sowed and put in the greenhouse by the propagation class; then they are allowed to germinate and grow. After several weeks in the greenhouse they are ready to go outside to the lath house to "harden off."

The flowers stay in the lath house for a week or so, then out of the campus they go. These blooming beauties are planted and maintained by the landscape maintenance classes.

This whole process takes six weeks to two months.

There are approximately 350 students in the OH department, studying several different areas of ornamental horticulture; landscape design and construction, greenhouse management, propagation, and landscape maintenance.

SPRING FLOWERS — These beautiful Osteo Spermum, commonly known as African Daisies, were grown by the ornamental horticulture department here on campus and will be used to beautify the drive in front of the Science Building.

OH instructor Frank Hilton, said, "Many people with degrees come back to get a vocation that will enable them to make a living."

The concept of talking to plants is not a recent development in horticultural maintenance. One of its innovators was the late Luther Burbank. Burbank bred cactus plants. McBoland states that "Burbank told the cacti that he was going to protect them, and that they didn't need their thorns."

As a result, the second generation of cacti was devoid of thorns.

"I say to my plants, 'You're a beautiful plant, you have lovely color.' " No, that isn't an inmate at a mental hospital talking, those are the words of Roland McBoland, Horticulture major at CCSF.

McBoland unhesitatingly revealed that he does indeed speak to his plants because he knows "that plants feel what's going on."

Roland provides an atmosphere of love for his plants. In other words, he sends out "good vibes." This type of environment is vital for optimum plant growth because, he says, "They like a calm atmosphere rather than one with a lot of commotion."

Hilda Chin Becomes First Girl on Men's Varsity Tennis Team

To everybody else March 18 was just another nice clear sunny day, but to Hilda Chin it was special. On that day Hilda became the first woman at City College ever to play on the men's varsity tennis team.

City was playing Laney College when Hilda won her match 6-4, 6-2, over a male player. Asked how the fellows react when they see a girl on the other side of the court, Hilda recalls an incident that happened at San Francisco State.

"The first time we played State, the guy was really surprised. All through the match he kept turning to the next court where his friends were and he just stood and said 'I can't believe it!' "

When you look at Hilda and see how far she has gotten in tennis, it's hard to believe that when she attended George Washington high school she hated tennis.

"The classes were so overcrowded that all the teachers could do was make you hit the ball against the wall and do drills. I hate drills!" explained Hilda.

"One day I had a couple of blue chip books so I exchanged them for a racket. I really started playing tennis in the streets."

Hilda was playing in the regular tennis classes at City when Coach Roy Diederichsen discovered her

"He came up to me and asked me if I wanted to play intercollegiate. I said great!" recalls Hilda.

As far as strength is concerned, Hilda said she has not run into trouble yet. "Most of the guys are pretty nice. They don't try to overpower the ball. They know I can do just so much, so they don't try to prove their masculinity."

Hilda has found that playing against men has not been so difficult, since she also presents a problem for the men. They are used to a fast and hard-paced game and find it difficult to play Hilda because she is so good at mixing up her game with slow serves, little taps over the net and, once in a while, surprisingly hard serves.

She is currently in her last semester at City and intends to transfer to San Jose State. She wants to become an interior designer.

Will she play on the men's team at San Jose? "The women's team is supposed to be pretty good, but the men's team is not bad either."

ON VARSITY — Hilda Chin, first girl in men's tennis.

RAM SPORTS

Girls First Win Of Year - But Men Suffer Big Loss

BIG SPIKE — Chris Zagorewicz (31) lets loose against San Jose, while her teammates are set to cover. Left: Doreen Suslow, Karen White, Zagorewicz, and Barbara Hattori (13).

All great teams in sports have one quality that sets them apart, and that's the skill to be able to bounce back after loss. City's girls volleyball team showed that rare quality in recovering from a defeat by DeAnza a few weeks ago which ended their 12-game winning streak, to beat San Jose here, March 20, at the Women's Gym, 13-15, 15-1, 15-8.

In the first game, the Ram girls took the lead at 5-4, but the Spartans put together a brilliant rally, scoring six straight points to take lead and the first game, 15-13. "They were slow getting started, along with not getting the good serve," said Coach JoAnn Hahn. "There were not enough bumps (hitting the ball with the hands cupped together) to the center."

During the five-minute break after the first game, Hahn came up with a new strategy for the second game. She would not disclose her secret plan, but what ever it was it proved to be successful. San Jose was blown out of the contest 15-1.

"Once they got warmed up and started playing together, they began getting t[illegible]erves over in the second game, but t[illegible] had trouble with it in the third game," said Hahn. City carried their momentum into the final game. The Spartans were only able to lead once in the game and lost 15-8, to even City's record to 1-1, for the year.

San Jose came with a men's volleyball team, which was unfortunate for City, which has not yet formed a team for men. Hahn had to gather six men players from the co-ed team. The Spartan men took the first game 15-9, but in the second game the Rams took the first serve and went on to a 15-7 victory, tying the match 1-1.

Unlike the women's team, which came back in the second and third games to win, the men went into one of the worst slumps of the day when San Jose's experience playing together began to show. They ran off eleven straight points to lead 11-0.

When City did get the ball back their serves were all going out of bounds.

"Their serves were terrible," explained Hahn, "But they have the good potential with their hard serves and spikes to become a strong team." City finally broke the scoring drought at 12-1, but from there they managed to score only five more points, losing the game 15-6 and the match 2-1.

Due to the lack of time the co-ed teams were only able to play one game, in which City came out on top 15-11 to extend the record to 3-0, for the season.

Giants Ready for Season Opener Tomorrow Against Houston Astros

Since San Francisco embraced the Giants to her bosom in 1958 "Wait 'til next year" has become the official team slogan. Despite the team's plethora of talent, only one pennant has been caressed by the San Francisco breeze.

The "Young Giants" of 1974 will strive to increase that number as they host the Houston Astros tomorrow afternoon in the season opener.

The leader of the team is Bobby Bonds. In the estimation of Sparky Anderson, Manager of the Cincinnati Reds, "Bobby Bonds is the best player in baseball." Bonds, along with Garry Maddox and Gary Matthews comprise an outfield which has speed, power, and is rated by Anderson as "the best in baseball." All three are young and will be together for a long time.

The infield is also young. However, compliments do not fall upon them as they do upon the outfield.

Only Ed Goodson is above reproach. He's a more than adequate fielder and is an excellent hitter.

Shortstop and second base are manned by Chris Speier and Tito Fuentes, respectively.

At times they look like the best double combo in baseball. At other times their defense is so porous that they could easily be mistaken for sieves. Although Fuentes had an excellent all-around season last year, it is questionable that it will continue. As for Speier, he's perennially among league leaders in committing errors at his position.

The McCovey trade moved Goodson to first, and third is being anchored by Dave Kingman. Dave played regularly in '72 and led the team in home runs and strikeouts.

Catching is another Giant headache. Dave Rader is a good receiver with an accurate arm. There is just one problem — it's not very strong. In one game last season, the Reds stole 6 bases off him.

However, the acquisition of Ken Rudolph from the Chicago Cubs, and John Boccabella, who was traded last week from the Montreal Expos in exchange for pitcher Don Carrithers, should improve the depth of the catching staff.

All the good news has been told. Now, for the bad news.

First, Ron Bryant (24-12), the most consistent Giant pitcher, will miss the first week of the season. Bryant injured himself on a swimming pool slide. Ron was so consistent last year that he was voted by the players as the league's best pitcher. Aside from Bryant, the quality of the starters diminishes radically. Tom Bradley (13-12), Jim Barr (11-17) and Jim Willoughby (4-5) will hardly make anyone forget Sandy Koufax.

Last year reliever Elias Sosa set a new Giant record by appearing in 70 games. He and Randy Moffitt will have to duplicate their herculean efforts if the Giants are to have a chance of winning their division.

Actually, all things considered, they'll probably finish third, again. Even with promising rookies like John D'Acquisto and Frank Riccelli the "Young Giants" don't have enough gas to pass the Reds and Dodgers.

Gymnasts Plan Show in June

The gymnastics classes will present a program of the various types of gymnastic skills. Events include uneven parallel bars, rings, side horse, free exercise, and a high bar. Both regular and evening gymnasts will perform, so come out and see them. The admission charge is 50 cents and the money goes to gym supplies. The time, 7:30 - 9:30 pm on June 5th.

The women's City College Gymnastic Team participated in a meet against American River College last week. Although the women from City put up a good fight, American River proved too much for them. The final total was 111.9 to 107.1 in favor of American River. Debbie Chernick of American River was outstanding; she placed first in balance beam and floor exercises.

Track

Unlike last year when City sent ten men to the Santa Barbara Relays, only three went this year. They were Thurmond Wells, Randy Minix, and Robert McCutcheon.

The reason for the big drop in representation was that team members were not running their top marks in time to be entered, leaving Coach Willie Hector with the three men in the field events.

Minix took fifth in a field of 42 in the high jump. Wells placed sixth in the triple jump, which had 47 participants. McCutcheon ran into some bad luck when he failed to place in the long jump and fouled on all three attempts in the triple jump.

Baseball

"The flu bug has hit us hard." This was Coach Ernest Domecus' explanation of the baseball team's 2-7 record. "In a game last week we had to use two outfielders to pitch for us."

A playoff berth for the Rams is still possible. As Domecus explained, "The schedule is split up into two parts. There'll be a winner for each half, and we feel that we can still be important."

Softball

Marilyn Schnake has taken over as coach of the women's softball team this season. Schnake will be going for her first win of the season on April 16th against Contra Costa College. Last year's team posted a 2-7 record.

Fencing Team Takes 2nd Place

City's women's fencing team took second place in the women's Intercollegiate Fencing Competition, the most difficult of all intercollegiate fencing competitions, on March 8 and 9 at San Jose State University.

CCSF was the only junior college among the 17 participating teams from all over California and Arizona.

More than 60 women competed in the opening day Individual Championships. Dolores Hong and Marvillee Yee made it to the finals, placing 6th and 9th respectively.

The Team Championships, held on the final day, provided excitement as the CCSF women showed their best fencing of the year.

Jessica Conn was a strong asset to the team of Hong and Yee. Pamela Lee, an alternate, fenced impressively the first day.

Maestro Ferenc Marki again has done an outstanding job coaching the fencers. Each girl received a beautiful trophy for her efforts and a trophy was awarded to City. Kathy Aanestad

College President Resigns Post to Accept New Job

Harry R. Buttimer is leaving City College after 27 years of service in various administrative positions. He has been the college president since 1970.

In a letter to faculty and administrators, Dr. Buttimer announced, "After very careful consideration and a difficult period of deliberation, I have accepted the superintendency of the Contra Costa Community College District effective July 1, 1974.

"My decision was not an easy one to make. I have the highest regard and deepest affection for this institution and its excellent staff."

Assistant Dean for Veterans, Dependents and Non-residents Wallace Wells remarked "The whole administration is going to miss him. He's a fine man."

"I think it's a profound loss for the college and for me, where I sit," said Edna Pope, assistant dean for women students. "He was an easy man to talk to and a fine leader."

There was little student reaction to his decision to leave. Of more than 20 students questioned at random, most echoed a comment made by third semester student Andre. Keyes, "I've heard his name, but I don't know who he is."

Dr. Harry R. Buttimer

Others said they had never heard of him. Only one person said he knew him and expressed no particular feeling about his leaving. Dr. Buttimer will continue in his position as City College president until June 30.

In the meantime, Chancellor/Superintendent Louis Batmale has asked that students, faculty and administrators join the Board of Governors in an effort to identify the finest possible replacement.

Women's Plan Offers Support

Any woman feeling that her economic position, age, family situation, and lack of confidence is a barrier to education will be able to get help from the Women's Re-Entry to Education Program (WREP).

WREP, which will begin next semester, has the following objectives:

- To assist women who are uncertain, uncomfortable, or threatened by an academic setting.
- To provide personal interaction between women of the target group and staff members.
- To enhance academic and emotional "mutual support" groups with a pleasant environment.
- To direct students to resources for local employment opportunities and City College programs leading to jobs in these areas.
- To provide courses in the basic skills of reading, composition, and/or math toward the goals of enrichment or employment.
- To provide academic experiences which contribute to intellectual, aesthetic, and physical insight and sensitivity.
- To develop understanding of the changing roles of women through the perspectives of sociology, psychology, literature, and/or history.
- To refer students to campus and community resources in childcare, health, finance, housing and law.

Summer Applications Available for School

Students planning to attend summer session at City College must file an "intention card" in the Registrar's office by May 22.

The cards, which require the students' name and ID number, will be available in the library, counselling and Registrar's offices.

Each student submitting an intention card will receive a registration enrollment packet in the mail in time for his use on June 24 when classes begin. Students then register in the class room during the first class session.

Detailed information on the registration procedure will be included in the mailing packet. General information can be obtained in the registrar's office.

Summer session runs from June 24 to August 2 for the majority of day classes and to August 9 for evening classes.

Students may select day or night classes or a combination without making any further advance arrangements.

Suspect Charged in Series of Campus Crimes; Teacher Shot

A San Francisco Grand Jury has indicted a former Traffic Bureau clerk for nine counts of armed robbery and assault with intent to commit murder. Police say five of the thefts occured on the City College campus.

Michael J. Boyd, 25, of 120 Orizaba street, is charged with a crime spree that ended in the shooting of a distinguished San Francisco State University professor on April 3. Boyd is currently being held in the Hall of Justice Psychiatric Ward.

Campus Security Chief Gerald DeGirolamo told THE GUARDSMAN that three of the holdups took place in CCSF men's rooms, one in an Arts Building music room, and a fifth in a Cloud Hall classroom. At least one CCSF witness, a State student, and the wounded teacher, have identified Boyd as the man who robbed them at gunpoint with a .22 caliber chrome plated revolver.

Walter Hucker, 71, professor emeritus, said he struggled with the gunman, who shot him through the throat, and made off with his wallet. Boyd was captured moments after the shooting when bystanders chased and cornered him.

Hocker, a Vienna University graduate, was released from San Francisco General Hospital after a week's treatment. Speaking in a thin whisper, with a thick German accent, the professor reflected, "I'm an old man. It doesn't matter if I die. But he (the suspect) has destroyed his whole life."

Police say none of the thefts involved more than $25.

Hacker, who will be unable to work for the rest of the semester, added, "This terrorizing has got to stop! I don't think he was hungry. He was dressed nicely. I wish I could afford to dress like that."

Veterans Told to Inform Office of Future Intention

Veterans planning to attend City College summer instruction are urged to inform the Office of Veteran Affairs immediately to assure receiving prepayment checks on time. Vets planning to return to CCSF in the fall are also requested to inform the office of their intentions on time so that pre-payment benefits will be processed and ready upon their arrival.

Assistant Dean of Veteran Affairs Wallace Wells told The Guardsman that although late checks have been a major problem for many vets, if the claims are processed early enough, many of the checks can be waiting for the students when they arrive for the first day of instruction.

The practice of pre-payment checks began last fall in an attempt to alleviate some of the problems veterans were encountering with late or lost payments. Many vets have had to wait well into December before receiving their first payment due to late application for benefits or mistakes on applications.

Dean Wells suggests any questions regarding veteran related situations be brought to the Office of Veteran Affairs on the upper floor of the Educational Arts Building, Room E-202.

QUEEN ASPIRANT — City College coed Yoko Tashiro, 18, is one of seven young women competing for the title of queen of the San Francisco Cherry Blossom Festival. If crowned, she wins a trip to Japan. The festival runs from April 25-28.

Club Council Argues Guidelines, Authority

Only three of City College's 32 clubs failed to have representatives at the first meeting of the Interclub Council.

The general feeling at the meeting was one of willingness as demonstrated by the high attendance.

Vigorous debate resulted because of a stipulation of the new group's proposed constitution. This provision stated that groups not represented at ICC meetings would be denied the right to AS budget hearings. In addition, club accounts of groups which go unrepresented for three consecutive ICC meetings would be frozen.

Associated Students President Ozzie Lugo stated that without this stipulation, there is no way of co-ordinating or controlling club expenditures of student funds.

Lugo emphasized that the final budget authority remains with the Student Council. However, ICC would have to have a strong voice with that body, he said.

Money and effort has been wasted because of poor communication. "Unchecked, such inefficiency could raise eyebrows among members of the Community College District Board of Governors," Finance Chairman Lee Leonard added. "Already," he said, "they have raised questions about some club expenditures. If we are hoping to get any money from the Board of Governors we are going to have to show them that the money we already have is being used for a good purpose."

Leonard stated that few people know what many clubs are doing with their budget funds. He added, "We are going to have to start working together."

Power hungry? CCSF political battles start May 3. Election petitions must be filed in Student Union 205 by Wednesday, May 1.

Boycott Aims at Saving Whales

A boycott of Japanese products has been called by American conservation groups to force the Japanese government to halt Japan's continuing slaughter of whales in spite of the ten-year moratorium on whaling called by the United Nations Conference on Environment.

The Japanese are also being cited for refusing to abide by the conservation rulings of the International Whaling Commission, of which Japan is a member.

Supporting the boycott campaign known as "Save the Whales" are the National Wildlife Federation, Friends of the Earth, Fund for Animals, Environmental Action, Defenders of Wildlife, and Environmental Policy Center along with student groups throughout the U.S.

The campus Sierra Club, City College's conservation group, has not as yet endorsed the campaign, though the National Sierra's have.

The Japanese whaling fleet is now in the Antarctic, killing hundreds of whales each day. Japan justifies this huge whale slaughter by claiming they need the meat to feed their people, but in fact whale meat represents less than 1% of their protein diet.

"It seems the Japanese will essentially catch whales till they're all gone. After all, whaling is still profitable," said A. Mariy, Oceanographer at CCSF, who reported that as early as the 1400's, whale species were becoming extinct.

Club Pays Most Of Own Expenses

City College Rally Committee received a budget for the academic year 1973-1974 that places the club on equal financial footing with the campus Child Care Center. The budget also places the club well beyond the monetary status of a majority of campus clubs and organizations.

The $3,027 expense account allows $1,200 for chartered transportation, while the remainder is slated for clothes and pom-poms.

Though this may seem extravagant to some, Assistant Dean of Student Activities Vester Flanagan says the monies budgeted for clothes meet only 30 percent of the cost. "Rally Committee members must beg, borrow, or steal the needed additional funds," he said.

The club has uniforms for both indoor and outdoor use. Though spring semester athletic activities last only one month, new clothes and accessories are purchased for each season.

"Uniforms used outside in the mud and rain are not suitable for use in the spring semester because they're so raggedy," said Flanagan. "If at all possible we use them again."

Question: How Does Marriage Fit Into Your Lifestyle?

Elmy Bermejo—Psychology
I've set a goal for myself and I want to finish it before I start something else. In the future, I'd like to get married but not right now.

Betty Dvorson—Journalism
Fantastically! But then I happen to be married to a very unique individual. He brings out all the best in me and encourages me to pursue any avenues of endeavor I like. He's such a complete person himself, that he's pleased when I find that kind of fulfillment in the activities I choose.

Jerry Jackson—Medical Records
It doesn't in the legal, City Hall sense; but if both parties are broad-minded enough and able to avoid possessiveness, I could see shacking.

Barbara Rosinska—Interior Design
Doesn't fit at all. I'm very independent: I like to do things by myself without depending on someone.

David Klipfel—Gen. Ed.
As my life style is now there is no room for marriage. But if I were to fall in love I'm sure I'd be able to compromise and make marriage fit in.

Presley Lemmon—Accounting
At this point marriage is the farthest thing from my mind. Maybe in about 4 or 5 years I'll think about it.

School Needs Top Name Leader

Louis Batmale, Chancellor/Superintendent of the City College District Board of Governors, recently requested help in "identifying" the finest possible successor for the position of President of City College.

The Board of Governors should conduct a nation-wide search for a prominent educator who could bring prestige to the largest community college in California.

The attention focused on such a person would secure for CCSF an increase in recognition and, perhaps, a greater influence in areas of finance.

A CCSF diploma would be a more viable currency within the academic community.

Our current college president has been a competent administrator, but a random check reveals that a surprisingly small number of students actually know his name.

A well-known figure might be able to take advantage of grants and loans from foundations who do not usually deal with this school.

Hopefully the new campus president will not remain invisible to the students, but will be a source of ready recognition and pride.

Dean's Methods Questionable

Associate Dean Vester Flanagan's actions at a recent meeting of the Inter-Club Council insulted and infuriated a number of council members.

His bulldozing tactics during a meeting resembled maneuvers in a junior high locker room rather than in a gathering of adult representatives of clubs and organizations on a large metropolitan junior college campus.

For an administrator and adviser for student activities to hustle up a group of people and send them clunking into a meeting room while a vote is being taken — regardless of his reason — is unprofessional, discourteous, and disrespectful of the democratic process and of the people trying to use it.

Dean Flanagan says he was rounding up members of interested groups and advising them that an important action was being taken. He says it was not his intention to disrupt the meeting. Perhaps this is so, though it's hard to believe he could have expected anything less.

The Dean argues that ICC was going to elect officers despite the possibility that some campus groups were not represented in the room, and that a majority of member clubs might not have been present.

These arguments may or may not have merit. They were heard by the ICC delegates, who decided there was sufficient representation to go ahead with the election.

If this decision was unfair, then the election was illegal, and Dean Flanagan had the right and responsibility to take action, but not the action he took.

We have no doubts about Dean Flanagan's integrity or his concern for CCSF students; but we have great doubts about how effective ICC can be if its members face the spectre of their democratic actions being interrupted by their faculty advisor's antics.

We call upon AS President Ozzie Lugo to clarify precisely what Dean Flanagan's rights and duties are relative to ICC and other clubs. And we call upon Dean Flanagan to leave the locker room tactics in the locker room and remember that he is dealing with adults.

Lower Speed Limit Encouraged

The 55 mph speed limit on California's highways has saved fuel and lives since its inception. Now the State Legislature is considering returning the speed limit to 65.

There are two possible reasons for the lower rate in traffic fatalities since this energy saving measure was enacted. The Highway Patrol cites the drop in automobile use due to the difficulty of getting gas as one reason. Another is the lower speed limit.

The possibility that the lower limit is a major factor in the drop in the traffic fatality rate is great and shouldn't be ignored. The state legislators should be encouraged to consider the lives that may be saved by maintaining the 55 mph speed limit.

New Course Offers Students First-Hand Experience in Aid

Emergency childbirth, poisoning, and drugs are some of the things CCSF students are learning to cope with this semester.

The course, Health 14, is the first to be in accordance with the new Red Cross Handbook regulations.

Students are given the opportunity to learn the practical and theoretical application of emergency care. Three mannequins are used to simulate real-life situations that require students to apply practical emergency treatment as if the mannequins were real individuals in need of care.

VICTIMS — Method used in giving a practical application of first aid.

The course teaches care of burns, bone and joint injuries, respiratory emergencies and cardiopulmonary resuscitation. Those meeting the rigid regulations will receive the Advanced American National Red Cross First Aid and Cardio-pulmonary Resuscitation Certificates.

The American Medical Association (AMA) believes that deaths can be prevented and the extent of injuries minimized, providing that people who handle such cases are competent and thus upgrading the emergency care field.

For example, 50 percent of cardiopulmonary cases result in needless death. Students who meet the standards of the AMA and Red Cross will be qualified to handle such cases.

The course has had favorable response. "Intense individualized instruction," says Health 14 Instructor Frank Ingersoll, "is responsible for this success."

SAVING A LIFE — Students and instructor attempt to save a life in a practice session in new first aid course.

Only 25 students are permitted to enter each class and they must be majoring or preparing to major in criminology, allied health occupations, air transportation, physical education, teaching-assisting or recreational leadership.

This is a two unit course and is under the direction of Ray Burkhead, chairman of the Health Education Department.

Black Suicide Rate Up Over Past Years

Within the last 20 years there has been a gradual but persistent increase in the national rate of non-white suicide. According to San Francisco-Suicide Prevention Inc.

The national rate of suicide for the blacks is low compared to whites, but is growing significantly — wspecially among the young, they said.

SFSPI said attitudes about the degree of black suicide range from flat statements of "blacks don't kill themselves" to a mild acknowledgement that the phenomenon might exist, but only in insignificant numbers and that available statistics might be questionable.

As early as the 1930's it was pointed out that as many blacks as whites attempted suicide, but that more whites completed it.

While white suicides peak during old age, the highest proportion of black suicides occur among blacks ranging in age from 20 — 30.

Citing statistics from the San Francisco Coroner's office, the group said there were 70 black suicides from 1970 through 1973.

The highest number were commited by men and women over 30 years of age. Next were men under 30 and men over 50.

Black men committed suicide twice as often as women, the Coroner's figures showed. However, the figures for the year 1973 indicate that the two to one margin is being narrowed, with nine female suicides against eight male suicides.

The assumption that black women tend to kill themselves by taking an overdose of barbituates and that black men tend to choose firearms more often that women do was substantiated by the findings. However the figures show that black men use barbituates as often as firearms last year.

Although it is much to early to draw any conclusions from the data, the coroner's statistics show that black suicide in San Francisco is a public health problem.

Nostalgia

Summer had ended and with it went the flower children of San Francisco. The year was 1967 and City College was very much a part of that year.

The Guardsman and the Free Critic, banded together in 1967 and formed the Guardsman/Free Critic.

The Experimental College was started in early 1968 and had some 300 students enrolled in the first week.

A woman was elected as Associated Students President, for the first time since 1941. Her name was Diane Lattimer and she moved up to the President's job when Rich Christensen, former President, resigned from his post. Reasons were that he did not attend classes and also because he lacked the units necessary to function as President.

In sports, O. J. Simpson was in the news in 1967. The Juice had transferred from City to USC the year before. He was the leading ground gainer of his team and he led the team to the number one ranking in the country. Also, Ollie Matson, Hall-of Famer in football, and ex-City football player, retired from professional football after 15 years on the gridiron. Matson retired with a record of almost 13 thousand yards gained, which is second to only the great Jim Brown.

Also, Willie Wise, now a star for the American Basketball Association's Utah Stars, was leading the Ram Basketball team to a victorious season.

In the music scene, the now defunct Fillmore was rocking with some of the big rock bands of the day. Groups like Blue Cheer, John Mayalls Blues Breakers, the Doors, and especially Cream, were really the big thing around town. The Jefferson Airplane, had come out with their hit "White Rabbit."

The broadcasting department of City College began broadcasting over the FM station KALW. The department initially broadcast one hour. Now it's on the air three hours a day.

Finally Art Hoppe, columnist for the San Francisco Chronicle, spoke on campus during the college hour.

Tenants' Group Helps Deal With Problems

Renters have always had a problem in San Francisco. Not only do they have to find a livable place that they can afford, but they must also find a landlord who is willing to rent to them.

Racial discimination, poorly maintained buildings, high rents, and evictions are problems constantly facing renters in San Francisco.

The Supreme Court has ruled that discrimination because of race is illegal, but the San Francisco Board of Supervisors recently voted down a proposed ordinance which would have made it illegal to discriminate against tenants with children.

Joe Fillingim of the Tenants Action Group (TAG) said, "The voting down of the proposed ordinance stinks. There is nothing a person can do if he is discriminated against because of his children."

TAG's main goals are to counsel tenants on their rights and how to use them. The organization hopes to organize Tenants Unions in various buildings and neighborhoods throughout the city. They will explain to tenants how to deal with problems not directly covered by law, because most laws favor landlords, according to TAG.

TAG has four long-range goals: (1) Rent Control - rents should have a set rate and shouldn't be allowed to be raised at the whim of the landlord. (2) Evictions - landlords shouldn't be allowed arbitrarily to deprive tenants of their homes. (3) Maintenance - payments of rent should be dependent upon the physical condition of the rental unit. (4) Destruction of housing - the community must have control over land use. As a minimum, landlords should be required to maintain the existing quantity and quality of housing.

An Appellate Court handed down a decision that landlords are required to keep housing up to major building codes. TAG is working to reform laws so that tenants can get fair treatment from landlords. The organization distributes pamphlets, such as Tenants Union By-Laws, Tenant-Landlord Bargaining Agreement, and a monthly newsletter, the TAG Rag.

For a donation, the Tenants Survival Handbook is available.

TAG is staffed by volunteers and needs more people to help. If you have any problems, questions, or just want general information, visit the TAG office at 1310 Haight Street, between Central and Masonic, or call 552-1740.

CCSF Student Enjoys Limelight in Hit Play

He doesn't look the part. The handsome face, the strong, well-built body, the dark deep-set eyes—who would ever think he plays the part of a psychotic Fascist Neo-Nazi? Tony Becket does that however each Friday and Saturday night when he portrays Zeke, in the hit play "The Ballad of Dangerous George."

Tony, a student at CCSF, is seriously interested in drama. He is enrolled in a broadcasting and can be heard on KCSF, Thursdays, 10 to 11 am.

Tony, 31, has had much experience in the theatre. He studied at the Estelle Harmon drama class in Los Angeles, where he met Michael Cole and Leigh Taylor-Young. Among many stage plays in which he has appeared are "Hatful of Rain" and "Hotel Paradiso."

He was directed by Walter Koenig, otherwise known as Chekov in the Star Trek series. He turned down a contract with Universal Studios because of artistic freedom.

TONY BECKET — Now in hit play.

Tony says of Zeke, "He is a complex character in the play. Nobody really understands him. Not even Ken Whalen, the author of the play, who really knew a "Zeke" in prison. However, that's because Zeke's a psychopath. Zeke is always tense, always nervous. He's happy one minute and is ready to kill the next. He's a paranoid who always thinks that people are out to kill him."

"The Ballad of Dangerous George" deals with prison life. The lead, George Jones, is a black man caught in the middle of a race riot between the Neo-Nazis and the Black Muslims. Zeke is the Neo-Nazi leader.

Of his current role, Tony says, "Trying to get up mentally for the part is very difficult. It takes a lot of effort to really feel the part of Zeke. When I'm through at night, I'm drained physically and mentally. It seems the more I play Zeke, the more I hate myself for being him. He's a very vicious person, which is almost the exact opposite of my own personality."

Tony advises would-be actors that "The acting profession is so insecure. It takes time and money to make it in the legitimate theatre. Acting is like being a machine. You must keep at it or you'll get rusty."

Tony won the role of Zeke against stiff competition. "I landed the part only because I was heard of in L.A. and because I was lucky. We had over 450 people audition for only twenty jobs in the play."

Judging from audience reaction he's a talented, creative artist.

"The Ballad of Dangerous George" is playing at the Artist Enterprise Theatre, 430 Geary Blvd.

Rams Racqueteers Beaten; Stan Woo Receives His First Loss

Lack of talent is not the reason that CCSF's tennis team has a losing record. Rather, Coach Diderichsen emphasizes, "It's our youth and lack of experience that's hurt us."

The present Ram team is a freshman group. That is, each member is in his first year of intercollegiate competition.

They are a loose spirited, confident group, and all reflect their coache's attitude about next season.

Terry McElhatton, a member of the Rams, said earnestly, "I know it sounds corny, but wait until next year. We're really going to be tough."

Teammate Robert Hughes added, "We'll all be back next year and we'll have more experience."

Unfortunately, the present isn't as bright as the future.

READY TO GO — Terry McElhatton prepares to serve against Merritt College.

Last Tuesday, at Merritt College, the Rams tallied up another loss, making their record 1-4 with one more match to play.

The big story of the day was that Stan Woo, CCSF's number one seed, lost for the first time.

Stan was topped by Merritt's Tim Nikcevich said, "Stan was a bit off today. He missed volleys that he'd normally make."

However, CCSF did push across two victories. The most prominent win was by Dexter Lee.

Though it took him three sets, Dexter won with relative ease. He lost the first set 4-6 because he says, "my serving was lousy."

Dexter's strategy in the ensuing sets was to "put the ball in play and let him make the mistakes."

Sticking to his game plan, Dexter started to warm up and breezed to an easy victory.

Women's Volleyball Win Streak Stopped by Tough DeAnza Team

Who says lightening doesn't strike twice? In this case the lightening is DeAnza College, which once again stopped another women's volleyball winning streak by defeating City last Wednesday afternoon 15-13, 10-15, 15-8.

In their earlier game in March DeAnza had broken City's twelve game string of wins with a 15-11, 11-15, 15-13 victory.

The first game was close, with the Dons just edging City 15-13. In the second game the Dons got off to a fast 8-2 lead, but City came back to hit ten straight points, taking the game at 15-10.

Both teams played evenly for the first few points of the final game. Then City took the lead at 5-3; but the Dons, who had a tremendous height advantage, began showing it with block shots and center spikes and took over the lead at 6-5. For all intents and purposes the game was over at this point. City never took the lead again and the Dons breezed in to a 15-8 win.

"We had trouble with the serves," said Coach JoAnn Hahn, "We also had trouble defending against DeAnza's center spikes."

The women's B team took to the courts next — which was their first mistake, since DeAnza fa failing to bring their B team, went with their varsity six. It turned out to be a repeat of Custer's last stand, with City playing the starring role.

DeAnza wasted little time, winning 15-3, 15-1. "It's rough to scrimmage a B team against an A team," said Hahn. Asked what the team has to work on, Coach Hahn said simply "Everything."

The co-ed team didn't have much success with Dons either. They also lost, 15-7, 10-15, 15-5. It was just a bad day for CCSF volleyball.

S.F. Teams Are Second Rate

Quick! When's the last time a San Francisco team took a major championship, in any sport? If you say the 1962 Giants or the 1966-67 Warrior basketball team, you're wrong.

The truth is that no San Francisco team has ever captured a major world championship. True, the aforementioned teams took the pennant and divisional titles, respectively, but they blew the championship series when they had the chance to take it. It's also true that the Oakland A's have taken two consecutive world championships, but they don't count as a San Francisco team.

It seems as if San Francisco has taken a page out of Avis' book — they are always finishing in second place. Take the Giants teams of the sixties. After their World Series loss to the Yankees in 1962, they proceeded to finish in second place for five straight years, from 1963 through 1968.

It looked better for the Giants in 1971, when they took the western divisional title, but they lost to the Pittsburgh Pirates, to finish second again in the National League.

How about the San Francisco 49ers? They started the '70s as if they were going to be strong contenders for many years to come. It looked like a major championship title was coming to the city in the form of a pigskin.

The Niners proceeded to take the western division three straight years, from 1970-1972. For three consecutive years, they lost to the Dallas team in the playoffs.

In 1972, they lost to Dallas even though they led by 10 points with less than two minutes to go in the game. San Francisco, it seemed, had done it again.

At least the Giants and Niners have made first place. The Warriors haven't even done that. The last title they took was back in 1966-67. Since then, they have finished second to the Los Angeles Lakers.

This year, they weren't any different than usual. The Warriors blew themselves right out of the playoffs when they lost the last five games of the season. Consequently they finished in second place.

It seems as if SF major league teams lack the incentive to be champions. They just don't seem to want to win.

San Francisco always seems to have the championship for talent, whatever league they are in. Yet, they are always bridesmaids.

The athletes blame the lack of attendance saying that not enough fans to come out and see them play. Yet, why should people come out and see these oversized, over-paid men if they are constantly going to finish second?

San Francisco teams lack the drive and sacrifice necessary to be winners. For example, the Warriors should never have lost. They were the best team on paper and seemed to have all they needed except the mental drive necessary to win.

So it appears that San Francisco is going to have to get used to being a second place city. After all, that's what its major league teams are — second place.

City Trackmen Prepare For Meets

Things seemed to be looking up for City's track men in past weeks, after they won their first meet of the year against San Mateo. But their sweet taste of victory didn't last long; they lost to Laney College in their next meet.

Laney, favored to succeed City as the state champions this year, manhandled the Rams 89-46. Of course when you face Laney you're rally facing James Robinson, who is probably the best runner in California.

At the Diablo Valley College Relays, City placed fifth in a fieldof 26 teams. The two mile relay team ran the second best time in the state this year with an 8:02. Randy Minix had a high jump of 6'7.

Thurmond Wells placed third in the triple jump with a 47'8. And Keith Farlow let loose with a 178 foot throw in the javelin to spear third place.

For the next five weeks City will be involved in the big meets such as: the Northern California Relays, the Golden Gate Conference Finals, Fresno Relays and the most important of all, the State Championship Meet at Bakersfield on May 25.

Baseball

In John Denver's hit song, "Sunshine," he sings, ". . . sunshine makes me high."

Apparently, the sun has the same effect on the Rams baseball team.

During Easter vacation, when "old sol" graced the Bay Area with his presence, the Ram nine went and "did their thing."

CCSF started its second round of league competition with an exciting doubleheader victory over Cabrillo College. The scores were 2-1 and 7-6.

City's record is now 2-1 after a 7-5 loss to San Mateo during that same week.

Swimming

The Ram swimming team lost in an inter-collegiate meet on April 6th. City came in behind Diablo Valley College, which swamped all other colleges, including CCSF, with a score of 658 team points. City finished a distant fourth with 230 team points.

Gymnastics Booming on Campus

Gymnastics, a sport that had been over shadowed by other major sports for years, seems to be coming into its own. It is considered by many people to be the most graceful and most beautiful sport to watch.

More and more students at City are getting interested in this sport. Back in 1968 there were only four classes. The number has since increased to six, each of the classes filled to capacity.

Olga Schneider, a former student at City and now an instructor in gymnastics, explains the sudden interest this way: "Media has been giving it coverage. You hear about it on TV and Radio. Gymnastics is also building up in Northern California."

CONCENTRATION — Ken Ho performs an L support on the rings.

STRETCHING OUT — Joan Vermilon is caught in the middle of her front walk over.

At the moment City does not have a men's gymnastic team competing intercollegiately. But Schneider and Norman Travis are in the process of getting a team together for next semester.

Susan Conrad, coach of the women's gymnastic team, is working with Schneider and Travis preparing their students for the gymnastic program to be presented on June 5 at the men's gym.

The program consists of events in uneven parallel bars, rings, side horse, free exercise and the high bar.

Kahn Gets Kanned After Only Ten Weeks

"I'm getting bombarded with publicity," said former KPIX sportscaster Milt Kahn in an exclusive interview. "Publicity has been incredible." But he's not bothered by what they say about him, just as long as they spell his name right.

After only ten weeks as the Bay Area's most talked about television personality, Superfan Milt is out of a job, and he doesn't know why. "It's all guess work," he said. "I think I was the best thing that ever happened to them. I certainly gave it 110 pe4cent effort!"

Milt was hired by KPIX under a firm one year contract, with an option for three years. He plans to resolve his financial situation with Westinghouse Broadcasting in the very near future, which could mean he will get an entire year's salary for ten weeks work.

"But I want to work," said Milt, who thinks sitting around collecting paychecks would be dull.

"My fan club can still continue," says the controversial commentator who views his future with optimism. "As far as where I'm going, I have no idea. I'm sure I'll do well." For now, he is enjoying his leisure time, "mostly playing tennis and playing damn well."

Socialist Pleads Political Views in Campaign Speech

"The tactics of the SLA can only do harm to the Revolutionary Left," according to Olga Rodriguez in a recent appearance before CCSF students.

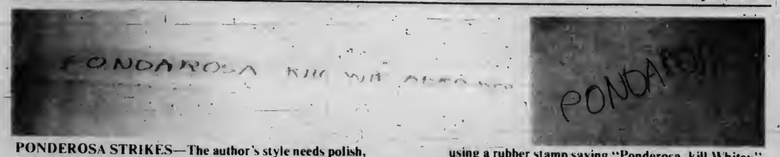
Ms. Rodriguez is the Socialist Workers party candidate for Governor of California. She feels that political kidnapping will only heighten right-wing hysteria against the Left.

The candidate takes issue with critics who say Socialism won't work in America. "What has capitalism done?" she asks, pointing out that America has exploding inflation, polluted cities and rivers, Watergate, Vietnam, and other ills that prove what capitalism has done to America.

Her party believes that the power in this country can only rest with the people, according to Rodriguez, and only when all the people acquire the right of self-determination and total control of their own communities will the many pressing problems be solved. "We need actions, not words, that the Democrats and Republicans have promised for years," she stressed.

"Americans have continuously seen their rights to freedom of choice and privacy eroded over the years and this wiretapping and CIA involvement in Domestic Affairs has got to stop," said Rodriguez.

She feels the priorities of America must be shifted to help the great numbers of disadvantaged people living in this country.



Rodriguez and the SWP are active in the struggle of Caesar Chavez' United Farm Workers Union.

Olga Rodriguez has long been active in the anti-war and Chicano movements.

She ended her speech with a plea: "Our campaign is an alternative and a struggle for the human rights of many and we need your help to strengthen and preserve these rights."

TOP STUDENT - Sophomore Anita Lutz won $250 as a runner-up in Bank of America's 1974 Community College awards finals for northern California. Lutz competed against students from 54 Community colleges to win the award in the technical-vocational field.

PONDEROSA STRIKES—The author's style needs polish, but his dialogue is to the point. Campus police say he is now using a rubber stamp saying "Ponderosa, kill Whitey".

"The Big One" Scrawls, Sribbles, Mystifies

A mad penman on a graffiti rampage has plagued campus authorities for over a month. Calling himself "Ponderosa" the prose bandit has left a trail of slogans, slurs, and racial epithets on the walls and in the men's rooms of several of the school's buildings.

EXPENSIVE HATE—The writing can't be erased, must be repainted.

CCSF security police report that the handwriting found in the Library, Science and Arts buildings, Cloud Hall, and the Men's gymnasium is the work of one person using a black felt pen.

The scribbler, who urges various forms of racial and sexual violence, spells poorly and is rarely coherent. But police have deciphered several references to the "Zehra" killings and to a .32 caliber revolver. They hope to catch and question him in this connection.

"Ponderosa," a name police guess to mean something like "The Big One," invariably chooses freshly painted surfaces for his literary efforts. He has also ruined 15 Library desks with his obscenities.

Campus construction workers complain that his activities have resulted in considerable expense to the college.

Police think Ponderosa may be a night student since most of his work has been discovered in the morning. If caught he will be charged with destruction of city property and expelled from City College.

Police ask that anyone with pertinent information notify them. Those wishing to avoid involvement are urged to phone anonymously.

Muckraking Newswoman Irritates Brass, Digs for News in Dual Role

"I don't cover fires" except when they are "socially significant" is what Peggy Stinnett told the fledgling reporters on a rainy April Fool's Day morning.

Stinnett covers Oakland City Hall and Board of Education for San Francisco's educational television station KQED, Channel 9 and for the Oakland Montclarion.

The Montclarion is not an "underground paper" but an "underdog paper" according to her. It is an independent newspaper and "may not get all the stories" but a "lot better stories," than the larger papers in the Bay Area.

"If people are informed they will react" said Stinnett at the CCSF press conference. She feels her "digging out the little things" is the reason the other newspapers in the area began to show an interest in what was happening in Oakland's city hall. "The media is imitative" is her reasoning.

After the Montclarion she rates the S.F. Examiner "better on news" than the S.F. Chronicle. However, the Chronicle is "more readable" with "lots of white space, good photographs" and "more readable good features in a lively visual presentation." Newspapers are "after all, a visual media."

While still working for the Montclarion she was asked by Oakland based KTVU, Channel 2, to be one of their newscasters. Although she was flattered, she took the job only on a "part-time basis" because "TV is a fickle situation."

Stinnett became a controversial newscaster, exposing "locking the gates" of a local park, the city's intention to sell the land occupied by a "rose garden" to "high rise developers."

With the aid of a certified public accountant she examined the city's ledgers to find "a $20 million surplus," instead of a "poor treasure" as had been claimed by the mayor.

The mayor's plans to give a $22 gift to each of the players on the Oakland A's baseball team, if they won the world series in 1972 was also exposed by her on Channel 2. This story cost her the job.

"People should keep their parks, and

Legal Election Costs $1.69 for Each Vote

Last semester's election cost City College and Associated Students $1.69 per vote.

Poll tenders were paid $ .99 for each student they saw vote during the two day student body elections.

Associated students dispersed $ .70 per voter to supply the city-donated voting machines.

According to Jay Patterson of the San Francisco Registrar of Voters, the city uses no more than two voting machines and four poll tenders for a voter-turnout of less than 400.

But the 359 City College voters utilized their choice of five machines watched over by ten paid attendants.

"The main thing about students," said Dean of Student Activities Vester Flanagan in defense of the high ratio of machines to personnel, "is that if a student has to wait to vote, then he won't. With five machines," he continued, "there would be no chance of students not voting because of lengthy lines."

Flanagan said poll tenders were paid to come from off campus to insure a "legal" election.

He feels that the $356 expense for poll tenders is more than justified to avoid a contested election. There have been charges of ballot box stuffing in the past, he said.

The $260 budgeted by AS council for donated voting machines is simply to cover transportation costs, said Flanagan.

Pentagon Missile Madness

Three cheers for the Pentagon. Our ever vigilant military planners, eagerly anticipating the failure of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT), are prepared to ask for 37 million bucks to build a brand new missile. Called the M-X, this little baby will be able to inflict megatons of megadeath on any two-bit nation that gets out of line.

Defense Secretary Schlesinger said recently, "We intend to pursue this new development at a very deliberate pace pending the outcome of the SALT negotiations."

That, missile lovers, is the writing on the wall. By now most of us realize that Ivan isn't likely to sign any treaties with a President headed for the unemployment line.

Besides, neither the American nor the Soviet militaries ever took this disarmament nonsense seriously. It gets in the way of an honest war.

The 37 million will go for desperately needed missile technology. The Defense Department wants a missile with a warhead that can zig-zag through radar screens. Currently, the best we can deliver is a Minuteman III which carries a mere three to six single megaton warheads. While the bombs can be independently targeted, they are vulnerable to those pesky anti-ballistic missiles.

Added to our current stock of close to 10,000 warheads, this newfangled contraption will greatly increase our kill power. We will sleep secure in the knowledge that we can, to quote Winston Churchill, "make the rubble bounce."

This modern convenience won't be on the market till around 1980. In the meantime, the poor thing doesn't have a name. After all, M-X? Choosing a good one won't be easy. The best have all been copywrited by men's prophylatic companies.

Dare we imagine an ICBM named "Zig-zag"?

Counseling Neglect Charged

Many students attending City College plan to continue their educations after graduation. But through ignorance, many find themselves enrolled in classes which are unacceptable for transfer to other schools.

This is a costly waste of time to the student whose financial situation is sometimes extremely limited. Many such students would never have enrolled in certain classes, had they been aware that credit for these courses is not transferable.

The guidance staff should make a special effort to ascertain a student's goal when he first applies to City College. The student should be made aware which courses will transfer whenever he makes out a new schedule.

By making sure the student is taking courses which he knows will transfer, the guidance staff will assure the student peace of mind and a greater awareness of where he stands in his studies.

Why Cut Drinking Age Limit?

If enough valid signatures are obtained by May 20, an initiative to lower the legal drinking age from 21 to 18 will appear on the November ballot.

The acceptance of this initiative by the voters would almost certainly cause complete chaos in our already disordered society.

Although 18 year-olds are legally adults for most purposes, some of them are not yet ready to accept the responsibility that goes with drinking. Many people under 21 years believe that drinking means getting drunk.

Our legislators should do more thinking before they introduce bills like this one. Anyone can see what would happen if more people were given access to alcohol. The number of drunk-drivers would undoubtedly increase, as would the rate of alcoholism. The state's crime rate would also rise.

Eighteen year-olds have adequate access to liquor and other beverages. Just about anyone can raid his old man's liquor cabinet.

Senate, Justice Push Halt To Raids on Police Data

A new legislative push in Washington may halt use of the police records that many companies now routinely consult to check out potential employees.

The Justice Department asked Congress this week for a tough law governing access to criminal data, and Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.), has asked for even stricter controls.

For at least the past decade, civil libertarians, workers for minority rights, and even some corporate recruitment specialists have urged that the use of police data be restricted to the police. But a Business Week magazine survey this week shows that many companies still send the names of some applicants to the police for a check against criminal files.

Companies that make heavy use of police data are gearing up to fight for continued access. Both the Justice Department and Ervin bills will be considered at hearings next month before the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, headed by Ervin.

Interest in the issue has been spurred by the progress on the nationwide, computerized central storehouse of criminal records, a federal-state data bank backed by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.

The bank will soon hold millions of pieces of criminal information. Ervin is alarmed at the 11,000 requests that currently flow each day into the Federal Bureau of Investigation for arrest and conviction information. He claims that many of these "find their way into credit, insurance, and other uses."

The proposed legislation limits to recent convictions the information local police can retrieve from the central data bank. Arrests not followed by convictions would be kept back, and individuals would have the right to see their own records and to correct mistakes.

Club Plans Evaluation

Free Association is now organizing "double bagging" teacher evaluations which they hope to publish and make available by fall registration.

The week-long evaluation survey begins May 13 and will be run entirely by students.

Association meetings are held each Wednesday at 3 pm in the work room of the Student Union building. Interested students may attend the meetings or call ext. 181 for more information.

THE GUARDSMEN

Dance Program Participation Up; Provides Exercise, Joy, Relaxation

Although the days of the Charleston, the Twist, the Mashed Potato, and even the Funky Chicken are gone, dance still lives on.

The dance program at City is a versatile potpourri of styles. One could learn square, folk, jazz, african, or even the lost art of tap dance.

Lene Johnson, head of the Women's PE Department, says "Dance is expanding tremendously. Take Modern Dance, for example. Modern dance is concerned with dance movements in which the person tries to express themselves.

"The dancers try to express how and what they feel through dance movements. It is a very stimulating, physically, mentally, and emotionally."

"Dancing is also a very good form of exercise," the instructor says. "Men and women with bad knees or backs, who aren't athletic enough to go out for football or basketball, find dancing is for them. True, it is not as physically tiring an activity as running track. However, it is very stimulating."

Johnson says, "Men are now breaking down old-fashioned attitudes. Before, and even today still, to a certain extent, men thought dancing was for sissies. Men thought it wasn't man-like to dance. However, nowadays we see more and more men in all facets of our dancing programs each semester.

"Men have found dancing relaxing them and helps relieve tensions and anxities better than a drink would."

One thing about dancing is that a student does not need prior experience. It would be helpful, but anyone can dance. All one needs is the ability to move and feel and he's all set.

Last semester, 80 students participated in a dance program. This year, there will be just as many students doing the same thing. The program is Friday May 3rd, and Saturday May 4th, starting at eight o'clock.

Letter to the Editor

Dear Editor,

I was very upset at the choice of two titles given to articles appearing in the last issue of the Guardsman.

The one that upset me the most was the title given to the article on William E. Goode. With all that Mr. Goode gave and accomplished for CCSF, I think he deserves the respect of being called Ex-AS President, not EX-PREXY.

...The other article and title that I thought was badly chosen was the article on the Blood Drive called "Dance, A Bloody Affair?" This makes the reader think that violence occurred at some dance.

It sure caught my eye, but when I found that it was about the Blood Drive and the dance to follow on Friday night, I was, figuratively speaking, "freaked out."

...Titles can "make or break" an article as far as getting interest.

However, I believe more thought and consideration should go into the choice of titles to make sure they are not in poor taste and that they do reflect what is in the article (ie not deceiving).

—Diane Batonides

Editor's Note: The Guardsman did not intend offense toward Mr. Goode or the blood drive. Our apologies.

Muckraking Reporter Explains Her Job in Student Interview

rose gardens" and should also know when the city plans to "give gifts to baseball players," was not a feeling shared by the A's owner, Charlie Finlay, the mayor of Oakland or the "top brass" of Channel 2. "I was a thorn in their side" is her opinion. Using her hand like a knife, she pulled it across her throat to describe her firing.

"Woman who shook city hall silenced" was the headline the Examiner gave the story. They were wrong. She was asked to work for KQED soon after the incident. Stinnett has continued to "go out on a story" and collect facts and report them so "people are informed."

Dressed in a well-tailored pink jersey dress, she spoke animatedly of her experiences on various newspapers as well as the two television stations.

Stinnett came to the bay area from "Ventura in southern California." She is now an afficionado of this area. So much so she believes we should separate northern from southern" California. An idea held by many other northern Californians.

After spending two years at U.C. Berkeley, she left school to work for the San Jose News, a job she kept for one year.

Her next job with the Richmond Record Herald was short lived. The printing was so bad "I couldn't read my own stories."

What does she think of tough city editors? "The city editor" of the Post Enquirer was an "s.o.b." but she liked him "because I learned." The job was not easy, he was not an easy man to satisfy, but it was "the greatest way to learn." If this articulate and honest reporter is an example, perhaps all city editors should be "s.o.b's."

Short, dark haired Stinnett doesn't like the term "objective reporting. Balanced news" is required because you must "give both sides" of a story. "If you just give one side, the reader doesn't know what the controversies are."

To keep the "public informed" is the job of a reporter. To do that you must give them "in depth stories."

Her advice to aspiring journalists is "Get the facts... You're not writing War and Peace, you're communicating."

Although she "turns into a pumpkin" at the end of her working day, she doesn't "feel threatened. Part of being liberated is doing what you want to do." Stinnett is doing that. She is "opening the gates" and letting "the people in."

Stinnett has done reporting on the Patty Hearst kidnapping case and related events involving the Symbionese Liberation Army. Peggy can understand that the SLA wants to provide for the people. She cannot understand why they use such tactics as kidnapping, etc. "If the SLA's goals are to feed and help the people," said Stinnett. "That's good, but I don't approve of anyone killing or kidnapping."

Nostalgia

The year was 1959 and big things were happening around campus. Balboa Pool had just opened, and their were plans to start a coed swimming team. In other sports, Casey Stengel was in the last year of managing the mighty New York Yankees.

Interest in the competition for coveted title of Miss San Francisco was beginning to wane. Although previous holders of the title were Lee Meriwether and Barbara Eden, many women thought that they would never get anywhere with the title.

Associated Students elections were being held as usual. However, in the Fall '59 election, ten percent of the student body turned out to elect officers. That's about three times as many people as voted in this past election.

Sid Phelan led the Rams to the Big Eight Conference crown. Phelan, who started in '55, lead the team to a first championship ever for City College in basketball.

There was a contest to see who was the ugliest man on campus. The sororities were going strong, with a dance every two weeks. The dances always had a good turnout.

Johnny Mathis, graduate of Washington High, was one of the big artists on the pop scene. Also, Buddy Holly, the Big Bopper and Ritchie Valens, all rock stars, died in a fiery plane crash.

Ben-Hur won 11 Academy Awards, the biggest amount of awards ever given to a picture.

Finally, on television, 77 Sunset Strip was a big hit. Ed "Kookie" Byrnes visited the Guardsman.

Love and Happiness Are Awaken; Spring is On Time

There are many signs of spring around the campus, although the lingering showers dampened a few students' hopes of it's ever showing up.

Botany and horticulture classes have come alive with some creative gardening. The herb garden behind the Educational Services Building has been revitalized. There is a wide variety of herbs that would enable any gourmet cook to season seven-course meals for a whole year.

The best places to find the newness of love include the chair right next to you in class (providing it is occupied with a member of the sex most attractive to you), the Student Union Bldg., the lunch room, and any place the sun is shining.

Spring is here and the evidence is popping up all over campus. No matter what man does to his environment, spring is always on time, bringing with it a rebirth of all that is living.

The most evident sign, however, lies in the glazed stare of students struck with spring fever. These people seem to be carried around by the momentum they accumulated last semester and the anticipation of the glorious summer just around the bend of final exams. Spring fever seems to weaken the resistance to Cupid's flying arrow. It's time once again for love to awaken the depths of so many hibernating souls.

On the center's bulletin board is a list of places in the community that may be of interest to women.

The Women's Action Committee meets there every Wednesday at 11 am.

Women's Volleyball Team Wins; Ready for Southern Tourney

The women's volleyball team wrapped up their season last week with a 15-7, 15-3 win over their cross town rivals, University of San Francisco. City finished the season with a 3-2 record, which was far off the pace of last year, when they went undefeated.

But last week's win was important. It gave the team the chance to try a new play, which will be an important factor if they are to win in the San Bernardino Tournament which starts today. Nineteen junior colleges will participate in this tournament, most of the teams coming from Southern California.

In the USF game City was able to experiment with a 5-1 play. "The 5-1 play is where we have just one setter, this allows us to have double blockers which we can use against the strong teams," said coach JoAnn Hahn. "Against the weaker teams we'll use a 4-2."

Coach Hahn had to go to a 5-2 play since the teams City has played recently have all had a height advantage, which allows them to get more spikes and block shots.

The play seems to have worked well against USF, but City has beaten the Dons for the last four years.

BIG EIGHT — Front Row: (11) Nina Reyer, (13) Sylvia Louie, (15) Karen White, (23) Paula Hocker.
Back Row: (14) Doreen Suslow, (22) Chris Zagorewicz, (12) Captain Barbara Hattori, (21) Rosa Chase.

"We've played USF for the last four years and we've always beaten them," said Hahn. "The team's concentration was better, along with coverage, but they still need cleaning up for the big tournament."

City is relatively short for volleyball. Its tallest girl, Paula Hocker, is 5'7-1/2". This is a disadvantage when they come up against the taller teams. "We always have midgets," said Hahn. "They just have to think tall. The real advantage to being small is that you can get the low shots."

In the DeAnza game both Hocker and Karen White showed great ability to block shots. Both of them have tremendous spring in their legs.

Tournament play begins today and will finish on Saturday. It takes only two losses to be eliminated from the tournament. If City is to win the tournament it must stay in the winners bracket.

If it wins all its matches, it will play seven matches and get long rest periods between games.

But with one loss it will have to play eleven games in some cases playing three back to back contests with less rest time between matches.

Dan Sui Breezes to Victory At First CCSF Archery Match

"It was nice to see so many new faces." This was the reaction of Mrs. Ardeen Domecus, supervisor of the "Pre-Special Edition Archery Shoot."

Mrs. Domecus was pleasantly surprised by the fact that forty individuals participated in the event.

The match was held on April 24 on the CCSF archery green. It was the first of what is hoped to be a biannual affair.

The shoot was sponsored by the City College Recreational Association and was won with relative ease by Daniel Sui, who scored fifty out of a possible sixty points.

In second place was Farley Fong, who finsihed with a total of forty-six points.

True, the winning margin was relatively small, but Danny explains, "The point spread is deceptive. Even a point spread of two is pretty big."

Danny developed an interest in archery in high school but says, "I was only messing around then. It wasn't until I came to City that I really got into it."

"I never had any archery instruction until I came to City," says Danny. "I took formal lessons here from Mrs. Johnson and Mr. Vespa."

In addition to being a very good archer, Danny is one of the student supervisors of CCSF's archery program.

The program is one of many sponsored by the Recreational Association.

"The Recreational Association is an organization which encourages intramural and intercollegiate activity in all sports," he says. "Our problem is that we don't have enough people who are interested. Any student can become a member of the RA. All they have to do is sign up with the teacher in charge of the sport they're interested in."

The RA is sponsoring another "shoot."

The "Special Edition Shoot" will be held this Saturday at Pacifica, from 10 3.

Saturday's affair will differ from last week's contest in that it will be intercollegiate.

Approximately sixty archers from twenty colleges are expected to participate.

Freshman Only Member of Ram Swim Team to Make State Championships

With the State Swimming Championships coming up this week, the Ram swimming team seems to be going down for the third and last time. The Rams will send only one member of the team to the State finals.

Wigbert Sy, a 17 year old freshman, will represent City College in the 100 and 200 meter backstroke.

The swimming team did so poorly in only getting one man to the finals because Ram Swim Coach Curt Decker says, "Standards are tough. To qualify for the State meet, one has to beat the time set up by the Community College coaches in the state. Only 16 swimmers and divers qualified this year because the standards to get in are so high."

The Ram swimmers finished this year in last place in the Golden Gate Conference, beating only Contra Costa College.

Decker says there are several reasons why the team did so poorly. "The first reason is CCSF does not have the talent. No San Francisco high school has its own pool. City College, the largest single community campus in the country, does not have a pool of its own. Consequently, we have to share it with the public, which cuts down on the time in practice. All the other schools have their own pools, so they have really unlimited time in which to practice. We have only two hours in the morning.

"Also, because no high school has a pool, there aren't enough people who really get interested in swimming. Kids figure why should they have to share with the public? It is just too much hassle and too much trouble to go out for the team."

The prospect for the Rams doesn't look too bright. There will be only one veteran, Sy, returning to next year's squad.

Coach Decker has some ideas on how to improve the team situation: "The big thing I would do is to try and get our own pool. This would let us practice without the hassle of the public and we would just have more time to practice. Also, I would let the high school kids use it. This way, maybe they would be motivated to swim and to go out for the team. Third, I would try and start a swim club.

"The kids would then be able to use the pool all year round. Competition, hopefully, would make them want to go out and break a record."

Coach Decker feels his suggestions will probably go unheard, however. He has been at City for nine years and says he has been promised a pool every year.

Sports Roundup

Softball Team Loses 8-7

In a hard fought game City's women's softball lost their opener of the season against Contra Costa College 8-7.

City was leading 7-1, going into the bottom of the sixth when Contra Costa came up with six runs to tie the game then came up with the winning run in the seventh to pull it out.

Although City lost the game they had some great showings from the players. Third basewoman Angie Ippolito and catcher Brenda Jerguson played brilliant defense. The hitting honors went to Anita Patel who had a 4 for 4 day.

Baseball

After a fast start in the season, the Ram Nine has faltered and lost two out of three games.

The team suffered a 9-3 defeat by Chabot and a 9-2 loss to San Mateo. It won a 5-4 victory over Laney.

City now has a 3-3 second-half record with ten games remaining.

"Our pitching hasn't done much and our defense hasn't been very tight," Coach Ernest Domeus said.

Members of Womens PE Department Hold "Dance Through Time"

The Womens PE Department is presenting a program this week end featuring students of various dance classes.

Called "A Dance Through Time," the presentation will feature folk, tap, jazz and other types and styles of dancing.

Program Coordinator Melia Furgis says "We have more than 150 people in the dance program. This is the biggest dance activity of this kind in the history of the college.

"The program has expanded from a studio presentation to a production being put on in the Little Theatre."

Last night, various members of dance classes in local high schools were to see the show. Today, at 11 am the dancers will put on a one hour free show in the Little Theatre.

Dance Through Time will be presented on Friday & Saturday at 8 pm. General admission is $1.00 or 50 cents with an A.S. card.

Campus Afro Studies Courses Flourish in Spite of U S Decline

Black Studies programs at universities across the country started with great enthusiasm in the late 60s, but now according to a Newsweek article these programs are suffering from student disinterest, irrelevance of courses, and generally low academic standards.

City College's Afro-American Studies department isn't suffering from any of the problems sighted in the Newsweek article, according to Glenn Nance chairman of that department.

There are 23 Afro-American courses offered in the City College catalogue, but only 19 listed in the class schedule.

Nance claims that the instructors have no trouble in filling their classes. He is planning to add another section to his black history class.

A slight drop in enrollment in Nance's department was attributed by him to the over all drop in enrollment for the college.

He was unable to give the number of students enrolled in his department's courses. Assistant Dean of instruction Shirley Hoskins, wouldn't give the figure for publication because "it would be misleading," she said.

After some investigation the number of students was found to be 665.

A random check of one black studies class with 17 registered students showed only two students in attendance.

Instructor John Morefield was concerned with the lack of white students in black studies courses. He thought that most white students just skip over the Afro-American studies section in the catalogue.

He also felt that most counselors fail to encourage students to investigate the offerings of black studies.

Nance commented that the original concept of black studies was to have courses such as Black History eventually combine with U.S. History.

According to Nance, flexible scheduling is necessary; "everything has to flex with the times." "Gay liberation, for example, could be a legitimate field of study," he said.

Marshal Kilduff of the San Francisco Chronicle, stated in a recent article that the problems plaguing these universities were not found at universities and colleges in the bay area.

On the contrary, Kilduff said the programs in the bay area have shifted to a more academic format and are drawing increasing numbers of students, both black and white.

ABOUT FACES—When completed, the mural will be 173 feet long and 16 feet high. The visages will be made from plaster casts of students, faculty, and administrators. See any friends?

Sculpture Deck, Bas Relief Mural To Ornament New Cloud Hall East

A $100,000 "Sculpture Deck", and a huge bas relief mural have been approved by the CCSF Works of Art Committee.

Working in conjunction with the Visual Arts Committee of the City Arts Commission and several professional designers, the group intends to include the projects in the new Cloud Hall East.

The deck, designed by architect Jaques Overhoff, will consist of a 30 x 30 foot patio bordered by four vertical concrete panels which, in turn, will be surrounded by green planted areas.

It will contain an assortment of colored, concave and convex free form sculptures designed to encourage lounging and enhance a social environment.

The mural will be a mass design of plaster cast human faces.

Student Elections To Begin Tuesday

City College voters will go to the polls next Tuesday and Wednesday to pick an Associated Student President and Vice-President and 15 Student counsel members for next semester.

Five polling machines will be set up in the upper level of the Student Union Building and will be open from 9 am to 3 pm.

Names of some 37 nominees for the 17 positions open were approved by Election Commissioner Neatria B. Kelley and Associate Dean Vester Flanagan on May 1.

Winners will serve for one semester.

Candidates for the two top offices must have completed 24 units in no more than four semesters, and have a 2.0 grade average. Ten units must have been earned in the previous semester.

Council candidates must also have a 2.0 average, and have completed ten units last semester.

Election winners must purchase Student Union cards within five days of the first Council meeting.

To be placed on the polls, nominees presented election officials with petitions signed by 15 registered or active Student Union members.

Some persons were nominated by campus political parties or named in proposed slates. Others submitted their own names as independent candidates.

Presidential and vice-presidential candidates are restricted to a $50 campaign spending limit. The [illegible] other offices is $25.

Voters must have either an Associated Student membership card or a CCSF picture identification.

Reservoir Plans Bring Mixed News to Parkers

After years of discussion and planning, construction to convert the south reservoir on Phelan Avenue into a student parking lot is expected to begin in April 1975, according to Associate Director of Facilities and Planning Victor Graff.

It will take two years, says Graff, to complete construction which calls for resurfacing of the water department reservoir. The present floor is not thick enough to support cars.

Once resurfacing begins, the 750-space parking lot in the north reservoir will remain cleared of cars until 1977 when the project is completed, Graff states. There are no plans for alternative parking areas during this period.

"We assume people will leave their cars at home and take the Muni," he said.

Designs have also been drawn for overpasses to be built across Phelan and Ocean Avenues to minimize the hazard to students who must cross those streets.

Construction plans for both the parking lot and proposed overpasses are now in the laps of the Public Utilities Commission who will coordinate efforts of the water department, Muni, BART, public works traffic engineers and City College to make the project a reality.

It is not yet known whether the overpasses will be included in the April 1975 project or scheduled for later construction.

Victor Graff also announced that the Department of Public Works has inspected lighting and safety conditions of Phelan Avenue. Their report to Graff states, "In order to improve the sight distance of pedestrians using the crosswalks, we will install pavement bars at the crosswalks to prohibit parked vehicles from encroaching on the existing red curbs."

The department states that it will not be installing flashing warning lights as Graff had suggested previously, because it feels visibility at the Phelan crosswalks is adequate in the evenings.

THE PIT - When construction workers begin to resurface the south reservoir for parking (right), cars will be prohibited from the 750-space parking lot at left. For student reaction, see page 2.

Student to Indict Cops With Policy Of Harassment Of Gay Community

A City College psychology major is preparing a class action suit against the San Francisco Police Department on behalf of the city's gay community.

Dennie Van Horn, 29, told the Guardsman "There seems to be a definite policy of harassment" by the police against the gay population.

Van Horn was arrested on Castro Street between 18th and Market. He was charged with public drunkenness, resisting arrest, obstructing the sidewalk, and failure to identify himself. The two latter charges have been dropped.

A companion and Van Horn were seated on a bench in Castro Street's gay strip when they were approached by two patrolmen. He admits they had been drinking, but denies that they were drunk.

The student claims he and his friend were told to stand up and identify themselves. Van Horn says when he and his friend asked for the officers badge numbers, their arms were twisted behind their backs and they were arrested.

Van Horn claimed, "In every town I've lived in, the police have stepped up their activities against homosexuals at election time." He feels politicians want to be able to claim they've made efforts to "clean up" gay ghettos. Police, the student says, make conscious efforts to force homosexuals off the streets and into bars.

In preparing his case, Van Horn says he's heard rumors of an "Operation Whitewash", an ongoing campaign of police harassment. He says plainclothes police enter gay bars where they arrest people for soliciting. Sometimes, Van Horn noted, undercover cops accompany gays to their homes to make drug arrests.

"The police had no real reason to arrest us," Van Horn said.

He is withholding his legal complaint pending the outcome of the hearing on May 13.

Reservoir Parkers State Views on Losing Parking

A random sampling of reservoir-parking students revealed a general attitude of dissatisfaction over the inconvenience parking lot construction will cause.

Freshman Russel Yick says he expects to be late for class every day because of the parking problem caused by construction. "I don't think you can ever find a parking space."

"I come from San Rafael," said first semester student Clarice Nesbit. "It would take too much time for me to take a bus to school so I guess I'll have to look for parking outside the reservoir."

"I live as far from BART as I live from school," Richard Holsworth commented. "My wife and I both attend school here and we have to drop our kid off at a babysitter in the mornings. We'll have to drive our car to school."

Bonnie Anderson goes straight to work from school on some days so predicts she will ride BART half the time and drive her car on work days. "The best thing for me," she said, "is to find a boyfriend who will drive me to school and pick me up afterwards."

"I'll ride a bus," Jim Brady stated. "It's useless to search for parking."

"I don't know what I'm going to do," exclaimed Elaine Sicabaig, "but I won't take the Muni!"

Question: Is Patty Hearst really with it, or is she being coerced by the SLA?

Antoinette Candelaria—Gen. Ed.
Patricia Hearst is a mystery to me. It always sounds as if she is reading from a script, and the tonality of her voice in the later tapes is monotone. She sounds like a smackhead.

Mark Brosam—Journalism/Film
I'm convinced Patty Hearst was immediately brainwashed by the SLA as soon as she was abducted. She probably believes what she and the SLA are doing is right and in the interests of the people. It's a scary thought—brainwashing.

Carla Perella—Poli. Sci.
Patty Hearst could be willing, but I feel she is being forced to say and do whatever the SLA wants her to do.

Ron Bissic—Photography
I really don't know. What I'd like to find out is if she's still alive. All those tapes could have been made ahead of time.

Sue O'Connor—Journalism
That's a very difficult question as well as a controversial question. I get the feeling that she really is being kidnapped, and so I tend to think she has a gun pointed at her back at all times.

John Carmazzi—Philosophy
I don't think that Patty Hearst is really in with the SLA. I can't see anybody making such a drastic change of lifestyle in so short a period. She must be either playing along by their rules or she is being forced to do and say the communiques and bank robbery.

Letter to the Editor

Dear Editor:

On behalf of the members of this English 1A class, we wish to object strongly to the article in your March 21st edition of the Guardsman, entitled "Babe bares bod for big bread."

At a time when women are struggling for equal rights and opportunities, your article suggests that college-educated women, rather than compete with men for the available jobs, may simply use their bodies instead of their intellect to earn a livelihood.

While we recognize the rights of your editorial staff to print articles which could be deemed interesting for the student population, we must express our disagreements with this article, as it purports to depict college women in an offensive manner.

To suggest that college-educated women consider being nude encounter hostesses to earn a living is not in keeping with the goals, aspirations and ambitions of the majority of women students.

We have nothing against women who wish to go into this line of work, but we take offense when a college newspaper publishes an article recommending it as a viable alternative for college women.

Sincerely,
Lucy C. Pastrana

Editor's Note: Where's your sense of humor? Most of our readers recognized the writer's tongue-in-cheek style. Closer reading of the article will support that this was simply an interview with a nude encounter hostess who expressed her own views of the profession. The Guardsman certainly didn't intend to endorse this line of employment for women.

Clinic Offers Part-Time Doctor in Pilot Program

Sitting in a doctor's office can be a gruesome experience. The tedious waiting and mounting apprehension often discourages the ailing patient from receiving medical treatment.

Though this may be the case at many medical offices, City College student health clinic is different.

Located in S190, the student health clinic is a relaxed medical center specializing in the treatment and education of young adults. Public health nurse Barbara Cabral claims, "City College students are at the age where they want to learn more about themselves in order to stay healthy. Therefore, we try to educate each student about medical problems rather than just treat them."

The clinic is part of a pilot program aimed at organizing a permanent medical facility for the benefit of students. Formerly an advice and referral unit, it is now expanding to offer treatment.

"We want to keep the students in class," explains Cabral. "With Doctor Donaldson, our new MD, Doctor McPhee, and the added interest of our students, there is a good chance the Department of Public Health will continue to allocate funds and personnel to our clinic."

The program features a mental health program, counseling, vocational rehabilitation, a general medical clinic, and a women's clinic.

Every Wednesday afternoon the clinic specializes in women's health. "We try to encourage women to use our women's health screening whether they are sexually active or not," says Cabral. "We have facilities for pap smears, VD check-ups and contraceptive counseling.

"Too many women have to leave school because of unwanted pregnancies and we would like to help the problem."

The student health clinic has a congenial atmosphere dedicated to helping the City College student and the staff encourages all students to use the facility when needed. Doctors are available on Monday, Wednesday and Friday mornings, but the clinic is open daily from 9 am to 5 pm.

Venereal Disease Days Slated

It affects people in all walks of life — the prostitute and the housewife; the boy in Vietnam and the girl next door; the homosexual and the heterosexual; the rich and the poor; the professional man and the laborer; the black and the white, yellow, brown, or red.

"It" is Venereal Disease, primarily Syphilis (pox, bad blood, siff, and Old Joe) and Gonorrhea (clap, strain, a dose, and the drip). Whatever you call it, VD is an epidemic that strikes someone in the United States every 15 seconds ... 4 victims every minute! Last year in San Francisco alone there were at least 14,891 reported cases of VD; hundreds more were never counted. Nationally, the picture is similar — over 700,000 reported cases.

TRANSMISSION

Venereal diseases are spread by people who already have them. Syphilis and Gonorrhea are transmitted from person to person by sexual intercourse or by close body contact involving the sex organs, mouth, and rectum.

The brganisms causing these diseases die almost immediately when exposed to light and air away from the warm moist areas of your body. This makes it virtually impossible to get Syphilis or Gonorrhea from public toilets, doorknobs, drinking cups, or eating utensils.

SYPHILIS

The first sign of syphilis is a painless sore called a chancre (pronounced shanker). In a woman, it can be in or near the vagina. In a male, it may appear on the penis.

In either, the sore can sometimes be on the lips, in the mouth, or around the rectum. It usually appears two to six weeks after exposure to the infected person, may not be noticeable, and will disappear in a few weeks more.

Two to six months later, there may appear a rash on any part of the body, sores in the mouth, sore throat, or a fever. Again, these signs disappear.

After years without any treatment, syphilis can destroy brain cells, ravage the spinal cord, or damage the heart and blood vessels. It can drive a victim insane, paralyze, cripple or even kill.

GONORRHEA

Gonorrhea symptoms in a male may appear in three to five days, and include a painful, burning sensation when he urinates and a yellow-white discharge from the penis. One out of five show no symptoms.

In females, four out of five may show no symptoms. One out of five may have a vaginal discharge. Right now there are at least two million people walking around with gonorrhea, and most of them don't even know it.

Without treatment it causes sterility by damaging the male's sperm ducts or the female's fallopian tubes. It can also lead to a crippling form of arthritis, meningitis, or heart disease.

HISTORY STILL REPEATS ITSELF

Syphilis and Gonorrhea have been around a long time. Their victims include Caesar, Cleopatra, Napoleon, Cassanova, and John Keats — all had Gonorrhea; and Henry VIII, Oscar Wilde, Vincent Van Gogh, Hitler, Mussolini, and Al Capone who had Syphilis.

In modern society VD can be prevented by the use of prophylactics (condom, skin, rubber, etc.) VD can easily be diagnosed by a blood test (for Syphilis) and a smear or culture test (for Gonorrhea). It can be treated with penicillin or other drugs. Many clinics, including the SF City Clinic at 250 Fourth Street, will diagnose and treat you for free.

The Student Health Service will sponsor VD Awareness Days at City College, May 13-15.
From 10 am to 2 pm Monday, there will be information booths at the flag pole (between Cloud Hall and the Science Building); by the cafeteria, and by the Arts building.
A VD film festival will be held on Tuesday and Wednesday in C245.

Student Handbook to Aid Newcomers

A booklet designed to help new students with orientation to the City College campus is being compiled by a group of concerned students.

The booklet, called Student Survival Manual, deals with problems a student might encounter on campus.

The manual is scheduled to come out in the fall. It will be distributed free to all new students.

The group putting the manual together is headed by Tom Ray, a student, and Barbara Rosenthal, faculty advisor. There are approximately 23 students working on the project.

Ray explained that the booklet is being written from a student's point of view." We go through the lives of the students; the problems they may encounter.

"The manual will help students understand and possibly avoid common student problems."

Campus Selects Top Hit Songs

What's the number one song on the campus? It's not Maria Muldaur's Midnight at the Oasis, or the Soul Train Theme. According to KCSF's music survey, the Main Ingredient's Just Don't Wanna Be Lonely, is numero uno.

The survey is a new feature that the Broadcasting Department is putting together. It asks people to name their favorite songs. Then, KCSF's Publicity Department gathers the figures and determines how popular a certain song is.

According to Terry McElhatton, co-publicity director, more than 100 people participated in the latest survey. "However, we would like to get more people to participate," he said.

The survey is conducted in the Student Union Building, Statler Hall, and the lobby of the New Arts Building.

Students wanting more information can call McElhatton or James Cross, of the City College Radio Publicity Department, 587-7272, ext. 444.

Here are the leading hits on the latest KCSF Music Survey:

TITLE	ARTIST
Just Don't Wanna Be Lonely	Main Ingredient
TSOP (Soul Train Theme)	MFSB
Bonnie and the Jets	Elton John
No More Mister Nice Guy	Alice Cooper

Mockingbird	Carly Simon
Thanks For Saving My Life	Billy Paul
Midnight At the Oasis	Maria Muldaur
Sunshine On My Shoulder	John Denver

Nostalgia

Sock hops were the big thing around school, and a cat was square if he didn't have his chinos or his white bucks on. The year was 1955, and many things were buzzing around campus.

In campus news, Ralph Hillsman, who is now Dean of Students, was appointed the Dean of Student Activities. Harry Buttimer, who resigned as CCSF president two weeks ago, was a business education instructor here. Buttimer and his wife won the Northern California Tennis title at Golden Gate Park.

In sports, Sid Phelan, who is also leaving after this semester, was hired to be the new basketball coach.

In baseball, the Brooklyn Dodgers finally captured a World Series championship, defeating the mighty New York Yankees.

The Ram football team renewed its annual rivalry with the College of San Mateo. This contest between the two schools always started with pre-game pranks, such as painting the Ram mascot blue. It seemed tradition was alive and well on the campus.

Second Place Finish for Women Gymnasts in JC Tournament

The women's gymnastic team wrapped up their season with a second place finish in the Community College Gymnastics Championships that was held April 20th, at Cosumnes River College.

Host team, Cosumnes River, won the tournament for the third straight year with 167.05 points, only 28 ahead of City, which had 138.10; and American River College finished third with 117.95. City's second place finish marked the third consecutive year they have finished in second place.

Some members of the team were not able to attend the meet, Coach Sue Conrad said. Also the San Francisco junior and high schools lack of facilities for gymnastics which would allow students to come to City with some gymnastic background, she said.

"If we had had all of our team there we might have won," said Coach Conrad. "All of the schools that placed have high schools feeding in gymnastic students which builds for a strong team. We have to work three times as hard to place."

At the beginning level Florence Wong took first place in the balance beam with Angie Dawson taking third. For Ms. Dawson it was just the start, as she also placed fifth in the parallel bars and took a fourth in both the vaulting and the floor exercise, to finish third all round at the beginning level.

Juanita Garcia was number one in the vaulting, with her teammate Sarah Rodgers taking a fifth. Lisa Valencia came home with first in the vaulting at the intermediate level, while Mila Salazar took second on the uneven bars. Lori Kaplan placed in all four events at the advance level, to take third overall.

Lori won first place on the balance beam, she then took a pair of second place finishes in the vaulting and the floor exercise. She capped the day with a third place finish on the uneven bars.

This championship meet not only marked the end of the season for the team, but it also was the last meet for seven of the women gymnasts. They are: Leslie Brooks, Sue Galassi, Lori Kaplan, Phyllis Quon, Lisa Valencia, Florence Wong and Angel Dawson.

"We'll be losing a good portion of our team, but there should be some students coming from high schools," said Conrad adding, "Mila Salazar will be the team's outstanding gymnast."

Coach Conrad will begin working with the new team in the fall semester, to prepare them for the Spring season, when they once again try to capture that elusive first place trophy.

Men and Women Fencers Take Team Honors in Napa

Once again City's Fencing team proved to be the best junior college fencing team in California. Both the men's and women's teams took first place in the Northern California Intercollegiate Fencing Association tournament three weeks ago at Napa College. Four schools — Monterey Peninsula, West Valley College, Napa and City — competed.

TOP WOMEN FENCER & Dolores Hong took a first place in the Women's Foil event.

For the last seven years, City has dominated in fencing among junior colleges. In the tournaments with the four-year schools (such as UCLA, Arizona, and Air Force), City has always been able to place in the top seven.

The Winners

In the Women's foil, Dolores Hong took first, Jessica Conn, second and Pamela Lee, fifth. All three women along with Marvillee Yee then won the women's team title. This tournament marked the end of the season for the women.

The men's team then duplicated the women's performance by taking the team title and the individual championships. Ko Hoi won the men's foil event; his teammates, Ceasar Ching and Robert Chiu, placed 5th and 6th respectively.

"City is best..."

The man behind CCSF's champions is Maestro Ferenc Marki. "City is the best junior college fencing team in California," he said. "Our record proves it.

"The big help comes from the women's PE department and the Associated Students, who have given us the money to support the program and the traveling expenses for the team."

Next year the Fencing Association will try to organize a nation wide tournament to determine the best team in the country.

Sports Roundup

City Team Loses to Chabot, 5-4

The good news is that Stan Woo, Mario Guzman, Robert Hughes, and Dexter Lee won their singles matches. The bad news is that the rest of the team lost.

In each team competition nine matches are played; six singles and three doubles. The victories by the aforementioned gentlemen made the score CCSF 4; Chabot 5.

This loss concluded the regular season for the Ram racqueteers. They ended their season with a 1-5 record.

On Friday, April 19, CCSF participated in the Round Robin playoffs. In Round Robin play one defeat eliminates a player from further competition.

City received its first loss in the first round.

The conquerer of the Rams was, once again, Chabot. This time, however, Chabot was not as lenient. They beat the Rams without conceding a single victory.

Though team competition is over, there's still a lot more tennis to be played.

Track

It's the time of year again when people get blisters on their feet and cramps in their legs. It's time again for the Bay-to-Breakers race.

The 64th annual Bay-to-Breakers will be run on May 19th. The race, sponsored by the Examiner, will feature up to five thousand runners.

Champion Ken Moore will show up to defend his title. Moore, who has run in the Olympic Games, will compete against some of the best distance runners in the world.

However, the majority of the participants will be out to see if they can complete 7.8 mile course.

The race starts at 10 am at the foot of Howard and the finish line is at the Great Highway at Ocean Beach.

The winner will get an all-expense paid trip to Sydney, Australia, to compete in a similar race held there.

City's Track team sent ten representatives to the Bakersfield meet, but only Thurmond Wells was able to place high in his event. Wells took fourth in the long jump with a 48'1.

Boxing

For the past 25 years Coach Roy Diderichsen has supervised the "City College Boxing Championships."

This semi-annual event resumes on Wednesday night, May 22, at 7:00, in the men's gym.

Ten bouts are scheduled. The weight qualifications range from 125 pounds and up.

Anyone in the school is eligible to participate in the tournament. Unfortunately, the deadline for submitting applications is past.

However, interested parties can keep the event in mind and can get in touch with Coach Diderichsen for next semester's tournament.

Is Winning Really Important?

Grantland Rice, famous sports writer, once wrote, "It matters not if you win or lose, but how you play the game."

It appears that the value of these words diminishes with each passing year.

Society has, instead, replaced them with a "winning is everything" attitude.

A few months ago, CBS's "Sixty Minutes" featured a story on a little league football team in Florida.

CBS filmed the team during practice, playing games, and at the conclusion of the games.

The treatment of the players by their coach was appalling.

He badgered the youngsters when they made mistakes, and was especially brutal when the team lost.

The coach called his players "stupid," "clumsy," "sissies" and other names that can't be printed.

Unfortunately, this type of behavior is not restricted to little league football coaches. Such behavior has been demonstrated by coaches in every sport and on every conceivable level of competition.

This "must win" attitude seems to be contagious, for parents of players have also been known to castigate their offspring for below average performances on the field.

When the sport is presented to the players in this manner, when winning becomes everything, it affects their perspective and attitude toward the game.

The participants are no longer able to enjoy themselves. The joy they once had while playing is replaced by pressure to do well. For the kids know that if they falter on the field, they'll get hell when they get off.

It's a shame that everyone can't leave the youngsters alone and let them have a little fun.

Winning does give a feeling of satisfaction, but it shouldn't be emphasized as being all important. Instead, what should be stressed is doing one's best, and good sportsmanship.

After all, didn't someone once say, "it's only a game?" —Mike Lum

FINISHED AT LAST!—It took a while but they finally finished building the tennis courts behind the women's gymnasium. The courts were opened last Saturday and will be used mainly for the PE tennis classes. The courts are made of 1/8 inch thick plastic vinyl, which makes wearing tennis shoes mandatory. City will occupy the courts Monday through Saturday. The question of whether the courts will be open to the public on Sunday has not been decided.

WREP Aids Women To Return to School

For some women, a return to school after many years as housewife, working mother or homebody looms as frightening a prospect as that faced by the space-weary explorer re-entering earth's atmosphere.

Striving to ease this splashdown and guide the uncertain returnee into the channels satisfying to her particular needs are the goals of City College's Women's Re-Entry to Education Program (WREP).

Dedicated to helping "any woman who perceives her age, economic position, family situation or lack of confidence as barriers to education for enrichment or employment," WREP's target group encompasses women of all ages and economic backgrounds.

Under the guidance of Edna Pope, Assistant Dean of Students for Women, the task of drawing up tentative plans to implement and coordinate the program was assigned to Diane Fairchild of the humanities department and Eileen Rossi, coordinator of women's studies. History instructor Alexa Nickliss, who is City College's chairperson on the status of women will function as WREP's adviser. She is also faculty adviser of Women's Action Committee.

Individually polled, Fairchild, Rossi and Nickliss agree that their immediate and primary concerns are finding adequate office space and organizing the budget. Money, they said, will be used for clerical help, publicity and necessary equipment.

The three faculty members also concur in the absolute necessity of student participation in the formulation of WREP's policies.

"At this point we are sorting ourselves out," said Fairchild. "There is so little time left to get things going for the fall, but we're keeping it loose awaiting student input."

The group is eager to hear from all segments of campus women, including faculty, clerks, culinary workers and janitors.

"Only if we hear from all the women we are supposed to help can we hope to meet their needs," explained Nickliss. "Conflict leads to progress," she continued, "but if the women on this campus remain silent, we won't know what their needs are."

Rossi, who also serves as president of the Academic Senate, emphasized, "Democracy is a tradition on this campus. When decisions are made unilater-

This year's winner of the Alpha Gamma Sigma Scholarship is Nancy Yee.

She won the award on the basis of scholastic achievement, participation in school activities, and her extra-curricular activities.

Miss Yee is a liberal studies major, who will be transferring to University of San Francisco next semester.

Farm Workers Urge Spectators at Cinco de Mayo Festival to Picket

At a well-attended Cinco de Mayo celebration, sponsored by La Raza Unida, the Farmworkers Support Group hosted farm-labor leader Dolores Huerta and Assembly candidate Father Eugene Boyle.

The two pleaded with students to picket and distribute leaflets in support of the United Farm Workers' grape, lettuce and wine boycotts. They also called on students to actively support the UFW's political friends.

Refusing to use lettuce, grapes, or some wines is "fairly easy," said Huerta, UFW's First Executive Vice-President. "But there is another thing we have to ask you to do — that is to help us fast . . . You've gotta come out and help us on the picket line."

"Picketing is very important, because it is direct pressure on the store," the veteran labor organizer explained. It is really like a pilgrimage, you know. I call it a prayer in motion.

"Farm workers — to feed you, to feed everybody, they have had to walk thousands and thousands and thousands of miles," said Huerta." But they don't walk upright, like I am. They have to go stooped over." It isn't hard, contends Huerta, to walk in front of a store for two or three hours on a Saturday, "when you think of what the people who are feeding you have to do every day of their lives."

Echoing Huerta's feelings, Father Boyle, the controversial priest turned politician, spoke of the sacrifices farm workers have made to put food on California tables.

"Throughout the history of this state," he said, "our farm worker brothers and sisters have been shedding their blood for us. Up the valley, up Highway 99, they have been shedding blood for us drop by drop to put the food on the table. They have suffered for us."

Huerta predicted that strikes will be starting again soon in Fresno, Delano, Salinas and in the Coachella Valley.

City College Instructor is Selected For Part in Future Studies Program

Mary Jane Kobayashi, City College sociology teacher, has the year 2020 on her mind. She was recently selected to be one of 50 participants in the 1974 summer Institute for Planetary Resource Management at the NASA Ames Research Center in Mountain View, California.

The program, entitled EARTH 2020: Visions of a World for Our Children's Children, aims to focus primarily on planetary resource management, human problems and opportunities in a finite world from an interdisciplinary approach. Participants were chosen from all disciplines, with preference given to those who are, or will be teaching courses dealing with the relationship of man to a limited world.

Twelve internationally recognized authorities on resource availability, utilization, management and distribution are scheduled to lecture to provide information to be used later for public lectures, educational programs and national television networks. Topics will include population, communication, transportation and ecosystem science.

Kobayashi, as a participant, will be expected to fulfill the objective of the institute by informing colleagues and students about the basic concepts and problems of man's relationship with the planet and possible solutions.

Mary Jane Kobayashi

"It's the next best thing to getting to the moon," said Kobayashi about her selection for the Institute. "It means a great deal to me to be able to get in on the ground floor, interpreting, forecasting, planning and designing in a unique area of major concern and immediate need. We all have to be educated for the 21st century."

Campus Faces Immortalized

IMMORTALIZED—Barbara Frigge, cable car canteen worker, awaits the plaster that will reproduce her face in a mold to be preserved for eternity.

"I've never been plastered this way before," exclaimed music instructor Joanne Hickey. She had just been immortalized in plaster by the Design 2B class, which is doing the macabre artwork on the school's new mural.

On Tuesdays and Thursdays the class is accepting volunteers whose faces will be cast in concrete.

The whole process takes about ten minutes. Faces are covered with vaseline, then framed and smeared with gooey white plaster of Paris.

The plaster is allowed to harden and a wax impression is then made. The impressions are later mounted on plywood and covered with a thin latex membrane.

Another plaster cast follows. This time a negative panel of the face is created into which concrete is poured. The complete concrete panels will form the mural.

Students to Perform Poetry, Music, Mime

A reading/concert featuring folk singing, ballads, contemporary music, mime and poetry will be held Thursday, May 23, in the lower level of the Student Union.

The event, sponsored by City College English department, is entitled "Impact/Contact."

Donna M. Lane, Lige Dailey, Albert Walker and Laurel Kallen are among the student performers.

Laurel Kallen has sung professionally at San Francisco's The Green Earth. She writes and recites poetry and sings ballads and folk songs.

The Soledad Prison Poets, Lige Daily and Albert Walker, perform and deliver politically oriented poetry".

They have appeared on television and radio and at several California concerts.

Donna M. Lane, who has won two poetry awards writes many poems about the woman's perception of human experience.

Lament: How Dry We Are!

One of the more frustrating things about life on this campus is the noticeable lack of stimulating beverages. Those who thought immediately of coffee, tea, or cola need read no further.

The academic life places upon one a seemingly never ending series of stresses and burdens. Faculty members must do daily battle with sullen and hostile tribes of riff-raff who rarely reveal more than a passing interest in the wisdom of the ages.

The riff-raff, on the other hand, must spend hours pretending enthusiasm for the mindless babble of the lunatic at the front of the room.

By the day's end, what with frazzled nerves and hair torn out by the roots and all, a body is fully justified in seeking a quick snort. Which brings us to our original contention.

City College needs a QUIET spot where a tortured soul may revive his sagging spirits. Presently, the nearest relief one in search of a restorative may find is in the slovenly taverns along Ocean Avenue.

To a desperate scholar this represents not only a considerable exertion (and expense) but severe physical risk. By entering these disreputable establishments, one chances abuse by rowdies.

There are, no doubt, a few minor legal obstacles to the creation of an on-campus inn. However, when measured against the parched throats of a thirsty school, they shrink to insignificance.

We trust that those with authority in such matters are cognizant of the situation and at the earliest opportunity will institute appropriate remedial action.

WREP Seeks In-Put from Women

ally, it leads to paralysis.

"We must respect the voice of the community, and on a college campus, that includes the students."

"Picture three rings," she submitted. "Counseling is in the center, sheltered courses and women's studies are in the second, and the third embraces all the other courses on campus — engineering, if she wants it.

"Women will gain emotional support from their interaction with other women."

Paid peer counselors will be chosen to assist the faculty in orientation, but as yet no criterion for their selection has been established.

Success of the program will depend on the close cooperation of everyone involved. Each coordinator will teach at least one course within the program. A yearly re-evaluation will insure the program's relevance and provide continuity.

Efforts will soon be made to reach out into the community to interest and recruit women from all areas and occupations.

According to Rossi, however, there is a wealth of potential re-entry women employed right here on the campus. She would like to see them become involved in WREP and possibly get time off to take a course twice a week.

Perhaps an indication of WREP's already widespread appeal is a recent experience related by Fairchild.

"When I telephoned one of San Francisco's weekly newspapers hoping to get publicity," she recalled, "the clerk immediately asked if she could be put on the mailing list."

Those interested are urged to contact Diane Fairchild, A204A, Extension 634.

Evaluations to be Done

The Free Association, a group of students, is running a teacher evaluation survey on May 15-21.

The results will be published in a booklet this summer.

If you want your teachers' evaluation to be published be sure that your classes have been surveyed by the group.

Excerpts from Police Blotter

Campus Police are offering $2.71 an hour to people interested in becoming student aids. The job requires that one stand at the entrance to faculty parking lots and check permits.

Hours are 8-11am or 11-2pm daily, with a maximum of 15 hours a week. The job counts as lab credit in the work study program. For more information call 151-200 or go to room C119.

A bright red Honda was stolen from in front of the Science building tendays ago. Dennis Ziegler told police that he had locked the handlebars, but had failed to chain his bike.

Police wish to remind motorcycle riders that their property is safer if left in designated areas on campus.

Motorcycles and bicycles should be parked by the Educational Services building, behind the Arts building, or near Bungalow 302.

Question: How do you feel about homosexual relationships?

Mary Fennelly - Broadcasting

I'm very tolerant of homosexuals, I wouldn't live in San Francisco if I hated them. I think homosexual relationships are just like other relationships — some good, some bad. I'm straight myself, but if I don't meet a better class of men than I've been meeting lately, I might give it serious consideration.

Katrina Brown - Communications

My own personal view on homosexual relationships is that every adult should be allowed to make their own decisions. The law should not restrict the sexual activity of individuals when they are not harming mentally, or physically another person. I don't think that homo relationships are normal, but it is something that is here and we can't hide it. I think too many people are too concerned with running the private lives of other people.

Jim Newson - English

Using a quote from the ghettonese philosopher, Slim Pikens, "Do your own thing". As long as it is an affair between two consenting adults, it's ok.

Thomas Myers - Photography

Recently the National Psychiatric Association has taken the homosexuality situation off the mental disorder list. I think this was an excellent decision because I feel homosexuality is merely another form of sexuality and not a disorder or disease.

Theresa Petrowski - Photography

I understand them, relate to them and feel they shouldn't be a minority of oppressed people. Everyone possesses a degree of bi-sexuality or homosexuality by nature and whether they choose to suppress it or express it is solely up to the individual.

I wish people were more knowledgeable to the life style.

Mary Levine - Journalism

I think a homosexual relationship can be just as valid as a heterosexual relationship. If someone is happy and fulfilled, it really doesn't matter what their sex choice is. No one man has a right to say what another man's choice should be.

In the May 9 campus views column John Carmazzi's comment mistakenly appeared next to Eala Wong's picture. The question was "Do you think Patty Hearst is a member of the SLA?"

Here are the comments and the pictures of both students.

Eala Wong—Writing

Yes, I think she is a part of the SLA. The daughter of a well-known newspaper publisher will get more benefit of doubt than most people. If she weren't rich you can be sure that the questio wouldn't come up.

John Carmazzi—Philosophy

I don't think that Patty Hearst is really in with the S.L.A. I can't see anybody making such a drastic change of lifestyle in so short a period.

Chaplain Wilton Smith Extols Newman Center

"The greatest fulfillment I have found as a priest has been my closer union and friendship with Jesus," said Father Wilton Smith of CCSE's Newman Center.

"When someone comes to me for penance after mass, I feel I have made him want to change his life."

His clerical collar momentarily concealed beneath a dark plaid Pendleton, he played the role of "mystery guest" but journalism students quickly ferreted out his identity.

"I am nourished by the sacraments," he declared. "Saying mass is my favorite thing. That is where you see the power of God's word."

As chaplain of the Newman Center, Father Smith's main thrust is to build Christian awareness and try to form a Christian community.

"We have a three-fold program to implement this effort," he outlined. "Socially, the Center holds pot luck dinners, snow trips and camping outings.

"Spiritually, we have prayer groups every Friday, masses twice a week and retreats."

The third area concerns social action in which they explore controversial topics, the current subject being abortion.

Originally scheduled as a debate, the format was changed since only one member of the team could attend.

How does he feel about the three priestly vows of celibacy, poverty and obedience?

"I guess number three is harder now than when I was younger," he admitted. "It was easier then to 'mind the boss'." (referring to the bishop).

As for celibacy, "When I hear of friends in the priesthood marrying," he said, "I only hope for their happiness."

While acknowledging the comfort a family would provide, however, he insists that freedom from familial responsibility allows him to spend more time in prayer and service to people.

Father Wilton Smith

He clarified the distinction between a Diocesan "spirit of poverty," oath and the oath of poverty taken by order priests.

Father Smith, for example, can own a car. Whether it is a '63 Chevy or a late model Cadillac is left to his descretion.

Recalling a dinner he attended with Father Berrigan recently, Father Smith revealed, "He had nothing. He had to borrow a dime to make a phone call."

Although an admirer of Father Berrigan's work, he considers himself a more traditional priest, as contrasted with the new breed.

Convinced that priests should avoid political involvement, he reasoned, "I think lay people are more effective."

Are people turning more to religion in these troubled times? According to Father Smith, there seems to be a decline in the "church every Sunday" routine but an increase in what he calls "charismatic prayer and renewal."

Referred to as Catholic Pentecostals, their ritual differs from traditional Catholicism but is described as a special gift of dynamism as regards the religious spirit.

Although he has never performed an exorcism, Father Smith firmly believes in the existence of the devil.

Incidents in which a person or a house can be possessed of evil spirits are entirely valid, he maintains.

Reflecting on his background, Father Smith was born and raised in San Francisco's Haight Ashbury district. After a religious education, he was inspired to enter the priesthood by a saintly grandmother and a dedicated clergyman from St. Agnes' parish who was especially kind to old people.

Students Offered Concerts, Lectures

Free musical entertainment and lectures take place on campus every Thursday from 11-12 at the College Theatre.

This 'College Hour' was originally intended to be an hour during which there were no classes. The period was to be left open to club meetings, guest lectures and concerts. Unfortunately tighter scheduling has made it virtually impossible not to have classes during the hour. Yet students are showing up for the concert lecture series.

"Attendance is good, but I wish it was better," says Joanne Hickey, faculty music instructor and music coordinator for the hour. "With our budget of $800 a semester (up $200 from last semester) it's hard to get a name people to draw much of a crowd.

"We might get a part time teacher — a public relations person — to take care of the publicity and booking for the series. The concerts are a lot of work that the music faculty has been passing around to each other," said Hickey.

"A PR person would greatly help out the program, but it's just talk right now."

Austin White, director of the lecture series, agrees that money makes the difference in the type of speaker brought on campus.

"We spend an average of about $350 on a speaker. That comes out to about nine speakers a year. We get turned down a lot. We'd love to invite Gloria Steinem," he remarks, "but she wants $2800 an appearance."

As a student sums it up, "The only time I've been to the College Hour is when I've heard of the lecturer or music. A budget of less than $5,000 a year seems rather skimpy for one of the largest community colleges in the state."

City Archers Win at Pacifica; Prepare for Humboldt Tourney

The arrows were off and flying again for the City College archery team, which won three of the five flights at the Special Edition Shoot May 4 at Pacifica.

Daniel Sui City's number one bowman was upset in the Championship flight by Robert Syvertso of Redwood and Walt Marinko from Chabot. Sui took third place with a score of 324, twenty six points behind Syvertso, the winner.

PERFECT POSTURE—And an eye for the target was what enabled Betty Ow to win the fourth flight.

One reason Sui shot below his par was that he spent much of his time doing the administrative work setting up this meet. But Sui is very confidant he can come back in his next archery tournament, at Humboldt State.

"Statistically speaking, I have a .95 probability of placing between first and third at Humboldt," said Sui. "Let me also say that third place at Pacifica was insignificant."

Farley Fong won the men's only trophy, taking flight one with a score of 273. Fong will also be attending the Humboldt tournament. "I didn't think I had a chance," he said. As for his chances at Humboldt, Fong predicted, "I'll be lucky if I place. But if I place it'll be alright."

The second flight was won by Craig Geyer of Foothill. At this point three CCSF had finished with City only taking a first in one. Next to come were flights three and four for women.

In these, the soft, tender hands of Yoko Tashiro and Betty Ow guided their arrows to victory.

Tashiro won the third flight with 74 points and Ow took the fourth scoring 66.

"We were very encouraged by the initial response," said Dr. Alice Duffy, coach of the team. "The fact that three out of five trophies were won by City College shooters is an encouraging indication for Humboldt."

Like Sui, Dr. Duffy is confident City will shoot its way to first place at Humboldt. "We intend to take a first there because our shooters will not have to be so involved in running the tournament."

The Sixth Annual Intercollegiate Archery Tournament will be held on May 18 and 19 at the Humboldt State University Field House. Shooting will begin in the indoor range at 9 a.m.

WINNING SMILE—From Yoko Tashiro who won a trophy for taking first place in Flight Three.

Softball Team Gets Destroyed in Double-Header; 14-9 and 26-9

It's been said that pitching is 90 percent of the game and that good pitching will always stop good hitting. Although not everyone will agree on those statements, no one on City's women's softball team will argue with them. They lost to Monterey College 14-9, were blown out of the second game of a doubleheader against Hartnell College 26-9.

The two losses give City a 0-4 record on the season. In the first game, Monterey didn't waste anytime putting runs on the board. They jumped to a 10-0 lead in the first inning.

After that Monterey was able to score only four more runs.

City picked up nine runs but could never get the big hit in crucial points. City had the bases loaded four different times but was never able to score.

Although the score against Hartnell was extremely one sided the Rams did remarkably well. City was only behind 11-8, after five innings, but in the bottom of the sixth Hartnell began to pull away.

Hartnell's runs column began to look like the scoring dial on a pinball machine, its nine stacking up eleven runs to finish the game.

Despite dropping a doubleheader Coach Marilyn Schnake said, "A great time was had by all."

Volleyball Team Wins Fifth Place

City's women's volleyball team had their San Bernardino trip cut short when they were eliminated in the third round of the San Bernardino Volleyball Tournament two weeks ago.

Despite this City was still able to place fifth among the fourteen schools entered. City's first loss came against Los Angeles Valley, 15-9, 15-10. Then host team San Bernardino finished up the job with a 15-11; 15-11 win.

"We weren't covering and at one point they were playing off the blocker's hand" said captain Barbara Hattori. "The girls down there play the way men would play up here. They train the girls when they're young."

The loss against San Bernardino marks the end of their playing days with City for Hattori and five other women. The other five women who are leaving are: Nina Reyer, Paula Hocker, Doreen Suslow, Chris Zagorewicz and Rosa Chase.

Barbara Hattori has played for City for two years, leading the team to win after win, but one game stands out in her mind. The final game in Reno.

"At the beginning of the season I didn't have confidence in the team, but in the final game I knew there was no way we were going to lose. It was like a dream come true."

Only Karen White and Sylvia Louie will remain from this season's team. Coach JoAnn Hann will have to recruit from the B team and hold tryouts. The B team in its first outing was routed by DeAnza College, 15-3, 15-1.

"They've played only one game but there are some good players," said Hattori. "They still need practice but it's just a matter of time."

Volleyball has gotten so popular among the colleges and universities that a Northern League will be started next Fall. The winners of the Northern and Southern Leagues will play each other for the State Championship.

SPORTS ROUNDUP

Seven Men Qualified in Track Finals

Seven members of City's track team placed in the top six of their events at the Golden Gate Conference Finals track meet held at Laney College May 3. All seven men qualified for the Northern California Trials which were held last Friday at Modesto JC.

Keith Farlow won first place in the javelin with a throw of 175-3, six feet farther than his nearest competitor. Randy Minnix high jumped 6'4, to win first place. In the 120 high hurdles Roy Gains came in fifth with a time of 14.2.

The 880 run saw Tony Herbert running a 1:59.5, which wasn't a bad time but Herbert—like the other five runners in the event—had the unfortunate pleasure of running in the same heat with Laney's super star James Robinson.

Robinson set a new national junior college record with a time of 148.4, outrunning his nearest competitor by 15 yards. Robinson knocked two-tenths of a second off the old mark set by Mt. San Antonio's Ray Van Asten in 1962.

Larry Williams ran a 55.4 in the 400 intermediate hurdles, taking third place honors. Thurmond Wells, City's most consistent performer this season, took second in the long jump. In the pole vault Andre Shy came in sixth with a vault of 13-0.

GOLF

Finishing in fifth spot in the conference this season, with a 3-2-7 record, City's golf team was not what you would call a serious contender to place well in the Golden Gate Conference Tournament held at Castlewood two weeks ago.

But as the pressure mounted, City began playing better. When the smoke had cleared, the entire team had qualified for the Northern California Tournament. In the final team standings City was in second place three strokes behind Chabot which finished first at 948.

Keith Davey, the team's number one player, shot sizzling rounds of 79 and 75, to finish at 154. The biggest surprise of the tournament had to be Edgar Stephenson's scores. His rounds of 84 and 83 gave him a total of 167. Stephenson had been averaging 93.0 on the season, but when it came to the big tournament Stephenson really came into his own, averaging 83 a round.

TENNIS

With the new tennis courts completed City's tennis team should have a convenient place in which to practice for next year's Golden Gate Conference Finals. In this year's GGC finals, held at San Mateo two weeks ago, City was only able to place sixth in a field of seven.

CCSF's number one seeded player, Stan Woo, lost in the quarterfinals to Mark Carlson of San Mateo, 5-7, 7-5, and a 7-6 tie breaker. Carlson went on to lose in the finals to Dan Masengale of Merritt College, 6-2, 6-4.

Ironically, Woo had beaten Masengale earlier in the round robin. So with just little bit of luck against Carlson, Woo might have been able to win the singles championship.

Bob Hughes of City advanced to the second round before being eliminated, but before Hughes left he knocked out San Mateo's number one seeded player 6-4, 3-6, 6-3. Dexter Lee also won his first round match before being eliminated.

Favorable Response On Awareness Days

Over 1,000 condoms, 2,000 information pamphlets and 2,000 fact sheets were distributed at CCSF during Venereal Disease Awareness Days on May 13-15.

Response was positive. "75-80% of the students who went by the tables took the information that was being handed out," says Bonnie Franke, San Francisco State Community Health Education major.

Bonnie and Chris Lowe, who is also a State College student, and 20 CCSF health education students organized and initiated the VD educational event.

The successful response is attributed to the "good location of the tables and the large campus."

Fifteen to 20 students attended each film session, making a total of 115 film-goers.

Kathleen Gould, of the health education department, says, "I am pleased with the fact that we have such good student response."

The VD Awareness Days were co-sponsored by the health department and the Student Health Service.

Campus Club Aids Immigrants

City College Chinese Culture Club will make available grants, scholarships and book grants to newly arrived Chinese immigrants for the 1974-75 academic year.

$1,300 was raised last semester when the CCC sponsored a Chinese culture night benefit. Portions of this money will be used to assist new immigrant students who are required to pay tuition fees.

Completion on Science Building Will be Delayed

Due to construction complications, December, 1974, is the anticipated date of completion for remodeling of the Science Building, according to Victor Graff, Associate Director of Facilities and Planning for CCSF.

Construction was scheduled to be completed this September, but because of contracting problems, use of the new facilities will be a semester late.

Graff pointed out that a main reason for delay was with the contractors, Arntz Bros. of San Rafael. The lab furniture they made did not meet specifications.

According to the penalty clause of the contract, Arntz Bros. will have to pay $150 a day which, in Graff's view, is "peanuts." The penalty money goes to the City.

VICTORIOUS—Wanda Batton, 18, has been unofficially named next semester's Associated Students president.

As Election Recount Demanded; to be Held

When the recent student body election results were announced, it was discovered there were 14 more votes than there were voters.

David Newton, first runner-up for Associated Students president, demanded a recount, which Assistant Dean of Activities Vester Flanagan says will take place before the semester ends.

Unofficial results indicate Wanda Batton captured almost 52 percent of student body votes for the office of AS president.

Batton's running mate, Frederick Mayer, won the vice-presidential seat with 161 of 379 votes cast.

Newly elected Council members and the votes they received are: Dan Greenwood, 177; Darlene Curry, 174; Kenneth Banford, 173; Linda Forde, 172; Andre Keys, 169; Janice Holloway, 165; Gary Pool, 164; William Lee, 159; Glenn Taylor, 145; Dee Schumacher, 140; Rodney Stovall, 138; Michael Feilmoser, 137; Dennis Williams, 133; and Burt Lustig, 123.

All elected officers, with the exception of Linda Forde, ran on the Good Things for City College ticket.

Class Teaches Rights

The Constitution and Individual rights will be a new elective class offered in September. Political science 43 will teach law for the layman to enable students to learn their rights without using technical law school terminology.

Study subjects include, first amendment freedoms, obscenity laws, due process rights and how to protect yourself against illegal search.

Students will also review examples of common legal problems that arise in marriage, divorce, adoption, how to write a will and the rights of women and single persons.

The class will be offered for three units and is transferable. Further information can be obtained from Darlene Alioto in C267, ext. 120.

Gambling Problem on Campus May Cause Building Shutdown

A sharp rise in on-campus gambling may force police to close the Student Union Building.

Police report that a group of students routinely gather for mid-day penny ante card games in the Statler Wing student lounge and its downstairs bike room.

Vester Flanagan, Assistant Dean of Student Affairs, said while some gambling has always gone on, it has recently become more blatant. He added some of the games are for fairly high stakes.

Flanagan said he will be taking action, but would not reveal specifics.

While most of the games are friendly nickle-dime affairs, police and school authorities hope to prevent the spread of an unhealthy situation. They fear an argument over a small amount of money could lead to serious consequences.

Police add that when warned to cease their activities, some of the card players have become belligerent. The refusal of others to produce student identification cards has led authorities to suspect some gamblers do not attend City College. CCSF regulations provide that students must show ID upon request by proper authorities.

Campus President Harry R. Buttimer told the Guardsman that gambling has been a problem over the years. "Whenever it breaks out," he said, "we do what we can to eliminate it."

While the student code of conduct makes no direct reference to gambling, paragraph nine says that failure to comply with the directions of a City College employee acting in performance of his duties will result in disciplinary action. It is under this rule that police are acting.

City law provides for a $1 to $500 fine or a six month jail sentence for those convicted of gambling in a public place.

Further, if any of the players are under 21, the other players could be charged with contributing to the delinquency of a minor.

Students Stuff Down Hot Dogs for Contest

The recent student body elections were highlighted by a hot dog eating contest in the crowded, windy area outside the cafeteria. The lunchtime crowd, while being fed hot dogs, chips, and soft drinks for 50 cents, were encouraged to vote.

Contestants attempted to break the world record of eating 18 hot dogs in five minutes.

TV, radio and press were on hand to witness the winner, Ed Forbes, down his eleventh dog at the 5 minute mark. His prize was a sack of fortune cookies donated by the Chinese Culture Club.

CHAMPION—Ed Forbes ate 11 hot does in five minutes to become hot dog eating champ of City College.

Games, Parking, Discounts Available to Card Holders

The majority of City College students are unaware of the different discounts available with a student body card.

Card holders receive free admission to all games; parking permits; discounts on school supplies at bookstore (not books); a reduced price for most campus activities.

"People buy student body cards for the parking permit or to participate in student activities," says Vernice James, student council member. "During the period in which we sell student body cards, we are so busy answering questions that we just don't have the time to fill in people on the different discounts available.

"This is a small room" she said, "and when you have so many people talking at once it's almost impossible to make yourself heard. The students should ask for more discounts."

One student suggested signs be put up on campus. Vernice remarked, "I'll bring it up at the next student council meeting." Then, with a smile, she added, "We'll hang them if the Guardsman will print it in the paper."

The number of AS student body card holders is 1,887 out of an approximate total student enrollment of 17,000. Cards can be purchased in room 205 of the Student Union building. They sell for $7.50 and are valid for one semester.

City College Tripartite Committees Explained

Tripartite may be a word unfamiliar to some City College students, yet tripartite committees affect every student on campus.

These committees formulate administrative policies and make decisions on matters concerning the school.

An example of one such committee is the recently formed Criteria Committee. Its purpose is to establish criteria for the selection of the new college president.

Eileen Rossi, resident of the Academic Senate, revealed that the group has accomplished its primary purpose and will now "go on with the selection process."

Rossi explained that the tripartites are comprised of representatives of the three factions of college government: the faculty, the administration, and the student body. Most committees consist of nine members.

"The Academic Senate and the Student Council elect their members and the Chancellor usually names the administrative representative," said Rossi.

There are approximately nine tripartites currently in operation. Among them is the committee for the selection of deans which recommended the appointments of Juanita Pascual, Sylvia Leff, and Shirley Hoskins.

As mentioned, these groups exercise a substantial amount of influence on campus policy, but they are not the only ones who do so.

Another organization which determines policy is the Academic Senate.

Rossi explains, "The Senate is made up of all the full-time certificated non-administrative personnel."

The purpose of the Senate is, in essence, the same as the tripartites. It differs only in that the decisions of the Senate are based on a strictly faculty point of view.

QUESTION: What would you like to see changed on campus?

Marian Driscoll—Nursing

I'd like to see a more effective and better supplied bookstore. They order 30 books when a class needs 60. And more art work displayed throughout the campus. I see lots of empty display shelves.

Jacier Kratofic—Physical Therapy

I like this school the way it is. It's been alright for me the way it is. My courses and teachers have been fine. Everyone does his own thing and that's cool.

Dan Boutte— General Education

I don't expect a great deal out of the place. I just get my grades and go home. I can't get too worked up over City. It is such a transient experience that it really doesn't matter.

Jack Forbes—Fire Science

There should be more spirit. I don't know how you go about doing it: I come from a high school with good spirit. Maybe we need a good football team..

Leah Peoples—Special Education

More activities, maybe a choral group or gospel concerts. The school lacks togetherness, something like that would bring us together, unite us. People are apathetic, there is nothing to get your interest. I would like to see more music activities.

Sharon Friedman—Nursing

I'm not really all that involved. I don't know what I'd like to see changed, I'm only here for one semester. There's too much isolation of the faculty. They run this place like a high school. I went to another school where the students and teachers used to rap.

Why Separate Lavatories?

Obsessed as we are with freedom, justice, equality, and the like, we wish to call to the attention of the student body a subtle form of discrimination. It must be subtle. So subtle that, to our knowledge, no one has ever complained about it before.

This school has separate lavatory facilities for students and faculty. The phenomenon has puzzled us for some time.

Does employment at a college somehow cause embarrassing biological changes in a person? What foul and wicked things are exposed behind the doors ominously marked "Faculty?"

What happens to students who brave the unknown (and maybe even break a law if anyone can find it) and enter the forbidden sanctuary? Are they ever heard from again? Do the secret police carry them off and commit unspeakable crimes against their persons?

Our unquenchable thirst for the truth led us to the lavish offices of Dr. Harry Buttimer, president of City College. As we entered the room he was humming "Pomp and Circumstance" while browsing through a Contra Costa travel brochure. We carefully avoided the lush carpet our peasant shoes might accidentally soil.

"Please sir," we begged meekly as we knelt and kissed his ring, "Just what is the official rationale for the separation of student and faculty rest rooms?"

"Gee, I dunno," he answered regally, "It must be some kind of tradition." We humbly thanked his majesty for this inspiring pearl of wisdom as we bowed and groveled our way out the door.

As it now stands, no one seems to know just why nature's urgent call segregates the wise and learned from the unlettered mob. Anyone with pertinent information is urged to inform the Guardsman.

But please use discretion. The walls have ears.

Hospital Costs Denounced

An apple a day keeps the doctor away. A simple statement that is relevant today.

Hospital care costs so much today that many people who really need it cannot afford it. The fees are ridiculously high.

Take, for example, having a broken leg. The required surgery alone costs about $1000. A private hospital room costs a phenomenal $97 per day; a semi-private room is $94. This covers meals and the privilege of sleeping in the bed.

Doctors' fees, any kind of medication, and therapy are all separate expenses which can add up to thousands of dollars.

For people who have health insurance, the financial burden is not heavy. However, many people do not have any insurance coverage.

Some form of socialized medicine seems to be the best answer. This method would state that all persons pay a modest amount per week, such as five dollars, whether sick or well. Then, when illness strikes, the costs would only be a few hundred, instead of thousands of dollars.

Such a bill will probably not be passed. The American Medical Association is opposed to any kind of socialized medicine. After all, doctors have it made now days. They can charge fantastic sums and know that people have to come to them, because there is no one else around to help.

Talkers Not Wanted In Library

The campus library recently invoked a new procedure requiring students to show a valid City College ID card in order to gain admittance to the main reading room.

According to a campus patrol aide, students from other schools have been using the library to meet with friends who attend City. The meetings often result in noisy conversations which distract other students. The new procedure is aimed at stopping such actions.

The intention is good but there are more convenient ways of making the library a study place than hassling each person who walks through the doors. First, everyone should have the right to use all facilities of the library, regardless of the school he attends. Second, it should be realized that non-campus students are not the sole noise makers in the library.

One alternative to the ID card is to simply ask noisy gossipers to leave. This procedure isn't very successful, as many talkers refuse to go, causing even more disruption.

There is another method, however, whereby talkative students could use library facilities without disturbing others. A part of the library could be sectioned off for those garrulous persons who need to talk. This section could be called the "Group Study" section and would be reserved for groups of students who wish to study together. It should not be a place for a social gathering.

Women Still Receive Less Pay

"Homemaking in itself is no longer a full-time job for most people," according to the U.S. Department of Labor.

"... Today more than half of all women between 18 and 64 years of age are in the labor force, where they are making a substantial contribution to the growth of the Nation's economy."

"The average earnings of women who work all year at full-time jobs are far below those of their male counterparts," states the department.

"Ninety-four percent of the people earning $15,000 a year or more are men," maintains Caroline Bird in a recent article in Cosmopolitan Magazine.

Many women are serious about their attachment to the labor force and are not necessarily working for extra pocket money.

"Of the 33 million women in the labor force," reports the U.S. Department of Labor, "In March 1973, nearly half were working because of pressing economic need. They were either single, widowed, divorced, separated or had husbands whose incomes were less than $3,000 a year."

Opportunities in the fields of industry, health occupations and trades are opening for women. Yet a surprising number of them are being trained to go into other fields. "More than half of the women and girls in public vocational programs are being trained in home economics; about one-third are studying office practices," says the Labor Department.

Do women take jobs away from men and should they quit those jobs they now hold? No, says the department. "There were 19.2 million married women in the labor force in March 1972: the number of unemployed men was 3.1 million.

"If all the married women stayed home and unemployed men were placed in their jobs, there would be 16.1 million unfilled jobs."

Should women stick to "women's jobs" rather than compete for "men's jobs"? According to the Department of Labor, "Jobs, with extremely rare exceptions, are sexless."

"Tradition, rather than job content, has led to labeling certain jobs as women's and others as men's," said the department. "In measuring 22 areas of knowledge and aptitude, a research laboratory found that there is no sex deifference in 14, women excel in six, and men excel in two.

Those who would like more understanding of the myths concerning women may gain it by attending classes in the Women's Studies Department.

First Production of New Campus Workshop

The newly formed City College music theatre workshop is offering its premier production at the college theatre this weekend.

On stage will be two one-act presentations: "Der Jasager," by Kurt Weill, and Mozart's "The Impresario." Dancers will perform Saint-Saen's "Carnival of the Animals."

The productions will feature full orchestra, singers and dancers. Curtain time is 8 p.m.

Musical direction and the orchestra are under the guidance of Richard Esterman, who previous work has been in Europe and New York. Walter Krumm of the drama department has devised the staging.

Tickets may be purchased at the door.

Students Work is Displayed

All that glitters is not gold; it could be silver, brass, copper or other nonferrous metals, as the recent Jewelry and Metal Arts exhibit testified.

Arm of Jewelry

Interspersed with the slick and dazzling array of rings, bracelets and belt buckles, Instructor Roger Baird juxtaposed the more primitive feeling of rugged welded sculpture.

"The fine arts department has come of age in the past few years," Baird said, "due to the increased interest in handwork."

Whether a student merely "wants to do something with his hands," become a street artist or sell his finished product to an exclusive boutique, the course attempts to acquaint him with a wide range of techniques. Enamelwork, etching, welding and metal casting are but a few of the processes he learns to implement his creativity.

Glowing with pride and enthusiasm as he pointed out the workmanship of his students, Baird explained that the pieces were the result of no more than three semesters' work; in many cases only one.

What will happen to the jewelry now that the exhibit has ended? "That's up to the owner," Baird replied. "Some pieces will be sold, of course; but things take on a special meaning when you've spent so much time on them. They become like one of your children."

Hotel and Restaurant Grads Marketable After Two Years

How does one get started in the Hotel Business?

One of the best ways is to enroll in one of CCSF's Hotel and Restaurant Management courses.

This was the route taken in 1936 by Lawrence Wong.

Today, 38 years later, Wong is the department chairman.

In downtown San Francisco, hotels and restaurants are being erected on practically every corner. Because of this, there is a dire need to increase the labor force in this field.

The intense competition for labor means more money for the working man.

This was corroborated by Wong who said, "Most of our people are interested in getting their two year degree and making some bread. And the bread is pretty high around here."

Two Year Program

The H&R curricula is organized on a junior college basis.

This means at the end of two years a student graduating from the course is fully capable of performing the required duties in this field.

In fact, by the end of the first year, the individual will have acquired what Wong calls "salable skills."

These "salable skills" are put to use in a hurry. During the summer, following the student's first year, he is required to work ten weeks in a hotel, at full salary.

The first two semesters of the program are totally devoted to food preparation.

The third semester deals with operation of hotels. "This involves learning the business aspects of hotels other than food preparation," says Wong. These include catering and dining room maintenance.

The fourth semester involves unpaid work experience in the field for fifteen hours a week.

Hotel maintenance is concerned with more than just food preparation. "The hotel business is so competitive that you have to go out and promote yourself," Wong explains.

For this reason, H&R enrollees have to take courses in front-office management, sales administration, business promotion and orientation to the public.

Not only does the H&R department give its students intensive training, it also helps graduates find jobs.

Sound Box Vibration Could Knock Down a Wall, says Inventor

"Just for the heck of it," a City College electronics buff has built what he says is the world's biggest and most acoustically perfect music speaker.

Jerry Judnik, 21, says that under the right conditions his huge, "horn loaded" sound box could generate enough vibrations to knock down a building.

The one ton speaker is 22.3 feet long and 13 x 13 feet wide at its opening. It took ten people to lift the front of it during construction. Looking like a square horn of plenty, the project is made of $200 worth of knotty two by fours and plywood.

Judnik says if the speaker were placed in a wooden or structurally weak building and turned on at full blast, the walls would come tumbling down.

His unusual enterprise was on display in the sunken patio recently and may now be seen in the Palace of Fine Arts.

He says he was inspired by the work of a 1920's engineer who experimented with the destructive power of noise. In addition he wants to dispute the advertising claims of Alta-Lansing, a speaker manufacturer.

They claim to produce the world's most perfect speaker.

Judnik, a drama major, says he plans to use his music box in the fall production of a play he's writing based on Dante's Inferno and in some mixed media productions.

WINNERS—Nancy Lee, James Flynn, Branwyn Duggan and Sandra McPartlan are four of five campus horticulturalists who picked up $1,100 from the San Francisco Garden Club on May 10.

The annual Alice Eastwood scholarship awards were presented to the students for outstanding achievement in their work with plans.

Prizes, presented at a faculty room luncheon, were given to Branwyn Duggan, a botanist, and Einar Berg, James Flynn, Nancy Lee, and Sandra McPartlan, horticulturalists.

SPRING 74 ARCHERY TEAM—Fine members demonstrate proper form. Left: Yoko Toshiro, Daniel Sui, Cindy Rezente, Farley Fong, and Danny Exon.

Ram's Robin Hood's Hare Another Good Showing; Dan Sui Wins Again

Daniel Sui predicted that he had a 95 percent chance of placing between first and third at the Sixth Annual Intercollegiate Archery Tournament, May 17-19 at Humboldt State University.

Sui proved his word is as good as his archery skills. He won first place in the unlimited team event of the Columbia Round with a score of 640. At 50 yards from the target Sui had a perfect score of 216.

When it came time to shoot from the 40 yard mark, the officials had the archers shoot with a five-minute time limit.

In spite of missing the bullseye four times, Sui came out on top with a 208. His farthest miss was 1-1/2 inches from the bullseye!

It didn't take long for Sui to get back on target: He shot another perfect score of 216 at 30 yards. With his great showing at Humboldt, Sui is rated among the top archers in Northern California.

"From a personal standpoint I have enjoyed being among the best in Northern California," he said, adding, AS WE CLOSE OUR SHOOTING SEASON I would like to thank our coach, Dr. Alice Duffy."

Farley Fong, who will be transferring to Fresno State next Fall, shot a 869 to win the men's division. In the women's division, Cynthia Rezente took fifth place with a 487 and Yoko Tashiro placed ninth with a 308.

"It has been a really fine season for us this year," said Duffy. "I have been honored to work with these women and men. Now our goal will be to build for next year to take the tournament in Las Vegas!" Duffy will also be trying to get more women on the team next season.

"We will concentrate on adding more members so that we can place better in team events next year. Yoko and Cindy have really put out in their first competitive experience and I think we'll see some real growth in their performance in the future."

Sports Roundup

Flu Bug Plagues Pitching Staff

The Rams baseball team finished the season with a dismal 7-18 record, but Coach Ernie Domecus doesn't seem to be very depressed about the season.

"The reason we finished so bad was because the flu hit our pitching staff. Also, we played in the toughest conference in the State, the Golden Gate Conference," Domecus said.

However, the season was not all bad for the batmen. Grant Becker and Gerald Griswell both made second string All-Conference.

Although next season is a year away, Domecus looked hopeful. He said, "Our prospects for next year look pretty good. We'll get some fine freshman pitchers coming to City next semester. Also, we'll try to go with more pitching and speed. This last season, we didn't have enough speed to be taken really seriously."

TENNIS

Any women interested in playing on CCSF's women tennis team can sign up for a tennis class during the summer from 12-2 p.m. In the fall, tryouts will be held in the first month of school for the competitive schedule throughout the year. For more information, contact Mrs. Mary Ann Southam at the Women's Gym during the summer or in the fall.

City College women tennis players fell victim to tough competition from such schools as Stanford and UC Davis at a lower division women's tennis tournament at Modesto, May 10.

Before the day was over, all four Rams representatives met defeat.

Nina Reyer, after being eliminated in the initial round of singles play, made her way into the semi-finals of the consolation round before going down.

Singles player Dianne Lum made the second rounds of both regular competition and the consolation play before she was eliminated.

The doubles team of Linda Perez and Ivy Dea had its troubles, too. They were knocked out in both the first round of regular play and the first round of consolation play.

GOLF

Three weeks ago the golf team qualified in the Golden Gate Conference finals to place second. But at the Northern California Tournament, City finish more than 50 strokes behind West Valley College, which shot 949 to win the tournament.

Not only did City finish in seventh place but none of the golfers qualified for the State Championship.

BASKETBALL

From June 24 through August 2, Mary Ann Southan will teach basketball. The classes will be held Mondays and Wednesdays, 2-4 p.m., at the Women's Gym. The class is designed to keep the summer students in condition and give them further experience in game play.

The men's varsity basketball team will begin practice October 8. Anyone interested in trying out for the team should contact Bradley Duggan as soon as possible so eligibility can be checked.

BOXING

Highlighted by a great heavyweight fight and some class boxing by Dick Cahillo, City College's Fight Night on May 22 was a roaring success.

Cahillo, a Golden Gloves finalist, was too overwhelming for Al Perez. In the heavyweight class, Jerry Holland proved too much for Fred Marshal.

Dancers Give Thrills to Audience With Exciting 'Dance Through Time'

"Wild, great, terrific," were some of the reactions to the "Dance Through Time" program presented by the students of the Women's Physical Education Department and the Recreation Association on May 3.

The program, which featured performers from various dance classes at City, was fast-paced, lively, well-coordinated and interesting.

The show opened with dancers depicting cavemen, then moved through time showing Christ and early Christians, the Renaissance, and Japanese and Philippine Island dancing. The setting then shifted to America with the can-can and "clogging," an old-fashioned dance performed by loggers in the 19th century Northwest.

After a short intermission, 20th century dance was demonstrated with the old soft shoe, 1930's blues dancing and a baseball game put to tap.

The most exciting part of the program was a twisting, rock 'n' rolling sock hop, with an impersonation of Chubby Checker.

Current dance styles were represented by Carole King music and the Soul Train Theme.

Only the modern dance portion of the program seemed sluggish. However, it was over soon enough not to spoil the audience's overwhelming enthusiasm.

Program coordinator, Melia Furgis, planned the various dances perfectly. They were kept short, each one livelier than the last.

There were many fine performances. Many of the participants showed their versatility by performing several styles of dance. Tony Bryant seemed to be on stage for every number as well he should have been. He was clearly the best dancer in the entire program.

Bryant received an award for best participation and a roaring, standing ovation.

Perhaps all the dancers should have won awards, for although many of them were clearly nervous, their enthusiasm was evident. The performers seemed so happy just dancing, they made the audience want to get up on the stage and dance too.

For non-professionals, the students put on one hell of a show.

City College PE Department Offers a Sport For Everyone

GOLF—Terri Doyle practicing her swing in a field.

GYMNASTICS—Ali Kamlan, caught in walking stride on the balance beam.

TENNIS—Robert Hughes of CCSF tennis team.

Whether the student has a couple inches around the waist line that he wants to lose or is just the athletic type, CCSF has a sport for everyone. At the moment there are about 54 different kinds of sports going on: from football to square dancing, from skin diving to badminton.

The most popular sport is tennis. In the last two or three semesters tennis has been one of the first sport classes to fill up with students.

Another sport starting to pick up is archery, in which both men and women can compete equally.

City's dance program offers modern dance, folk dancing, tap dancing and ballet. It is an enjoyable way of getting in shape and it is also a nice way to meet people.

For the person who likes contact, there's a choice of judo, kung fu, and boxing. If that's not enough contact, there's always football.

Gymnastics is starting to come into its own at City, too, with six classes filled to capacity.

Weather Causes Rise in Pot Use

City College police blame warm weather for a recent rise in the on-campus use of marijuana. They say spring fever causes relaxed attitudes on the part of students who don't bother to conceal the evidence.

Apparently, some individuals flaunt drug use in front of student cops. Though they rarely take people into custody for possession of less than enough to make a sale, student police have full authority to make arrests.

Campus authorities decline to reveal just how many students have been busted. Security Chief Gerald DeGiralamo says, however, "We could arrest people every day if we wanted to."

College fuzz are directed to be diplomatic in questioning suspects. It is left to the discretion of individual policemen to make an arrest.

When stopped, a student (or faculty member) has a better chance of avoiding problems if he or she is congenial. The school's lawmen say they are just people and resent being called pigs. Belligerent students who refuse to submit to an ID check may find themselves on a quick trip to the pokey.

City police are a bit more direct in the way they handle the problem. According to DeGiralamo, they just haul people away. Student police are inclined to issue warnings.

There are legal difficulties in searching a person for evidence. Unless they actually intend to make an arrest police cannot reach into a suspect's pockets. They are limited to pat searches.

Campus police are given marijuana demonstrations to learn what it looks like, how it's used and what it smells like.

With a perfectly straight face, Chief DeGiralamo told the Guardsman that future law enforcement officers must be taught to "familiarize" themselves with grass. He would not reveal which class offered this training.

PROUD—Larry Espinola, sports editor of the Guardsman, shows the award given to him by the Recreation Association.

Larry was presented the plaque at the awards banquet last Wednesday night, honoring members of the different sports teams.

Paid Alternate to Medi-Cal Offered to CCSF Students

A new pre-paid comprehensive health care plan is available to City College students who are eligible for Medi-Cal.

Representatives of the state-paid American Health Care Plan will be on campus several times in the next few weeks to talk to students seeking alternative medical plans.

AHCP representative Bill Palmer will be at a table in the cafeteria from 10 to 1:15 and on the Ram plaza from 1:15 to 3 p.m.

The program is aimed at preventive care, and at overcoming limitations imposed by the Medi-Cal sticker system.

It will allow members to get medical aid from one doctor, rather than going to different sources for each complaint.

The plan covers the full range of medical and dental care, and some mental health costs, Palmer says.

Free Critic Editor Charged in Illegal Use of Council Money

Misappropriation of $120 of student body funds did not upset the majority of Associated Student council members at their May 29 meeting.

When councilman Ne Gouveia of the Free Critic staff told council that he used $120 of the Free Critic's remaining $200 to attend a journalism conference in Fresno, council members laughingly suggested sending him to jail for six months or giving him 20 lashes. These funds had been slated for return to Associated Students after the Critic announced it was not publishing another issue.

Council members discussed retroactively transfering funds for the conference to "cover up" Gouveia's maneuver, but finally copped-out by voting to take no action.

Councilwoman Jean Marquardt charged that Gouveia's action was illegal because clubs cannot transfer monies from their funds for one purpose to another without council approval.

This money, she said, had been alloted to the Critic for printing costs, not conferences.

Gouveia defended his action saying that he understood the money was distributed to them for general purposes to be used at its members' discretion.

According to AS guidelines, a member of the Critic staff would have to appear before council to ask permission to transfer funds for the money to be legally spent for a conference.

Don Peterson, Free Critic sponsor, signed the requisition for the money Gouveia used. Council members were not able to clarify why he requested $120 when council had records on file from the journalism club indicating that total expenses for the conference, including transportation and most meals, amounted to $66.

It is also not clear why Gouveia attempted to attend the conference in a separate capacity from the campus journalism club. When he previously asked the edtor of the Guardsman about the conference, he was told that it was only open to members of the Journalism Association of Community Colleges, of which he is not a member.

Fresno Journalism Conference Chairman Peter Lang wrote a letter of complaint to Assistant Dean of Student Activities Vester Flanagan explaining that convention rules provided that no student who is not a part of a journalism delegation accompanied by an adviser could attend.

Said Lang, "I told him he could not attend conference sessions and offered to refund his registration money. He became quite upset and wanted to discuss with me the reasons why he should not be permitted to attend.

"He was unable," Lang continued, "or more probably unwilling to accept my statement that a recounting of how the situation may have developed . . . was irrelevant."

Coalition Gives Gays Chance for Sharing

"The main social function in the gay community is the gay bar. The Gay Students Coalition, said a spokesman, is a means that gay students can meet each other for friendship."

Gay Students Coalition (GSC) serves educational, social and political functions.

It offers a forum for students (not necessarily gay) who want to discuss prejudice, fears and questions about homosexuality.

The Coalition in its political capacity is currently circulating a petition to initiate a Gay Students Program at City College to offer such courses as Gay Literature, Psychology of Gay Awareness, and others.

For any students who attended meetings last semester and were discouraged, the GSC spokesman said, "The group has changed quite a bit since last semester. It's a lot more together and better organized. Let them come and see for themselves, it's not the same trip."

The group has been meeting every Monday night at 8:00 p.m., Green Lounge, Lone Mountain College, 2800 Turk St. (near Masonic). Next semester's meeting place has not yet been confirmed.

Age Discrimination Upsets Campus Club; 30 Plus Students Question Rights, Reasons

City College students kicked off a major campaign to knock out age discrimination in scholarships.

First target of the war is the California State Scholarship and Loan Commission, according to Anne Tringali, President of the 30 Plus Club.

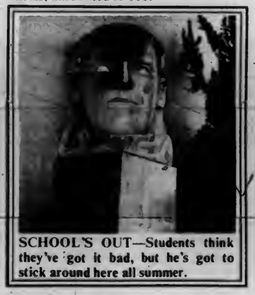
Tringali and members of her club hope to meet with the Commission sometime this summer to protest the 30 year age limit on State Competitive Scholarships.

The 4,000 member student group will also battle the requirement that students seeking aid provide information on their parents financial status.

"This requirement probably does more than any other thing to inhibit people who need aid from seeking it."

Tringali said there are virtually no scholarships available to students who are over the 30 year age bracket.

One local bank, she said, refuses to consider federally backed loans for students who are over 25 years old. Even most fraternities, sororities and women's clubs put a top age limit of 21 on their scholarships. "This is terribly unfair," said Tringali "There is no good reason why scholarships which can not be denied on the basis of race or color, should be denied because of age.



"What results by their doing this is that they inhibit the motivation of older people to go on to schools of higher education."

The denial of scholarships forces most older students to spread their schooling over a number of years.

"To go to school, I have to work part time," said Tringali. "This means I can't take a full schedule of classes.

"Tack on three to five and that makes eight years to complete my education," she exclaimed.

Tringali said the campaign has the support of the Associated Student Counsel and the Board of Governors. She hopes to get support from groups of older students in the Community colleges in the state.

SCHOOL'S OUT—Students think they've got it bad, but he's got to stick around here all summer.

Women Struggle for Voice in New WREP Program

To provide and help plan student input into the Women's Re-Entry to Education Program some 45 women met at one or more of seven meetings with faculty and administrative coordinators.

Independent students and members of Woman's Action Committee, Child Care Center, 30 Plus Club, Recreation Association and Unbiased, Non-Sexist, Inter-ethnic Training and Education (UNITE), who offered the original proposal for WREP, contributed ideas to program coordinators on how they felt the WREP program could be most effective for them.

From long and emotional discussions during earlier meetings, students assembled and presented a list of demands to Dean of Women Edna Pope, WREP Coordinator Diane Fairchild, Women's Studies Department Chairman Eileen Rossi and WREP Advisor Alexa Nickliss.

Primary demands provide for equal student decision-making power with faculty and administrators who coordinate the program and a commitment from WREP for more adequate child care facilities.

WREP coordinators read the demands, supported by a petition signed by over 200 students, and with the exception of Nickliss, questioned the desirability of equal student representation on the WREP governing board. Edna Pope angrily expressed her fear that students would take over the program. Coordinators also voiced concern over accountability of students to administration.

"Since when has the administration been accountable to students," asked Pat Condray, a 32-year-old student and mother of two. "We can agree to be mutually accountable by having equal representation," she suggested.

Program Adviser Nickliss agreed, stating, "If we don't listen to students, the program will go down the tubes."

Regarding child care, coordinators maintain that women could be referred to community child care centers while student mothers at the meetings asserted that their experience has shown these facilities to be inadequate and/or expensive.

While these issues have not yet been settled, students are standing firm in their commitment to the realization of demands as the basis for a successful WREP program.

Campus Views

Question: How has this semester been worthwhile for you?

Harriet Smith - Psychology
I'm graduating. I got my last few units in. I've learned more this semester and had some good instructors. Personally I have more to get serious about.

Lee Grover - General Education
You have to take into account that I'm only here to get a couple of units for transfer. In that respect it has been worthwhile. I haven't done as well as I would have liked, but it's as well as I expected.

Ellen Greenwald - Nursing
It hasn't been. I've taken the wrong classes. I go to school instead of working; it's more relaxed and gives me a chance to meet more people and to get more exposure.

Marilyn MacDonald - Dentistry
I really enjoyed this semester. This is my second semester; I was going to transfer but I put it off because I like the campus and the people. A lot of personal growth has occured this semester. All and all its been very worthwhile.

Jimmy Tihoe - General Education
It's been worthwhile for me coming in contact with people and communicating. I now have the ability for future success. I also have a better understanding of today's educational process.

Raymond Jeung - Hotel and Restaurant
I'm learning mostly. I'm closer to my goals. I have a definite major. Also I got to meet a lot of new people. I'm looking forward to next semester; it should be better.Every semester seems to be better.

Johns Hide Much Talent

As many a captive viewer has noted, there is a veritable storehouse of art, literature and advertising enshrined on the men's room walls at City College.

It's only logical to ask, why waste it? Why not do something with it?

The school could have an annual men's room door festival, with prizes for the most detailed art work; the broadest vocabulary of four letter words; and the best poetry in the catagories of "just plain dirty", "not quite as dirty", and "funny dirty".

There could be a special category for racial slurs. And of course, carving would have to be judged in a class by itself.

Student Council could appoint a toilet stall advertising manager and set regular rates. These would be determined by the number of lines, and by the degree of permanency of the ad. Ads carved onto doors and walls should, of course, cost more than those merely scrawled on.

There are other ways of dealing with men's room beautification. Students could, without too much difficulty, use things like paper or canvas for their creative works; and maintenance workers could clean the crud off the walls.

No one seems to think much of these last two ideas, but we suggest trying them. They might work.

Traffic Jams a Problem

Sunny days and inconsiderate students, put them together and what have you got? A traffic jam in front of the arts building is the answer. Students standing gossiping on the walk way between the Arts Building and the Visual Arts Building seem to be intent on blocking traffic passing through the area.

On any given sunny morning hordes of jabbering students may be found milling around, blocking the walk way.

These students seem to have nothing better to do than to cause other students who want to get to class a difficult time when passing through this area.

Inconsiderate students stand in large groups in the middle of the walkway and are indifferent to those students who have to push their way through the yacking mob.

"No loitering" signs shouldn't be necessary to solve this problem. Those students who are guilty of blocking traffic should use their own common sense, if they have any, and gather somewhere else, where they would be less bothersome to students who want to get to class on time.

Praise For Child Care

Adequate child care for the parent who wishes to attend college is most difficult to find. High costs and long waiting lists, which are often the case, are discouraging.

At City College there is a quality child care center available to students.

The Center is located in Bungalow B-7, at the north end of the football field, next to the B-300 bungalows.

This semester 90 children applied, 78 were accepted. There are plans now in the making to absorb the other 12.

Forty-five enrollees are children of returning parents or those who are close to graduation. The returning parents are given first priority over all new students.

The center, although it handles the 78 children in a one week period, provides them with a creative and intimate atmosphere. It has a ratio of 1 teacher to every 5 children.

The director of the center is always present, overseeing the activities and handling any problems that occur.

The workability of this facility stems, in part, from the interest the staff has in the youngsters and the desire to make it a positive experience for all.

Organizing efforts of the parents have also helped the center to flourish.

All of this effort shows that people do care and want to maintain a child care center that will fill the needs of the children, as well as those of the student-parents.

Right on. Mike Hutcheson, no seperate (sic) lavatories for faculty and students!

Now let's finish the job, no seperate (sic) lavatories for men and women—like in Europe.

Hey, why not change the Guardsman to Guardsperson?

Cause of Death With Students is Suicide

Joe Student has few friends, few interests, dates seldom, keeps his room in a mess, and doesn't care about his personal appearance. He may or may not have hassles with his parents. He is moody, and he complains of discomforts and possible ailments.

When Joe Student says he's going to kill himself if he doesn't pass his history course, he shouldn't be taken lightly.

Joe is suffering from symptoms common to those college students who attempt or accomplish suicide.

It is predicted that 100,000 students will consider suicide as a way out of their problems this year; 10,000 of those students will attempt it, and 1,000 will succeed.

Suicide is second to accidents as cause of death among college students in America.

This alarming rate of suicide has been attributed by psychologists to the lack of ability of students to adjust to campus life. The impersonal approach found at many colleges seems to be a major factor.

Pressure of tests doesn't appear to be an important factor in student suicides. Most suicides take place at the beginning of the semester.

Suicidal students tend to hide their depression, but do give hints of their contemplation of suicide, such as Joe Student's threat of suicide if he fails his test. These hints often go unnoticed until too late.

CONCERT—"Summer in the City", a dance-show-party-concert on Friday, June 14 from 8 pm to 2 am, at California Hall, Polk at Turk streets. Featured are the two "Battle of the Bands" winners: Approaching Storm (funk) and Poo-Crau (sixties). San Francisco's own W.C. Fields will make a personal appearance.

Tickets may be purchased at the Student Union Building, Room 206.

Guardsman Survey Shows Women With More Complaints Than Men

In a recent survey conducted by the Guardsman, a majority of students felt that their counselor did not alert them to a broad range of career opportunities.

"He is always rushing me out", responded one student. "He never has asked me what I want to do, he tells me the requirements, that's all. He is a catalogue interpreter, a requirement pusher; he is a waste of time."

When students were asked if they have the same scholastic opportunities in their class as the opposite sex, a majority of the men answered yes, while a majority of women answered no.

"Employers want workers more familiar with the field," reported a women student, "Or some one, who has had experience, such as men. They don't trust women even if they have experience because employers are conditioned to hire men. Women are hired for menial tasks".

All of the women who answered the question felt that they would make use of a counseling center on campus designed exclusively for women.

A response to this question was, "I think it's important to have women counselors as well as men, who are aware of women's problems."

When women students were asked if any of their teachers displayed attitudes or practices that discriminate against women, a large number responded yes. "Teacher's don't take women seriously, they answer questions with cute remarks. Women are given different attention. Men are slighted sometimes when women ask questions; the subject matter gets less attention. The attention is on a sexual level with women."

Of the men who answered the same question many felt that teachers don't discriminate against them.

The majority of women felt that teachers don't display attitudes or practices that discriminate against men. A majority of men felt that women were being discriminated against by teachers.

Students who answered the question whether or not the child care center on the campus met their needs, a majority felt overwhelmingly that it did not. Some commented that it doesn't have enough facilities for number of children who need it, and "There are not enough hours of care and there is a waiting list."

Men felt that they don't have better career opportunities than women. A man responded that, "Going into medicine, females have an advantage now." Women felt that they don't have the same career opportunities as men.

Historical Persons Symbolized in Play

Alex Horn's play Adam King is an interesting but uneven work. The performance by the Everyman's Theatre is also interesting but faulty.

The play states that the lives and deaths of John and Robert Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. were linked in a common struggle; and their assassinations the result of a latent conspiracy among the industrial and military moguls, aided and abbetted by a self-seeking humanity.

At the heart of this occasionally windy allegory is a gimmick which provides part of the play's strength and much of its weakness. The actors are not allowed to merely symbolize the historical characters. They are required to look and sound like them too. Physically, this worked amazingly well. But the attempted imitation of Kennedy Bostonese was—at best—only close, and—at worst—highly distracting.

The presentation was further weakened by an over-reliance on mannerism in direction, and the use of too many people. Time and again choruses or actors were required to tap dance on and off stage or strike peculiar postures.

Despite these weaknesses, there were some strong, memorable moments in the play, such as the satirical gatherings of the conspirators, the moment when Topman (symbolizing Joseph Kennedy) pleads for the life of his son Adam King (JFK, of course), or when Mrs. King, lamenting the loneliness of her life as first lady, says "I am choked with regrets—bored, bored, bored. I only wish someone would look down on me for a change."

With two exceptions, the performances were amaturish, but enjoyable. Thomas Boyland, Frank Triest and Martin Bernbaum carried off their roles as Adam King, Topman, and Luke fairly well, and author-coproducer Horn was an entertaining, if not always convincing devil-like Tyrant.

Cedric James was fair but uneven in his role of Joseph Man (Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.)

The exceptional performances were turned in by Lauri Cook, as Adam King's wife, and Dennis Cloherty as Mathew King (RFK).

The trouble is only Cook's performance was good. Throughout the evening her acting was cool, poised and well-paced.

Cloherty, on the other hand, was more a victim of both his role and his lines.

Possibly through no fault of his own (he may have been wearing a mouthpiece) most of his lines were indistinguishable. But what could be distinguished might better not have been. His emoting was wooden and unconvincing, and his delivery too often rushed and breathless.

Despite the unevennesses and shortcomings, though, Adam King, at the Everyman Theatre, 24th and Mission Streets, is worth seeing.

Local Port Uses Containerization Method

Oakland, the home of baseball's world champions, the A's, does more than just produce winning ball clubs. It has also the second largest port facility in the United States and third largest in the world.

This was not true a decade ago. Containerization, the more efficient method of handling cargo, and the foresight of the Oakland Port Commission are responsible for the rapid growth of the port.

The container looks like the trailer of a truck, (and in most cases is the trailer) is loaded with cargo, either at the port or the point of origin. Cargo once loaded on a ship by sling is now fully automated and handled by massive cranes usually part of the port facilities.

The advantages of this method of shipping can be seen in the growth figures of the Oakland Port. In 1963, prior to the development of modern container facilities, the port handled just over two million tons of cargo. In 1973 over seven million tons were shipped through the port, a 1000 percent increase.

One out of five Oakland residents depends on the port economically. There are 23,000 persons employed directly by the port with another 46,000 who depend on port activity.

The Oakland Port Commission has not remained stagnant. It has gone beyond its investments in port facilities. It now encompasses everything from the port to the Oakland International Airport to Jack London Square and to an Industrial Park.

The Port of Oakland has a decided advantage over San Francisco's port, the room to grow. Finger piers, designed to handle break-bulk cargo which characterize San Francisco, do not require the land space necessary for container ports.

San Francisco's ports are also being modernized. However, they do not show the same growth potential.

A walk through the Oakland port contrasts sharply with a similar walk along San Francisco's Embarcadero. In the East Bay the port facilities are new, bordered by park area. The dark dreary atmosphere is gone. The old pier sheds have been replaced with vast parking lots able to accommodate thousands of containers waiting to be loaded aboard ships.

The Industrial Park is five minutes from Oakland's International Airport and 10 minutes from the port. Originally planned for warehouses, distribution centers and light manufacturing plants, it is becoming primarily an office center. This is due to the rise in land value from $40,000 in 1964 to $125,000 an acre in 1974.

One of Oakland's most famous residents was not forgotten when a square containing restaurants, shops, motels and the main office of the Port of Oakland was developed.

Jack London, one of America's foremost writers, known by young and old alike, spent many hours of his youth in the early years of the twentieth century working and drinking on Oakland's docks.

Jack London Square is unlike the harbor area during London's days there. He couldn't afford the price of a beer there today. But it reminds all visitors this was his home.

London was a drinker. His favorite haunt on the docks was the First and Last Chance Saloon. It is the only remaining structure of his day. The author of "The Sea Wolf" would not be comfortable on the docks of Oakland today. It is possible he would fail to recognize the area for what it is, a port.

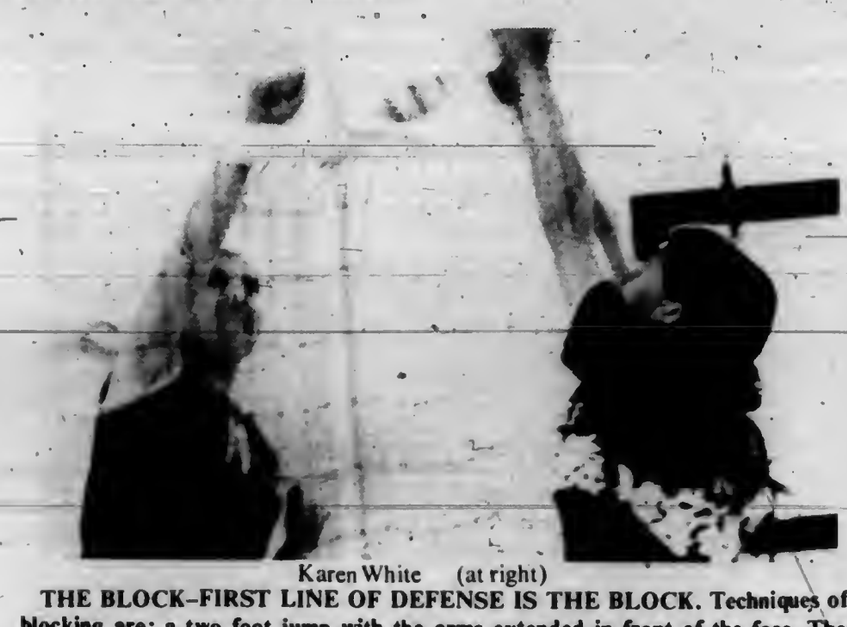
The Five Basic Fundamental Skills of Playing Volleyball

Rosa Chase (at left)

SPIKE–Effectiveness of the spike is based largely upon the quality of the pass and the set. The spike is executed at the height of a jump and the hand is above the net at the time of ball contact. The ball should be contacted with the heel of the spiking hand and the hand continues over with a wrist snap for the follow through.

Sylvia Louie

FOREARM PASS–This is the basic method of ball handling employed by a player. Important things to remember when executing this skill are: hands should be held together elbows straght, arms parallel to the floor; feet positioned comfortably for balance and the legs straightened at time of contact. It is a defensive technique that is utilized to "save" the ball from hitting the floor so that it can be played offensively by one's teammates.



Karen White

THE SERVE–The serve is the main offensive tool of a team. The most important aspect of the serve is to get the ball onto the opponent's court and make it as difficult as possible for them to return. The most effective serve is the over-hand serve. The over-hand has an action similar to that of the spike. The ball is hit with the heel of the hand and the hand continues with a wrist snap.

Barbara Hattori

SETTING–The setter is an architect, actually controlling and directing the team's offense. The setter must move quickly to get positioned under the ball. Spotting through a triangle formed by thumbs and index fingers, the setter must hit the ball with finger tips.

Karen White (at right)

THE BLOCK–FIRST LINE OF DEFENSE IS THE BLOCK. Techniques of blocking are; a two foot jump with the arms extended in front of the face. The hands are held ridged with fingers extended and spread. The blockers must watch the ball and the spiker's hand.

Tong Wins ; Sui Upset By Three Points in Ram Last Chance Shoot

"I just can't believe it!" This was the reaction of Albert Tong to his victory over City's number one archer, Dan Sui.

This epic event occurred last Wednesday at CCSF's Last Chance Shoot, the final one before finals.

"It was a great pleasure for me to beat a shooter of Dan's caliber," said Tong.

Tong finished with 73 points out of a possible 80. Sui was second with 70 and Farley Fong third with 69.

The highest point total compiled by a woman was 68 by Betty Ow.

Sui, jovial in victory or defeat, took his loss in stride.

BIG WIN—Albert Tong shot a score of 73 to win final archery meet.

"First, I must congratulate all the shooters for the best shooting I've seen since I began coaching the team," said Sui. He added, "I didn't score well today because I was so happy with our team's progress that I didn't concentrate on my form or aiming."

Players, Owners Make Loyalty And Pride Thing of the Past

The word sports is now useless and antiquated. Another word is more appropriate for sports. That word is Business.

Sports are no longer played for fun or just for the spirit of competition. The motivation in sports is now money.

In the past, an athlete earning 100 thousand dollars a year was rare. Nowadays, it's not unusual to have athletes making as much as 600 thousand dollars a year, as Wilt Chamberlain does. Of course, in basketball, the average player makes about 90 thousand dollars a year, anyway, so Chamberlain's salary is not really that much in relation to his sport.

Don't have any pity of football or baseball. Players in these sports average around 45 thousand dollars a year.

Yet, it's these same athletes who make this good money, who complain the most. Most of the athletes cry about how long their schedule is, or about flying and getting "jet lag," or they don't like playing at night, or that they didn't get real diamonds in their championships rings.

Many athletes do not have any kind of loyalty to their team or teammates. Many of them would jump to another team without batting an eyelash, if he was offered more money.

The worst part of the situation are the owners. They are the ones who have been yelling and screaming the most. The owners complain about how much they have to pay their stars, and how much athletes are demanding more and more money.

Yet, these are the same owners who still pay the outrageous salaries. They are the ones who encourage players to jump to their teams with more money. However, they get upset and start to cry when some other owner pulls the same trick.

Another problem owners have is over-expansion. There are now three football leagues, two baseball leagues, two hockey leagues, and two basketball associations. There is a sports program every night of the week on TV. If one took a logical look at the whole scene, one would realize that sports is going to overexpose itself. Yet, there are still people and cities who are dying to have a major league team.

The fan is the one who is hurt most by the expansion and by overpriced athletes. The majority of the fans still crave sports. However, there is a growing minority who are getting fed up with having to pay to see men who see sports as only a business.

The short-sightedness of the owners and the greediness of the players are in the end going to destroy themselves. After all, the fans sports dollar will stretch only so far. With so many different sports competing for that dollar, pretty soon there will be no dollar to stretch. After all, the fan has a certain power which will render the owners and these athletes totally helpless. They can stay home.

Students Aiding In Hiring Of Physics Teacher

Both students and faculty will participate in the hiring of a new physics teacher, marking the first time that students at City College have had a hand in the hiring process.

Faculty member Paul Hewitt stated that the proceedings are open to any student who has or is currently taking physics; the faculty will be represented by a three man hiring board. The first meeting of the evaluation session was held April 17 and additional meetings are scheduled for May 1 and 8.

Each prospective candidate is required to give a ten minute presentation on some aspect of physics. The presentation is video-taped for future reference.

Evaluation sheets are then distributed among the students who grade the candidate on such criteria as organization, attitude toward subject and students, understanding questions, ability to explain complex questions, quality of ideas, knowledge of subject, and com-

Firecrackers Spark Talk On Physical Education Funding

Ed Hartzler

Associated Students Vice President Martin Poon, speaking at the April 22 meeting of the Board of Governors, asked that the Community College District fund the Physical Education Department. He also requested that the AS Council be allowed to send representatives to future Board meetings in order to facilitate a "closer relationship between the Board a .d the students."

The large contingent of students who attended the meeting seemed to be quite angry at the Board for placing the item concerning P.E. funding last on the agenda ("We're always last on the list," one student shouted.)

At one point, a pack of firecrackers was set off in an attempt to get the Board's attention, which it momentarily did. One individual behind the noisy interruption later stated that the action had "served its purpose. It got the board to pay attention."

Poon's proposal for the P.E. department was based on what he termed the inability of the Council to meet an increasing number of budget requests.

"With students becoming interested in many affairs of the community such as Vietnam, pollution and the like, and with large number of other events (dances, concerts, that the Council must finance), we are asking that the District pick up the tab for the P.E. department."

Evidence was presented showing that while the districts iN San jJose, Merritt, and Diablo Valley pay for all athletic expenses except for meals, and while San Mateo pays for all expenses including meals, the City College of San Francisco District pays for only minor equipment in the women's gym.

In addition, Lena Jew, Recreation Association President, announced that since the college had no buses available for Sportsday, participants would be required to use buses borrowed from other colleges.

The Board referred this request back to Superintendent Louis Batmale who would investigate the matter and report

BOARD MEMBER ZURETTI GOOSBY — Says Board of Governors could be used as court of appeals for students.

KCSF Director Blasts Council For "Gross Inconsiderations"

BOB SUMMERS — Cites Council for "gross inconsiderations."

Bob Summers, KCSF News Director, cited Associated Students Council for "gross inconsiderations" for their failure to cancel an April 19 meeting between the organizations in which only two council members attended.

Summers, in a KCSF editorial, complained that thirteen councilmen, including President Tom Lai, were absent. Lai was attending a conference with three of his colleagues in Sacramento.

The purpose of the meeting, according to the two council representatives, Florence Chan and Dora Liang, was to iron out the difficulties now standing between KCSF and AS. "It seems that student Council has grievances against KCSF and that KCSF has grievances against Student Council, Chan remarked.

The grievances stem from a request by the campus radio station for $2500 from council. That bid was turned down, and $500 was voted toward KCSF.

Summers claimed that the $500 was a bribe to keep quite. He also said that council had appropriated another $500 to the Free Critic when they had only come out with one issue at that time.

Chan flatly refused the bribery accusation. "The request for $2500 was, I feel, too much and council could not afford it," she noted. "It was not a token or a bribe. We were very sorry we couldn't give you $2500."

Summers also stated that Judy Kay, former AS President, had objected to another KCSF editorial he had written. "Any one who disagrees with an editorial is free to come up and rebutt it," Summers explained.

The failure of Kay to show at the meeting was "uncalled for," according to Summers. "It is a grave insult to me that Judy Kay was not here," he said.

Summers pointed out that "no solutions were resolved to the problems because of the "gross inconsideration" by council's failure to cancel the meeting."

College Requests $733,000 From Extended Opportunity Program

City College has requested $733,000 from the Extended Opportunity Program for the 1971-72 budget.

Howard Schoon, Director of Special Education, announced his request from the Office of the Chancellor of California Community Colleges in Sacramento. The funds would go towards grants-in-aid, books tutoring, additional counselling, and other services for needy students at City College.

The chances of that sum being accepted are not very likely. Schoon said he did not see approval of that amount as very likely, although he indicated that it is a realistic figure based on the actual needs of the some 1900 "disadvantaged students currently enrolled on campus."

In submitting the $733,000 request, he said that there was some merit in "telling those needs as they are."

Presently, the Office of Special Education is operating on a budget of $250,266 allocated by the California Community Colleges through the EOP.

A breakdown on that sum shows that $188,257 have gone to student grants; $48,824 to work study assignments; $9,885 to cover instructor services in the Readiness Program; $2,800 to special counselling services; and $500 to materials and supplies.

Additional funds have been made available from the Ford Foundation Project.

City gained $46,000 in that grant, which will be expended in equal installments over ten quarters. The budget allocates $13,000 for Programmed Learning Materials; $15,000 for additional counselling; $15,000 for additional tutoring; and $3,000 for personal costs.

Four quarters or another year of funding remain in the project.

Two Days Left In City Blood Drive

Students have two days left to donate a pint of blood to the City College Blood drive being held at Statler Wing.

The first day of the college's 17th annual blood drive was Wednesday, April 28. Sponsors foresaw a first day turnout possibly exceeding last year's total which accumulated 196 pints.

City is attempting to break their own West Coast Community College record for pints given.

Another goal of this drive is to aid seven year old Jon Hoy, a victim of anemia. Jon and many children like him need blood, but cannot afford the cost.

The donors also build a blood bank account which supplies blood to them or to any member of their family for one year if needed.

Greek Council is urging everyone to participate in donating a pint of blood. Statler will be open from 8am to 4pm April 29 and 30.

Students To Vote On Registration System

A new registration system is being proposed and a ballot will be held on campus in the beginning of May.

A questionnaire will appear in next week's issue of The Guardsman (May 6) . Students are requested to vote on the method of registration preferred.

The alternative system offers students the chance to vote for registration on total units completed coupled with a rotating alphabet system. For example, students with surnames contained in the letters W-Z could take the first three registration hours, A-F the next three hours, and so on.

The alphabet system substitutes students total number of grade points (as presently adopted).

Priority would however be granted to technical course students (such as students following a continuous 2-year program in such specialized fields as medical assissting and hotel and catering).

The current system can be broken down into three phases

Top priority is given to technical students and transfer students (going from CCSF to a four-year college).

Second priority is provided for continuing students holding numbers over 3500.

Finally, general registration is opened for re-admits, new students (including SF public high school graduates, taken on a school rotation basis), and the general public.

Rah, rah . . . Siss boom bah Boom a lacka . Yay, School!

By Jim Toland

The Guardsman has recently been criticized for not writing editorials concerning "relevant" happenings on campus.

Instead of concerning ourselves with "outdated" issues such as the 18 year old vote, some readers feel that we at the Guardsman should only involve ourselves with events that are happening on campus.

These readers think that more editorials should be written regarding Associated Student Body Cards, attendance at baseball games and the crisis surrounding the selection of a new campus seal.

The Guardsman feels that we may have indeed neglected the interests of these people and we would like to take a few moments out to say "Rah rah sis boom bah . . . boom-a-lacka, boom-a-lacka . . . yay school, yay team . . . rah rah . . . yay City College." If they would send us six dancing girls with nice legs and pom poms we might really be able to get excited.

City College is a fine school, it has one of the highest ratings in the nation among junior colleges.

Most of the instructors here are very well qualified to hold their positions and some are even noted experts in their fields.

City College is a very functional institution providing its students with an exceptional education. We are fortunate to have these many educational facilities available to us.

Since we feel that many of the "major issues" at CCSF reflect the shallow consciousness of non-worldly, uninvolved people, we can not even begin to develop an interest in some of the silly things that some people find so gravely serious.

The Guardsman staff is encouraged to write editorials and columns concerning real problems in the real world.

Most of us feel sorry for anyone who has allowed school to become his entire life or his whole world. We think that many of the students and some of the instructors in City College have been in school a little too long.

Some of these people have been in a classroom continuously since nursery school. We think that it is about time for some of these people to look around and see what other human beings are doing and what else is happening in the world around them.

School, like anything else, becomes a prison if you let it limit you. It is sad to see a prisoner, but it is sickening to see a person who wants to become one. Although some of our staff members have made a religion of their limitations most of us try not to confine ourselves and we will not voluntarily put the chains on.

If there is enough happening at City College to totally absorb your interest please do not criticize us for not agreeing with you. Henry Thoreau said it best: "If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer. Let him step to the music which he hears, however, measured or far away."

Wierdos On Campus And Other Sorrows

By Joe Konte

Sometimes I wonder if I'm the only sane creature at City College. Do you know any of the strange people who go here? Let me introduce you to them.

• Greta Granny Gown — She usually is in her twenties, but looks almost forty with those godawful long baggy dresses. The only way you could tell she's a woman is that only a woman would wear something so ugly.

• Suzy cigarettes — Old Suz' looks like she just rose out of a magic lamp with all that smoke hovering over her head. I wish she'd do some magic and disappear. Cough, cough.

• Larry Liberal — He wears shoulder length hair and usually wears a sportscoat. His conversations run from Shakespeare to the psychological problems of a vending machine, where he hath just loseth his final dime.

• Janice Jeans — A real individual. Only her and 5,000 other gals are wearing bluejeans. She usually wears them so tight, I can hardly breathe when I stare at them.

• Jimmy Jock — Jimmy is the ex-football player who shows off his massive shoulders and beer belly by wearing his alma mater's jersey. He'll carry a jacket around with him in 40 degree weather just to let you realize how special they are.

• Priscilla Peep Show — Where there are stairs to be climbed, there is a Priscilla. Her dresses keep everybody warm but her, and when she hikes the steps . . . well, as the song goes: "You can see forever."

• Harry Hairy — Dangling locks and a straggly beard protrude from his head and face. It reminds me of the story where an old lady asked a long-bearded fellow why he looked the way he did. "I'm revolting," he said. Boy that's for sure.

• Betty Baretop — Betty is the well endowed broad with no visible means of support. Doesn't she know it's unsafe to run down the stairs when only wearing a tight sweatshirt. I might trip.

• Clifford Cliche — This guy's vocabulary consists of three phrases: "right on," "power to the people," and "far out." He's a hit at rallies because when the speakers say some earthshaking statement which no one understands, Cliff shouts out, "Right on." And like that is the heavy information. Are you hep?

• Sherri Stretchpants — I've seen better bottoms in wells. It doesn't take a raving beauty or a sex goddess to wear them. All the girl needs is a little "hindsight."

• Tommy Tough — Tommy just hangs around with his gang and stares at all the "uncool" people. His suave, sophisticated lines include: "Hey, baby," "where's the action," and "wow."

• Irene In-Crowd — She does the answering when Tommy says, "hey baby." Irene can chew a whole pack of gum while smoking her cigarette, and still talk. Her lines include: "hey, man," "where's the action," and "wow."

• Joey Judge — He's the guy who passes judgment on people by putting them into stereotypes. Between you and me, I think he's the guy with the real problem.

Dear Diary

By Ron Patrick

Dear Diary,

Another day is gone; a new day is in the making.

I am the eye of the storm, the ego-center of an adolescent whirlpool; spinning furiously, blindly, bursting free of my childhood cocoon while plunging forward in crucial effort to the fulfillment of "maturity." The forces of transition are ripping my body limb-from-soul. I am teetering perilously between energies that are tidal, unfamiliar, relentless. I am youth, and like so many others, I am searching for identity.

I am born again by the tides of fresh experience. I desire the revelations of introspection and yet, contact with the bustling world. I desire honesty, but soon realize that I must wade through an endless swamp of deceit and hypocrisy to discover its meaning. I desire honor and sincerity, but find instead, innumerable persons rationalizing that you must cheat to "get ahead."

I desire love, in the fullest, most universal sense of its meaning, but face hatred, wickedness, contempt, as it chokes my morality. I desire Jesus, but like all things spiritual and intangible, find Him difficult to grasp. Above all, I desire the self-respect, wisdom and security which seemingly create happiness. But happiness is an end only fulfilled through the experience of suffering.

"To touch, to see, to know — A hint of light, a glimpse of darkness before you go. . ."

I must unleash the potential within myself while adhering to the spoils of social conformity. I must discover myself as a bridge between ideals and reality, a thing of value, a vehicle through which culture perceives and transforms itself into something pure and enduring. I demand expression. I must be accepted by this world and given hope — or I will despair and turn to rage.

I am yet a primitive man. I exist within a quagmire of uncertainty. I realize the possibilities of life, but only in cloudy, contradictory ways. This vigorous energy of mind and body is a preponderance of my youth and is largely at odds with social prescription, the "status quo."

I seek to "grow" — inwardly and outwardly — through the discovery and responsibility of freedom, but often feel crushed by culture, trapped in tradition, locked behind law.

I must dare to be different, or indeed, I may lose my identity before it's been found. I seek understanding, encouragement, guidance. It is my right to be young.

A Parking Place for $7.50

By Bruce Bosso

Seven dollars and fifty cents is a lot of money. It can buy a couple of tanks of gas, a couple pairs of pants, or a City College Student Body Card.

For a tank of gas you can drive your car quite a ways, pants will keep you warm, but what does a Student Body Card give you?

The official party line of the Associated Students tells one that a Student Body Card gives him, "Discounts at various stores, reduced rates of admission at student activities, and a parking permit."

However, most of the discounts are at a store where even discounted merchandise can be purchased elsewhere much cheaper.

The discounts for student activities are often non-existent, and even if a person went to every activity, he would be hard pressed to make up his $7.50.

So it seems that one is paying $7.50 for a parking permit and when asked this question, Dean Samuels responded, "Yes, but if we charged $7.50 only for a parking permit, all money collected would have to be used for maintenance of the reservoir, this way (making money by selling student body cards) we can use the money as we please."

Students should not be bribed by traffic tickets. If a student must be charged for active membership in the Student Association, then the price should be reasonable.

Two or three dollars would be fair. If a student did not drive a car to school, he could still purchase one and not feel he was blindly robbed.

So, if the present rate continues not many cards will sell. After all, $7.50 is a lot to pay for a parking permit.

"We really wish more mommas would bring down their children, and talk with us about it at the center . . ."

Personality of the Week

"I am going to tell you how the world looked to me before I was introduced to and became well acquainted with the works of Kahlil Gibran, and where I see life now."

Thus began 35 year old LaVerne Lobdell, ex-convict, philosopher, and guest speaker at the campus Newman Center on April 15.

LaVerne began his spiritual metamorphosis when a cellmate gave him a book of essays by H.L. Mencken. He was turned on by the cynical humor of Mencken, who put LaVerne's thoughts into words which he himself was unable to express.

LaVerne Lobdell

Where LaVerne had never before read anything more profound than Perry Mason, he then began to read Plato, Emerson, Nietsche, Schopenhauer, Voltaire, Heiddeger and Sartre. He began intensive introspection.

Upon release from prison, he realized that life is task, became a self-appointed disciple of Gibran, and set out hitch-hiking around the country reciting from such Gibran works as "Voice of the Master" and "Secrets of the Heart."

Of his years spent in over 50 jails, LaVerne says that he has no complaints regarding his life because he who complains doubts life. "For my years in prison I regret nothing. My sorrows have taught me to understand the sorrows of my fellow man."

"Once in a while a misfortune (such as imprisonment) forces a person out of the rat race of daily living and causes him to introspect. If prison was necessary to awaken me and bring me here, I could not possibly have any regrets."

He also feels that the "Love thy neighbor" imperative which implies that loving others is a sacrifice, is a misconception. One need not sacrifice anything to love and "we need the love of others for self-preservation."

LaVerne believes that books do not provide answers on the meaning of life and that "anyone who tells you that he has The Answer is a fool. A book can only prepare us for an experience that takes place."

LaVerne has been seeking a publicity agent to aid him in obtaining speaking engagements. A large Los Angeles agency which also handles Jane Fonda has expressed an interest in him, but this will not materialize until the fall.

Meanwhile, he hopes to find a spiritually oriented commune for the summer, where he can obtain food and shelter in exchange for his services.

He is presently available for speaking engagements and if any campus organization is interested, he can be contacted via the Newman Center, 210 Phelan Avenue.

Food Conspiracy-- A New Deal

There are a group of people in the Bay Area who are investigating and taking action on the high costs and impersonal distribution of food.

The Food Conspiracy is a non-profit, volunteer organization which enables the buyer to purchase fresh food at extremely low prices.

A licensed food co-op, the Conspiracy was founded over a year ago in Berkeley. It expanded to San Francisco in June of 1970 and there are now over 50 Food Conspiracies in the Bay Area. With 40 in Berkeley and 10 in San Francisco, they are multiplying rapidly.

Members of a Food Conspiracy who wish to place an order usually meet in a designated area where they are each presented with a current list of food items and their prices.

A member then selects the food he needs and pays the amount for what he is buying.

The buyers, who are also customers, purchase the food either at the Farmer's or Wholesale Produce Markets. Items are bought in large quantities, thus a low price is maintained.

An average of 25 to 40 families patronize each neighborhood Conspiracy weekly. The Mission Conspiracy has grown so large, that it has become necessary to divide it into North and South Mission stations.

For further information, phone:
Bernal Heights 285-3857
Sunset 661-0383
Noe Valley 647-4205
Other numbers are available through the Haight-Ashbury Switchboard at 387-7000.

Through marketing with the Food Conspiracy, a person can help himself and his community obtain high quality food at low prices.

Ideas In The Love Of Wisdom

The word philosophy is derived from the Greek word PHILOS ("loving and SOPHIA ("wisdom") and means "the love of knowledge and wisdom."

In a general sense, a person's philosophy is the sum of his fundamental beliefs and convictions. In this sense every one has a philosophy, even though he does not realize it. All people have some ideas concerning physical objects, man, the meaning of life, nature, death, God, right and wrong, and beauty and ugliness.

Of course these ideas are acquired in a variety of ways. Especially during the early years of our lives, we are continuously engaged, with varying degrees of consciousness, in acquiring views and attitudes from our family, from companions, and from various individuals and groups. These attitudes may come to us through customs and tradition. They may be influenced by the movies, radio, television and books. They may be the result of some thinking on our part; or they may be largely the result of convention.

Philosophy is a group of problems as well as theories about the solution of these problems. It presses its inquiry into the deeper problems which concern mankind and for which philosophers have always sought answers.

What are philosophical questions? "I wonder, did you see the movie last night?" This is merely a fact and far from being philosophical. But the questions, "what is truth?" and "what is the distinction between right or wrong?" have philosophical importance.

Most of us stop at times — either because we are forced to by startling events or even out of sheer curiosity — and think seriously about fundamental life issues.

We may often hear someone say that it does not matter what a person believes so long as he does the right thing, which means some people have a tendency to value action or deeds over beliefs and convictions. But ideas are the foundation of action, and a person is not likely to make any effort to act unless he believes something.

There is a deep tendency in all of us to become whatever we think of ourselves to be; as a result, ideas have a decisive power in human history.

City Alumni Depicts Transfer Problems

A recent transfer student to San Francisco State College from City College, depicted some of the problems with which students are confronted when transferring from a community college to a four-year institution.

A student must make a variety of adjustments when transferring to a four-year institution from a junior college. Upon entering, one finds himself confronted with a completely new mode of educational procedure.

To begin with, each new and readmit student must undergo a rigorous week of becoming acquainted with the college procedures. The orientation begins with briefings which inform the student of the on-campus clubs and organizations. These briefings are followed by others concerning requirements for obtaining a degree. The classes labeled as "core courses" which pertain to the student's selected major, are required in order to obtain a degree.

State College, like other state-supported institutions, is divided into special sections called "schools." For example, English majors may belong to the School of Humanities while business majors belong to the School of Business and so on.

The next phase of orientation involves a discussion of the student's program with an advisor. Professors teaching in the Schools also offer guidance

Unlike City College, San Francisco State has no pre-registration system. Registration is based on seniority status — e.g., graduate, senior, junior, sophomore, then freshman registration. All students above your grade level have priority in registration.

After orientation and registration, other problems begin to show themselves. One of the major problems lies in the mental adjustment one must make. The atmosphere at State College is "formal" in certain respects and "relaxed" in others. Students seem older at a four-year institution. A good number of them have families to care for. They seem to take a more serious outlook on the values of education than the younger students.

Instructional procedure at State College is quite different from that of City College. Where community colleges offer only introductory courses on the curriculum, four-year institutions offer more advanced and in-depth programs of study. Research and study for courses can no longer be taken as casual matters.

Freedom of choice in courses at San Francisco State College takes predominance, providing "core courses" have been completed. Supposedly, the role of the junior college has aided the student in completing this task, so that when he transfers, he will be prepared to begin in-depth work on his major.

• Organic Foods Are In Vogue •

There are over 50 million organic home gardeners in the United States. All across the country organic food stores are prospering and becoming more popular everyday. Still, many people doubt the validity of eating organic foods for health; they think that it is merely some sort of fad or a change in someone's daily routine so that they can say they are part of the ecology scene. Here is a chance for you to judge for yourself.

In a nationwide survey by Associated Press it was found that cyclamates are still being sold, despite the FDA (Food and Drug Administration) banning the sale of this artificial sweetener after Sept. 1, 1970. The FDA has done nothing to enforce the order!

Processing and refinement of foods was discussed by Dr. Henry A. Schroeder of Dartmouth Medical School with a Senate subcommittee on August 26, 1970. He said, "Most of the trace elements essential for health are removed from processed foods. The residue of mill feeds which is rich in trace elements is fed to domestic animals."

Soft drink additives are called "illegal" by a Salk Institute researcher associated with Ralph Nader's Center for the Study of Responsive Law. In a recent Canadian laboratory experiment, the additive was shown to induce damage to the liver, heart, thyroid and kidneys of rats, and to interfere with normal fat metabolism. The FDA quickly removed the additive from the Generally Recognized as Safe list (GRAS), but did not remove it from the market!

The FDA actually has "guidelines" for establishing "acceptable filth levels" in food. This means that cockroach dust, rat excrement, etc. is allowed in food as long as it stays below a certain level.

The FDA recently doubled the amount of the known cancer-causing hormone, diethylstilbestol (DES). This is injected into beef cattle to produce a fast weight gain. It used to be 10 mg. now it is 20 mg. FDA regulations state that this hormone cannot be injected within 48 hours before it is slaughtered. However this restriction is not always observed by cattlemen, because when the price is right the farmer tends to rush the cattle to the slaughterhouse without delay.

The FDA is considering submitting that purple marking on federally inspected meat and poultry that means "safety," to the National Academy of Sciences for safety reevaluation. Canadian tests indicate the color may have carcinogenic (cancer causing) potential. While the FDA is studying this problem, there have been no plans to advise the consumers to trim away the violet government inspection and grading stamps before using meat!

The food preservative, nitrite, can combine with certain amines in the stomach to form a powerful cancer-causing substance known as nitrosamine. Evidence was presented by two University of Nebraska scientists, Dr. Melvin Greenblatt and Sidney Mirvish. Nitrite is found in smoked and cured meats and fish — including hot dogs, ham, corned beef, and luncheon meats.

People are also exposed to increasing amounts of nitrates (which easily converts to nitrites). Nitrate is used in fertilizers and certain herbicides cause accumulation of nitrates in plants and forage. Nitrate is found in drinking water caused by the run-off of nitrate fertilizers into rivers and streams.

Amines are found in trace amounts in certain canned foods; another is permitted as an anti-fungus spray on fruits and vegetables.

"Eyes — Relaxed and Clear"

Some eyes are bright, some are dull and vacant. Some are sad, others are angry. Some are cold and hard, others are soft and warm. The expression of the eyes is the mirror to the soul.

The muscles of the eyes are subject to much tension and what is needed is relaxed exercising of the eyes and the habit of relaxed use of the eyes.

An important thing to remember when using your eyes is to keep them moving in a slow, relaxed manner and to avoid placing them fixedly on objects.

An outstanding exercise for the eyes is this: 1. sit relaxed with shoulders and head straight; 2. visualize a large clock in front of you with the numbers from 1-12; 3. look up as far as possible at the imaginary number 12 on the top of the clock; 4. rhythmically move your eyes slowly to each number (don't allow your head to move); 5. when you have gone around once then perform the exact same movement in a counter-clockwise direction; 6. perform this movement three times alternating from clockwise to counter-clockwise; 7. close your eyes and relax for 30-45 seconds.

Another good exercise is to perform this same one with the eyes closed.

Side effects of drugs are harmful to the eyes. Thiouracil (used for depression and overactive thyroid) causes paralysis of the muscles of the eyes and eyelids, causing them to droop. Prolonged use of acetophenetidin (an ingredient in aspirin), also affects the eyes. Atropine (used for motion sickness) interferes with the eyes in their accommodation of light and darkness.

A deficiency of riboflavin and calcium has been found to produce cataracts. Vitamin A and riboflavin must be emphasized in the balanced diet.

Good for enriching vision are sunflower seeds (rich in Vitamin A and D, calcium, phosphorous and iron), juniper berries, rosemary, honey, raw carrot juice, and brewer's yeast.

Eyewash to use is from sassafrass pith made into tea and dropped from an eyedropper. Any tea used must be strained.

You only get two so take care of them.

Weiners and Other Garbage

Anybody for a hotdog? Well if the answer is yes, maybe this will change your mind.

Sodium nitrite and sodium nitrate are used in food as a coloring (red) and a food preservative. They are found in sausages, canned meats, cured meats and fish.

Both these chemicals have never been shown to be cancer agents, however there still is a danger. It is known that a compound called nitrosamine (composed of nitrite and a secondary amine) is definitely carcinogenic (cancerous).

In a scientific article presented in Nature, Jan. 3, 1970 Dr. William Lijinsky, of the University of Nebraska's Eppley Institute for research in cancer, gave evidence at a Food And Drug Administration seminar showing positive laboratory induction of cancer when mice were fed nitrites and three different types of secondary amines.

Dr. Liginsky said, "The findings so far show that nitroso compounds (nitrosamines) are able to elicit tumors in almost all organs and tissues. There is no reason to suspect that man is immune to their action."

Where does one find nitrosamines? They are found in tobacco smoke, in wheat and rye, in beer and other alcoholic beverages, and in higher concentrations in nitrite-preserved fishmeal animal feeds. It is very difficult to detect nitrosamines, especially in low concentrations.

It should also be pointed out that nitrates destroy vitamin A stores within the body. Nitrates make it impossible for carotene (found in carrots and other yellow vegetables) to convert into vitamin A.

Another source of nitrate is the increasing use of nitrate fertilizers. This chemical treatment of the land concentrates nitrate in crops and pollutes drinking water supplies that receive the run-off from nitrate treated fields. Whether we like it or not our bodies are being exposed to nitrates.

Some will say that since the people have very little control over the environmental misuse of nitrates why should they worry about a hotdog, or for that matter any other nitrate filled food?

It is a matter of elimination. The more you cut down on nitrate foods the better chance you have of surviving. Also knowing that your diet might consist of nitrate you can better understand the need for eating nutritional foods rich in vitamin A or the taking of Vitamin A supplements.

Blacks Out of Proportion?

The proportional number of black men drafted in the service is a recognizably higher percentage than that of the white men drafted. Why?

To start with, opportunities on the college level has been a fairly recent turnover. Financial aid for so-called minorities was booming in 1967, contrasting to this date. Many blacks within concentrated metropolitan areas have not been lucky enough to be accepted into various colleges. Or some do not wish to pursue higher education. Many blacks that do not finish high school, either find petty jobs working for racist corporations, or small businessmen. Some may find it easier to hustle or peddle dope. Objectively, blacks that do finish high school, find it almost equally hard to find a good paying job. The black men either on the streets or "slaving" on a bare minimum salary, are pulled in as first draft choices. Therefore, being forced into fighting a war to defend their motherland, to promote freedom and peace . . . Peace? Does one hear a contradiction? The point at hand: The black man is easily subject to the draft. Another problem: What to do with the number of black Viet vets returning? Will they be suppressed into another cycle of rejection?

This question can be viewed in different aspects. But some measures recently proposed, seem to start action to help these vets.

The Department of Human Resources Development claims they are "trying to recruit from 50-60 employment specialists" to structure this whole program. Dr. Leon Sullivan, the first black member of General Motors board of directors, had some views expressed in the Chronicle (3-15). "100,000 Negro veterans are returning from Vietnam, many facing the possibility of no job opportunities." Recognizing this inevitable fact, he added, "These young men coming back aren't going to take the stuff they did before they went in."

In rebuttal to Dr. Sullivan's statement, Doug Hayward, a white spokesman, who is Information Editor for this Northern California chapter program, stressed, "Human Resources has been working on this for some time. We have a real aggressive program of finding jobs for returning vets."

Gilbert L. Shiffield, the Human Resources Development Department Director, recently issued a special message to all California employers to support the major drive to find jobs for vets. He emphasized employers "should utilize one of the on-the-job training programs administered through the State Dept. of H.R.D."

As clearly shown, some efforts are being made to cope with this ever-increasing problem. But will only a minute percentage of vets be granted these opportunities? More programs as such should be implemented.

"Nature, or —"

The moon, low in the western horizon
Is a deep blood-red, showing
Through the blackness of the ocean and sky;
Is there a natural cause for the tint
Of blood, or—
Is it a reflection—
Of the letting of man's blood
Through the blackness of man's heart?

Dear Mr. President,
Today i heard the sound of a baby crying, as overhead planes flew by dropping napalm bombs to hush the world below.
I heard the scream of death
this day coming from a young, lovely woman, but while bombs flew overhead, they had no time to stop and listen.
I, today, have heard the unfinished conversation, cut short by a bayonett swift.
I have also heard a rumor.
Perhaps you have heard it, too. God is alive in the White House!

• "Cocker Power" Flys High •

"Joe Cocker / Mad Dogs and Englishmen" could also be called "Woodstock Revisited." Filmed in the traditional Woodstock style (divided screen, stereosound in a semi-documentary form), "JC /MD&E" sounds great, looks good and is absorbing. The film shows highlights from Joe Cocker's Trans-American rock concert tour. Traveling along with Joe is his family, consisting of groupies, dogs and babies that number over a hundred.

The film covers clips of Joe's concerts in the "Pleasure Palaces of America." The screen is usually divided into three small screens and the viewer is treated to different happenings. The stereophonics soundtrack enhances constant intrigue. The color is very good and offsets the use of black and white, which is used throughout the film.

JOE COCKER / MAD DOGS AND ENGLISHMEN — Traveling commune flies high.

The movie editing is fast paced, alternating with songs and some of Joe's views. Two memorable views are a conversation with the "butter Queen" and Joe driving down Main Street in Dallas. The "Butter Queen," a groupie, relates details of her personal life and she is definitely not camera shy. Driving down Main Street, Joe and his friends barely miss causing an accident. One of Joe's friends points out where President Kennedy was killed, and where Lee Oswald was supposedly standing with the gun.

The only fault of JC /MD&E is the omission of mellow songs. The constant loud Rock is hard on the audience's ears after the first hour.

By the end of JC /MD&E, the viewers know that "Cocker Power" is here to stay.

his findings and recommendations at some later date. The student council was asked to provide answers to several pertinent questions, namely how many students are benefited by the P.E. Department and what the most important priorities for the Council are.

Poon called his second proposal to send student representatives to future Board meetings as a necessary step in bringing the board and the students closer together and allowing the students a chance to air their gripes and grievances to the Board members.

Many of the Board members expressed fears that such an action would constitute a bypassing of the Student Review Board and one board member, Dr. Gossby, brought up the possibility that the Board of Governors could be used as a court of appeals for students who the Student Review Board was unable to help.

The Board voted to allow for a position near the top of the agenda at each future meeting for student grievances.

Apathy Blamed For Small Turnout At Ecology Forum

Student apathy was blamed for the poor attendance at an Ecology Forum sponsored by the Newman Club on April 19, 20, 21.

The forum, which was held in order to bring about increased public interest in problems relating to environment in California and particularly the Bay Area, was attended by only 55 students. Newman Club spokesman, Dennis Cox, attributed the poor turnout to "apathy in the student body."

Those people who did participate in the affair heard representatives from industry, utilities, government and anti-pollution groups talk about pollution in the Bay Area and what was being done to eliminate the problem. The speakers included Paul Bran from the Air Pollution Control District; James Robertson from the Federal Environmental Protection Agency; David Soblin, Community Information Officer for BART; Harold J. Taylor, Regional Planning Engineer for California Division of Highways; and William Brunot, a nuclear engineer from P.G.E. Air and water pollution, highway landscaping, and problems of mass transportation were among the subjects discussed.

A highlight of the conference was the showing of the film, "The Gifts," which was nominated for an Academy Award as best short documentary.

The Newman Club has scheduled a similar forum, concerning some other issue of importance, for either the end of the current semester or the early part of the fall semester.

Jerry Hoskin, one of the students involved, said there are about 50 teachers applying for the position and that the final decision will be reached sometime toward the end of May.

Transfers Becoming Easier

Chancellor Sidney Brossman of the California Community Colleges said students seeking transfer into California State Colleges now find it easier than a year ago.

"We intend that every Community College transfer student has a place guaranteed in State College," said Brossman. "There's been a great deal of improvement, but there's room for more."

Brossman, speaking April 19 at the Sacramento Inn to California Community College Student Association, said "students are the greatest asset we have."

Brossman told them Community Colleges are perceived well by general public, the Legislature and the State Administration and that students can take most of the credit.

"Many of the gains made by the California Community Colleges are because of your hard-work within the system," he said. "I hope you'll continue this record."

Avant-garde Music on campus

A program of new music will be given next Thursday, April 29th, at 11am in the College Theater. Especially featured will be recently deceased Igor Stravinsky's Piano — Rag — Music (1919), plus an avant-garde composition from Vietnamese composer Nguyen-Thien-Dao for flutes, piano, brushes, and radio, and John Cage's "Water Music" (with real water). Bay area composers, Charles Boone and Anthony Gnazzo, will also have works performed.

Performers will include CCSF music faculty member, Madeline Morton (Mueller), pianist; Amy Kusian, flutes and percussionist; and Lawrence Blackshere accompanied by Julian White, pianist. Charles Boone will provide commentary before each composition.

Horticulture has Turf Trials

About 1,050 square feet of lawn grass (otherwise known as turf) has been planted on the south side of The Visual Arts Building.

The seven samples of turf have been donated by Cal-Turf, one of the largest growers of turf in this nation, to give Ornamental Horticulture a chance to use living materials to make an "instant" lawn.

The samples will also aid in a study of how these type of grasses stand up under the pesky San Francisco climate.

Hillsman Declines Discussion On Censuring Of Black Activist

By David Boitano

Black activist "Brother Black" has been officially censured by City College officials. The letter of censure was sent to Black by Dean of Men Ralph O. Hillsman, and placed on Black's permanent record.

The censure revolves around a speech given by Black on March 19 at the Free Speakers' Platform. His failure to secure permission from the Associated Students activities office to use the speaker's platform resulted in a violation of section G-2 of the Student Governance Code. For this and for (so informed sources have stated) faculty complaints filed against Black, stemming from his use of the loudspeaker near Bungalow 5, Black has been officially reprimanded.

In an open letter to all students, Black referred to Dean Hillsman, saying that "He apparently does not want black students to unite on this campus. I do not feel I have violated the Student Governance Law in any respect."

BROTHER BLACK — Says Hillsman doesn't want black students to unite on this campus.

Dean Hillsman declined to discuss the censure, owing to a regulation which he said "forbids a teacher or administrator from discussing a disciplinary case with a member of the public. This rule is designed to protect the student's right of privacy."

V.D. Booth To Be Set Up On Campus

A "V.D. Awareness Booth" will be set up in Statler Wing April 29. Sponsored by the Student Advice Center, the booth will be open from 10:30am.-2:30pm. The purpose of the booth is to enlighten the students of City College to the dangers and cures of Venereal Disease. The booth is staffed by Bill Prange and Mike Chong, both students in Health Education at San Francisco State.

These two students came to City's Advice Center to set up the booth with Student Adviser Cecilia Madrid, and Mike Shen, who works with City College's Health Center. Both Prange and Chong have recently been working in conjunction with Health Center No. 5, which is part of the San Francisco Health Department.

Both Mike and Bill will be disseminating literature about V.D. and will ask students to fill out a confidential questionnaire, designed to inform the student as to how much he knows about the disease. In addition Free Condoms will be passed out to those students filling out questionnaires. For further information, contact the Student Information Center at E109 adjacent to the cafeteria.

Women Take Second In Western Fencing Competition

By Kathy Aanestad

The Women's Western Intercollegiate Fencing Competition was held April 16 & 17, 1971 at UC San Diego. The Western's is the most difficult of all intercollegiate fencing competitions because teams from all over the West participate in it.

On April 16, the Individual championships were held. Out of 64 girls, Jean Michaelis placed 2nd and Kathy Aanestad placed 7th. Michaelis came through as usual. She tied for 1st place but in the fence-off, Jean unfortunately lost. However, she took 2nd place with a beautiful trophy for her tremendous effort and hard work.

On April 17, the team championships were held. Out of 16 teams competing, the City College team placed second. It is with much respect and admiration to point out that CCSF was the only Junior College participating in the Westerns. There were 6 Universities, 9 State colleges, and our own City College. The University of Arizona took 1st, and L.A. State took 3rd in the team events. Connie Louie made a remarkable effort that day to help carry the team to victory. Each member of the team received a trophy, plus one for the coach, Maestro Maki. Members of the team are Jean Michaelis, Connie Louie, Kathy Aanestad, and Barbara Scott. The trophy will be placed in the Women's gym for display.

The team would like to express their gratitude to Mrs. Johnson, Head of the Women's P.E. Department, for all of her consideration, moral support, and orange peeling, when she accompanied them to San Diego as their sponsor.

R to L: Maestra Marki, Kathy Aanestad, Jean Michaelis, Barbara Scott, and Connie Louie.

Askey Sets Meet Record

By Andy Metz

Despite the mighty efforts of Derrick Williams and Larry Shields, CCSF's track squad dropped a one-point squeaker, 66-65 April 16th on City's field.

Shields and Williams, mainstays of the squad all throughout the season, once again contributed valuable points by reaping two first place victories apiece. Shields sped to a 10.3 victory in the 100 yard dash and a 22.6 triumph in the 220. Williams soared 22'9" in the Long Jump and minutes later came back to achieve a winning, personal season best of 47'8-1 /4" in the Triple Jump.

Also "on" for City was Frank Oross, snaring a second in both the shot and the discus. His distances of 46'2-1 /2" in the shot and 151'4-1 /4" in the discus were his season's best in competition. The only other victor for City was Bill Askey, with a 56.2 meet record victory in the 440 yard intermediate hurdles.

Coach Louis Vasquez, commenting after the meet said, "It was another of those meets decided by bad breaks that have been plaguing us all season. Were we to go against Foothill today, I am confident we could take them. It is just a matter of getting everybody healthy, and getting everybody "up" for the big performance in these close, crucial meets. I won't point my finger at any one individual." (Note: three of City's last four losses have been within three points of a winning margin.)

Ram's to Strike at Thunderbirds

By Jack Hansen

The diamond nine take on the Merritt Thunderbirds today at San Leandro; game time is 3:00pm. City's present record is 6-7 with the Thunderbirds maintaining a 0-13 record so far this season.

"The team is working hard but has been hampered by tough breaks. Ray Spediaci is doing a terrific job both with his pitching (5-1) and his clutch hitting, many of times winning his own games," replied Coach Domecus when asked if the 6-7 record really displayed the baseballers capabilities.

In last week's game the Ram's fell to San Jose City College Jaguars 5-3. John Farrell was the losing pitcher but was fettered by six errors causing a five run surge by SJCC in the seventh inning.

The Red and White only runs came when the bags were loaded and Spediaci sacrificed flied to scored Red Ramos. In the sixth Frank O'Leary was safe on an error, Ron Kary singled, and Creg Cohern walked to again load the bases with one out. John Farrell sacrificed to score O'Leary making it 2-0 Rams. City's only other run came in the eighth.

Golfers down Laney

By Tim Kilkenny

Lead by an outstanding performance by Mike Kerns, Steward Diamond, and Kirk Naismith CCSF's golf team dumped Laney College 45-9 at Willow Park last week.

Kirk Naismith shot a 78 and Steward Diamond had a seven over par 79. Remember that both Smith and Diamond are capable of shooting even par at Sharp's Park.

Carter, of Laney, turned in an excellent performance tallying a three over par 76; a very respectable showing.

But once again the light handed putters with never relinquishing woods and irons tasted victory. City's golf team is now 14-6 in competition.

"I was very pleased with the teams exhibition," reflected Coach Klemmer. "We have great competitors with possible futures in the golf world."

Man Behind The Scene: Ed Wong

Many students are unaware of Ed Wong, the statistician for all intercollegian athletics at City College.

He is a stringer, one who passes on information relating to major athletic activities. Ed is the man who notifies the major newspapers in San Francisco and gives a run down of the game highlights and its outstanding players. Ed has been invaluable because of his unrelinquishing dedication to CCSF and its students.

Before attending CCSF Ed used to cover both high school football and basketball games. Upon his graduation he went into the army for two years as a radio-teletype operator.

The sports section would like to thank the man behind the scene, Ed Wong, for his assistance and help.

Odyssey A Smash

The Women's P.E. department, under the supervision of Mrs. Johnson and the Dance Committee packed the Little Theatre last week. Dance Odyssey proved to be a smash. The Little Theatre was packed with standing room only to watch the women perform.

Program coordinator Robert Kuykendall had excellent assistance and help in making Dance Odyssey a sensation. Ethnic costumes were designed by Miley Furgis and Maude Reidy. Stage management was tailored to perfection by Lurie Baker. The lighting and sound set the atmosphere and was terrific. Ron Wilkinson and Mr. Kuykendall take the credits there.

Anti-War Rally Held in Memory Of 'Murders'

By Ed Hartzler

"We are here to pay tribute to our brothers and sisters who were murdered at Kent, Jackson, and Augusta and to demand an end to this terrible war."

This was the keynote address of Joe Ward of the Student Mobilization Committee at a rally commemorating the fatal shooting of students at Kent

FATHER EUGENE BOYLE

State, Jackson State, and of Black citizens of Augusta, Georgia, last May. The rally was held on May 5 at 11 am on the City College Ram and was attended by approximately 300 students.

Two Men Involved In $692 Caf Theft

City College cafeteria was robbed of $692 on May 4, by two men, one of whom was believed to be carrying a gun.

One of the suspects approached the head cashier, while the other guarded the door. An employee, who wished to remain anonymous, said the man who demanded the money appeared to be concealing a gun under his sport coat.

He was quoted as saying, "Be quiet, don't move."

The bills were piled atop the desk, but in the alleged gunman's haste, he left behind $120.

Sergeant Robert Fizter stated the campus police were initially summoned, but arrived too late to see the men.

The two suspects were described as Black males, neatly dressed, about 5'10", and of medium build.

Bookstore Robbery Hushed by Manager

Associated Students' Bookstore was robbed of $120.10 May 5, but bookstore management declined to admit that money was taken.

The Guardsman learned that a robbery did indeed take place, with the suspect making off with about $150.

Richard Main, manager of the bookstore, verified a robbery attempt, but claimed that the bandit failed to take any money.

However, Dr. Harry Buttimer, Assistant Superintendent of City College, confirmed that a robbery did occur in which $120.10 was stolen.

Main was reluctant to discuss the robbery attempt, saying, "We don't want all this publicity!"

He was apparently referring to an article in the Guardsman May 6, which revealed a holdup attempt at the bookstore on April 27 in which the suspect fled empty-handed when the clerk could not open the register.

Main's contention was that people might get the idea of attempting more robberies from reading such stories. "I don't see why," said Buttimer, in reference to Main's notion. "I would think," said Buttimer, "that printing the facts would do just the opposite."

Main mentioned that a security guard might have to be hired in order to prevent further robberies, as well as the frequent shoplifting which he says occurs daily.

Dave Hunter, who said he was on duty at the register that Wednesday evening, claimed that two Black men were involved. He stated that the suspects asked to open the register, but fled when they became nervous.

Students Request More Power in Hiring Process

By Joe Konte

Student Council fought off the question of its legality, and then proceeded to react on a letter by the City College Assistant Superintendent in regards to the open position of Coordinator of Instruction. The events took place at meetings held May 3 and 5.

The legality of the council in regards to its constitution was brought up by student Dan Atzinger, but council decided to retain the revised 1970 constitution until the issue can be put to a general vote by the student body. (See complete story on this page).

Dr. Harry Buttimer had originally sent a letter to council concerning the formation of a tripartite interviewing committee (consisting of students, faculty, and administration) in which two

Council 'Invalid' Claims Former PR Director

By Joe Konte

Associated Students Council of City College was termed "illegal," and its Constitution declared "invalid" by its former publicity director in a letter he read to council May 3.

Dan Atzinger, who also ran for a council seat in last years' election (missing out by only twelve votes) presented a three page summary of evidence, and called the "entire 1970 election a farce."

Atzinger charged that the changes made in the 1970 Constitution from the old 1966 Constitution had to be "presented to, and passed by, the general student body (Article V, Section 1, Part C of the 1966 Constitution). The Constitution in its revised and updated form has not been passed in this way," Atzinger points out.

Eight complete sections have been dropped from the Constitution. These sections, in addition to the various other parts and sentences dropped, comprise a total of over 1300 words deleted from the Constitution, according to Atzinger's statistics.

Art Samuels, Dean of Student Activities, had admitted previously that the present Constitution was only a revision of the 1966 document. He cited revisions as the dropping of such defunct groups as Council of Organizations as being the only changes.

However, there were many changes besides simply eliminating sections. The grade requirements for the President were lowered from 2.2 to 2.0, and the

Blood Drive Another Success

The 17th annual City College Blood Drive has been termed a "success" by its publicity chairman.

Ed Lew said that "we get better every year," in reference to the number of pints donated to the school's drive.

This year's event, which expanded to three days for the first time, accumulated 467 pints of blood. A total of 535 possible donors registered, but 68 were turned down for various reasons such as illness or being underweight.

In discussing the idea of the added day to the drive, Dean Ralph Hillsman and the faculty have supported the idea of keeping the blood drive on a three day basis.

Last year, City College totaled 703 pints, and may top that mark in 1971. The drive technically lasts until April 15, 1972, where the donor can accredit blood during the year to the City College account.

Among those who assisted in the publicity and the carrying out of the progress in this year's drive included Barbara Rosenthal's 26B class in cooperation with the sponsors, Greek Council.

Let's Check out the System Before we Charter the Bus

By Jim Toland

The controversy on school busing still rages in San Francisco as well as in other Bay Area, State, and national communities.

Although the supporters of school busing mean well, they are doing more harm than they are doing good.

These people feel that forced integration on the grade-school and high school levels is the answer to the deficiency of quality education in the ghetto areas.

This is an unfortunate illusion on the part of the busing supporters. Forced integration can only aggravate the tense situations now existing in the ghetto areas of the nation and especially in the impoverished areas of San Francisco.

When you bring a busload of black children into a white neighborhood or a busload of white children into a black neighborhood, you have a very basic class problem. The children will usually be exact opposites, economically.

The white children, from an all-white neighborhood that are chosen to be bused, will usually be from a financially secure middle class family. They will be well fed, well clothed, well protected and sheltered. They will probably be from Saint Francis Woods or from somewhere in the Sunset district.

Since these programs always make the most absurd of choices, they will naturally choose as classmates for this child, a group of poor black children who do not have the good fortune to be well-fed or well-clothed. Since poverty does not provide for such, the black child will not be sheltered or well protected. He will probably be from Hunter's Point or the Fillmore district.

When school is in session, the white child will begin to develop a superiority complex over his black classmates. He will notice that most of the black children are skinny and poorly dressed. He will begin to think that he is better than they are because of his training to associate human worth with material wealth.

The black student, on the other hand may also develop an inferiority complex because he cannot keep up with his white classmates when they show up at school with bulging lunch bags. Or else he will grow to despise and resent the white children for their flaunting of the things that he does not have. Both situations are unhealthy for the black children.

The black children will become more and more frustrated by the advantages and comforts that their white classmates take for granted, and they will desperately strive to get them.

With younger children, the problem usually comes to a head and manifests itself in small fistfights and in minor thefts.

The sadness of course being, that the white kids do not realize that they are tormenting the blacks and that they are getting what the blacks feel that they deserve. The whites end up suffering, too.

When black or white high school students are bused they are regarded as invaders on others' turf. As students get older they become more serious. So do their problems.

Race riots and bloodshed are not an unusual occurrence in these situations. They are not even the exceptions.

Balboa High School, the nearest public high school to City College, has had several killings in recent years directly attributed to inharmonious racial planning. So this idea is not too far-fetched.

There are two ways to bring better quality education to the ghetto children as well as harmonious integration to the schools.

1) Hire only well qualified and proficient instructors and pay them to teach rather than to babysit, as some of them now prefer to do.

2) Let the schools integrate naturally, bringing whites and blacks together who have similar socio-economic backgrounds and who live in similar neighborhoods.

White people and black people both hate to have things forced upon them. The hatred mounts when they realize that those who would do the most forcing understand the problems the least.

Saving our Sinking Ship

By James Parsons

It is the hope of many that President Nixon will give high, if not first, priority to America's critical need for overall economic stability.

The year-to-year press of inflationary pressures have found all of us demoralized and exhausted upon a treadmill that millions of citizens neither sought nor asked for.

It becomes urgently apparent that precious little time is left — tomorrow's deliberate action must be delivered today.

Mandatory price-wage laws are regarded as political anathema by the leadership of both major political parties. And to compound the situation, our several leaders fail to counter with workable alternatives.

In the national interest, it would be most prudent for Mr. Nixon to issue a plea to management-labor leaders that they sit down eyeball-to-eyeball and mutually agree to a five year moratorium on price-wage negotiations. This failing, the president should feel free to invoke without fear of voter retaliation, binding price-wage restrictions throughout the nation.

All of us have learned with hard and bitter regret that there is no such thing as "a little inflation." A thrifty and famous American, Benjamin Franklin, once said: "A small hole sinks a large ship."

Kent State a Year Later

By Christal Green

Tuesday May 4, 1971 marked a day of mourning and memories for people across the United States. It was exactly one year since the anti-Vietnam War demonstration at Kent State in which four students were killed by the National Guard.

The nation took this day exactly one year later, to reawaken the country about the tragic affair at Kent State. Newsmen made interviews with family members of the dead students on nationwide television. No one was allowed to forget the scene.

Since this event took place many Americans have lost respect for the National Guard. They use harsh words such as "mercenaries" or "sadists" to describe them. Yet, who looks at the National Guard's side of the story?

The majority of these boys are against the war themselves; that's why they joined the guard — so they wouldn't have to go and fight in a war they didn't believe in. More than likely, they are also college students, just like the ones at Kent State that they were sent to guard. They were taken out of their schools, away from midterms and girlfriends, and sent across the country to a campus in Ohio to watch a demonstration in which the college ROTC building was burnt to the ground.

The National Guard was spit upon and harassed by the Kent state students; kids their own age. The situation of angry mobs was new to many of the guardsmen, who reacted in a frightened manner, not a mercenary one. So why can't this nation let the old story die, and revive it next year on its second anniversary?

They Picked the Right Place for Bombing

By David Boitano

The recent demolition of a Congressional restroom by Washington D.C. radicals must surely be "rated" as one of the most repulsive acts of anarchy in our nation's history.

Such acts of vandalism serve only to bolster reactionary sentiment against the bomber's cause. Thus, those who wish to work constructively toward the achievement of their goals, are thwarted by the reactionary sentiment indirectly bolstered by the bomber's act.

It is doubtful, however, that Leslie Bacon and her follow conspirators had any goal in mind when they exploded a bomb in the restroom of the Capitol building. This doubt is supported by the fact that (according to newspaper accounts), Miss Bacon ran messages for Abbie Hoffman and other known radicals who adhere to a philosophy of disruption for its own sake.

In the future, the Capitol police might maintain better surveillance in the Capitol building to insure that similar activists do not force a repetition of the bombing.

There is, however, one puzzling fact remaining. It is the fact that the bombing took place inside of a men's toilet. That says a lot about Miss Bacon, her co-conspirators, and their political philosophy.

A Look at Some Performing Seals in Politics

By Bob Forman

Hurry, hurry, hurry! The great game of political performing seals is ready to begin!

In the center ring is that master of balancing the ball of the people's hopes, Dick, Nixon! He may sometimes drop the ball, but his fans know he always does even that with the best interests of their circus at heart.

Trying to crowd Dick out now is Ed Muskie, a seal with a growing fan club who wants to take the fish away from Dick and his fans and distribute them more equitably — among themselves.

Aloofness is the strategy of that old seal Hubie Humphrey. He has a following who can take his bite, but his bark! He lives in hopes the other seals will grow tired and drop the ball. He remains out of the ring looking on.

Georgie McGovern is climbing into the ring on his belly. He is a self-righteous seal who needs no fans. He knows everyone is for him.

Ted Kennedy, a seal with very loyal fans and a famous name does not even come into the ring. He plays hard to get.

Other seals from the opposing circus remain outside the ring. Their fans try to persuade the lighting booth to divert the spotlight to their seals occasionally.

Paul McCloskey is a clever seal who managed to pretend he is not interested in the reward fish. He plays the game for its own sake, his face cries.

All these seals will shortly be playing at your local fairgrounds. Their performance has been overlong. Boycott both circuses. Tell them to put on a better act or lose our business altogether.

Dear Diary

By Ron Patrick

Dear Diary,

In order to insure against subversive opponents infiltrating my coming national elections, further precautionary measures should be initiated forthrightly.

Sanctions have been placed against major news media to facilitate "objective" reporting in my favor, and disciplinary measures against non-loyal journalists have been enacted.

But, it would seem that more than this is necessary to assure my political survival. Therefore, I have ordered the National Legislature to appropriate funds for major additions to the Con Son Annex and full-scale operation of the National Surveillance and Counter-Insurgency Systems, with aid of U.S. Intelligence, of course.

I assume that these safeguards will satisfy Mr. Nixon in his quest for "the right of the South Vietnamese peoples to self-determination." He only regrets that his re-election to the Presidency could not be so easy.

President Thieu

. . .Now Henry, will the real Secretary of State please stand up?

Bill Rogers

. . .Well, it appears that Jane Fonda is pulling in more publicity being against the war, than I am, being for it. And we both know, dear diary, that publicity means money. And, "where there's money, there's sentiment," like I always say.

Bob Hope

. . .and I realize that Patty will be greatly disappointed when she hears that she'll have to continue her graduate studies back East. But Ronnie knows best. He says that a college education in California will be just "too damned expensive" once his proposals go through, and we can't really afford it anyway. What I want to know is, if we can't afford it, who can?

Nancy Reagan

then I proposed that we add one disciplinary measure to the Hotel and Restaurant Department's by-laws. Namely, any student engaged in the preparation of food for the school cafeteria, who either knowingly or innocently, uses one more speck of agricultural fertilizer for seasoning purposes in the hamburger patties, will be subject to an automatic "F," suspension, or both.

Laying Down The Law Could Be Hazardous to Your Mind

By Bruno R. Forner

The FCC sounds like someone's report card, but it isn't. It stands for the Federal Communications Commission.

Recently, the FCC tried its hand at laying down the law when it comes to drug-oriented lyrics. Songs that were blacklisted include "White Rabbit," "The Acid Queen," "Along Comes Mary" and fifteen other "dangerous" songs.

If this keeps up, the FCC may have to blacklist "Tea for Two." After all, "Tea" rhymes with "T" which is the first letter in the word "tranquilizer."

How about "Stardust." The "dust" might be a powdery drug like "mescaline."

"Smoke Gets In Your Eyes" might connote some type of weed being smoked — say "marijuana."

A few years back; the FCC tried stamping out sex lyrics. When you look at it, every song that doesn't have a dangerous drug lyric (like the ones above, and "Bottle of Wine" and "That Little Old Windedrinker Me" that are also drug oriented) deals in some way with sex.

"Tiptoe Through The Tulips" doesn't tell you what they're doing in the tulips, does it?

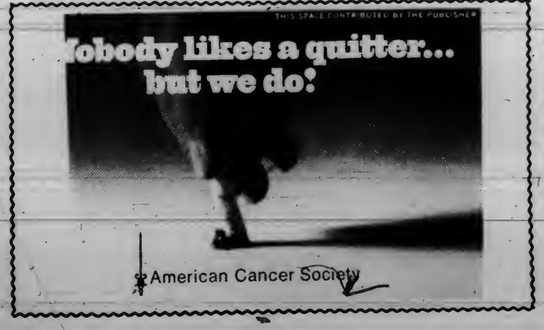
I'm not going to bore you with other frivolous examples, because by now you can pretty well tell which songs are subversive and dangerous — all of them!

They can't do this to us! They can't take away our music. If they do, Grace Slick and Bill Graham will be out of a job.

I've got an idea. Why doesn't President Nixon appoint Bill Graham and Grace Slick as FCC Commissioners? And then we can make Frank Sinatra the chairman. And then . . .

There is Another Viewpoint

By Marvin Francis



I am disgusted by the self-righteous putdown of La Raza. People are angry because the Brown Berets called some white people "Honkies."

It's long past time some people understood the truth. We have been Niggered, Chinked, Spicked, and Gooked for four hundred years, and we can't forget that overnight.

The motorcycle gangs murdered a Black man at Altamont and assaulted scores of others, and all you hear is, "Hee, hee, hee, boys will be boys." But when La Raza calls a bunch of people "honkies" people get upset.

The people who are disturbed by La Raza's actions at the recent peace rally should ask themselves if one afternoon's worth of verbal abuse balances four hundred years of social abuses, inhumanity, and caste on the scales of justice.

If the truth still can't be seen, I suggest people brace themselves, and expect lots more of the things we witnessed at the rally in the future.

An Alternative Solution To a Rapidly Dying Art

By Joe Konte

Are you tired of taking notes in boring classes with boring teachers?

I've been taking notes for four semesters at City College and the tragic toll has already taken effect. At last count, I had used up seventeen pens. Twelve ran out of ink, four were lost, and one broke in my pocket, leaving me with blue keys and blue coins (not to mention a few choice blue words).

Eleven notebooks have been filled from cover to cover over the tedious grind, representing the spoken word of many of the campus' most noteworthy lecturers.

I've suffered a severe case of writers' cramp, and at the point of this writing, only two of the original five fingers are in working order. From now on, I'll be known as lefty.

Other minor ailments acquired as a result of note taking include drowsiness, increased daydreaming; and chapped lips from chewing on my bic pen.

For my pain, I've acquired such vital information as formulas in chemistry, and data on Henry IV.

After all this, I can't tell a chemistry formula from a baby formula; and all I know about Henry IV is that he came between numbers III and V.

But I am not one of those chronic complainers. You see, I have a solution to put more life back into lectures.

So as a public service, I am forming a club: Youth Against Worthless Note-taking (Y.A.W.N.).

To gain membership, you must turn in the pencil which you borrowed forever from your neighbor when you forgot your pen; a page of your best doodlings; and a note from your doctor describing the arthritic pain in your writing hand.

YAWN shall march on all long-winded teachers and demand that they burn their lecture notes. Those who refuse will be captured and forced to sit and listen to their own lectures.

YAWN shall liberate all students who sit in boring classes daily under the disguise of education.

YAWN shall hold an anti-notetaking rally at the Rams head to denounce the repressive lecturers.

We in YAWN shall no longer tolerate the monotonous drone of the lecturer at City College whose idea of education is a couple of pages of notes.

Remember that you were warned here first. The revolution is coming. Will you be sitting passively in your biology lecture hall when it comes?

Become involved and join YAWN. Write on!

Take Dick for Instance - Or Take Dick for Worse

By Janet Kramer

Mr. Aspiring President, 1972, you may look healthy, apple-cheeked, of sparkling eye and unfurrowed brow — you may have the lean, lithe figure of a young gymnast, or health club devotee, but how will you appear in 1976?

If you want a clue, without needing to employ the services of a professional artist, or consulting the astrologist's crystal ball, why not check the photo files. Take a long, hard look at your predecessors and evaluate. Before the election, during the term of office, and after. Note any changes?

Take Dick for instance. Putting a little weight on are we? Do I detect a stoop (could it be a slump) about the shoulders? My, what a well charted forehead you have. By the way, haven't you altered your hairstyle? Getting a bit thin on top? Is that the frosted-tips look I see you're favoring? They say graying at the temples is terribly dapper!

The scene . . . At the White House, Pennsylvania Ave., Washington D.C.
The time . . . 1972.
Mother Pat, is peaking (piquing?) at the family photo album, occasionally she glances up and across at her husband, Dick.

Pat: (sighing) Darling, you looked so young and handsome, so full of pep, so, mmm, 'not a care in the world' and it was only a couple of years ago when you had this shot taken!

Dick: You know, I've been feeling a little run down lately, (turns) Trish dear, grab a pad and pencil and take this down.

(stands, and begins pacing the floor, thoughtfully).

"My top level, high powered executive post is soon to be vacated. We are shopping for someone to step into my shoes. No experience necessary. The candidate applying for the job however, must be able to cope with a variety of problems at any one given time. He must have a panache for handling people from all walks of life. Basic requirement: knowledge of public relations." Then call the Classified section of the Washington Post and ask them to put this in as soon as possible and let it run for a while. Tell them to bill U.S. citizen.

Anyone for President?

The Many Uses of Spiro Agnew

By Roger Righton

Let's face it, one of these mornings we will wake up and not find Spiro Agnew as our Vice-President.

I'm not really worried, though, because there are a lot of areas that Mr. Agnew can easily find work in.

Show business offers him several opportunities. There is a role just made for him in the musical version of "The Selling of the Pentagon."

He can even play the role of Oscar in the television version of "The Odd Couple" (he'd have to play opposite Bill Buckley, of course).

If he chooses comedy, he'd make an excellent straightman for that greatest of all natural comics: Senator J. William Fulbright.

Maybe Mr. Agnew can settle down and write a couple of books. Subjects he has become an authority on are: "How To Play Tennis In One Easy Lesson" and "The Selling of the Hearst Syndicate."

Then there are sports.

We all know that Mr. Agnew is a whiz at golf, so why can't he have his own golfing empire? He can begin a chain of country clubs all across the country, publish "Golfboy" magazine (with a center fold-out picture of Arnold Palmer), and also have a chain of golfing boutiques.

There is just one little problem. Mr. Agnew's picture is posted on the bulletin board of every golf course in the nation. It says "Wanted" right above it.

Personality of the Week

Meet dynamic City College student Marvin Francis, the plumber's son. Marvin didn't waste any time forfeiting a basketball scholarship to college when his father convinced him that he could earn nine dollars an hour as a plumber.

Having no burning passion to become a plumber and lacking a student deferment, Marvin left his Bronx, New York home at 19 to avoid the draft. He took to the road and headed for San Francisco.

Marvin reflected on an incident enroute: "I was walking along the railroad tracks in McCook, Nebraska on my way to the Greyhound bus depot. I guess I attracted a lot of attention from the natives, who had never seen a Black person. Suddenly I turned around, man, and there was this group of people gaping at me." Hastily purchasing a bus ticket, Marvin grabbed his paranoia and departed.

In San Francisco, a bout with hepatitis inspired Marvin to return to the Bronx. One dreary winter's day he became the fourth passenger in an unheated VW camper driven by an unlicensed one-eyed LSD devotee, who stayed high clear to Boulder Dam. On the Eisenhower Expressway in Chicago, the highway police stopped the camper for not having appropriate license plates and jailed the driver. After helping to bail him out, Marvin decided to continue solo, thanks to the generosity of a brother who wired him busfare.

Marvin hung around the east coast long enough to attend the Woodstock music festival, which he found disappointing. "Lines for the john were, like wow, you would not believe it! Two hundred fools in one line. Not enough of anything to go around. And I was too far away to hear the music, which was my reason for being there."

Coming out to San Francisco once again, Marvin shared an apartment in the Haight Ashbury with a big-time drug dealer known as "Superspade," whose name made headlines when he was murdered. Superspade had supposedly gone to Marin County with $60,000 in a paper bag to buy some drugs. Marvin didn't learn that Superspade had been stabbed and shot until he read it in the newspaper next day.

Before the Haight disintegrated into crime and violence, Marvin used to see such revered hips as Timothy Leary, Alan Ginsburg and Paul McCartney in the neighborhood. The peaceful tone of the Haight changed when riots occurred several years ago. Street people and local artisans attempted to turn Haight Street into a mall and intervened to see the police "beating the Hell out of the hippies and loading them into paddy wagons."

Recently Marvin himself had an encounter with the police. He was taprevent traffic from entering. Through his living room window, Marvin could ing his garbage out when he heard a bomb go off in Park Police Station. The next day he took his camera to the scene, where he perceived the ingredients for a great photograph. A policeman holding a shotgun stood guard in front of the station, a beam of sunlight focused on his head. He asked Marvin what he was up to. Since Marvin refused to give his name, he was arrested for failure to identify himself. When he protested that he hadn't broken any law, the policeman told him "Well, you broke MY law." Marvin was then booked, fingerprinted and jailed overnite. At the hearing, even the judge laughed as he dismissed the case. "Go on back to school," he told Marvin. Commenting on police tactics, Marvin readily spewed forth his interpretation of the arrest: "Everybody is treated like a criminal. Guilty until proven innocent, especially if you're Black." Marvin feels that this type of prejudice stems from a fear of Blacks based on ignorance.

A more subtle form of prejudice has been experienced by Marvin in public with his white wife Cynthia and their 15 month old daughter, Michelle. "Like in Cost Plus, man, a dude from Oregon will point at us and whisper to his wife 'Lookit this, lookit this'."

And how does Marvin feel about the popular form of prejudice known as male chauvinism? Cynthia does stay at home watching soap operas. When queried whether a woman belongs in the home, Marvin replied that "people belong where they want to be."

Interview: Local Cat Burglar

"Ace" is a full-time student at City College during the day. At night he moonlights as the "North Beach Cat Burglar."

"I've never been caught, because I'm too cool," he stated in an interview with the Guardsman Monday.

"I steal anything; I don't specialize yet." Ace has been engaged in his profession for almost five years.

"It really bugged me when I was in high school and all the other kids had money and cars and nice clothes and I didn't." Ace soon remedied the situation.

"I started out by busting into cars and taking things. I'd sell the stuff to my friends or to a 'fence' in the neighborhood."

Ace has been traveling throughout the United States for the last several years. "I've lived in Chicago and New York City, mostly. The East Coast is really where the action is."

Ace eventually wants to get into bigtime crime. "I'm waiting for the big score, you know, like a bank or an armored car."

One of Ace's heroes is Willie Sutton, the famous bank robber who was recently released from prison. "He's really great; he had class. He pulled a lot of jobs and was professional enough not to have harmed anyone."

"I feel that ripping things off is the only true form of revolution. Most of these college schmucks up here talk about revolution, but they're just sissy middle class punks. I don't think most of them could waste a wet paper bag let alone a bull."

"No, I don't call them pigs, they just have the authority everyone else would like to have. I don't dig them very much, you know calling them pigs is just the plastic in-thing to do. An intelligent criminal has a basic respect for his opponent or adversary."

Ace is now a competent second-story man. "I don't feel guilty about stealing from anyone. Everyone is richer than I am." Ace resides in a $14 a week hotel room in the south of Market. "It's crummy but I know things are going to get better. I got my eye on some things now." Ace wouldn't elaborate.

"I don't dig drugs. I use mod clothes as a disguise. After I've made a score, I put on my peace button. I don't really dig the hip scene. It's hypocritical and phony. The middle class chumps say they are anti-materialistic but they would give you a nickel if you asked them for it.

"Look," said Ace, "I'm at the bottom of the barrel; I'm an American citizen; I'm poor and I'm White. All my life Blacks, Chicano's and every other minority have taken out their frustration on me. They see the establishment and the social structure in this country and just assume that all White people have money, so they'd jump on me."

"These days the establishment has developed a guilt complex so they give preferential treatment to all of the minorities. Minorities get the jobs, the welfare, all of the Educational Opportunities Program grants and most of the scholarships. I'm tired of being walked on."

"I want to be a criminal, because the average man works all his life and maybe saves up $20,000. Why should I go through all that aggravation, when I can make that much in a single afternoon, if I make the right score?"

The funniest thing to happen to Ace during his career was, "One night I was popping the window on this Volkswagon van when I look up and staring at me from an apartment window is some guy and his old lady. I yelled up, 'Jesus Christ, I got to make a living too!' They just nodded and pulled down the shade."

Ace is interested in political science and criminology. "The political science can teach me about the biggest crooks, the politicians. Criminology teaches me the tactics that the police will employ to catch me, which puts me a step ahead of them."

Ace sums up his philosophy by saying, "I'd like to leave my schoolmates with this thought: There is no gravity, the world sucks."

Strange Structure on Campus Draws Interest

The structure is good shelter from recent wet weather.

Necessity is the Mother of invention. . . Frustration is the Father of creativity"

Story and Photographic Essay by Wythe Bowe

For those who frequent the Visual Arts Building, the structure in the accompanying photos are a familiar sight.

Technically known as a "3 Frequency Icosahedron," this structure was erected by students and non-students of Art 2A, under the benevolent eyes of Alan Brooks, instructor of the class. Commonly known as a "geodesic dome" this rather futuristic arrangement was conceived and designed by Mike Geminagini and Frank Philips, with the aid of two other good souls who weren't even students. In this day of dropouts, it's nice to see some drop-ins.

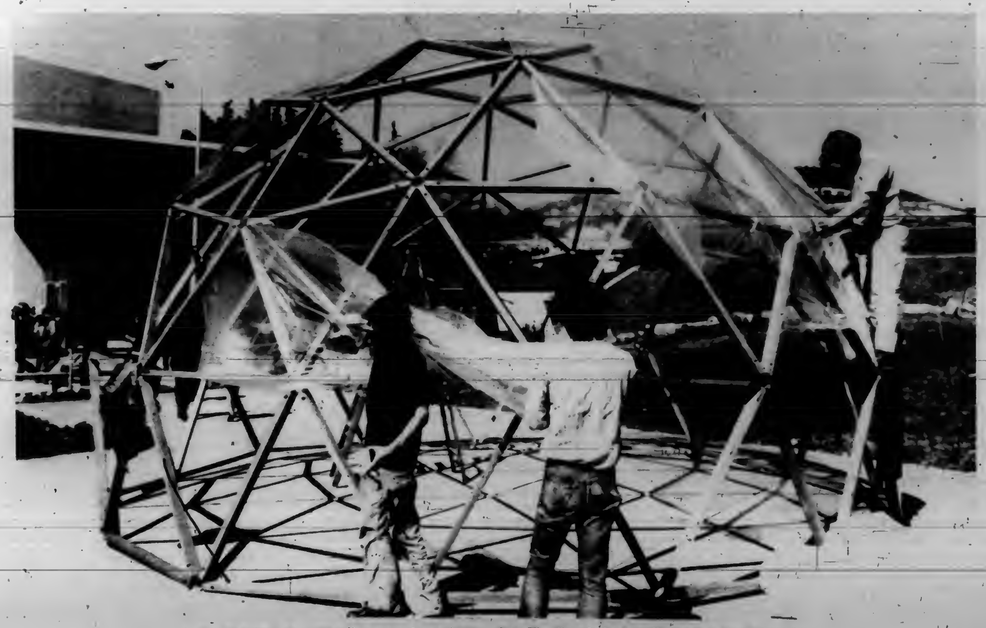
Following an original design by a man named Fuller (1938) and funded by the ceramics section, construction was begun last fall.

But why? This chap Fuller designed the original structure as a kind of easily attainable dwelling, which could be inexpensively constructed by someone with little or no technical skill. In short it can replace many kinds of conventional architecture as a truly environmental dwelling. Its shape is natural and sympathetic to that of the earth. For what it's worth, it is identical in basic structure to the polio virus. But that's another story all its own.

Beyond this interesting (hope) story however, is one a little depressing.

Originally, the dome was intended to be student area, a small but natural surrounding in which people were already gathering, to play guitars, talk, and groove.

But all good things seem to come to an end. Over the Easter break, parties unknown ripped the polyethylene covering off the wood frame.



What happens now? Alan Brooks and the people involved in the project would like to see the dome serve some kind of function on campus — an organic bar, something in which students could take part directly. Not take it apart.

At an administrative meeting the other night, moral support was given, but no money; money that is needed to develop the dome and most of all make it vandal-proof.

Alan Brooks said the other day that if all else fails, he'll buy the structure and move it off campus. This is typical of the interest and concern displayed by the folks involved and it strikes me as a crying shame that some empty-headed BLEEP or BLEEPS had to go wreck a good thing. What a world.

Students hang around Frequency Icosahedron.

A new structure on campus has caused much attention. The "geodesic dome" was a project of Art 2A.

Rally Commemorates Last Mays Killing of Students

While the speakers stuck to the theme presented in the keynote speech, that of ending the war and preventing future student deaths, their speeches revealed a market disagreement over the methods that should be employed to attain this goal.

Some speakers advocated the present method of large-scale peaceful marches and demonstrations; others, however, questioned the effectiveness of such demonstrations and in a few cases, condemned the crowd for sitting around listening to speeches instead of working to end the war.

Bonnie Shepard of the SMC praised the Spring Offensive, which she said came about, "When we saw Nixon's peace plan in action in Laos, when we saw it fail."

"What better way to honor these martyrs," she asked, "than to build the anti-war movement?"

TRINIDAD LOPEZ — Chicanos constitute 25% of the dead in Vietnam.

Also referring to the Kent, Jackson, and Augusta dead as "martyrs in one of the most tragic events in our country's history," Father Eugene Boyle of San Francisco's Sacred Heart Church reminded those present not to "forget those who have gone to prison, and those who have suffered to convince this country to get out of Southeast Asia."

He announced that the National Council of Priests had recently passed resolutions supporting immediate withdrawal from Southeast Asia, an end to the draft, and the freeing of the Berrigan Brothers and the Harrisburg 6, accused of plotting to kidnap Presidential Adviser Henry Kissenger.

Trinidad Lopez of the La Raza Unida Party said that the war was taking money away from social welfare programs, causing unemployment, and causing a disproportionate amount of deaths among Chicanos.

"While the Chicano people represent about 15 to 20% of the population," he said, "We constitute 25% of the dead in Vietnam."

Jocelyn Won of the Asian Association for Unity; Jack McCloskey, president of City College Vets for Peace; and former Associated Students Publicity Director Dan Atzinger all expressed criticisms of the goals of the rallies and some of the people involved in them.

"People talk about peace, but the real problem is the future of the Asian people," said Wong. "It is imperialism we should be concerned about. We, the Third World Students, agree with the Black Panthers; America is the mother country and we are victims of colonialism."

Atzinger announced that he had been at the Montgomery Street demonstrations that morning and "was going back down there again."

"The plan was to disrupt as peacefully as possible, but Alioto has decided that even civil disobedience is violence — so you may get your head busted anyway. The people that are going down there are showing that they are willing to oppose the war by doing something about it, instead of just talking about it."

Describing himself as a "man who spent thirteen months in this lousy war," McCloskey told the assembled students that he was "sick of giving speeches," and that "war is going on here."

"You trained me," he yelled, "you sent me there. Now there are a million more like me who are bringing the war home. This is your campus, your environment, you change it."

Bobby Duer of the Women Against the War contingent announced that many women who have never before participated in any marches, are now uniting to oppose the war.

The rally ended with a plea for non-violence and love, by a young man describing himself only as an "Independent named David."

Council Declared 'Invalid' Due to Constitutional Changes

unit requirement from 42 to 24. The minimum units a council member must carry from the previous semester was also changed from 12 to 10.

These, plus other numerous amendments, caused Atzinger to wonder if Samuels' statement (that the present Constitution was a mere revision of the valid 1966 Constitution) was "either a self-declaration of serious negligence or a devious attempt to cover up the facts and keep this council in a cloak of innocence."

Atzinger went on to call for the formation of a Reconstitutional Committee, the halting of illegal council activity, a new election for council now, and the resignation of Dean Samuels for his failure to properly inform council, and his negligence of duty to the students of this campus."

The latter remarks brought on a roar of laughter among those present at the meeting, and also placed some embarrassed smiles on the red faces of Samuels and the council members.

Bonnie Solomon was the most outspoken of the council members in discussing the shocking discovery. Solomon offered that in 1970, council "approved the revisions as a matter of expediency."

She also stressed that it "was not an attempt to deceive the students" and that the Constitution had to be ratified to be used as a "working base" for council. "We will try to get it to the student body at a later date," she explained.

President Tom Lai commented that "we started with it and we should end with it," in referring to the controversial Constitution.

The feeling in council was that since only five meetings were left in the semester, it would be best for council to go on with regular business, with the matter to be decided possibly through a student vote.

Students Asking for Power in New Hiring

students would participate in the interviewing for a Coordinator of Instruction. Council President Tom Lai and another student would participate in the interviewing for the administrative post according to Buttimer.

Numerous objections were voiced by some council members and students in attendance that other campus organizations should be consulted in the hiring process.

Charlie Smith, one of the most vocal opponents of accepting Buttimer's letter unless more student participation was assured, claimed council was being used by the administration.

Smith, who referred to the Third World movement and its necessity to be involved in a decision-making policy on campus, drafted a letter of reply to Buttimer.

Council considered Smith's points and finally drafted a final official letter to Buttimer in which it explained that the "difficulty we face is that we cannot legitimately claim to express the views of students while ignoring the efforts of a great many student groups."

Council said that it found "the concept of tripartite committees desirable, but that it would like to see the structure of such committees altered so that students "might have an equal voice with administration and faculty."

The letter explained that such actions would ensure that a "coalition of paid educators could not override the desires of those they serve."

. . . Elsewhere in council:

- Florence Chan who announced she was quitting her council post April 28 decided to remove her request after council voted 10-0-3 to refuse acceptance of her resignation. Chan previously expressed her displeasure with the progress of council.
- Art Samuels, Dean of Student Activities, found Councilmen Danny Martinez and Steve Marigan to be ineligible according to constitution academic requirements (2.0 gpa and 12 units). However, council voted to keep both seated, with the general feeling that grades should not be the lone criteria for removal from council.
- Barbara Rosenthal and about ten students from her public relations class left the May 3 meeting early, causing a momentary outburst by members of the audience. The slight friction occured after council refused to vote on a design for the Fall activities guide.

Council objected when the class asked them to vote on the design, complaining that the matter should come under new business.

Rosenthal claimed she "came in plenty of time," and that a decision was needed from council immediately in order to meet the printing deadlines.

Lai later informed her that the council would accept and support the design which the class chose.

Summer Correction

In the April 29, 1971 issue of The Guardsman, the announcement appeared under Campus News that "The last day one can apply for the summer session is April 30, 1971."

Warren R. White, assistant dean of instruction, amended the information, (which previously appeared in the campus bulletin), in making it clear to students that this deadline applies only to new students or students returning to the college after a considerable lapse (several semesters) in attendance.

Current City College students do not need to apply for the summer session. They merely register. Students should consult their counselor for priority number which will be the same for the Fall, on one of the following days, June 1 through 4.

Summer session schedules are available at the AS bookstore, at 10 cents a copy.

Dean White added that there will be changes in some of the times presently listed in the schedule. These will be available together with information on instructors for the courses at the time of registration.

Registration will follow the same lines as the Spring procedure.

All-American Candidate: Dennis Glass

By Jack Hansen

Dennis Glass who recently set three meet records in the Northern California Swimming Championships, is City's candidate for All-American in two events; the 200 Individual Medally and the 200 yd Breathstroke.

It's quite an honor to be even considered as an All-American candidate. Dennis Glass times have made him a constant threat in every event he swims. To be even considered as an All-American candidate one must be in the top twelve, time wise, in the nation. Of course, one must remember this is on the Junior College level but even at this elvel the competition is stiff and rigorous.

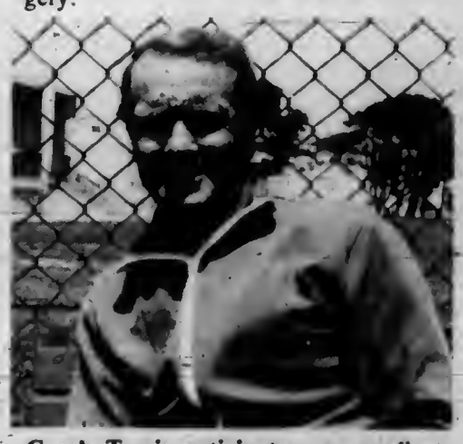
In the 200 yd Individual Medally Dennis placed thirteenth and had to swim in the consolation event. Only the six best times are eligible to swim for the title. But in the consolation event Dennis turned in the fourth best time in the nation. While in the breathstroke he placed tenth in the nation.

"I feel we got shafted on the times," stated Coach Decker. "But regardless I'm very happy Dennis has been selected as a candidate for All-American. He desires it and I foresee many more accomplishments for an excellent competitor."

Dennis Glass is CCSF's Candidate for All-American in two swimming events.

Gymnastic Exhibition Tonight

By Jack Hansen



The men's gymnasium will be the sight of the second annual gymnastics night. The night will feature the use of the parallel bars, side horse, rings, free exercise, uneven bar for women, vaulting, horizontal bars, and all around usage of equipment by Pat Avera who is excellent on all equipment.

Patty Young will also be in the limelight. Coach Travis commented that Miss Young is an outstanding performer. Patty will also be competing in the Women's National Meet to be held May 11. He also added that the primary purpose of "Gymnastics Night" is to show the public what's being done in this field where physical conditioning and coordination is a must.

The participants of this evening will consist of students from Mr. Travis's class and gymnastic team and also Miss Conrade's team.

Miss Conrade added that she hopes this evening's program will stimulate more interest in the field of gymnastics here at City College.

Miss Conrade was unable to assist in the first annual Gymnastic Night as she was hampered by back ailments. She had a back fusion last year and was out a whole semester recovering from surgery.

Coach Travis anticipates an excellent Exhibition for Gymnastics Night.

Derrick Williams is Fabulous

By Andy Metz

With the college track season coming quickly to a close, it is natural for track coaches to be concerned about team prospects in the championship meets; and next year.

Coach Louis Vasquez of City College is no exception. Now that the dual meet season is over, Coach Vasquez is looking expectantly to the Conference and Northern California finals in hopes of salvaging some glory from an otherwise highly unsatisfactory year. (Team record to date: 9-8) Commenting on the team's prospects in the final meets, Coach Vasquez said, "I have three or four men who I have lots of hope for: Derrick Williams is capable of holding his own with any J.C. athlete in Northern California in the Long Jump and Triple Jump. Larry Shields is always a threat in the 100 or 220 yard dashes. John Brooker and Bill Askey have both done fine jobs in the Intermediate Hurdles thus far this year and may do much better. Frank Oross has copped many points for us this year in the shot and duscus; he, too, may go all the way. As for next year, all I can say Derrick Williams has hopped, skipped and jumped to more first place victories as a City College trackster than any other man on the team this year. He is fast, strong and uses his explosive talents to score consistently fine efforts in the Long Jump and Triple Jump. To date, he has skyrocketed to a 48'4-1 /4" mark in the Triple Jump and a '22'9" leap in the Long Jump. In the past week, Derrick scored a third place victory in the Triple Jump at the Northern California Relays in Modesto. As all the junior colleges in Northern California were represented at the meet, his victory is a good indication of his possessing the ability to challenge any J.C. athlete at the state level. Derrick has participated in track since his sophomore year at Lincoln High School. His major at City is architecture; he hopes to continue his studies at Berkeley. "Depending," he says with a grin, "whether I can pull down a track scholarship." In the fall, Derrick uses his outstanding running and jumping abilities in eluding tacklers as a back on the football squad.

"I hope we can hang onto some of our better athletes and possibly get some first-rate transfers from high school in the fall. We had a good group of men this season but it was very small. You might say we had good quality but in small quantity. Our top men are as good as any in the conference but we lacked the depth to put together a winning season. Maybe next year!"

Derrick Williams is City's leading point gainer in Track. He is a contender in every one he competes in.

Menson Wong Rams Robin Hood

Robin Hood and his merry men were admired by the plebians in the days of old. Menson Wong is CCSF's Robin Hood. Though he cannot be compared to the legendary expert, Menson can hold his own. This was displayed when CCSF sponsored Mr. Wong in the 1971 United States Intercollegiate Archery Championships held in Arizona on May 1st.

Menson, who participated in a field of 200, took third in the American Round. The American Round consist of shooting from 40, 50, and 60 yards. In the over-all competition Menson arrowed down thirty-sixth place.

Menson Wong took a third in the American Round of the U.S. Archery Championships.

When walking around the men and womens gymnasium and the archers are practicing beware — Menson Wong is deadly from sixty yards.

Rams Down Thunderbirds

By Tim Kilkenny

Last Thursday the Rams beat Merritt CC 6-1 handing the Thunderbirds their fourteenth straight loss this season. Ray Spediaci chalked up his sixth victory and sixth complete game this season.

Spediaci faced only 28 batters giving up only four hits.

Coach Domecus confers with Red Ramos on strategy to be used. Ramos is City's "Hot Bat" presently.

CCSF's first run came in the fourth inning when Frank O'Leary was safe on an error. Randy Karp sacrificed O'Leary to third and Red Ramos singled bringing Randy home. In the fifth Dan Ferritie walked, Dan Taylor tripled scoring another run, (2-0) City, then Ray Spediaci sacrificed to bring Taylor in. Randy Karp singled in the sixth then stole second and again Red Ramos singled bringing in Karp.

Merritt's only run came in the sixth on a single and double.

In the seventh Dan Taylor singled, Spediaci walked but was forced out at second when Larry Haren hit into a fielder choose. O'Leary was then hit by a pitch to load the bases. Randy Karp drove in City's remaining runs.
